"O my prophetic soul! my Ant!"

Sir John Lubbock, M.P., F.R.S., etc., of England, is devoting a portion of his aristocratic time to the observation of ant life; so, also, are certain leisured ladies in our own land, and that reminds me that I, myself, know something about ants.

My field of observation is in the great sage-brush territory, mostly in the State of Nevada. In Nevada the ant, in various phases, is numerous and ubiquitous. He is to be found in the lowest valley and up to the top of the highest mountain of this dewless region, rushing about in his business-like style, over the rough, arid surface, and down into the lower levels of his mining works. When an ant has anything to do (as he generally has) he is sure to attend to it. He is a warrior, a robber, a builder, and a miner; but I doubt, even in the face of strong assertion, if he is an agriculturalist. It may be that he is a "stock-raiser," if his attention to plant-lice can be construed that way.

It is true that some ants, which locate their "diggins" mostly in the valleys, have a way of building mounds, like the most ancient human residents who do not reside any more in the Mississippi Valley, and also of cutting away the bunches of coarse, wild grass and sagebrush, and smoothing off the ground for, say, three feet each way in a circle. This space around their mound they keep clean as a threshing floor, cutting away everything likely to make ambuscading ground for their enemies. The mound is, I infer, a fortification, with a space cleared over which to observe and attack an approaching enemy. When the garrison in one of these fortifications falls into weakness, and the work gets too heavy for the force, a sparse growth of slender grass, from lost seed, is, for a time, permitted to spring up in the cleared space. This accident may have given rise to the assertion that the ant engages in agriculture.

There may be another reason why the mound-builders clear a space around their mound. In a colony of ants some member, or number of members, attends to the art of laying eggs. The building of eggs is said to be a very simple process—but that remark must have been made by some fellow who never tried it. The ants know all about it; but I do not know how they do it. It does hardly seem that they can lay them, because ant eggs are greater in diameter than the ant is. Yet they may lay them small and have some way of swelling them afterward.* At all events there is an awful lot of white eggs in an ant-hill; and in the dashes of big rain which sometimes fall in the sagebrush, the hill should get soaked through, so as to dampen and chill them, then the boss of the hill pipes all hands to carry out eggs and lay them in the clearing, to get dried and warmed by the sun's heat. The sides of the mound and the clearing around present a busy scene in egg-drying time. Each ant comes charging out with an egg, nearly as large as a grain of wheat, in front of his nose (if he has a nose), upborne by his arms, and after hastily, yet perfectly, putting it down in a row with other eggs, skips immediately back into the mound for another load.

When all the eggs are carried out and laid in the sun, over the cleared place and mound sides, a strong party of ants is left on guard, while the main force hurries away to forage for grass and weed seeds, to bring home bodies of either dead, or murdered, or live insects. The guard moves about among the eggs, turning them over from time to time to equalize the warmth. Egg-drying time is a season of great peril for "unborn millions" in the country of the ants. A hail storm, a drenching rain, birds, horned toads, wasps, lizards, yellow-jackets, etc., are feared yet fought at this critical period. At any time when the weather is not too cold a horse hatched and left standing over an ant-hill finds silent music enough to keep him dancing; but in egg-drying time he finds cause to put in several extra-winded, stamping kicks, enough to make the gravel fly behind him like a mild discharge of buckshot at every kick. And a man—say a poet or a preacher—found loafing about there in a state of ecstatic abstraction, is soon informed that there are things on earth worthy of his immediate attention; and this man generally attends to them right away after he receives the information.

Sometimes the noble tumble-bug† takes his walk abroad with much sable circumspection and slow dignity, and as he walketh upon his way, his great, grave intellect absorbed in some spherical problem, he is pleasantly surprised to find himself entering upon a wide space of cleared and even ground, over which his horny legs carry him with much ease and slight celerity: but anon, he finds himself more surprised, and very unpleasantly surprised, and surrounded by an army, the soldiers of which travel upward upon his several legs, as hastening human firemen do up ladders leaned against a flaming house, and, setting at naught his black coat of mail, proceed to swarm over him and assault him at all points. The idea of imminent danger at length reaches the slow intellect of the dull beetle, and with all the agility of a house on stilts he turns about to retreat, but he turns too late, the Philistines are upon him. One of his legs falls apart in pieces, then another leg, and another, until the monster rolls over a helpless hulk in the midst of the ever-increasing number of his swarming small enemies.

Then a certain force of ants—presumably the professional anatomists of the colony—are left with the corpse to make an autopsy of the remains, while the rest disperse, bearing away with them the numerous legs of poor old solemnity. Any other insect shares the same fate if the ants can catch him. There is a brownish wasp which is a regular hawk after ants, and pounces down upon Mr. Ant, to use a poetic simile, "like a hawk upon a June-bug," and bears him away on his silken wings to a death in the upper air. The yellow-jacket also, at times, but not usually, follows the example of the wasp. The yellow-jacket does not seem to have so keen a relish for the adult ant as he does for the eggs and infants. The y.-j., in higher altitudes particularly, is a ravenous carnivore; but he does not like tough meat as well as he does the tender flesh. Neither of these savage insects dares to remain longer than an instant upon the battle-ground of the ant; for with the least delay would come the warriors, who, after a sudden and fierce assault, would cling to the flying enemy through space and through life, let him fly where he would or die where he might.

The dry-land lizard—the muchly deteriorated son of that saurian sire, the iguanodon—is not averse to a plate of fresh ant; but he takes the ant unawares by lying in wait near the ant's colony, to dart his long, sticky tongue out of the end of his cunning countenance upon the hapless ant like a flash—and the ant is "gone in," while the saurian winks his eye as much as to ask, "Did anybody observe an ant anywhere about here?" There is no poetry in the remark when I say, "the saurian winks his eye," because any man, or, I don't mind if I do add, any woman, who is much acquainted with the dry-land lizard, will support me when I say that the modern saurian is a deuced cunning-looking fellow, and capable of any amount of ocular astuteness. I do not include among my saurians the newt, or water-lizard, which is a cold, slow, sprawling, slippery, disgusting species of uninteresting innocence—good enough to be an angel and ugly enough to be a saint. The dry-land lizard is "peart and chipper and sassy," very cleanly in his habits, nice enough for a companion and naughty enough to be damned—which last I have no doubt he will be if the prayers of pious ants can have the same effect which the supplications of other small creatures are supposed to have upon the Creator of both parties.

The horned toad—a saurian of testudineous proclivities—is a burglar. A horned toad is a unique reptile, or beast, or animal—I do not think he is a fish, and I will take mine oath he is no bird. I know, by the by, that there is a lot of science wasted on all these animals, reptiles, etc.; but I am not writing science—at least not word science. All the same, the horned toad is a burglar; for he goeth in the chilly night-time, when the ant is asleep in the lower levels of his works, and he burieeth his body in the surface of the ant-mound, leaving only the horny part of his head to protrude from the mound; and then and there lieth in wait for the unwary who swarm at sunrise and are taken in by a mysterious flashing instrument that cometh upon them with the irrevocable force of snap-judgment. That flashing instrument is the horned toad's tongue. To the ant this instrument, coming upon him from among the pebbles of gravel, is the direct antipodes of the renowned "clap of thunder from a clear sky." I have no doubt that authors, orators, and particularly politicians in the ant-world, describe a calamitous surprise by comparing it to "a toad's tongue from a bare mound." But the toad does not have it all his own way; for, though his head is impregnable to antibiotics, as a pebble is, his cream-colored belly is assailable. The ant, after suffering great loss in the list of "missing," finally takes in the situation, and, going below, proceeds to excavate in an upward direction till he strikes the body of the buried toad. The toad must gird up his loins or "git." He "gits." He comes out of the ground like a young earthquake, and makes haste, for the tide of victory has turned; the biting ants are adhering to his abdominal region and getting their work in without any perceptible delay. A horned toad does not make haste as does a common hop-toad. A horned toad does not hop—he shuffles. As a shuffler he has no equal—I mean as a single shuffler; for of course I do not pretend to say he can come the double-shuffle of African descent. A pretty looking figure he would cut on his hind legs trying to be a negro minstrel; but at his own shuffle he is graceful and perfect—and I hope he is happy, as his shuffle is an easy way to rub his belly along the ground, and that position is calculated to grind away adhering ant to atoms. It is a wise provision of nature that a horned toad can outrun an ant; that is to say, the toads consider it a wise provision; the ants no doubt have other views on the subject. This calls up to mind the curious fact that between fighting enemies the Providential delivery for one is Providential calamity for the other, among animals as well as among peoples.

I do not believe that lizards, toads, or insects prefer ants for food, because there are so very many ants in the sagebrush land that if they were good food the eaters of them ought to be proportionately numerous, but such does not seem to be the case. The same creatures which feed upon ants also feed upon the various flies, and I am led to believe that these creatures prefer flies for food. But the flies are only to be had in the warm summer season, while ants are out at any season in that country when there is a warm day. Your ant can stand the weather at Fahrenheit's zero, and will be actively abroad during the sunny hours of such days if the earth is perfectly dry. It is wet weather of any kind that depresses your ant, and cold wet weather sends him out of sight. More than once have I got up from bed, out of doors in the sagebrush, to find the ice half an inch thick on the water in the bucket, and yet, by a little after sunrise, the ants were carrying away the crumbs of bread as though it were mid-summer.

Flies are as ubiquitous as ants in the sagebrush, but not any way nearly as numerous. And considering how readily both these insects take to the diet of the white man, which seems indispensable to them, particularly to the flies, after they have found it, it is wonderful how they continue to live and prosper where there are no white people. The same reflection, as a side note, will apply to mosquitoes. I have camped in dark cotton-wooded cañons where no man ever set his foot, or at least no man ever slept there prior to my visit, yet the mosquitoes sang and quarreled over my sleeping face as blood-thirstily as though they had drunk human blood all their lives, leaving me in the morning with a bitten face to ask what blood they could possibly live upon when I was not there—for there were no animals, tame or wild, for miles around.

Once upon a time in a new settlement we planted the corner awning-post, in front of the store and post-office, in an ant-hill, because the ant-hill happened exactly where the post had to be; but though we dug a considerable post-hole, which played hob with the colony's calculations, they did not desert, but went to repairing the mound around the post.

So much of that as could be reconstructed each night, was kicked over and trampled down each day, and every day, from early spring-time to late autumn during the years of 1867, '68, '69, '70, '71, '72, '73, '74, and part of '75. I presume the work is still going on, but I left that country about that time, and have not since inquired; but I can inquire if any responsible person wants to know about it. The man who keeps that store has done his level best to drive away that nest of ants, but he had not succeeded at last accounts. Coal oil, coal tar, castor oil, carbolic acid, water, and many other things have been tried, but the ants refuse to evacuate the premises.

This colony of ants has, however, advanced in civilization. The awning spoken of is an evening resort in fair weather for the men of the little village, where they can smoke with great comfort, sitting in arm-chairs and having their legs resting with feet placed up on the sides of the awning-posts. At first it was a standing—perhaps more of a sitting—joke to have a party sit down at the corner post, for the ants soon caused a precipitate getting up and grotesque scattering of the sitters; but in the course of time the ants, either from discouragement or getting used to it, ceased to object, and spoiled the joke.

In the post which was inserted in the ant-hill, as aforesaid, there was a wide seasoning-crack, which began at the lower end and ran about half way up the post. I took a lath of wood and closed the surface of this crack from some little distance beneath the earth's surface to a point about one foot distant above; then I tramped and rammed the ground down tight around the post, hoping thereby to close up the entrance to the colony, but it was no long time before the ants came out of the crack over the upper end of my lath, seemingly well contented with the alteration. The surface of the post, except as to the crack in it, was planned smooth and straight, and was perpendicular every way at all points. I gave the ant, which was a red insect about as long as a barley-corn but not nearly so heavy, a full-grown grain of barley and watched him.

He (one ant) dragged the grain a distance of over two feet; he then, in some way, called another ant to his assistance, and the two, going backward in front of the barley, carried it up the perpendicular face of the post, over the top of my lath, and dropped it down the crack in the lower works. I next inclosed another barley grain in lead foil, such as comes out of a tea box, but the ant handled this grain just as he did the other. This last feat I take to be equal, comparatively, to two ordinary men going up a perpendicular surface with a load of one ton weight.

We brought the water out of Hot Creek, Nye County, Nevada, and made a little irrigated garden around our house; but there was an ant-mound in our garden, and the ants would not let anything grow on that spot where the mound was. "Drown them out," said I. Then I shoveled the ant-hill over the wall, scattering it in the road, dug a trench for the water, sank a sump-hole in the place where the ant-hill had been; then I waited, before I turned on the water, to see what Mr. Ant would do about it. Well, he came pouring but of an orifice in the precipitous side of the sump-hole, made a rapid estimate of the damages, and was about proceeding to repair them when I brought on the water in a slow but steady stream and gave him something else to think about. The water ran down to the bottom of the sump and began to rise like a silent tide toward the orifice where the ants came out. This orifice was a round hole about as large as the end of a man's little finger, and it opened upon the precipice I had made with the spade about midway from top to bottom, but there was a little ledge half an inch wide left by the spade an inch or so below this round hole. Many ants came out on this ledge and looked down upon the rising water. A few went to the water's edge, ran to and fro uneasily, and then hastened back up to the ledge. The water kept on rising more rapidly as the saturated ground absorbed it less and less. The ants seemed to comprehend the state of affairs. I turned the water on more heavily. The ants retreated into their hole, and after them "came the deluge."

I went into our house, leaving the water still running over the flooded ant colony. After an hour I turned off the water and let the deluge subside. Then, when the last water was sunk into the earth, I took a spade and dug again; but I was not a little surprised to find that some dampness but no running water had gone into the ant-works. This was easily explained by finding a ball of ants closely locked, each ant in the embrace of another, with their heads all one way. They were a little chilled and stupid on being dug out, but they soon recovered when exposed to the sun's heat. They had performed the heroic acrobatic feat of packing themselves in the orifice at the critical moment, thus shutting off the water from flooding the lower levels.

Among ants, water for domestic use may be desirable, but they can go without as easy as a mosquito can live without human blood. At Stockton Station, on the wagon road from Carson City to Reese River, there is a dug well over three hundred feet deep, and it holds the only water about there in any direction for miles; but the ants live and flourish on the surface of that arid spot. At Hot Creek, Nevada, the blacksmith wished to dig a well for water. Some one told him to dig under an ant-hill and he would be sure to find water at no great depth. He dug away the ant-hill and sank a well at that point, but he went down sixty-four feet before he struck water, while at five feet he lost all traces of ants. The theory was that ants must have something to drink, and therefore, in desert places, must dig down to the underflow of water. In fact, if the mound-building ant, the rattlesnake, the horned toad, and the dry-land lizard ever drink water or get a drop of dew for months at a time in the State of Nevada, I could not find out in ten years' residence among them when or how they do it. I have found more of these reptiles and insects in places ten miles distant from any moisture, than in any other spot.

Besides the ant I have so far spoken of in this writing, there are several others in the sagebrush land. The mound-builder, as I have said, is a red ant, about one barley-corn in length, energetic and active. His dwellings are in the valleys and open country. Alongside of the red ant comes a dark brown ant, nearly black, in fact, about half as large as the red ant, but rather more stoutly built. This latter ant does not build any mound, but burrows in the earth among boulders which are under the soil. Around the orifice of his home he throws a little circle of small gravels, or rather coarse sand, but for what purpose I am unable to conjecture. This ring is no protection against rain or snow—indeed, I should think it would act as a rudimentary funnel to guide the rain-fall into the ant-hole; and it may act as a sort of dam against the very infrequent flow of storm water in the desert. Yet, if it were for that purpose, I should judge that the ant would put it only on the higher side of the grade and in a half circle. I once came near thinking it was a mere dump of debris from below; but after I had kicked the circle away some half a dozen times only to find it promptly restored, I gave it up. The whole circle would not yield materials enough to fill a double hand, while the mound of the red ant will fill a bushel measure, or, if the colony is heavy, more than that.

I once essayed to dig out a colony of these smaller ants, but I failed to because the cunning fellows had fixed their home in a subterranean pile of boulders, thereby rendering the contract too heavy for me. I thought I would try strategy. So I went to a red ant hill, aroused the inhabitants, and when they came out to make war upon me I shoveled them up, carried them off mound and all, and dumped them down on top of the brown ants. War existed "by the act of the enemy" right off; but the result was not what I looked for. I was playing to have the red ants clear out the little brown ones, but the lesser ants proved the better fighters. They climbed up the legs of the enemy and saved them off, one after another, at the joints, until the red ant was a helpless, dilapidated trunk; and then the insatiable little brown fellows divided the abdomen from the rest of the body, by sawing through the slight connecting substance by which the ant is related to himself. Thus ignominiously perished many hundreds of red warriors. The sun went down upon this field of carnage, while silent-footed darkness came sadly from the East, like mourning Mercy, to enshroud the dead. I do not know if the victorious army slept upon the battle-field, because I shouldered my shovel and wended my way homeward, while the clash of arms was still in progress; but I called round late next morning, and found the red ants all dead, the circle of gravel restored, and the mutilated remains of the defeated host thrown out to fester in the sun, beyond the outer rim of the circle—a horrid sight in a Christian era!

The moral of these latter attainments is, that the small brown ant is no cannibal. Like a good Christian knight, he takes exquisite delight in slaying his enemy, but he will not eat him. Chivalry!

I know some more about ants; about how they are endowed with wings, and go flying about when they are in love; how they drop their wings and go to work, like other earthly angels, after love-making is accomplished. I know about the very little nasty black ant that goes visiting in single file. Also about the black carpenter ant, who thatches his home with straws, spalls, and little sticks. But it is not the fashion for an ant sharp to tell all he knows in one lesson. J. W. GALLY.

We are glad to see the names of our leading clergy appended to a dignified dispatch asking the President to sign the Anti-Chinese Bill. Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish, Bishops, Priests, and Rabbis, uniting to give expression to the opinion that the presence of Chinese upon this coast is highly detrimental to the spiritual, moral, and material welfare of our people. The expression of the opinions of such leading divines as Dr. Scott, Bishop Kip, Rabbi Cohn, Bishop Alemany, and others of our Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish clergy, ought to carry great weight to the thinking and honest-minded people of the East.

Many journalists in San Francisco will remember Mr. William M. Laffan who used to write things for various papers here. "An amosin little cuss," was Laffan, and bright. He left and went to Baltimore, where he had a newspaper; then he burst up; then he went to sketching—made articles for Scribner and illustrated them, wrote for "Tide Club" papers for it, and has done an infinite number of things. He is now dramatic, musical, and art critic of the New York Times, and is so noted. So this paragraph is a puff, and we have no right to be disgusted.

*The scientists say that there is a queen ant, as there is a queen bee, and this royal female swells up as large as a bayo bean, and lays all the eggs in one colony; but the writer of this article has not made that observation for himself and neither asserts nor denies it.

†This insect is not the Scarabaeus pilularius, but a larger beetle of a perfectly black color. The S. pilularius I have not seen in the Empire of Artemisia.

THE HOUSE OF MY PEOPLE.

My sister Jane looked at me with a shade of doubt upon her face, and reproach and surprise creeping into her dark eyes. "Sell the dear old house? Mary, you are beside yourself," said she. "Not for any price! Not for any price!" Then the needle she held poised in air took up its seam again, and her lips closed after a moment with their usual sweet smile.

I caught up the handful of handkerchiefs I was hemming for Mistress Fenwick, after another half hour, and went out in the pleasant spring time, under the apple trees blooming with radiant pink, like a vivid snowfall, between the two halves of a splendid afternoon. The old place—the family's even in the day of my grandfather's father—was glorified in its fair new dress of grass and blossom, but I saw it not. To my young eyes it was homely and ill-favored. The brick house was like an old dress made over, one generation adding a furbelow here in the shape of a wing, another a flounce in the porch that ran around it, and our own day had seen the coat of red paint put on—sadly enough it needed a new jacket again—but through all the attempts at modernizing it, the old-fashionedness of it was as plain and prominent as the weathercock that shot about in the wind on the far end of the peaked roof.

My mood was off though by supper time, and I thought Jane looked relieved as we sipped our tea out of mother's old "Chaney ware," because I never alluded to the proposition I had made to her so suddenly. But my spirit was up in arms, none the less that I bided my time. All through the summer I thrust artful words at her. I sighed wearily over Mistress Fenwick's hemstitching, and said how the price that would buy the house would keep us in comfort in the village without the needle for pin-money. As the autumn drew near I complained that the old house was melancholy, and when December came I shivered and said the winds wailed round the corners and crept under the shingles till the cold ran up and down my very bones. Jane grew used to these little arrows of suggestion, but all the time, though I tried to shut my heart against the knowledge, I knew they pained her. The truth is, my mind was running hard on Robert Fenwick. I wanted to be in the heart of the village where I could see him every day. I wanted to smarten myself with ribbons for his eyes—perhaps you'll excuse a young girl for her foolishness. I never thought how one likes to search out the hidden flowers; I never dreamed that I should be really throwing myself at his head; but I know now that when a girl does that she puts away from her all the sweet joys of being coaxed, the tenderest thrills of the courting. So it came to be Christmas week, and on the Tuesday of it, for the first time, Jane spoke in a discouraged way. "Well, Mary," she said, "you're young, and, perhaps, it's but natural. May be it's best the old house should go. I know you'd like more life and stir. God forbid that I should drag you down into the quietness of my years before your time. Yes, yes," she added, with a sort of sob, "we'll look for a purchaser right away, sister." My heart smote me then, but it throbbed quicker at the vision of Rob Fenwick that rose before me—handsome, with his curly hair, his round, red lips, and his white forehead.

Christmas Eve we sat toasting our toes by the andirons, their dog-heads standing out plain against the coals and shining in the dancing blaze. Jane clasped her hands behind her head and looked around her sadly. "I've known this sitting-room ever since I was born," said she. "I remember seeing you carried before this very fireplace, a little, red, close-fisted baby not an hour old; and it was over in yonder corner the coffins of the four little brothers lay to have a hymn sung and a prayer said over them before they were taken away to the graveyard."

Jane was versed in the folk-lore of the family. She knew the names reaching away into the far branches of the tree, and many a time had she told over the Christmas gatherings, the harvestings, the festival times throughout the year that she had known in the old house. All the family, into cousins and second cousins, she would tell about; their looks and manners and ways, even to old great-grandfather Lowther, whom you'd have guessed she had been playfellow with, so well did she know him. And ah! such endless tellings of my mother; how she had wept when one by one the little brothers died; how she sat and rocked on the porch of summer evenings; how, when Jane was twenty years old, on her death-bed she had said with the death-break in her voice: "Take care of the little sister, Janey," and she kissed me—the baby—on my mouth and died, with father heart-broken lying with his head next hers on the pillow.

It was midnight when we lit our candles, turned the ashes over the roasting coals, and kissed each other once oftener than usual for Christmas Eve. The old clock chimed upon twelve as we parted—beginning with a rattle, ringing the hour with a stentorian echo, and ending with a bang. "When I was a little wee girl, father used to hold me up in his strong arms to let me wind the clock," said Jane half absently, as if to herself.

The wind whistled outside as I shivered myself under the bed covers, and the moon shone in through the window, pale and calm and cold, and looked like a silver shield let into the heavens. The boughs of the great tree overhead raked and scratched against the house, and I heard old Towler sniffing outside in his kennel. All of a sudden the moon went out, or the sky opened and took it in; every sound hushed, and I lay still without breathing. People and people were beginning to come, moving in and out; sitting in chairs, on the stiff, hair-cloth sofa, in the best room; talking to each other, smiling, nodding their heads. I had never seen them before—most of them—but I knew them every one. There was Aunt Ann Crumpet, with her rheumatic back and her stick, and Grandfather Lowther, with a long white beard, and my father John, and great grandfather, strange as it may seem, in his blue coat with brass buttons, younger, and redder-cheeked, and taller, and straighter than the other two. There was sweet Aunt Mary Lowther, slender and graceful, with shining ringlets round her head, and a hand like a ball of cotton, it was so plump and small and soft.

"I'm so glad the last Mary Lowther looks like me," said she. I knew she said it, though I heard no sound; yet I thought her voice was sweet, and it was like the hush that falls after the peal of the bells.

"All the Mary Lowthers are beauties, and they make the finest women in the country. I'm hoping great hopes of this one." Uncle Twitchell looked over his gold-rimmed specs, and pinched my cheeks, then passed me round to the company. Mother smiled such a smile as she took me in her arms. The four little brothers trooped silently about in the rooms—little Roderick, and William, and Luther, and Lewis—and their faces were like snowflakes, they were so pure. I looked over backward into the past before I was born and saw them.

Cousin Tilly put a white flower in mother's hair. "The minister is waiting," she whispered, and mother floated off into the middle of the best room, and there she was married. Father held Jane up to the clock, and mother said, with a tear in her voice, "Take care of the little sister, Janey." Then the four little coffins were carried out in a row.

Grandfather Lowther said to Aunt Hitty: "John's to build a wing on for him and his wife; tell your Jacob there's place for another on 't'other side the house. If the house isn't big enough to hold us all, we'll stretch it, Hitty," and the left wing, where Jane slept, slowly unfolded itself and Uncle Jacob and Aunt Hitty lived in it.

A young man came riding up to the door on a great roan horse, with a cloak so big about him he was almost lost in it, and a hat drooped over his face so that it was quite hidden. "I'm looking for John Lowther's place," said he, in bold, ringing tones, and he stood erect and haughty.

"John Lowther lives here, sir," answered my father, peering into the darkness as he held the door-latch in his hand. "It is your daughter Jane I come for," the stranger said, and then the door was flung wide, and my sister ran out crying: "Arthur—Arthur Prince!"

She laid her head upon his heart, and he put his two arms about her. "My pretty little Jane!" I heard him say.

He was given the seat at table at father's right hand, and Jane forgot her knife and fork in gazing at him with timid eyes, and she had no gray hairs, and no lines like wrinkles were about her mouth or forehead. But his great roan horse threw him, and his head struck the flagstone at the door. His yellow hair was red with blood, and his face was whiter than the stone; and a long coffin, covered with a black pall like his cloak, came in at the door and went out again.

A soft rustle of skirts, like doves' wings, was in the hall, and the faces clustered and the forms gathered thicker and faster. Oh! how many there were of the family since grandfather's father's time! And all dead but Jane and me! How many, many graves full of the Lowthers and Lowther kin! Were they all come back for Christmas?

A shadow began to darken the faces, regret shaped itself upon the lips, and tears slowly filled the eyes. They all wondered, and shook their heads with the old Lowther shake that had been in the family as far back as ever I had known. They all shook their heads, and Uncle Twitchell leaned his forehead on his hand, and put his elbow on the back of the old stuffed chair in the sitting-room. Grandfather curled his fingers round his ear, and bent over to a little Mary Lowther that went on a journey and was lost at sea. "Little Mary," said he, in trembling tones, "I surely never heard them right. Why, I was born in this house, and I danced grandmother's first country dance with her on this very floor. Eh! but it's sad times, sad times!" Aunt Ann Crumpet hobbled up to me with her stick worn smooth and polished at the nob with so much fondling next her chin. "The old house is going to be sold," said she to me in her cracked voice. "Poor Jane! it was to have been her wedding portion when she married, but Prince Arthur, handsome Arthur Prince, was killed before her eyes. Ah! but she'll take it hard!"

My mother leaned back in her rocking-chair out on the porch, and seemed to make a hushed plaint, a noiseless little moan, and covered her eyes with her slim hand. My father came and took her head in his arms. "The babies were all born here, weren't they, my wife?" said he, heart-broken. "And here we were married, and lived our lives together, and died. As I came in from the orchard out yonder, standing under the old gnarled apple trees, I used to watch you getting supper on the table, with the children clinging about you." Then they kissed each other and said: "Poor Jane! Poor Jane!" and mother whispered: "Take care of the little sister, Janey." And I saw my sister Jane hovering round the lower step on the stair. "He kissed me once for every step on this stair that night," she murmured. "I am so glad he knew the old house. I shall live in it forever for his sake. Here he stood, and there he sat, and yonder he smiled upon me," and then she clasped her hands wistfully, and with a look here and there of deep anguish, I heard her whisper: "But we'll sell the old place, Mary, and I'll look for a customer to-morrow."

The tears were flowing into my heart like drops of blood, and it was like to burst, and they began to crowd and mass together with wailings. The Mary Lowthers, a dozen or more of them among cousins, and aunts, and great aunts, wound their arms about each other and made a group by themselves, each with soft eyes and plump, small hands, and ringlets of hair falling on her sloping shoulders. And grandmother grew out of the shadows with her cap, and her fold of neck linen, and her knitting-needle, and with her face wrinkling, and creasing, and working with feeling, she went in among them, and her old voice shook as she said: "Benjamin, let us take our leave of the old house."

Then they went about taking their leave, each saying good-bye to the spot they loved best; and Jane stole under the apple trees, and, gathering a handful of leaves, buried her face in them and sobbed aloud. Cousin Patty, and Lily, and Reuben, and David, and Joseph, and Harriet, and Uncle Twitchell, with little Mary Lowther by the hand, came close to the fire-place where the dog-nosed andirons shone. Grandfather went out upon the back stoop with the orchard spreading beyond it, and mother went up into the corner where the little coffins had stood. Such a procession went out and leaned over the well-curb, and two or three children swung to and fro on the gate. They all went with their faces twitching, and with tears. Aunt Crumpet went into the spare chamber, with her young husband on her arm, where she was dressed for a bride. She got down on her knees and fell to choking, as if with a great hiccup of sorrow that sounded like the crooked bough scraping and knocking on the house, and then I tossed my arms and threw my head about in pity for them all, and cried aloud in the agony I was suffering for them; and behold! I clutched my pillow, and my cheeks were wet with tears. Thank God!

Thank God! it was, indeed, the bough rubbing on the roof; it was my own wet pillow; it had been a dream, a dream!

Half gathering my wits about me, and sobbing like my own Lowther kinfolk, I rushed in upon Jane sleeping quietly in her own bed. I stole my arm about her neck, and "Jane, Jane," I cried, "we'll never sell the house, Jane, never, never!" I was shaking from head to foot as I, Mary Lowther, was never shaken before, and my head was burning, while my hands and feet were cold as ice, and a shiver like an ague had seized my tongue as well.

But a purchaser never was sought for, and we never did sell the old place. And never sewed I handkerchief for Mistress Fenwick after, for Rob came riding down on Christmas day like Jane's lover of old, and asked for Mary, and Mary had he for the humble asking.

To the old house and Jane who never will leave it I go at every holiday time, and methinks they who are dead and gone come forth to meet me as I swing the gate and go up the path. Then, when I wake in the night, I lie and think I see the throng again coming through the house, and, because of its peopling and the dear faces that have shone upon it through the generations, I love it dearer than all other habitations this side of the graves where they lie.

SAN FRANCISCO, February, 1879. KATE HEATH.

The Lion Growls.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—In your paper of January 18, 1879, occurs the paragraph commencing "England's military glory," and ending "We have always thought it a great misfortune that instead of our civil war we could not have tried our valor in a brush with England." I agree with you that it was a great misfortune; you would have beaten us so easily—as easily as you were going to beat the Southern people before Bull Run. Three months would have been far too long to have given you, and we should have been as soundly thrashed as the Southerners were in that battle.

Instead of comparing England's recent successes in India with an imaginary contest between United States soldiers and Digger Indians, why not name that affair of Sitting Bull and his Sioux, where the gallant Custer was killed and Reno's heels saved his hair? Would Great Britain, think you, have allowed the death of a brilliant officer like Custer, and the brave men who followed him, to pass by unavenged? No, indeed. If boasting were fighting, then the Americans are the masters of the world; for, as far as boasting goes, they are the Gascons of the English-speaking race. God forbid that I should say that the Americans are not a brave people, for I have served under their flag and know better; but I noticed then that the boasters took care not to do much of the fighting; the hard knocks were left to somebody else—the Irish, Scotch, English, Canadians, and Germans could apply and take the lion's share. The native-born citizens liked shoulder-straps and newspaper notoriety better.

What credit can you take for the suppression of the rebellion? With every advantage you could have—an open seaboard, a large navy, unlimited credit, every facility for purchasing material of war in Europe, a larger population, and enlisting mercenaries from every part of Christendom to fight for you; deprived of these advantages, that brave little Confederacy kept you at bay for years, and yet you would like to have a brush with a first rate power. Why, Spain has trailed her jacket for you more than once; try her to begin with, and you may work up. You have generals enough to begin with, in all conscience, though few of them have anything but a newspaper reputation. I except the illustrious McComb. Perhaps quantity will make up for quality. Read the historic page of your later military achievements as written by people of other countries, say from 1812, and compare. In conclusion, I hope with you to live long enough to see England engage in a war with some first class power, and that power the United States; and I trust that after it is over you will have a more just opinion of your own nation and a better one of mine. Yours, respectfully, H. SEYMOUR.

PALMERSTON (Nova Scotia), February 12, 1879.

A gentleman of this city has devoted a great portion of the time he has spent on the Pacific Coast in contracting bills, which he did not find could be conveniently paid when due. Having lived in California since '59, and being what is called "a generous liver," he has numerous creditors, and the sum of his debts is respectably large. Some years ago he determined to attempt the gradual payment of all his liabilities. Endowed with a fine sense of justice, it puzzled him to decide upon a plan of liquidation that would be fair and equitable to all his creditors. After long consideration he hit upon a method which he found entirely satisfactory. He explained his plan yesterday to one of his recently acquired creditors. A bill was presented him with a request for immediate payment. He took the account, and carefully checking all the items, and footing up the long column of figures, found all correct. Then he quietly and neatly folded up the bill, indorsed it, and filed it away in a pigeon hole marked "W." Turning to his waiting creditor he explained as follows: "Mr. Williams, it will be some little time yet before your bill will come up in the regular order, but you may depend upon my attention. Some years since I adopted an alphabetical system of paying off my indebtedness, and I have now got as far as C. Don't trouble yourself to call again. As soon as I get to W, I will call upon you with the amount." Struck with the debtor's systematic and equitable method of doing business, the creditor hopefully withdrew.

She sat in her elegantly appointed boudoir and sang thus to her lute:

I am monarch of all I survey,
My right there is none to dispute;
I speak and my minions obey;
But I long for a masculine brute.
O solitude's charms, that the pen
Of the poets has warbled about;
Better live in a hovel with men,
Than dwell in a palace without.

A professor, examining a student on Bible history, asked him why Moses was buried in such a secret place that the Israelites could not find him? The youth replied that he supposed it was for fear they would dig up his body and stuff it. This young person was the son of a showman.

RELIGION.

By Nathan, an Essenian.

If any man, whose intellectual and ecclesiastical growth has been nourished by habitually "sitting under the droppings of the sanctuary," desires to obtain any actual information as to what really constituted Christianity while it existed among men, it would be well for him to forget as far as possible all that ecclesiasticism has taught as the truth, and to read the four Gospels, and the Acts of the Apostles, and nothing else, in order to disentangle in his own mind what Christ taught from what men have been teaching in His name, but without His authority. The immediate results of such a course would, perhaps, be somewhat startling. The first result of it would perhaps be this: the inquirer would find that the doctrines of the Trinity, Transubstantiation, Election and Reprobation, Predestination and Free Grace, Final Perseverance, Close Communion, Hell, Papal Infallibility, Apostolical Succession, The Three Orders of Priesthood, the Church itself as a Corporation, Guild, Sodality, or as anything else except an assemblage of believers, and an endless rigmarole of other theological opéra bouffe and sanctified Black Crookism, would fade away out of Christianity at once. Or rather it would appear that all of this ecclesiastical kite-flying was never in the thought or purpose of Christ at all, but was the product of after ages, and of that mere theological gong-beating which, perhaps, began when Peter and Paul cross-fired upon the question whether the salvation of a Gentile were possible without circumcision, and which continued through all the controversies about "things clean and unclean," about "meats offered to idols," and through the irreconcilable controversy between Paul and James about "justification by Faith," or "by Faith and Works," and which has continued down until our day about other ecclesiastical fripperies.

Beyond doubt every intelligent reader of the Gospels and of the Acts would be impressed at once with the conviction that Christianity as Christ taught it was an exceedingly meagre thing—plain, simple, direct, and absolutely barren of doctrines or ecclesiasticisms—and would begin, perhaps, to wonder where our ornate ecclesiasticism originated. Certainly, Christianity embraced nothing except God the Father, Christ the Son, the Holy Ghost, the Church (i. e., believers as opposed to unbelievers), the Forgiveness of Sins, the Resurrection, Immortality, and the Communion of Saints (i. e., the communion of believers). Beyond this there was nothing in it, except, perhaps, singing, prayer, exhortations, etc.; a washing with water, symbolical of admission to the commune before Christ's death, and the same baptism and the sign of the cross, for the same purpose, after it; and the customary use of thaumaturgical power, given to demonstrate the divinity of the Teacher and the verity of His teachings. He would be astonished to find that Christ never wrote a line upon the subject of Christianity; never wrote at all, except one sentence with his finger, in the sand (and what that sentence was no man knoweth); and never authorized any one else to write; and he would, perhaps, begin to wonder what authority there ever was for ecclesiasticism, with its impenetrable wilderness of creeds, decretals, confessions of faith, disciplines, allocutions, etc. All that constituted the Faith by which Christ proposed to accomplish the social, political, and spiritual regeneration of mankind, could be taught and learned in an hour; all the rest of it, which is really a learned profession, requiring several years on the study of it, and a regular system of education at colleges, seminaries, etc., is merely theological kite-flying. The early preachers set out only the necessary truths of the gospel—which are few and simple—and then raised the dead, cured the blind, healed the sick, and performed other thaumaturgical works in order that men might believe. Ecclesiasticism, having lost the power to demonstrate the truth by working miracles, seeks to substitute for this lost thaumaturgy a regular system of intellectual and literary bombardments.

As to the Trinity, the doctrine is not found in any teachings of Christ. It would have been sufficient to demonstrate the falsehood of His teachings if it had been there. Three are not one any more than one is three. God can not create a two-year old colt in a minute; for mere contradictions are not the object of divine power. The Trinity is a mere mistake, and ever since the days of Athanasius the doctors of divinity have been splitting metaphysical hairs in vain at tempts to explain what is impossible, and to vindicate what is absurd—so grossly and palpably absurd that even to label it with the imposing title of a "Sacred Mystery" can not conceal its absurdity from the eyes of common sense. What Christ did teach was simply that He himself was the Son of God—not God. (To suppose that He was God would show the justification of a sinner to be impossible, for a reason that will be developed hereafter). The son of a dog is canine; the son of a man is human; the Son of God is divine—of the God-family. Christ taught nothing about the Holy Ghost at all.

The Greek for ghost or spirit occurs one hundred and twelve times in the New Testament, and it affirms nothing at all as to sex. But the terms father and son imply, also, the term mother. Christ was "begotten" of God—a man is begotten of his father; Christ was "conceived" of the Holy Ghost—a man is conceived of his mother. If, therefore, the idea of spiritual sexhood is tangible at all (and it is certainly warranted by the very words of Christ) God was the Father of Christ by Spiritual generation (not creation), and the Holy Ghost was his mother. Ergo, the Divine Nature is Father, Mother, Son, Family; and the fact that man (to whom alone the idea of family pertains) was created in "the image and likeness" of God is susceptible of a common-sense interpretation. Moreover, according to the Egyptian, Assyrio-Chaldaic, Hindoo, and Chinese theologies, in their most ancient forms, God was conceived of as androgynous—a being combining both sexes in one, spiritually hermaphrodite. From the fact that sexhood is nowhere predicated of the Holy Ghost, it may reasonably be inferred that Christ meant to teach that God is a dual being.

This was undoubtedly the faith of Moses, as is proved by the otherwise unexplainable fact that although he was a monotheistic Jew, and a good hater of ever polytheistic idea, his name for God was the plural form of a Hebrew noun. The mistake of the Trinity arose out of an earnest desire to maintain the absolute divinity of Christ without incurring the danger of fostering polytheistic views; and the gifted young priest who maintained the doctrine at Nicia did not understand that the son of an androgynous God must necessarily be a divine being himself. And this is not Ebionitism, Arianism, Patripassianism, nor any other ism or ology whatever, but is Christ's teaching.

Now Jesus proposed this faith as the only foundation upon which social, political, and spiritual regeneration is possible. Was there any mistake about it? Or is it so grandly true that the fact that He did so ought to be held proof conclusive of His own divinity, and of His right to teach and to command? Let us see:

While it is, perhaps, true that the existence of the personal God can not be asserted to be a strictly scientific fact, a fact within the narrow limits of ascertained truth—actual knowledge—yet it is scientifically accurate to declare that every gens and generation has, in some shape, however crude and rudimentary, believed in such a being. From the lowest, most debased idolatries, through all the wonderful myths of Egypt, Hindostan, and other peoples, in all time and place, faith in the idea of God has been the common language of mankind. "There is no speech where its voice is not heard." The snake-whisperers and the rain-makers assert it as certainly, however inarticulate and feeble the utterance may be, as did the temple service of the Jews, the grand, poetic faith of Egypt, or the Oriental splendors which the deft fingers of Hindoo subtly wove into magnificent vestments for clothing the one idea that is the common property of mankind—God. Did this grand thought arise out of nothing to curse the human race? Does it exist for ever, and yet tend toward merest nihilism? In what correlation of psychic forces did this grand conception find its genesis? What theory of development by natural law and the survival of the fittest could by any possibility give birth to this "universal consciousness of God"? How came this yearning, mighty, inappassable want of God into the human consciousness at all? How procure itself such universal recognition that no race ever had a habitation that did not also have some holy place? Is it, can it by any possibility be, a mere aching, agonizing emptiness and vacuity of human intelligence, with nothing whatever to answer to its vain, imitatable longing?—a universal and specific want of what is not?—a deathless hunger and thirst for a mere nothingness?—a necessary, inevitable, everlasting delusion and insanity inherent in all human intelligence by virtue of the fact that it is human and intelligent? If otherwise, is it not true that this fact of the existence of the personal God is based immovably as Alps or Andes on the very roots of consciousness itself; and if the consciousness which is the root of reason be fallacious as to this primary and necessary truth, what better are we than daring lunatics in attempting to reason at all? For there is no escape from this universal and necessary truth. If we could, by an act of volition, hurl ourselves past "cycle and epicycle, orb in orb," clear beyond the limits of the universe into utter bathos, it is not absolutely certain that the first act of intelligence outside of the merest ego would be in some shape to assert the idea of God? What force, what verity, can there by any possibility be in any metaphysical jargon which goes about to deny such high, supreme, absolute, inevitable, necessary, universal consciousness? True, the fact is not susceptible of proof, and all of "the evidences" with which ecclesiasticism has worried the mind are mere kite-flying, gong-beating, theological cobwebs; witness Butler's Analogy, Paley's Natural Theology, and the incurable verbosity which has afflicted the whole tribe of Levi. But the fact can not be disproved; and from Celsus and Lactantius to Darwin and Prince Bismarck all argument and effort in this direction are a mere jargon, doomed to certain failure, because they are not directed against a mere theological dogma which may be true or false, but against consciousness itself, which is of necessity veracious and invulnerable.

What then? Why only this, that the existence of the personal God, a fact incapable of proof or disproof, is a necessary, universal, and weighty want of the human, and is to be accepted by faith only; and it is merely one of "the follies of the wise" to attempt to do anything else. For faith in this fact antedates all history, philosophy, ecclesiasticism, and is part and parcel of the universal consciousness. "By faith only," so taught the good Essenian. So, also, every argument against the reality of moral distinctions is a mere beating of the wind. Fas et Nefas, the conception of right and wrong, is a necessary, universal, inevitable truth. The dispute as to what constitutes right or wrong is, of course, endless, but the reality of the distinction between them is a truth of the consciousness against which there is no argument. For every gens, every generation, every man, knows that no individual of the human race has ever accomplished all the good, or avoided all the evil, that was possible to be done or avoided. It is an historical fact that through all the ages human nature stands, like the lepers in Israel, with uplifted hands crying out to God and man, Unclean, unclean! As a necessary fact in human consciousness there is a state of alienation between God and man, for which in some way the human alone is to blame. The conviction of sin is universal. All climates, ages, and nationalities demonstrate the truth. This conviction of sin has no reference to any specific act of transgression, but to a state of conscious alienation from God; it antedates all accusation; it refuses to plead, or accept, any defense or justification; and by a natural, inevitable, necessary confession higher than any processes of reason, resistless as the precession of the equinoxes, spontaneous as the flowing of the tides, human nature pleads guilty before God of sin never charged against it by man, angel, or devil; never written in the forms of any statute, human or divine; never designated by any sign or symbol known to men; self-accused, self-tried, self-condemned. From this profound, inevitable, merciless consciousness of sin there is no escape. In the torrid deserts of lower Africa, where the distinction between the human and the brute seems almost to fade away, the Bushman feels the sting of sin and grovels in the dust; Ashtaroth and the star-god Remphan attest its sway over Babylon, the mighty and the then known world; Isis and Osiris proclaim its fatal dominion over all the lands and ages watered by the Nile. Bramah and Vishnu mourn its prevailing power over all the castes alike, and its corruption of the very warp and woof of human life in the purest, subtlest, delicate civilization ever known to history. Homer sung its sorrows as vividly as he sung the sacking of Troy; Jupiter and Venus, Plato and Paul, Mahomet and Christ, all men, all arts, all civilizations, bear record of this fatal truth. So terribly earnest and real is this conviction that Buddha, whose religion is that of one third of the human race, conceived the highest blessedness to be Nirvana—i. e., annihilation as an antidote for sin. This was the end sought through all the metempsychoses—the summum bonum. How came this conviction of sin into human consciousness? What devilish ingenuity of fate or chance, what satanic cunning in development by natural law, arrested human nature already over-burdened with all physical discomforts and pain, and fixed upon that nature the ineffaceable brand of moral delinquency, the ineradicable stigma of sin, if, indeed, the brand itself was a lie?—if the human is not by nature sinful? Surely, against so high, universal, necessary, inevitable consciousness all argument is vain. Surely, this conviction of sin, "this boundless upas, this all-blasting tree," whose lethal shades have darkened every human heart and life, must be a fearful fact, a real "heritage of woe" to which every man on earth is lawful heir by virtue of the fact of his humanity. But sin is want of conformity to the will of God, the transgression of moral law; and by a necessity of thought from which there is no escape, if there be any moral law of which sin is the transgression there must be, also, a law-giver; and so the personal God that is affirmed as a universal want of the consciousness is again affirmed as the giver of moral law, the author of moral distinctions, the source of the necessary idea of Fas et Nefas. What need have we of snakes and apples in a garden, or of the Levitical economy, or of any theological thimble-riggism whatever, about such a matter as this? If it were demonstrated that all "Revelation" were the merest chaff, does not the truth remain immovable that "he that believeth not is condemned already?"—self-accused, self-tried, self-condemned, of sin against God by a necessary law and fact of consciousness deeper, truer, and more profound than all of the ecclesiastical systems on earth? "Canst thou unloosen the bands of Orion?—or bind the sweet influences of Pleiades?—or bring forth Mazzaroth in his season?—or guide Arcturus and his sons?" If not, why seek to measure the universal truths of Jesus with little ecclesiastical pint-pots? Why seek to decorate the mighty Christ with theological show-coatisms and swaddling-bonds? Ah, but the truth of Christ is infinitely larger than all of the social, political, and ecclesiastical systems on earth!

True, this fact of sin can not be proved; it can not be disproved; and because it is a necessary truth of the human consciousness, it must be accepted by faith only, even as the grand Essenian taught.

Moreover, in the cognition of the idea of God, it seems to be the uniform process of reason, if not in fact a law of thought, that God must be to every gens, and to each man, the highest idea of the Perfect. God is the infinite Perfect of that of which man is the imperfect and finite. Man and God are reciprocal ideas, and the existence of either one implies that of the other. So if it were possible for one to conceive any idea of a perfecter Being than he conceives God to be, definite and tangible enough to take even a single steady glance at it, it would infallibly appear that this perfecter Being is the real God and the other a mere mistake. Now, necessarily the conviction of sin subsists in the fact that consciousness puts every man under indissoluble bonds that he render a perfect life to God, and under necessary, inevitable conviction that he miserably fails to do so. He knows that he is not as perfect as the law of his own nature requires him to be. His idea of this perfectness is higher and more inevitable, just in proportion as he is himself a higher and holier being. Hence, he can never get any closer to his own ideal of the perfectness required; hence, can do nothing to secure the favor of God or release himself from the conviction of sin; hence, the best man is as truly under conviction of sin as the vilest; hence, self-righteousness is utterly incompetent to effect any reconciliation between himself and his God; and hence, through mere despair of ever being able to do anything to justify itself in the sight of God, human nature, in all climates and ages, has turned away from its own incompetence, imperfectness, and sin, and has sought relief for burdened conscience in some form of sacrifice that might be made available by faith for its own justification; and hence, the idea of sacrifice for sin is both logically a necessity of human consciousness, and historically a necessary fact in the experience of mankind, and is both truth and fact. Of necessity, therefore (a necessity that grows up out of human consciousness itself, independently of all ecclesiasticism whatever, and is truer, deeper, profounder than all the theological systems on earth—a necessity that existed before any of them were invented, and will survive them all), justification is by faith only through sacrifice.

[CONCLUDED IN NEXT NUMBER.]

Here is somebody's ideal woman: She is at once passionate and innocent, strong and delicate. Her manners grow on her like leaves on a tree; they are beautiful, and they are her own. Her smiles and her frowns, her laughter and her tears have all long roots; they live down in the depths of her heart. She is tender, yet she can resist unto death. Night and morning meet in her hair and in her eyes. You would never know, till you had listened to her, how many tones a sweet voice can possess, yet be always sweet. She is simple, but proud; and while you would confidently demand of her any charitable service, you would never venture to touch her hand unless she first offered it to you. Neither would she offer it lightly.

Cheerily dawned the morning,
Warbled the wood birds around,
When they brought out the croquet wickets,
And laid off the croquet grounds.

Drearly closed the twilight,
Scarcely a word was said;
But they carried him out to the graveyard,
With a mallet lump on his head.

The Prince of Wales and Dr. Playfair were standing near a cauldron filled with boiling lead. "Has your Royal Highness any faith in science?" said the doctor. "Oh, yes," said the Prince. "Will you plunge your hand in the boiling metal?" "You tell me to do this?" said the Prince. "I will." The Prince then ladled out some of the molten lead in his hand. It is a fact that the moisture of the hand is from lead boiling at a white heat.

LITERATURE.

Mr. Richardson having written A Primer of American Literature, the London Academy is pleased to be displeased with the patriotic venture, and asks if there is "really enough of American literature yet to make a primer of it desirable." Our critic thinks not; thinks we are "too young;" fears that we have not had time to have a history; laments that our annals are crowded with mediocre names; and complains that too many of our writers are still living. The last objection is a grave one, and is, we fear, insuperable, the law not permitting their extinction. The Academy, it is barely worth while to mention, is the literary authority in whose pages a writer—no doubt the same one—recently criticised as a new work a book which had the honor of exhaustive examination by the inferior genius of one Macaulay.

Among American comic writers of the class represented by Mark Twain and Artemus Ward, the Daily News (London) finds two remarkable features—their "rusticity" and their "puritanism." They are Puritans at bottom as well as rustics. Their familiarity with certain religious ideas and certain Biblical terms is "amazing." Their boldness in the use of the Scriptures "is certainly very odd to us in England," but in their "astounding coolness and freedom of manners" there is "nothing of the social funkiness which too often marks our own satirists." As for the "genial showman," the News remarks that his reports of his "conversations with the mighty of the earth were made highly ludicrous by the homely want of self-consciousness displayed by the owner of the Kangaroo, that 'amooosin' little 'cuss,' and of the 'two moral b'ars.'" Mark Twain has "an almost Mephistophelian coolness," and "a glorious vein of exaggeration." His "colossal exaggeration is, of course, natural to a land of ocean-like rivers and almighty tall pumpkins." His story of the sufferings of a greenhorn who had purchased "a genuine Mexican plug" is "one of the funniest things in literature," and one of its passages is "more moving than anything in Rabelais." The weak point in American humor, however, it finds in the Innocents Abroad. Here is the place where it "has always failed." It has "lacked reverence and sympathy."

Fanny Kemble, when a girl, had a fondness for the poetry of Byron; but, finding it injurious to her mind and heart, she gave up reading it. When visiting an aunt in the country, she again began to read, "Cain" and "Manfred" most deeply impressed her. They stirred her whole being "with a tempest of excitement that left me in a state of mental perturbation impossible to describe for a long time after reading them." Giving up this poetry was "a great effort and a very great sacrifice, for the delight I found in it was intense." After this noble renunciation, Miss Fanny read Byron only in the privacy of her own boudoir.

Mr. Bret Harte and his recent lecture have both pleased the Londoners. The Athenaeum calls him "a true artist, possessing rare mastery over language, skilled to express ideas, pathetic or grotesque." Referring to his lectures, it mentions "choice language excellently spoken, describing the picturesque of quite unfamiliar scenes, telling of strange and romantic forms of life, and appealing in swift succession to the hearer's poetic imagination and to his sense of humor."

By the way, if you wish to read the Serbian translation of Mr. Harte's best stories ask for the Shest Kaliforniiskikh Priča Breta Harta.

Mrs. Burnett's early heroines wore pearl rings on their forefingers and swansdown around their throats.

The London Times, in a leading article of January 3d, spoke of the Hebrew as a language which possesses but a single volume of literature. The library of the British Museum contains not less than ten thousand books printed in Hebrew. Steinschneider's catalogue of Hebrew books and manuscripts, in the Bodleian Library, is a quarto eight inches thick. As the Times is edited by a professor of Arabic, this cavalier treatment of an opposition literature is natural and commendable.

We have not done with English opinions of American literature: The Saturday Review—severest of our censors—calls Bayard Taylor's translation of Faust "one of the most remarkable feats of translation achieved in any modern language." That paper further says he "has rendered the whole poem in English wonderfully close and wonderfully free from strain and harshness. Line for line and metre for metre he followed Goethe's way, flinching before no difficulties, and seldom otherwise than victorious; a labor so great that no man could have hoped for success who had not in himself enough of the poetic spirit to undertake it as a labor of love."

Swinnburne is going to join the Roman Catholic Church, if they will let him.

Mr. Edmund Yates has engaged in a new literary venture—the publication of a monthly miscellany to be called Time. It will be "no more" long before Gabriel, with one wet foot and one dry one, shall make proclamation to that effect.

The "old South Church" is fatal to genius. In the March Atlantic, Mr. Whittier's verses, designed to preserve it, ought to seal its doom beyond hope of reprieve. It has been the parent of more cheap sentimentality than any building in America, and we heartily hope it may burn down.

The San Francisco News Company are about to publish a book by Ring Jenson, entitled Among the Mormons. It purports to be an account of the "lively experiences" of an American and an Englishman who "went to Salt Lake and married seven wives apiece." There is no doubt that this would be lively enough; whether the book is lively remains to be seen. The Gentile literature of Mormonism has hitherto been redeemed from dullness only by malice.

Mr. Matthew Arnold's new volume is called Mixed Essays. Compounded of "sweetness and light," eh?

"ANGRY PASSIONS RISE."

VIRGINIA CITY, February 25, 1879.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ARGONAUT—Sir: I am sorry that my verses on "The Devil Fishing" should have inveigled you into a row with your contemporaries. Permit me further to express my regret that I am obliged to use your columns in reply to an article in the Post. I feel like the man who used the king's sceptre to belabor a jackass, apologizing for his conduct on the ground that he took the first thing handy. The paper I have alluded to prints a poem from Pread, from which it says that my verses (I do not claim them to be poetry) were plagiarized. I never saw Pread's poem before, and the only similarity I can discover between Pread and myself is that we wrote on a similar subject—the devil. If the Post man had pursued his literary investigations further he would have discovered that Pread took his idea from Byron's "Devil's Walk," and Byron foraged extensively from Chaucer, Shelley, and Keats, who also wrote about the devil, as they doubtless had a right to do, the subject not being copyrighted.

But speaking of plagiarism, let me give a more striking illustration of the subject. Some four years ago I wrote for the News Letter some verses on George Bromley's sweeping machine. The man then editing the "Town Crier" department erased my name from the bottom of the article after it was in type, and then claimed the production as his own in the next issue. This man (I am now informed) does the "Derrick Dodderings" for the Post. I will not mention his name, as I am not positive of his identity, and if I charged an innocent party with any connection with the "D. D." column, my accusations would certainly be actionable. Some years ago I wrote a special article for the Post on "Bohemianism in San Francisco." About a year ago an article appeared in its Saturday's issue under the same head. What was my surprise to find that about half of my article had been appropriated verbatim and printed as original matter; and the writer had stolen the worse half, which indicated a lack of discrimination on his part quite in keeping with his surroundings. Neither the poem stolen by Mr. "D. Dodd" nor the prose appropriated by the other fellow amounted to much, but if either constituted any considerable addition to the literary reputation of the parties making use of them they are welcome to it.

Now what right has the Post to attempt to make me out a plagiarist while it employs men who have stolen my productions in their entirety, and why does it fish among its old files for my articles when it has a staff of eight or ten writers on its pay-roll. It seems to me that with one "back-file editor" and a pair of shears, the services of at least six men might be advantageously dispensed with.

Yours, respectfully,

SAM DAVIS.

A Short Sermon.

"Put money in thy purse."

Make it thy soul's delight to gather coin. Suffer not thy thoughts to stray from this purpose. Make corners in bread, so that the poor shall go hungry. What is it to thee that hundreds suffer? Make corners in water, through the great Father poured it out without stint for all his children. Fence it up; gather it into reservoirs and make the thirst as well as the hunger of the people fill thy purse. What were hunger and thirst made for but to help thee put money in thy purse? Watch the progress of industry, and buy up the land that lies in its course. Hold it for high prices; hold it until the homeless and landless must have it at any price. What is it to thee that industries are paralyzed? Put money in thy purse.

Thy brother may be fainting by the wayside, crushed by misfortune and sickness. Heed not his cry of agony. Shut all avenues of the heart to the cries of suffering humanity. What is the world to thee? Put money in thy purse.

The world is full of beauty. Every little flower that opens its petals to drink in the sunshine is full of marvelous, self-acting machinery. Heed it not. Turn not aside from thy great work. The rocks of the earth, all the elements tell a wondrous story of the creation, extending through myriads of ages, of changes from chaos to order; from darkness to light and life; of alternating ages of torrid heat and icy solitude. The stars spangling the infinite blue deep tell a marvelous tale of the extent of God's works, and suggest the possibility of a future greatness of the soul; of a wandering at will through endless beauty—wondering, admiring, and learning. Leave such things to fools; they are nothing to thee. Put money in thy purse.

Work for money with all thy might, mind, and soul, and it shall flow to thee, as the water floweth to the sea, in streams ever widening and deepening, gathering strength as it comes. Thou shalt own broad acres in the hearts of cities, and principalities in the country. Thy flocks shall cover a thousand hills, and thy bank accounts increase by day and by night. Though, in the pursuit of wealth, thy features become the incarnation of all that is vile, a record of years of sin, at thy approach with the golden key the doors of palatial residences will fly open, obsequious servants will conduct thee to the innermost shrine, melodious voices will sing for thee the sweetest songs, gray-haired wisdom will lend thee its aid, and youth and beauty will come to thy arms. Thou mayest ride rough shod over the people, for hast thou not the where-with?

But know, O mortal! that thy millions can not purchase one atom of love or respect; that the poorest sewing girl in the city, or the dirtiest dustman, is richer than thou art, for some one may have for them a tender thought; but thou shalt be abhorred of all. When sorrow cometh to thee, no heart will beat in sympathy, no tears will mingle with thine. Every man's hand will be against thee as thine has been against mankind. Every dollar of thy millions will be a demon to gnaw thy withered, shrunken soul. Thy heart shall be like a desert land, without green thing, fountain, or shade. The harpies of the law shall quarrel over thy ill-gotten wealth as the wild dogs and wolves over the fallen bison of the plains, and thou shalt have lived in vain, for what doth thy wealth profit?

A famous artist once painted an angel with six toes. "Whoever saw an angel with six toes?" people inquired. "Whoever saw one with less?" was the counter question.

WHAT I SEE FROM MY WINDOW.

If it interests you to know where said window is located, I answer, in the language of the advertisements, on California, between Larkin and Kearny Streets. Will that do?

I have not been near it for several days, as I was sick. How I greet it as an old friend and try to derive some amusement from it by looking out. The first object of notice is a yellow monster floating high in the air. By the help of my faithful glass I discover it to be the flag of H. I. C. M. Consulate! There is a picture on it of a dragon. I first thought it was a full sized bumble-bee; comes from being near-sighted.

Somebody bows up from the car. Wonder who she is! Politeness requires that I return the compliment, so there goes—a graceful bow. I think those people across the street must live entirely on a diet of ham. I counted twenty-four a fortnight ago, and there is another cargo unloading. "Toujours perdrix" would not be my taste, much less ham, "mais les goûts sont différents." By the way, I enjoyed the ARGONAUT's French column very much indeed. School is out. Wish I was one of those youngsters with satchel and lunch-basket. They are happy. They have no interest in the fluctuations of the stock market, no bills payable, no money in the French Bank, no board account to settle, and no splitting headache. It seems to be the top-spinning season with them. Wonder if that messenger boy is in a very great hurry to deliver his telegram! He took a top away from a little boy to show him what he could do in that line, but after five ineffectual efforts he walked down the hill, a wiser and colder boy, for he actually rubs his hands.

"Wild game, wild game!" sounds a melodious voice. No, I thank you; not any in mine. At home, where I came from, all game is considered wild. There must be tame varieties here, I suppose, although things generally are lively enough. The car stops. Somebody for me? No; an elderly lady gets off the dummy and drags her better half after her. For the time being he looks decidedly like the worse one; his lunch must have disagreed with him, poor fellow! At least his face is putty colored, his eyes glassy, and his steps tottering. She tries to pilot him up the hill; he pushes her away. She advances a few steps alone; then, like a true soldier, with flying colors (her bonnet strings), she returns to her charge, and, Victoria! the haven of rest, the porch of their pretentious dwelling, is reached at last, and I am glad of it.

The policeman at the corner seems to be in a brown study. Maybe his new hat did not cost the regulated $4.50, and he is turning over a shrewd plan in his fertile brain how to avoid getting one of those Fishy "orders signed and countersigned." Well, he has my best wishes for success. How the wind plays with the nether garments of the ladies' toilets! The average size of the pretty ones' pedestals seems to be 5¾. Now, if I were a lady, and my understandings were not of the most genteel dimensions, I would not give the zephyrs a chance by sitting on the dummy. One of the gentlemanly engineers of the C. S. R. R. always sports a flower in his button-hole; to-day it is a carnation, to match his face, which the wind took the trouble of dyeing with soft blushes.

If Mr. Bergh, from New York, were in my place, he would unharness that poor old Rosinante, and make the human brute pull the cart up hill. I always feel like giving that ilk a sound whipping when I hear them curse and beat the poor animals. Family down street must be out; the milkman, with his "crème à la pump" has been knocking for five minutes already; no, the door is opened now, sorry I can not see by whom. Well, I declare! what funny creatures the dear little ladies are! Two friends making carriage calls leave the vehicle at the upper corner, and walk down-hill fully three-quarters of a block, and that in full dress, without as much as a lace scarf. Is it because Jehu went go?—excuse the wicked thought—is it, may be, to see and be seen? I hope they will find their friends at home, and be duly admired.

The flying bakery is passing the second time already, but seems to have shut up for the day. I deem it wise to follow its example.

Obscure Intimations.

DOBBIN.—Your "Soliloquy" recalls too many tender recollections of our own lamented mule; we can not use it.

MIA.—The matter will be referred to Mr. Somers on his return from the East.

C. W.—Thanks; please send them.

"RATS."—As you are "a subscriber to the ARGONAUT," your neighbor certainly has not "the right to let rats caught in a trap, run in a public street" to damage your store and goods. If you were a subscriber to the Bulletin it would be different. Bishop Hatto, of excruciating memory, who was devoured by rats in his island tower, was a subscriber to the Bingen Bulletin.

CHARLES P. SOMERBY, Publisher, New York.—If you must review books for us, please condemn those of other publishers instead of praising your own. It is in better taste.

"AFTERWARD."—We made an error in your address, and have not your name. Shall we ask posterity?

"A SACRAMENTO SUBSCRIBER."—Does it not strike you as uncivil not to sign your name to a note which you address to another person—even if he happen to be an editor? We do not, of course, take the trouble to read what is commended to us by the kind of taste which writes anonymous letters.

SERMON.—The carpenter is at work on our pulpit, the harness-maker rebinding our Bible. When we are ready to get into the one to hammer the other it is likely that your homily will be hurled at the heads and hearts of the ARGONAUT's devout congregation—our fellow-workers of Mammon. On second thought we'll hurl it now.

EL. R.—No apology for not liking your manuscript, no stamp for returning it, and don't care a kettle cobbler's malediction what you think of us.

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

The next Quintet Recital—second of the current series—will fall due next Tuesday, 4th instant, and introduces for the first time Mr. Jacob Müller, the favorite baritone, who will sing Schubert's Wanderer, and the song To the Evening Star, from Tanhauser. Of novelties there are to be a Nocturne by Field, and transcription of Liszt (of the Spinning Song from Wagner's Flying Dutchman) by Miss Schmidt, Hungarian Dances by Brahms (in the violin arrangement of Joachim) by Mr. Louis, Jr., Quartet by Rubenstein, and Trio by Schubert. The Abendlied of Schumann—for string quartet—will be repeated in compliance with many requests, and the balance of the programme will consist of a string Quartet by Haydn and a Quintet of Mozart.

Mr. Chauncey's Berceuse, the new composition that made such a profound impression at one of the Orchestral Matinees several weeks since, has just appeared at Gray's, arranged for the piano forte. Besides its freshness of thematic material and novel treatment of the instrument, this piece brings quite an interesting effect in the second part, where the author, displaying a remarkable finesse in the matter of rhythm, has introduced his sextollets with the audacity of a genius who knows and acknowledges no rules. I do not believe that there is a living composer—Wagner and Liszt, perhaps, excepted—who would not have written these six notes as two triplets; and certainly there are few pianists—among amateurs, I mean—who can play them as Mr. Chauncey has written them. But this, we must remember, was also said of Beethoven's later Sonatas at the time of their first publication, as well of many things of Schumann, Chopin, and others, and yet they have survived and become classical. So there is hope for the Berceuse.

There called upon me, one day this week, a young gentleman, who is thought by his friends to have a promising voice, with the request that I would hear him sing and advise him with regard to the desirability of devoting himself to a musical career, and also give him my views as to the possibilities or probabilities of such a step, the best method for pursuing it, etc., etc. Mr. A. (let us call him so) brought a note of introduction from a mutual acquaintance, through which I was informed that he was about twenty-two years of age, had sung several times in company with great success, and had but little money with which to undertake a musical education, but that if there was any likelihood of his achieving great things with his voice the means would be forthcoming. Before asking him to sing I made some few inquiries as to his previous studies, etc., and ascertained that he was a clerk—in a broker's office, I believe—on a salary of $75 per month, liked his business, and was well liked by his employer, knew nothing of music further than to read a vocal part passably, could not play on any instrument, and had heard no singing, excepting occasionally, for the past few years, in this city. I then let him sing to me. He had brought—his letter of introduction spoke of him as a Tenor—the Cujus Animam of Rossini, If with all your hearts from "Elijah," several Italian Arias, and two English songs. Of these I selected one which, being comparatively easy, would give him the best opportunity to do himself justice. My young gentleman did not seem particularly comfortable over my choice, fidgetted a bit, and at last suggested—but with perfect modesty of manner—that he was but little accustomed to singing English songs, and that, if perfectly agreeable to me, he would prefer to sing one of the Italian ones first. So we took up the Cujus Animam. I was a little shocked at the outset by the rather explosive manner with which he attacked the opening phrase, but, remembering that he had probably never had an opportunity of hearing it properly sung, permitted him to proceed for, say, about a dozen measures, when it occurred to me to look up at his face. It was well nigh purple with the effort he was making, and I begged of him to desist, and sing me a scale. He did so, and now I made several discoveries. Firstly, that he had no Tenor voice at all, but a high Baritone instead. Secondly, that he had no ear; or rather, perhaps, a very stubborn ear, that could retain the outlines of a melody if they were very decided and strongly marked, but was not willing to accommodate itself to the varying whole tones and semitones of a diatonic scale. Thirdly, that he had a very imperfect sense of rhythm. It was simply an unusually high Baritone of considerable timbre, flexibility, and smoothness, but not in any way remarkable. I did not tell him all this at once (it seemed to me almost more than one could bear at one blow), but led him on to speak of himself and his hopes for the future, and found that he had been to an Italian singing master ("late of the opera"), who had assured him that he had a very remarkable tenor voice, with which he could eventually make a fine career on the stage; that one year—or two, at most—would suffice to prepare him for such a career, and had, in fine, begun by teaching him the very song of Rossini over which he had a moment before almost exploded in my hearing. He had been thinking of giving up his place in the office, in order to have more time for study; and on consulting a friend—my acquaintance—with reference to it, had been advised to see me first. Of course I had to tell him the truth about his case, as best I could; but it was a painful task which I would have gladly been spared. I advised him, firstly, not to quit the respectable position that was bringing him a decent living. I do not know the rate of promotion for a broker's clerk, but fancy that it ought eventually to bring him up to, say, $3,000 per annum, and this would be a great deal for any but a first rate baritone singer to earn. I then suggested that he try, for a year or two, to forget as far as possible the existence of his voice, with the double purpose of resting it from the over-exertion to which it had been subjected in singing tenor songs, and employing the time in studying the piano forte and something about music generally. Then, by going to some real singing teacher, one who knows the voice and how to train it, he might possibly learn to use his, and in time derive much pleasure from it. But no profit. This was what, above all, I endeavored to impress upon him: that the voices that justify the abandonment of an honorable and profitable business career in the hope that singing will pay better are very rare, almost phenomenal, and that, to make a successful singer, the possession of such a phenomenal voice must be accompanied by a genuine and pronounced musical talent. No singer is secure in the possession of his voice; it may leave him at any day. And then, if he be not a musician, with a real knowledge of his profession (which can be gained only after long years of study and experience), his life may be said to be wasted. He is obliged either to change his business or become a mere pretense, a charlatan. Out of all the singers in the world, ninety-nine of every hundred are bad singers. Of such there are more than enough, then. It is only those who have the reasonable assurance of some day becoming good singers—that is, who possess at once voice and talent—who should feel called upon to take up the voice as a profession. And even such will do well to deliberate long and earnestly before casting the final die; they must be prepared for much, long, and very hard work, many bitter trials and bitter disappointments, and much feverish and uneasy tossing hither and thither upon a couch which, if it is apparently strewn with roses, has many, and sharp, thorns concealed underneath, not a few of them tipped with a subtle poison the merest contact with which is moral paralysis, if not death.

In speaking of Madame Jaffa's concert, last week, I took occasion again to make my protest against the miscellaneous style of programme that is mostly made by our concert-givers, and ventured to advance the hope that custom, at least, would in course of time bring about the mixing of some little brain in such matters. This, of course, would be much more likely if it were the fashion to adopt the better and more sensible customs of those whom we should make our models in matters of taste, or if we were in the habit of assimilating the genuine thought that should be our guide in matters of art, instead of looking only to those who have the ear of the world—which may always be set down, broadly, as the ignorant part of it—and aping from the surface impression that we get of it their manner of making the success that brings notoriety and influence. When I said that the mixed programme was dying out in older and more advanced communities I referred to the species of olla-podrida that is usually put together by a concert-giver who, having his own selection thought out and prepared according to his possibilities, or limitations, sets to work to fill up the two hours of music that it is considered necessary to give by getting together such people as are more readily available, and, throwing whatever they are willing to play or sing into a sort of variety entertainment that is dignified by the name of concert, prints his programme—headed, invariably, Grand Concert—and gravely invites his friends and the rest of the public to pay their dollar each for the two hours of weariness and vexation of spirit that is the almost invariable result. I hear people complain almost daily that concerts are a nuisance and a bore, and in the main—as matters are conducted with us—I agree with them. A concert that is a mere jumble of impressions, in which Beethoven is relieved with Ardit, and Bach, or even Haydn, placed side by side with Bellini or Verdi, and in which there is no attempt at a logical arrangement of the numbers or their relation to each other, is an intellectual—or rather unintellectual—barbarity, not entirely unlike those "Quotations from Favorite Authors," with which a certain portion of the reading public is supplied under gilded covers, and which, under the pretense of condensing the author's brains to the capacity of a tea-spoon, are really all tea-spoon and no brains at all.

A logical—sensible—concert programme should be founded upon an idea. It should be a programme of Chamber music, Salon music, or whatever else it aspires to be, with a harmonious arrangement throughout; with a point, or climax, carefully prepared, and a similar preparation of the usual encore numbers that should also be in keeping with what has preceded or is to follow them. There should be in it no florid and bespangled aria of Rossini tripping on the heels of a Beethoven Symphony or Concerto, no trashy sentimentality of Millard or Claribel in immediate contrast to a quartet of Schumann or Schubert. Either may be good in its place, but the fitting place for the one is not alongside the other. The Beethoven Sonata that follows Una voce is more than likely to strike the average listener as somewhat prosy—neither Beethoven nor Rossini being in the least answerable for this—nor can I imagine the most delightful Suite of Bach getting even a respectful hearing after an audience has been subjected to the mellifluous intoxication of a beautiful Tenor voice and a "Good-bye, Sweetheart." The most charmingly written essay of Montaigne would be dull reading after a chapter of Peg Woffington; yet who shall say that the Frenchman is a lesser or duller writer than the English novelist.

The miscellaneous programme is based upon the view that a concert audience is easily wearied and impatient of monotony; that it requires variety and entertainment. This is undoubtedly correct, and, furthermore, is founded upon a lasting principle of art. Whatever is monotonous is bad, when it becomes wearisome. But there is a monotony that is at once delightful and interesting; a one-tone that must prevail in every work of art that makes any pretension to excellence; it is the harmony of the painter, the symmetry of the sculptor, the form of the poet. And a concert programme to be good, should be in some sense a work of art. The bearing this in mind, however, need not in any case result in that monotony that would prove wearisome to either performers or listeners; what is essential is that there should be unity of style, and within this there are illimitable possibilities of variety and relief. A programme of Chamber music can easily provide itself with vocal numbers out of the well nigh countless songs—di camera, the Italians call them—of the best composers, while the modern virtuosi and writers of Salon music have furnished no end of attractive and pretty gewgaws to be strung in among the arias de bravura and sentimental ballads with which our singers delight to tickle their audiences. The plea that it is desirable to suit all tastes will not hold good. Firstly, those who want the Beethoven don't want the other stuff, and those who care for the "stuff" don't want the Beethoven. Secondly, those who have stomach for both at a single meal are afflicted with artistic dyspepsia, and need regulating. A consequence of this fashion of dishing up everything in the same pot, is that most of the hearers are impressed by the noisy, jolly things, and eventually come to consider Messrs. Beethoven et al. an infliction that has to be borne in order to obtain the "taking" pieces. And I don't entirely wonder at it, either. S. E.

CONCERNING EDITORS.

A friend is politically ambitious; he would like political honors. He is honest, learned, rich; he is too proud to fawn, he is too clean to mingle in the dirty ward wallow. We recommended that he see the leading gentlemen of the press, and consult with them, and let them understand his aspirations and his views. We suggested the honored names of Thistleton, Marriott, Pickering, McCrellish, de Young, Fitch, Wentworth, Boruck, Pen Johnson, Basset, and others. "These gentlemen," we remarked, "are the first minds of our coast. They are the moulds in which the form of public opinion is cast. They are the leaders in our political and social organization by virtue of their unselfish love of their fellow man, their pure moral lives, their elevated tone of thought. They seek only to promote the public good; the common welfare the only aim of their industrious, self-denying lives."

He replied: "I have been to them all; I have interviewed them, seeking their advice, and have come away with a reflection. The reflection contains an idea; the idea is embodied in a story. The story is of an incident that occurred at Washoe in its early days. Sam Brown was the most popular and dreaded of all the early murderers. Most of his exploits of killing were by daylight in crowded saloons. He was an artist that delighted in the exhibition of his work. He was confessedly at the head of his profession, and took a just pride in his reputation."

"One day Sam Brown, finding himself at leisure, and the day being an agreeable one—Washoe zephyrs playing over the fragrant sagebrush, the air laden with perfume—be thought himself to go down from Virginia City, through the Devil's Cañon, up the valley and by the brawling river, to kill Van Sickle, a publican, who kept a road-side tavern on the Carson. On his way Sam overtook a diminutive little Jew named Levy, well known at Virginia for his honest dealings, his genial temper, and his pleasant ways."

"Their respective mules fell into a harmonious jog, and little Levy, full of fear and full of guileless anxiety lest in some playful moment Sam would kill him in a sportive way, made himself most agreeable to his companion. At Silver City, and the Gate, and at every road-side inn, he played the generous cavalier. It the outspoken friendliness of a generous nature Sam informed Levy of his purpose to kill Van Sickle, and into his purpose the small Levy entered with full sympathy, convincing Sam of his earnest coöperation, and assuring the blonde murderer (for Sam was fair haired and blue eyed, of Saxon type) that he might rely upon him for his coöperation and assistance, should the exigencies of the case demand his aid. Thus in friendly converse the tedious day passed not unpleasantly by. Sam beguiled his companion with tales of murder deftly accomplished; of the trick of turning the knife within the wound; of the bullet sent with unerring aim to offending parts; how once he was winked upon, and of the brain he shattered through the insulting orb; how a blow was arrested by a derring ball that broke the arm and killed; how he had shot the victim in the back that had turned his back upon him; how he had killed a rascal that had snored by stamping his blade down through his offending nose as he slept."

"Van Sickle saw the approaching pair, and, from his verandah, with a double-barreled gun, welcomed Sam to a hospitable but bloody grave. The duel was a hot one. Sam's ready arsenal opened fire, and for a time the fusillade was incessant. Levy trembled and fled; but the incoming stage, laden with passengers—all armed, as was the habit of the country—rapidly nearing the scene, Levy rallied and returned. It was an uneven fight, and Mr. Brown succumbed to the unequal conflict. He fell, pierced with many wounds, bleeding at every pore; dying—not a cartridge left in his arsenal. Levy pressed into the group that surrounded the dying man. 'Shentlemens, I ask one favor. D—n you, Sam Brown, you murdering villain! Shentlemens, do me von little favor. Let me shoot him just vonce.'

"The crowd consenting, Levy fired, and Sam Brown, smiling, died."

"And," said our friend, "that is just the way I feel toward editors. I do not want to know them. I do not want them to notice me. I would avoid them. I am afraid of them. I am compelled through personal fear to assent to all they say when I am with them. I would like to murder them—the whole fraternity—but I dare not fight them. I admire the man who does; and if the whole gang could be killed I would deem it a great favor to just shoot the last safe shot into the expiring carcass of the last dying editor."

We would suggest to the Buffalo colony, now organizing in Western New York for emigration to California, that it purchase the Temple-Workman Ranchos, in Los Angeles County. Thirty thousand acres of land can be obtained for $600,000—this is $20 per acre. One-third of the land is worth $100 per acre; one-third, $50 per acre; and a small part of the hill land, from $10 to $20. The whole is worth $1,500,000. There are two streams running through it—the San Gabriel, a bright river, and the San Jose, a nice, enduring mill stream. The Southern Pacific Railroad cuts the land into two parts, with four stations on it. It has two splendid residences, with groves of orange, lemon, and lime trees, olive orchards, vineyards, out-houses, tenant houses, wine presses, etc. A large part is fenced. It has a flouring mill. The land is especially adapted to wheat, barley, and corn; the hill lands to pasture—all covered with soil to their summits. The foot-hills are fruit and vine lands. It is all naturally irrigated, and is, we have no doubt, the finest body of land in California—near to Los Angeles, and nearer to several lesser but promising towns. Twenty acres of this land will support a family. Forty acres is an independence. There is a good local market. There can not be found elsewhere in our State so desirable a tract of land for colonization. Any part of it that the colonists might be willing to part with would be taken in Los Angeles. The scheme would be popular in the county; wealthy men would advance money on the land to farmers in possession; and we have authority to say that one-half the purchase money of the whole tract could be negotiated in San Francisco, at low rates of interest. We suggest to those of our readers who know any of the Buffalo colonists to write, and let them the purchase of this property.

WIDOW COBB'S FIRST LOVE.

The fire crackled cheerfully upon the broad hearth of the old farm house kitchen, a cat and three kittens basked in the warmth, and a decrepit dog lying full in the reflection of the yellow blaze wrinkled his black nose approvingly as he turned his hind feet where his fore feet had been. Over the chimney there hung several fine hams and pieces of dried beef. Apples were festooned along the ceiling, and crooked necked squashes vied with red peppers and slips of dried pumpkin in garnishing each window frame. There were plants, too, on the window ledges—horse-shoe geraniums and dew plants, and a monthly rose, just budding, to say nothing of pots of violets that perfumed the whole whenever they took it into their purple heads to bloom. The floor was carefully swept, the chairs had not a speck of dust upon leg or round, the long settee near the fire-place shone as if it had been varnished, and the eight-day clock in the corner had its white face newly washed, and seemed determined to tick the louder for it. Two arm-chairs were drawn up at a cozy distance from the hearth and each other; a candle, a newspaper, a pair of spectacles, a dish of red cheeked apples, and a pitcher of cider filled a little table between them. In one of the chairs sat a comfortable-looking woman of about forty-five, with cheeks as red as the apples, and eyes as dark and as bright as they had ever been, resting her elbow on the table and her head upon her hand, and looking thoughtfully into the fire. This was the Widow Cobb, relict of Deacon Levi Cobb, who had been mouldering into dust in the Bytown church-yard for more than seven years. She was thinking of her dead husband, probably, because—all her work being done and the servant gone to bed—the sight of the empty chair at the other side of the table, and the silence of the room, made her a little lonely.

"Seven years!" said the widow's reverie ran. "It seems as if it were more than fifteen—and yet I don't look so very old, either. Perhaps it's not having any children to bother my life out, as other people have. They may say what they like, children are more plague than profit—that's my opinion. Look at my sister Jerusha, with her six boys. She's worn to a shadow, and I'm sure they have done it, though she will never own it."

The widow took an apple from the dish and began to pare it.

"How dreadful fond Mr. Cobb used to be of these grafts! He will never eat any more of them, poor fellow, for I don't suppose they have apples where he's gone to. Heigho! I remember very well how I used to throw apple-parings over my head when I was a girl to see who I was going to marry."

Mrs. Cobb stopped short and blushed. In those days she did not know Mr. Cobb, and had always looked eagerly to see if the peel did not form a capital S. Her meditations took a new turn.

"How handsome Sam Peyton was, and how much I used to care for him! Jerusha says he went away from our village just after I did, and no one has heard of him since. And what a silly thing that quarrel was! If it had not been for that—Here came a long pause, during which the widow looked very steadfastly at the empty chair of Levi Cobb, deceased. Her fingers played carelessly with the apple-paring; she drew it safely toward her, and looked around the room.

"Upon my word, it is very ridiculous; and I don't know what the neighbors would say if they saw me."

Still the plump fingers drew the peel nearer.

"But they can't see me, that's a comfort, and the cat and old Bowse will never know what it means. Of course, I don't believe anything about it."

The paring hung gracefully from her hand.

"But still, I should like to try; it would seem like old times, and—"

Over her head it went, and curled up quietly on the floor at a little distance. Old Bowse, who always slept with one eye open, saw it fall, and marched deliberately up to smell it.

"Bowse, Bowse, don't touch it!" cried his mistress; and, bending over it with a beating heart, she turned red as fire. There was as handsome a capital S as one could see!

A loud knock came suddenly at the door. The dog growled, and the widow screamed and snatched up the apple-paring.

"It's Mr. Cobb—it's his spirit come back again because I tried that silly trick," she thought, tearfully, to herself.

Another knock, louder than the first, and a man's voice exclaimed:

"Hillo, the house!"

"Who is it?" asked the widow, somewhat relieved to find that the departed Levi was still safe in his grave upon the hillside.

"A stranger," said the voice.

"What do you want?"

"To get lodging here for the night."

The widow deliberated.

"Can't you go on? There's a house half a mile further on; if you keep to the right hand side of the road, and turn to the left after you get by—"

"It's raining cats and dogs, and I'm very delicate," said the stranger, coughing. "I'm wet to the skin. Don't you think you can accommodate me? I don't mind sleeping on the floor."

"Raining, is it? I didn't know that." And the kind-hearted little woman unbarred the door very quickly. "Come in, whoever you may be. I only asked you to go because I am a lone woman, with only one servant in the house."

The stranger entered, shaking himself, like a Newfoundland dog, upon the step, and scattering a little shower of drops over his hostess and her nicely swept floor.

"Ah! that looks comfortable after a man has been out for hours in a storm," he said as he caught sight of the fire; and, striding along toward the hearth, followed by Bowse, who sniffed suspiciously at his heels, he stationed himself in the arm-chair—Mr. Cobb's arm-chair, which had been "sacred to his memory" for seven years. The widow was horrified; but her guest was so weary and worn out that she could not ask him to move, but busied herself in stirring up the blaze, that he might the sooner dry his dripping clothes. A new thought struck her. Mr. Cobb had worn a comfortable dressing gown during his illness, which still hung in the closet at her right. She could not let this poor man catch his death of cold in that wet coat. If he was in Mr. Cobb's chair, should he not be in Mr. Cobb's wrapper? She went nimbly to the closet, and took it down; fished out a pair of slippers from the boot-rack below, and brought them to him.

"I think you had better take off your coat and boots; you will have the rheumatic fever, or something like it, if you don't. Here are some things for you to wear while they are drying. And you must be hungry, too. I will go into the pantry and get you something to eat."

She bustled away, "on hospitable thoughts intent," and the stranger made the exchange with a quizzical smile playing around his lips. He was a tall, well-formed man, with a bold but handsome face, sunburned and bearded, and looked anything but delicate, though his blue eyes looked out from under a forehead as white as snow. He looked around the kitchen with a mischievous air, and stretched out his feet before him, decorated with the defunct deacon's slippers.

"Upon my word, this is stepping into the old man's shoes with a vengeance! And what a hearty, good-humored looking woman she is; kind as a kitten;" and he leaned forward and stroked the cat and her brood, and then patted old Bowse upon the head. The widow, bringing in sundry good things, looked pleased at his attentions to her dumb friends.

"It's a wonder Bowse does not growl. He generally does when strangers touch him. Dear me, how stupid!"

This last remark was addressed neither to the stranger nor the dog, but to herself. She had forgotten that the little stand was not empty, and there was no room on it for the things she held.

"Oh, I'll manage that," said her guest, gathering up paper, candle, apples, and spectacles (it was not without a little pang that she saw them in his hand, for they had been the deacon's, and were placed each night, like the arm-chair, beside her), and depositing them on the settee. "Give me the table-cloth, ma'am. I've learned that along with a score of other things in my wanderings. Now, let me relieve you of those dishes; they are far too heavy for those little hands"—the widow blushes—"and now please sit down with me or I can't eat a morsel."

"I had supper long ago, but really I think I can take something more," said Mrs. Cobb, drawing near the table.

"Of course you can, my dear lady. In this cold autumn weather people ought to eat twice as much as they do in warm. Let me give you a piece of the ham—your own curing, I dare say."

"Yes. My poor husband was very fond of it. He used to say no one understood curing ham and drying beef better than myself."

"He was a most sensible man, I am sure. I will drink your health, ma'am, in this cider." He took a long draught and set down his glass. "It is like nectar."

The widow was feeding Bowse and the cat, who thought they were entitled to a share of every meal eaten in the house, and did not quite hear what he said. I fancy she would hardly have known what "nectar" was, so it was quite as well.

"Fine dog, madam, and a very pretty cat."

"They were my husband's favorites," and a sigh followed the answer.

"Ah, your husband must have been a very happy man."

The blue eyes looked at her so long that she grew flurried.

"Is there anything more I can do for you, sir?" she asked.

"Nothing, I thank you. I have finished."

She rose to clear the things away. He assisted her, and somehow their hands had a queer way of touching as they carried the dishes to the pantry shelves. Coming back to the kitchen, she put the apples and cider in their places, and brought out a clean pipe and a box of tobacco from an arch recess near the chimney.

"My husband always said he could not sleep after eating supper late unless he smoked," she said. "Perhaps you would like to try it."

"Not if it is going to drive you away," he said, for she had a candle in her hand.

"Oh, no, I do not object to smoke at all." She put the candle down. Some faint suggestion about "propriety" appeared to trouble her. She glanced at the clock and felt reassured; it was only half past nine. The stranger pushed the stand back after the pipe was lit, and drew her easy chair a little nearer the fire and his own.

"Come, sit down," he said pleadingly. "It is not late, and when a man has been knocked about in California and all sorts of places for a score of years, he is glad enough to get into a berth like this and have a pretty woman to speak to again."

"California! Have you been to California?" she exclaimed, dropping into the chair. Unconsciously she had long cherished the idea that Sam Payson, the lover of her youth, with whom she had foolishly quarreled, had pitched his tent, after many years of wandering, in that far-off land. Her heart warmed to one who, with something of Sam's looks and ways about him, had also been sojourning in that country, very possibly had met him—perhaps had known him intimately. At that moment her heart beat quickly, and she looked very graciously at the bearded stranger, who, wrapped in Mr. Cobb's dressing-gown, wearing Mr. Cobb's slippers, and sitting in Mr. Cobb's chair beside Mr. Cobb's wife, was smoking Mr. Cobb's pipe with such an air of feeling thoroughly and comfortably at home.

"Yes, ma'am. I've been to California for six years; and before that I went quite round the world in a whaling ship."

"Good gracious!"

The stranger sent a puff of smoke curling gracefully over his head.

"It's very strange, my dear lady, how often you see one thing as you go wandering about the world after that fashion."

"And what is that?"

"Men without house or home above their heads, roving here and there, turning up in all sorts of odd places—caring very little for life as a general thing, and making fortunes just to throw them away again—and all for one reason. You don't ask what it is. No doubt you know already very well."

"I think not, sir."

"Because a woman has jilted them."

Here there was a long pause, and Mr. Cobb's pipe emitted short puffs with surprising rapidity. A guilty conscience needs no accuser; the widow's cheeks were dyed with blushes as she thought of the absent Sam.

"I wonder how women manage when they get served in the same way," said the stranger, musingly. "You never meet them roaming up and down in that style."

"No," said Mrs. Cobb with some spirit, "if a woman is in trouble she must stay at home and bear it the best way she can. And there's more women bearing such things than we know of, I dare say."

"Like enough. We never know whose hand gets pinched in a trap unless they scream. And women are too shy or too sensible—which you choose—for it."

"Did you ever, in all your wanderings, meet anyone by the name of Samuel Payson?" asked the widow, unconcernedly.

The stranger looked toward her; she was rummaging at the table draw for her knitting work, and did not notice him. When it was found, and the needles in motion, he answered her:

"Payson? Sam Payson? Why, he was my most intimate friend. Do you know him?"

"A little—that is, I used to when I was a girl. Where did you meet him?"

"He went with me on the whaling voyage I told you of—and afterward to California. We had a tent together, and some other fellows with us, and we dug in one claim for more than six months."

"I suppose he was quite well?"

"Strong as an ox, my dear lady."

"And—happy?" pursued the widow, bending over her knitting.

"Hum—the less said about that the better, perhaps. But he seemed to enjoy life after a fashion of his own, and he got rich out there, or rather I will say, well off."

Mrs. Cobb did not pay much attention to that part of the story. Evidently she had not finished asking questions, but she was puzzled about the next one. At last she brought it out beautifully.

"Was his wife with him in California?"

"His wife, ma'am? Why, bless you, he has got none."

"Oh, I thought—I meant—I heard—" here the little widow remembered the sad fate of Ananias and Sapphira, and stopped short before she told such a tremendous falsehood.

"Whatever you heard of marrying was all nonsense, I can assure you. I know him well, and he had no thought of the kind about him. Some of the boys used to tease him about it, but he soon made them stop."

"How?"

"He just told them frankly that the only woman he had ever loved had jilted him years before, and married another man. After that no one, except myself, ever mentioned the subject to him again."

Mrs. Cobb laid her knitting aside, and looked thoughtfully into the fire.

"He was another specimen of the class of men I was speaking of. I have seen him face death a score of times as quietly as I face the fire. 'It matters very little what takes me off,' he used to say, 'I've very little to live for, and there's no one that will shed a tear for me when I am gone.' It is a sad thought for a man to have, isn't it?"

Mrs. Cobb sighed as she said she thought it was.

"But did he never tell you the name of the lady who jilted him?"

"I knew her first name."

"What was it?"

"Maria."

The plump little widow almost started out of her chair; her name was spoken exactly as Sam would have said it.

"Did you know her, too?" he asked, looking keenly at her.

"Yes."

"Intimately?"

"Yes."

"Where is she now? Still happy with her husband, I suppose, and never giving a thought to the poor fellow she drove out into the world?"

"No," said Mrs. Cobb, shading her face with her hand, and speaking unsteadily. "No; her husband is dead."

"Ah! But still she never thinks of Sam?"

There was a dead silence.

"Does she?"

"How can I tell?"

"Are you still friends?"

"Yes."

"Then you ought to know, and you do. Tell me."

"I am sure I don't know why I should. But if I do, you must promise me, on your honor, never to tell him if you should happen to meet him again."

"Madam, what you say to me never shall be repeated to mortal man, upon my honor."

"Well, then, she does remember him."

"But how?"

"As kindly, I think, as he could wish."

"I am glad to hear it, for his sake. You and I are friends of both parties; we can rejoice with each other."

He drew his chair much nearer hers, and took her hand. One moment the widow resisted; but it was a magnetic touch; the rosy palm lay quietly in his, and the dark beard bent so low that it nearly touched her shoulder. It did not matter much. Was he not Samuel's friend. If he was not the rose, had he not dwelt very near it for a long time?

"It was a foolish quarrel that parted them," said the stranger softly.

"Did he tell you about it?"

"Yes, on board the whaler."

"Did he blame her much?"

"Not so much as himself. He said that his jealousy and ill-temper drove her to break off the match; but he thought sometimes if he had only gone back and spoken kindly to her she would have married him, after all."

"I am sure she would," said the widow, piteously. "She has owned it to me more than a thousand times."

"She was not happy, then, with another?"

"Mr.—that was to say, her husband—was very good and kind," said the woman, thinking of the lonely grave on the hillside, rather penitently, "and they lived pleasantly together. There never was a harsh word between them."

"Still, might she not have been happier with Sam? Be honest and just say what you think."

"Yes."

"Bravo! That is what I want to come at. And now I have a secret to tell you, and you must break it to her."

Mrs. Cobb looked scared.

"What is it?"

"I want you to go and see her, wherever she may be, and say to her: 'Maria—what makes you start so?'"

"Nothing, only you speak so like some one that I know."
 "Do I? Well, take the rest of the message. Tell her that Sam loved her through the whole; that is, when he heard that she was free again, he began to work hard at making a fortune; he got it, and he is coming to share it with her if she will let him. Will you tell her this?"

The widow did not answer. She freed her hand from his, and covered her face with it.

By and by she looked up again. He was waiting patiently.

"Well?"
 "I will tell her."

He rose from his seat and walked up and down the room. Then he came back, and leaning on the mantel-piece, stroked the yellow hair of Bowse with his slipper.

"Make her quite understand that he wants her for his wife. She may live where she likes, only it must be with him."

"I will tell her."

"What do you think she will say?" he asked, in an altered tone.

"What can she say but—'Come?'"

"Hurrah!"

The stranger caught her out of her chair as if she had been a child, and kissed her.

"Don't, don't!" cried she; "I'm Sam's Maria."

"Well, I'm Maria's Sam."

Off went the dark wig and the black whiskers; there smiled the dear face she had not forgotten. I leave you to imagine the tableau. Even the cat got up to look, and Bowse sat on his stump of a tail and wondered if he was on his heels or his head. The widow gave one little scream, and then she—

But stop! Quiet people like you and me, who have got over all of these follies, and can do nothing but turn up our noses at them, have no business here. I will only add that two hearts were very happy, that Bowse concluded after awhile that all was right, and so laid down again, and that one week after there was a quiet wedding at the house that made the farmers stare. The widow had married her "first love."

M. Champfleury, having recently published a book entitled "Balzac's Method of Working," it may be worth while to reproduce Edouard Ourliac's famous description of the way in which the great author's "César Biotteau," which was set up, rewritten and corrected fifteen times in twenty days, got into type: "The printers were ready and pawed the ground like waiting steeds. M. de Balzac sent in two hundred sheets of manuscript, written in five feverish nights. Every one knows his writing. It was a debauch, a chaos, an apocalypse, a Hindoo poem. The stoutest compositor turned pale; time was short and the copy unparalleled. Nevertheless, needs must, so the monster was transformed—translated as well as might be, into familiar signs. The most expert could do no more. The proofs were sent to the author. Next day, the author sends back the first two proofs pasted on four-sheet posters. From each printed word sets out a dash of ink hat curves and winds like a congreve rocket, and at last breaks into a fiery rain of phrases, epithets and nouns, underlined, crossed, written upside down, mixed and scratched out and superposed. A splendid—a dazzling sight. Imagine four or five arabesques of this sort, interlaced, knotted, clambering and tumbling from one edge of the sheet to the other, from the north to the south; as many maps in which were interwoven the towns, rivers, and mountains, all the hieroglyphics of the Pharaohs, and the fireworks of twenty festivals. At this awful spectacle, the printers smote their bosoms, the copy-holder tore his hair, and the apprentices lost their reason. The most daring tackled the proofs, where some recognized Persian, others the unfamiliar symbols of Madagascar, some Sanskrit. Work was pushed on with blind trust in Providence. On the morrow, M. de Balzac sent over two sheets of pure Chinese. Only fifteen days left; a maddened copy-holder endeavors to blow out his brains. Two more proofs received, very legibly written in Burmese. Two printers go blind. And thus the proofs went back and forth, till, at the seventh essay, some symptoms of excellent French were diagnosed; nay, there were even faint traces of connection between the phrases."

The editor of an English journal vouches for the respectability of his correspondent who relates the following story as a truth of which he has personal knowledge: A cobbler in Somersetshire dreamed that a person told him that if he would go to London Bridge he would hear something to his advantage. He dreamed the same the next night, and again the night after. He then determined to go to London Bridge, and walked thither accordingly. When arrived there he walked about the whole of the first day without anything occurring; the next day was passed in a similar manner. He resumed his place the third day and walked about till evening, when, giving it up as hopeless, he determined to leave London and return home. At this moment a stranger came up and said to him: "I have seen you for the last three days walking up and down this bridge; may I ask if you are waiting for any one?" The answer was, "No." "Then what is your object in staying here?" The cobbler then frankly told his reason for being there, and the dream that had visited him three successive nights. The stranger then advised him to go home again to his work, and no more pay any attention to dreams. "I myself," he said, "had, about six months ago, a dream. I dreamed three nights together that if I would go into Somersetshire, in an orchard, under an apple tree I should find a pot of gold; but I paid no attention to my dream, and have remained quietly at my business." It immediately occurred to the cobbler that the stranger described his own apple tree. He immediately returned home, dug under the apple tree, and found a pot of gold.

A woman in the cars sat facing a man who, with one eye at least, seemed to be staring fixedly at her. She became indignant, and said: "Why do you look at me so, sir?" He said that he was not aware of having done so; but she insisted. "I beg your pardon, madam, but it's this eye, is it not?" lifting his finger to his left optic. "Yes, sir, it's that eye." "Well, madam, that eye won't do you any harm. It's a glass eye, madam—only a glass eye. I hope you'll excuse it. But, upon my soul, I'm not surprised that even a glass eye should feel interested in so pretty a woman."

JAPANESE FABLES FOR LITTLE FOLKS.

Translated for the Argonaut by T. E. Hallifax.

V.—TANUKI DAMASHI.

In the Katchi-katchi Hills there once lived a very aged couple. One day, while out gathering firewood, the old man caught a tanuki (badger) which he brought home and tied up to the rafters, telling the old woman to cook it for him. He then went out to the hillside again to cut more firewood.

When he gone away the sly old badger begged the old woman to untie him, as he was in great pain, promising, if she did so, to reward her by helping her to hull the rice, at which she was working so laboriously. The old woman was foolish enough to believe him, and the badger, as soon as he was free, seized her, stripped her off her clothes, and put them on himself. He then put her into the rice mortar and pounded her into mince meat, of which he then prepared the old man's supper before he came home. When the husband returned the badger appeared as his wife, and deceived the old man so cleverly that he made a hearty supper, and enjoyed it greatly. When the supper was over, the badger confronted the old man, and, abusing him for catching animals, told him he had been revenged, his supper being the old woman; and that if he would look under the verandah he would find her bones; having said which, the badger, leaving his victim's clothes on the mat empty, went away.

The poor old man was very much grieved at the sad fate of his wife, and, vowing revenge, carefully gathered up her bones to bury. When this had been done, he sat down on the mats and cried bitterly. Presently a rabbit entered, and being a great friend of the old man, because he only hunted and killed wicked animals, tried to comfort him, and promised he should be revenged on the cunning old badger. The rabbit then made a paste of red pepper, and took it into the forest; he also took a hatchet to chop wood; and, on his way called at the badger's burrow, of which he knew the whereabouts very well. Badger, not owning a chopper, was glad to go with Rabbit to chop wood enough for both, for, like most wicked, sly thieves, he was lazy. When Rabbit had chopped a lot, he told Badger he might have the small, light twigs, as he was old and not strong. This Badger was glad of, and Rabbit helped to tie them on his back, and then told him to go first and he would follow. So off Badger started; but, presently, Rabbit stole up behind and set fire to Badger's twigs, which blazed up and burnt him severely before he could untie them. He was in great pain; but Rabbit told him he had some good plaster which he always carried about him in case of accidents; and, spreading the red pepper paste on a leaf, he placed it on the burn. This caused Badger great torture, at which Rabbit ran away laughing, and in great glee went to the old man and told him what he had done.* The old man said he was afraid Badger would, in his anger, play some more pranks, and that the only way to prevent this would be to catch him and kill him. So they arranged a plan to make two boats—one of wood and one of clay—and get Badger to go out fishing with Rabbit. The boats being ready, Rabbit paid Badger a visit, and told him of his intention to go fishing, inviting him to join him. Badger, being still sick from the effects of the burn, and very hungry, readily accepted the invitation. So Rabbit got into the small wooden boat, Tanuki took the large clay one; and, when well out in deep water, Rabbit struck Badger's boat with his scull and broke it, and the boat at once filled and sunk, leaving Badger struggling in the water. Then Rabbit held him down with his oar till he was dead; after which, he dragged the dead body out, and carried it to his friend, the old man, to show him that his promise of vengeance had been strictly performed.

VI.—THE CRAB AND THE MONKEY.

Once upon a time, on the shady side of a hill near the seashore, there lived a crab. One day he found some boiled rice, and set off home with it; but on his way was spied by a monkey. The monkey offered to exchange the seed of a persimmon—the fruit of which he had nearly finished eating—for the rice. This the crab accepted, on condition that the monkey had not injured it with his teeth. The exchange made, Jocko devoured the rice, but the crab planted the seed in his garden.

A long time afterward, the monkey happened to pass the same spot, and was surprised to see a fine tree laden with fruit, and his friend the crab sitting on the balcony of a nice new house, admiring his fruit tree. The monkey being hungry, begged the crab to allow him to eat some of the fruit. But the crab apologized, saying that his friend would be quite welcome to some of the fruit, but he could not climb the tree to gather it. The monkey declared his ability to climb if the crab would allow him to try; to which the owner of the tree consented, stipulating that he should receive half the fruit that was plucked. So up the monkey clambered, and ate as fast as he could, selecting the best and ripest fruit, but was too greedy to notice the crab who was waiting patiently below. At length the crab, losing patience, accused the monkey of being a bad, deceitful fellow; upon which the monkey got angry, pelted the poor crab, and broke his shell. The crab's friend, the wasp, coming by, attacked the monkey and stung him so severely that Jocko scampered away frightened. The wasp sent for his friends Egg and Mortar, and, after due deliberation, they made it up amongst them to punish Jocko. They arranged that Egg should explode if put on the fire, the wasp should sting Jocko, and Mortar, placed on the roof, should roll off upon his head as he ran out of the door.

The next day the monkey, being hungry, called at the crab's house to apologize, and to beg another dinner of fruit; but, seeing no person in the house, he entered; and finding a nice large egg on a tray, he put it on the fire to roast it, as he could not manage raw eggs so well as hard cooked ones. Presently the egg exploded violently, and scattered the hot cinders over Jocko, who ran into the next room howling with pain; but the wasp flew out of a corner and stung him so badly that he rushed out of the house, frightened and almost mad with pain, when down dropped the mortar upon his head and killed him.

MORAL.—Cunning and greedy people rarely gain much, and ungrateful ones are generally punished in the end.

*This most popular child's story inculcates the pleasure of revenge; and the details of the tortures of the burnt badger are dwelt on in some versions with great gusto. Numerous other nursery stories have the same object in view.—T. E. H.

THE TIME OF RAIN.

The niggard sky, with wasting stores of light,
 With mines of silver stars and suns of gold,
 Yet grudges to the ragged earth one mite,
 And shuts the beggar out to rain and cold.

Sad Earth, poor prodigal with empty sheaf,
 With low head mantled in her dismal veil,
 All day doth weep in penitential grief,
 And blends her moanings with the south wind's wail.

And weeping sore, the sad Earth careless grown,
 Unkempt and disarrayed her gay attire,
 Sits faded like a wrinkled yellow crone—
 Her robes of verdure dragged in the mire.

The broad companionship of view is gone,
 Which filled with teeming throngs the desert place;
 The lonesome valley droops in mists forlorn—
 The hermit hills have scorned her faded grace,

And friar-like have donned their hoods of gray.
 The venerable mountains, clad in white,
 Like holy prophets of the ancient day,
 Have hid near heaven from ills they can not right.

The myriad voices of the Spring are still:
 Of little birds who sang at work or play,
 Of lambs which bleated on the sunny hills,
 No sound is heard throughout the dreary day,

But dismal croakings of the pool do vie
 With ceaseless mutterings of the roof and pane;
 From southward-going flocks a weary cry
 Is mingled with the sighing wind and rain.

Low lie the mirthful leaves and loving flowers—
 No more their whispered laugh and fragrant bloom,
 The gentle streams have borne through mournful bowers
 Their long and slow procession to the tomb.

But all is not forlorn: amidst the scene
 A thousand new-born rills among the hills
 Out stubble-fields, of life and light do gleam
 With eager haste whate'er remaineth still.

Ephemeral born, they leap and wildly rave
 With maddened riot through their twilight day;
 Their orgies holding in the hollow graves
 Of streamlets dead—tossing their bones in play,

Or dive in madcap glee from dizzy brink.
 In new eccentric ways their waters glance,
 Or, soiled and foaming with their speed, they link
 Their waves, and lace the fields in maniac dance.

SANTA ROSA, February, 1879.

HAM BERLIN.

Methinks a Bell is Ringing.

[FROM THE GERMAN OF FALLERSLEBEN.]

Methinks a bell is ringing—
 Whom is the sound to greet?
 I hear the song in the valley—
 For whom the singing sweet?

Not at the marriage altar
 Is this cortege to wait;
 They bear a silent burden
 Through yonder churchyard gate.

The banner on the steeple
 Is waving up and down,
 And on the casket trembles
 A fresh green myrtle crown.

I hear a small bell ringing
 Like a painful cry, and sad
 I hear a grave-song singing:
 "The fair young bride is dead."

SAN FRANCISCO, February, 1879.

C. MARCHAND.

Contrasts.

I.

The gray and silent clouds hang low
 Above the gray and restless sea;
 The moaning wind that luries past
 Shakes down the last leaves from the tree;
 A bird floats by on weary wing,
 And mourns the summer days gone by;
 The flowers, grieving for the sun,
 Let fall their petals pale, and die.
 And yet, 'mid all this gloom and death,
 My heart was never half so gay.
 Lift those shy eyes to meet my own—
 Dear love, this is our marriage day.

II.

The sunlight falls in countless gems
 That sparkle on the ocean's breast;
 The air is filled with music sweet
 Of twittering birds about the nest;
 The flowers, awakened into life,
 Unfold their beauty to the sun,
 And shed their fragrance on the breeze
 Which sings of summer joys begun.
 Amid this throbbing life and bloom,
 With trembling hands I gently lay
 White blossoms on thy heart, dear love—
 Dear love, this is thy burial day.

WEST OAKLAND, February, 1879.

E. M. D.

A Song.

Ye rose she stole ye ruby's redd,
 And when ye thief they seek
 She hides her stolen rosie hues
 Upon my true love's cheek.

Ye snowflake filched ye lily's white,
 And to avoid arrest
 She hid to where my deare love was
 And nestled on her breast.

Ye cloudes they stole ye night's own duke,
 And flying with their prize
 They founde no safer refuge than Within my lady's eyes.

Thus when I see all robbers are
 I needs must doe my part,
 So I shall steal a lover's arms
 And garson her heart.

SAN FRANCISCO, February, 1879.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per 4 weeks. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."

News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.

A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY, }
 FRED. M. SOMERS, }

Editors.

SATURDAY, MARCH 1, 1879.

No land is historical that has not had its wars; no land is classic that has not had its bloody tragedies; no people are truly great who have not endured and suffered. We in California feel the poverty of our historic past. The early pre-annexation struggles were but Greaser scrimmages. Fremont was whipped by Pico, so there is no glory in that. Our Indian wars have been ignoble squaw conflicts with root and pine-nut diggers, armed with bows and arrows. Even the Modoc controversy in the lava beds did not raise Shack-nasty Jim to the dignity of a warrior chief; and Natchez over in Nevada never appears in hostile paint and plumes. Col. Barnes's Amador war, and William T. Coleman's civil conflict with pick-handlers, were bloodless and uninteresting. The civil war incarnadined with blood no Californian battlefield, and the achievements of the California Hundred are not emblazoned upon the historic page. General John McComb wears a sword innocent of battle stain, and though we have scores and scores of generals, their achievements have been confined to carving-knives and toothpicks. Our warriors have had no opportunity of achievement; our regiments of MacMahons, and Emmets, and Wolf Tones have been confined to processions and St. Patrick's Day; while our German and Austrian companies, with brass one-legged pots upon their heads, marching under double-headed eagle flags, have confined their prowess to the lager keller, and only sausages and sauerkraut have felt the terror of their unslaughter. We are a brave people, and we pine for the perils of the battle-field. The South has been to war, and we envy it the proud distinction it has achieved. We take not warning, but courage, by its example, and we are intent upon civil war. We have a grievance, and we defy the National Government. The Chinese shall not invade our shore, nor shall they pollute the sacred soil of our State. We have raised the standard of revolt, and from this time proclaim the sovereignty of our Pacific Empire. We defy those proud tyrants, Mr. and Mrs. Hayes, and all their hired mercenaries of the Methodist Episcopal Church. We hurl our proud defiance at Roscoe Conkling, and not all the onions of Weathersfield shall bring to our eyes one tear of repentance. We spit upon the cotton lords of Massachusetts, and defy the mercenary traders, green grocers, and swappers of New York, and challenge them to send their armies to our coast. Speaking for the Central Pacific Railroad Company, we dare them to send their battalions across the continent, and their munitions of war, at the present high prices of freights and fares. We boldly defy the prayers of their chaplains, and challenge Henry Ward Beecher, Adirondack Murray, and the Reverend Joseph Cook to bombard the throne of God in favor of the heathen Chinese. Not all the proclamations of the President and her husband, not all the eloquence of the Hoars of Massachusetts, not all the stink-pots of the Chinese six companies, not all the resolutions of the nutmeg State, not all the prayers of all the Methodist Church, nor all the sniveling cant of the magpietists of Boston, shall prevent California from withdrawing itself from this hateful union of States. We are keeping house for ourselves over upon this side of the continent, and we claim the inalienable, God-given right to select our own boarders, and to exclude from our domicile unwelcome guests. We are entirely independent of the East, and we care nothing for it. We snap our fingers at its laws, we bite our thumbs at its armies, and the Chinese shall not come into our port of San Francisco. We have money enough in our hills to bribe the national Congress. We have grain enough to live without the East. We have wine enough to debauch and make drunk all the troops that may be sent to us. We have only one gun, and across this we will throw a chain. We have only one road, and upon this we will burn a trestle bridge. We will barricade the only pass through the Rocky Mountains, and it shall be the Thermopylae, where, with our invincible three hundred, we will beat back the hosts that shall dare invade us.

Ours will be a holy war: to drive the infidels from the sepulchre of Christ was not a more sublime act of Christian faith than to defend our homes and firesides against the hordes of bias-eyed barbarians who now threaten to overwhelm us with Coolie slaves, gamblers, opium-eaters, and window-tapping harlots. The laws of self-defense authorize us to put forth extreme exertions that we may resist this incoming black death, this Asiatic plague. It justifies us in burning ships and establishing a military cordon along our coast. The ship that brings lepers to our shore may be burned, to arrest infection. A civil war will be profitable to us: it will bring us troops. Men will enlist at the East to come to California to fight us, and when the cruel war is ended they will remain to cultivate our lands. We need immigration, and this would give it to us at the government expense. We should have enough of loyal men to act as contractors, and we should find a market for our produce in providing army supplies, and out of the commissariat we would grow rich. A thousand millions or so of dollars spent upon this coast would be "just splendid" these hard times, and put us all upon our feet again. We have had our civil war in California: we suspended the laws, tied up the courts, hung criminals, exiled New York roughs, and defied the General Government, although General Wool was in command, and two ships of war, with their frowning batteries, were swinging at anchor in our port. We had our own way in our little civil war, although General William Tecumseh Sherman was in command of the law and order forces. Another vigilance committee would be attended with similar results. America is not strong enough, and has not armies enough, to subdue public opinion upon this coast in reference to Chinese immigration. We are not going to take Fort Alcatraz, or to fire upon a war ship, but we are going to prevent Chinese from coming to our harbor, and there are not merchants enough in New York, nor canting patriots in Boston, nor drooling Methodists in all the world, nor wisdom enough in Congress, nor military genius enough in the War Department, nor virtue enough in the Republican party, nor moral sentiment enough in all the Eastern States, to conquer our resolves in this respect. We are the outpost and picket guard of civilization upon the western border of this continent and in the interest of Christian civilization, and in defiance of an ignorant and sentimental Eastern public opinion, we will fight this battle.

This conflict has not its parallel in the recent events of the South. The Rebellion was in the interest of slavery and the wealthy class. This war is for freedom and in the interest of the white working poor. We are unselfish. We know that if we were indifferent to the interests of our race we can make money. We know that if we were indifferent to our poor we can introduce cheap labor to do their work. We know the comfort of Chinese servants. We know all about railroad building, construction of levees, reclamation of lands, irrigation, fruit picking, rice culture, and know how rapidly our material interests might be advanced by Chinese cheap labor. We know how broad is our national domain and how sparse our population. We know all about the desire of our rich men to get richer by Chinese. We know all about Chinese Sunday-schools and the Reverend Otis Gibson's Boston Methodist Mission. We know just how many souls he thinks he has saved, and just how many Chinese prostitutes he thinks he has rescued by marrying them to white men. We know all about the solemnity of that international treaty which Mr. Conkling is too honorable to violate. We know all about the splendid commerce of the Orient, the rich trade of Asia, the newly found track to India. We are duly impressed with the fact that of one blood God made all the nations of the earth; that the earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof; that He made man in His own image. We know all about the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, and the importance of bringing Chinese souls here that we may snatch them—but all the same we say: "NO MORE CHINESE!" If, one hundred years ago, when the merchants of Boston, the traders of New York, and the soul-saving pietists who desired to bring Africans from Congo (to convert them) to Virginia, with her fruitful soil, rich climate, broad area, and sparse population—if at that time the Southern people had said: "We will have no immigration from Africa; we will have no slaves to supplant poor white workers of our own race; no ignorant, unassimilative population; we will keep our soil sacred from the polluting foot of barbarism, and in the interests of humanity we defy you negro traders of Boston and you mercenary merchants of New York"—then the Southern negro question would have presented the present aspect of the Chinese question, and we should have avoided a dreadful civil war. We have taken this question into early consideration, and we have resolved to solve it now and not wait till, with four millions of Asiatics among us, it shall wrench the Government and cost it six thousand millions of dollars and a million of lives to get rid of it. This is our question, and in its solution we defy Boston, Connecticut, the Methodists, the Republican party, and Mr. and Mrs. Hayes.

But we are not going to war—God bless us, no. We are going to sit down on the Chinese, and then ask a paternal Government what it is going to do about it? We will fight the administration politically. We will give our twelve electoral votes to the party that thinks as we do. To the solid South we will add three solid Pacific States. Our six Democratic senators shall emphasize a Democratic majority in the Senate of the United States. We will send our members of Congress to sit on the anti-Chinese benches. We will elect a Workingman's candidate for Governor. We will fill all our offices, State and municipal, with anti-Chinese Workmen. We will elect anti-Chinese judges. We will have anti-Chinese boards of health, and anti-Chinese quarantine officers, and anti-Chinese license commissioners and fish commissioners. We will quarantine newly-imported ship loads of Chinese for six months in our harbor, and we will refuse to allow any provisions to be sent them. When they come ashore we will charge them with being paupers and mendicants; try them as such before an anti-Chinese police magistrate, and, if they appeal, he will summon from the sand-lot an anti-Chinese jury, which can convict by a majority vote under the new Constitution; and we will send them to the county jail, where an anti-Chinese Sheriff will cut off their cues, and from which an anti-Chinese Governor will not pardon them. We will refuse to allow their dead bodies to be taken back to China for sepulture, and thus they can never reach that celestial kingdom with which are connected all the superstitions of their religion. We will pass sumptuary laws, and make it a misdemeanor to eat rice. We will compel them to eat Boston brown bread and baked beans, and attend the Methodist Church on Sundays. We will condemn the Chinese quarter for a public park, under the law of eminent domain, and drive them outside our municipal walls as they do our people in China. We will put a tax upon them, extort licenses from them, and deny to them the privilege of street peddling, and rag-picking, and begging, and refuse to support them, when sick, in our hospitals. We will refuse to rent them houses in which to live, will tax their merchandise, shut up their theatres, compel them to occupy rooms above ground, and to sleep breathing fifteen cubic yards of air. We will submit them to medical inspection, and make them pay for it. We will make it a misdemeanor to use opium, and punish them for gambling. We will close up the Reverend Otis Gibson's alley by our health officers. We will declare the Chinese a nuisance, triable by juries, and on a finding will abate them by removal. We will persecute them in all manner of ways. In a word, we will sit down upon them; and if we do, what will the Government of the United States do about it? Will it declare war, send armies, bombard our city, proclaim martial law, place San Francisco in a state of siege, and keep a standing army under command of Major General McDowell? In earnestness, we ask the honorable Senator from New York if, with his understanding of the dual character of our Government—its sovereignty of States in the direction of taxation, police, and health regulation; its independence of judicial system; its right of jury trial to all accused persons—he can devise any practical system by which he can compel us to receive to our shores an alien and, to us, hateful race?—if he can devise any practicable code of Congressional enactments by which he can bring us into friendly and neighborly relationship with this people, whose race, color, civilization, and religion are not ours, and whose habits of life, modes of thought, and purposes of existence are not in harmony with ours?

Is it desirable or endurable that the Central Government shall compel us by military force to have a population that can not become citizens; that can not do military duty; that can not act as a posse comitatus; that can not perform jury duty; that will have no families in the land, will not spend their money in it, will not be buried in it; that pay no taxes; that fill our prisons and hospitals; that recognize no obligation to an oath; that murder infant girls; that make merchandise of women; that buy and sell them as slaves for prostitution? Will the Hon. Roscoe Conkling risk his reputation for statesmanship upon the assertion that America is the asylum of starving China; the refuge of redundant Asia? And will he, in the interest of an ignorant, hypocritical, religious cant, or a mercenary demand of trade, throw open the Golden Gate to the invasion of four hundred millions of barbarians? The honorable Senator is but a village statesman if such views bound the horizon of his political sagacity. Mr. and Mrs. Hayes are but soft-shell Methodists if they think we will submit to an invasion of Asiatic barbarians through respect for the laws of Congress, or fear of the military arm of the Government of the United States.

One of the Southern States has a legislature without enough lawyers in it to form a judiciary committee. What that State lacks in lawyers it will save in litigation. The laws made by its legislators will be so clearly drawn that they will be almost able to understand them themselves.

AFTERMATH.

The Reverend Otis Gibson, with the keen business sagacity that characterizes this most devout minister of God, has gone East with a learned Chinaman for whom he has written a lecture. Admission, one dollar; Sunday-school children half price. We regard this as a most excellent money-making device, not excelled by that of the gentleman from the East who is now exhibiting a learned pig in our city. We presume the pig exhibitor does not present his phenomenon as a specimen of Eastern pork, and so we hope this exceptional Chinaman will not be considered as a specimen of our average Chinese. The Reverend Otis exhibited his learned and pious heathen to a small but select audience before he left. The lecture is composed of platitudes and personal abuse of the editor of the ARGONAUT, whom, in his pious vocabulary, he styles "hoodlum," and other choice expletives peculiar to that branch of the church militant to which he belongs. May the blessing of any God who has use for Gibson and his Chinaman go with them.

On Monday, February 24, the Chronicle contained one of its most forcible and telling articles against stock gambling. It denounced Flood & Co., and charged upon them the poverty and destitution that does sometimes result from unfortunate investments in mining shares. The result of the article was most telling. The north end stocks advanced in value the same day several millions of dollars. A few more such scathing denunciations and the great bonanza firm will be able to retire from business upon a reasonable competency. This is a striking illustration of the power of the press.

Under the inspiration of Saint Patrick, the gentlemen having in charge the celebration of his birthday have refused to allow Denis Kearney to take part therein. This increases our respect for Saint Patrick. Denis issues a card, saying he feels honored by the act of discourtesy, and that the sole object of a Saint Patrick's Day parade is political, senseless, extravagant, exclusive, sectarian, unpatriotic, and not in harmony with the spirit of patriotism and American nationality. All of which being bold as coming from a Catholic Irishman, and true as coming from any body, increases our respect for Denis Kearney.

From the letter of Mr. Sam Davis, in another column, we learn that we have a quarrel on with the Post. We feel rather like the large man who, perceiving a small man whom he had unwittingly affronted earnestly engaged in some kind of occupation about his (the large man's) legs, looked down, asking what he was about. "Fighting, by G—!" was the undaunted reply. How could we know that the Post was pitching in?—the other papers had nothing about it. As for the other parties to the combat, they may pummel one another to the entire satisfaction of their feelings and reason; it is (or seems likely to be) their own funeral, and the burial service would appear to be more seasonable reading than the riot act.

Mr. Longfellow's poem in the March Atlantic, "The Chamber Over the Gate," concludes thus, referring to the lamented survivors in case of death:

"Ours is the bitterest loss,
Ours is the heaviest cross,
And forever the cry will be,
'Would God I had died for thee,
O Absalom, my son!'"

The cry will be, in other words: "Would God you had suffered the bitterest loss and borne the heaviest cross, O Absalom, my son!"

Mr. William F. White writes to the daily papers averring that what he "was reported as saying" in the Chronicle "is wholly untrue." We knew that; but did he say it?

We are rather inclined to think that Kearney has struck twelve o'clock, and that the great agitation has culminated. The Chronicle, having fanned the flame of agitation to a burning conflagration, is now engaged in throwing cold water upon the dying embers. The movement has done great harm in menacing social order. It has depreciated property values and disturbed confidence. Last winter was—owing to Kearney—a hard one for laborers, but things are now looking better. Those politicians and newspapers that have been frightened by the blatant vaporings of this wild ass of the sand-lot are now returning to reason. The Democratic leaders are getting back their courage, and there is now some talk of running a Democratic ticket. The Republican party, having demonstrated its moral courage by paying no attention to Kearney, will be strengthened by the adherence to its ranks of a larger number of intelligent, property-owning Democrats, who, by this movement, have had demonstrated to them the utter cowardice of their party in the presence of a political mob.

Larkin, of El Dorado, will return to grubbing his foot-hill farm like the honest Cincinnatus he claims to be. We shall see Clitus Barbour again practicing in the Police Court. Beerstretcher will sink to his level. Vacquerel, in white paper cap and muslin apron, will return to his soups, pots, and kitchen; while all the disgusting demagogues that have crawled up, and all the viler political reptiles that have crawled down, into this small mud volcano, will be relegated to their original social and political positions. Volney E. Howard and Judge Terry will carry back to their darker obscurity no added honors. The Call and Bulletin will not, we think, be able to breathe new life under the ribs of this skeleton that the Chronicle has kicked to death.

The Catholic clergy have given no favor to this renegade and blasphemer. The respectable Irish gentlemen who have some pride of their native land, a proper regard for the rights of property and the amenities of social life, and some decent respect for their adopted country and its laws, have all sat down upon this ignorant Irish adventurer. Hence, we say, that it seems to us that Kearney has struck twelve o'clock, noon. He will stump the State. Farmers and workmen will be too busy to give him their honest hours; tramps and vagrants, social bummers, party vagabonds, and political demagogues will gather around him, but the bell has tolled his requiem, and the sod will long before election day be green over his political grave. The dog will have had its day.

"One strong peculiarity," says a contemporary, rather inelegantly, "certainly predominates in us as a people. It is progressiveness; we do not stand still." We can't; the ground is too hot under our feet. An American never dies; he breaks through.

The ghost of Bayard Taylor haunts us through the press. It walks at noonday and it stalks at night. It will not down at any bidding. It will not "troop" home to its church-yard at midnight. It will not disappear at the crowing of the cock. The name of Christ distinctly pronounced, the sign of the cross plainly made, and still it walks through the daily journals in open undisguise. Now poetry, then incident, now biography, and then interesting reminiscence. It began by his illness, was followed by his recovery; then he relapsed, then got better, then got well, then died, then was buried, then resurrected, then lay in state, then was buried again in funeral pomp. Then his body was incinerated, then placed in a solemn shadowy vault, then taken out to be brought home. The remains yet threaten us upon arrival. The press will burst out afresh with the arrival of the ship, the reception of the body, more funeral ceremonies, biographies, and reminiscences. Then he will have a monument—probably by subscription—more eulogies, more poetry, more biography, more tender recollections, and then the unavailing of the statue in some village church-yard and more gush.

We had it first by telegram, then by letter, then in the morning papers, and then the evening papers, and then further particulars by the Eastern papers, and now the poetry is coming with an increasing avalanche of pathos. We ask for rest. We pray that the press may have its attention diverted in some other direction. We hope some body else will die, that we may have relief from Bayard Taylor. The case is almost worse than those of Sam. Bowles and Senator Morton. In the language of the irreverent hoodlum, we ask the press to "give us a rest." Let Mr. Whittier's verses, in another column, and the Saturday Review's opinion of the translation of Faust, elsewhere in this issue, make an end of the whole business.

Lippincott's Magazine for March contains a biographical sketch of the late Colonel Richard Realf—a man who, in his youth, was patronized by Lady Byron, yet was not a prig; and in manhood by Colonel Jackson, yet was not a fool; whose early work was bad enough to incur the approbation of Sam Rogers, and whose late was good enough to escape that of Sam Williams.

An Eastern poet having projected his vision into the tenebrous interspaces between the Possible and the Conjectural discerns,

Glimmering on the dumb cold lips of dawn,
Pale languors of inscrutable unconcern,

And Joaquin Miller perceives in the Oregon Chinaman one of the noblest works of God. The Squaw-Man has evidently the sharper eyes.

Of course even Joaquin Miller has a right to an opinion, but only, we submit, on condition that he keep it to himself. His notion of the Oregon Chinaman is possibly correct; we will admit that it is correct; nay, we will maintain its correctness. We will surrender all our convictions on this Chinese question, and help the Government import more Chinamen. We will concede everything in all this world but the right of Mr. Joaquin Miller to express an opinion. There is neither sense nor safety in a country where freedom of speech is carried to such a length, and, by the Lord, we will pull up stakes and go to Russia!

The Chinese question, which we had blindly thought of paramount importance, we now see to be of none whatever, except in so far as it has been the means of bringing up for discussion and settlement the new and supreme political problem, "Shall liberty of speech be extended to Joaquin Miller?" We answer No; and upon the issue so made we will fight this Government and another. The Chinese are welcome to come or to stay; the women of New England may marry as many of them as they like; the Methodist Church may ordain them as ministers; Mrs. Hayes may ply them with lemon water till they are drunk as lords. We don't care. But if there are brave hearts, clear brains, and strong arms on the shores of the Pacific, Cincinnatus Hiner Miller shall not say what he thinks if we can help it—and shall think it only because we can't help that.

"The actor who should undertake to represent the character of the Saviour who died on Calvary must be more than ordinarily audacious and profane."—Bulletin. With a little of the less picturesque audacity and profanity cut out of the part, ~~here~~ and there, perhaps Mr. Bishop could manage it.

The Pope—heaven forgive him!—has forbidden the traffic in relics, and our pious friend who is building a three-story house from pieces of the True Cross will have difficulty in obtaining lumber to complete it. The supply of the skulls of St. Paul for an ornamental border to his gravel walk will peter out, too, unless he had a point on the market and bought before the corner.

The Call is particularly strong in stories by local writers. The first installment of its latest serial, "The Mission of a Bracelet," begins thus: "A gentleman in the prime of manhood, but upon whose brow rested a deep frown," and ends thus: "She burst into tears and wept convulsively for nearly half an hour." Left weeping.

Of course exhaustive criticism of a dinner does not consist in sampling the soup and toothpicks; and there may possibly be good matter between the silly head and the ludicrous tail of a literary work, but the presumption is all the other way. We do not know how it is in the case of a story in the Call, nor do we as yet see our way clear to finding out without reading the story.

Quite as ludicrous, when taken together, though not singly silly, are the initial and final sentences of Mr. Horace Davis' recent speech in Congress on the Chinese question. No one, we presume, will deny that Mr. Davis can make a rational speech, and no one will affirm a general inconsistency or uncertainty in his views on this or any other subject. Yet his speech begins thus: "Mr. Speaker, the traditional policy of the United States has been to encourage unrestricted immigration, to greet with a welcome every man that came to their shores," and ends thus: "Let us push back this hostile invasion from our shores and restore the traditions of a Republic, united, harmonious, and free." It is, perhaps, needless to explain that the italics are ours. Mr. Davis did not utter them.

The Prince Imperial of the French Republic has sailed for South Africa to help the British troops thrash the Zulus. The Prince is quite a veteran. He received his "baptism of fire" in one of the early battles of the Franco-German war when he was a little tot no bigger than an imperial pint, and he did not like it any. From the way the Zulu war seems likely to end we judge that he will now get his baptism of smoke, and no doubt the spirit of the Third Napoleon will perch upon him in the form of a plucked pigeon, saying: "Thou art my reputed son in whom I am well pleased."

Concerning the "Passion Play," the Bulletin is moved to remark: "To reproduce the life and death of the Saviour on a stage which has echoed to the repartees, the love songs, the sharp dialogues and broad scenes of the modern drama, is shocking to every sense of propriety." To print the Holy Bible on a press that has run off a French novel is shocking to the, etc. To preach the Gospel in a hall that has echoed to the footsteps of giddy dancers performing the glide is shocking to—and the rest of it. To publish a sermon of the Rev. Dr. Holydrone on "spiritual regeneration through the quickening influence of the Paraclete," in the columns of a journal containing also the epic of a kicking mule is thing-amy to every jigsaw ruraliaity.

We note with gratification the announcement of the marriage, in Arizona, of "Jesse Fryer to Major Pauline Cushman." Now, my little dears, which is the man and which the woman?—for a brass pin and a bound volume of the Puzzler's Ownest Delight for 1878.

"I'll make that fellow just sick!" soliloquized a local journalist, the other afternoon on the Oakland boat, cutting something out of the Bulletin and wadding it into his vest pocket as a text for a paragraph. Then he threw away the mutilated journal, which the writer of this picked up and compared with his own. The item cut out was as follows: "The Emperor of Russia has ordered the construction of three new iron-clads and the formation of twenty additional battalions of cavalry."

Every North Carolina Governor for more than fifteen years past has been pardoned out of office in one or other before he had served out his term. As yet even so shall it be done unto you, Governors.

AGNES VERNON.

Two Scenes in Her Life.

"Tell you a story, Kate! Well, that is a fine thing to ask of a poor old woman who is a cripple on the sofa most of her days. I think it should be rather you who, from your gay outer world, should bring me stories of real life."

"Indeed, auntie, your stories often seem to me more like real life than anything I meet with. Perhaps when you moved about in the world you understood the things you saw better than I do. But be good, auntie; please do. Tell me now the story of the miniature that was found among poor papa's things, after his death, that no one knew anything about or could recognize but you."

"Well, dear, bring it here and let me look at it again, and I will tell you where and how I saw her, in the pride of her beauty, when she looked just like that miniature; and then I will tell you what it all came to. I never saw Agnes Vernon but twice, though I was so intimate with her sister-in-law, Mrs. Vernon."

"What! Was Mrs. Vernon her sister-in-law? Goodness! how I wish papa had married Agnes Vernon; then Mrs. Vernon would have been my—my—What would Mrs. Vernon have been to me, auntie?"

"Nothing more than what she is now, my dear—a kind, good friend. But you must wish no such foolish thing, dear Kate; for had Agnes Vernon married your father, as I feel sure he at one time hoped she would, it might have been a life-long sorrow to him. As it was—though she nearly broke his heart—your good mother made up for all that and brought him years of tranquil happiness before he died."

"Oh, to be sure, I would rather have dear mamma for a mother. This beautiful lady looks too much as if she could drive her chariot right over one's body with perfect unconcern—like the wicked Roman women. But, auntie, go on with the story, and please begin at the very beginning."

"Well, dear Kate, like the wicked Roman woman, poor Agnes Vernon suffered heavy retribution for all her faults, whatever they may have been; but, indeed, Kate, I do not believe they were any worse than what any beautiful girl may easily run into without dreaming that she is doing any great harm."

"You know that your father's career began in India, where, from the first, he took a high stand from the extent of his acquaintance with the native languages. After some years' stay there, he returned to England on sick leave. It was winter when he reached the Mediterranean, and there, by advice, he determined to remain until the spring had somewhat softened our rude climate."

"What happened during those few months we never exactly knew, though we heard from him regularly and with good accounts of his health. When he did return to us, however, he looked more like a dead man than a living one. It was evident that something had gone very wrong with him. Either some great trouble was oppressing him, or some great illness must be impending, he was so unlike himself; at times so excited, then again so absent-minded that he seemed unconscious of being spoken to; whenever the postman's knock was heard his impatience became uncontrollable. The only explanation he gave was that he expected letters; but they never came. This state could not last, and within a month he was down with brain fever. His ravings were terrible, and he constantly referred to 'Agnes! Agnes! dear Agnes!' in tones of heart-rending reproach or of touching tenderness. This was the first time we had heard him mention the name; and who she was we, at that time, could not divine."

"For weeks we did not think his life could be saved. As it was, his recovery was slow and tedious."

"As soon as he was able to bear it, the doctors ordered a change of scene. A trip to some of the German baths was decided on, and I was to accompany him. When we had been at Ems about a fortnight, a slight improvement was perceptible in the invalid—a faint color began to come back to the wan cheek; a little more energy and interest in things around him was at times apparent. He promised me that soon, when he was a little stronger, we would visit together all the pretty places of the neighborhood. Meantime he urged my entering, as much as possible, into all the reasonable amusements of the place."

"One morning I went to the circulating library to exchange our last batch of books, the first in which my poor sick brother had shown any interest. I found there a party of English people, evidently new arrivals at the springs. One of them was the most beautiful woman I ever saw. Tall, elegant, and somewhat stately, with slow tranquil movements and such a look of heavenly innocence upon her fair, white brow, and in her dreamy eyes, that she looked more like an angel of heaven than a being of this earth. From the crown of her sunny hair down to the rosy-tipped finger and little foot, she was all beauty, while every movement breathed la grâce encore plus belle que la beauté. The luscious lips, red as the royal rose, were so beautifully formed that the most fastidious could not have criticised them as too full. This miniature shows a beautiful face, but, believe me, Kate, it is no more equal to her than a picture of sunrise at sea is equal to the reality that bathes sea, air, and cliffy shore with inimitable glory."

"Under pretext of selecting books I lingered in the shop till this English party went out. I determined that this beauty, with the

'Face of the morning
When the shadows break apart,'

Should be introduced to me. That evening the weather was damp and chilly, so my invalid went home early from the promenade, leaving me with some acquaintance to enjoy this, the most fashionable part of the day, longer than he cared to do. The walks and colonnades of the public gardens were every minute more and more thronged with fashionable visitors. The German band was playing that soft, floating, delicious music which German bands, it seems to me, play nowhere but in Germany, when suddenly, through one of the windows of the Kursaal, I caught a glimpse of the same lovely face that had so delighted me in the morning. She alone, in all that roomful of butterflies, was dressed in the elegant affectation of simplicity that is so becoming to a really beautiful woman. It was evidently not the only one I was admiring her. Indeed, no one so beautiful had been at the springs that season, and she was already the chief attraction of all who were not too busy at the gaming table to notice any thing else. I was soon informed, by those who had met the family the winter before, at Rome, that their salon there had been quite a rendezvous for the English in that city, and I had no difficulty in finding acquaintance who could introduce me to them. In a very short time I was quite at home with my new friends, and as much charmed with the manner and conversation of Agnes Vernon as with her beauty. We parted that evening fully resolved to meet again next day, and every day, and to be together all day long, if possible. Little did I think how I should see her again."

"Next morning my brother surprised me at breakfast by saying he did not believe the air of the narrow, damp valley of Ems was agreeing with him, and he would like to try Wiesbaden or Spa. As the trip was undertaken solely for his health, of course, I assented, though I was sorely disappointed at having to part so soon from my new friends, the Vernons. I was telling my brother of the delightful evening I had spent, and he, standing at the window, was listening with languid interest, when, suddenly, without the least warning cry or movement, he fainted dead away to my great alarm, as I knew how much a relapse was to be feared. When he recovered he insisted that he could not breathe another hour in the close atmosphere of that place, and that we must leave Ems that same day. This impression seemed so morbidly intense that it was in vain to resist it, and we set off in a few hours without having taken leave of any body. It was a long while before he recovered from the state of lethargic indifference which followed our journey to Spa. I never heard him speak to any one of the brief visit to Ems and its abrupt termination."

"The beautiful Agnes Vernon I never saw again until years afterward, when I returned from India to be present at your father's marriage. I then found that my old friend, Caroline Anderson, had married the brother of Agnes, and from her I heard that Agnes had become a confirmed invalid and hopeless sufferer in consequence of a very sudden and extraordinary attack of neuralgia—so the doctors called it—which seized her without any premonitions during the summer in which I had seen her at Ems, and while she was still in Germany. She had been out riding one warm day, and on returning home she had lain down and fallen asleep upon the sofa without taking off her habit, or throwing any additional covering over her tired, heated limbs. She awoke in intense pain, which never after left her, not even under the influence of the most powerful remedies; stupor they did succeed in producing, but natural, painless sleep never came to her again. She was brought from Germany to London with much difficulty, for the slightest movement, even the jarring of heavy vehicles as they passed, or the fall of any heavy body in the house, greatly aggravated her sufferings. The most eminent physicians in London were consulted, and every resource of science exhausted in vain attempts to give her relief. None ever came. The spine, they said, was the seat of the disease—the neuralgia of the spine, they called it. They could classify, but they could not cure."

"At last the poor sufferer was removed by slow and painful stages to the southwest of England, where, you know, the Vernons have a fine old homestead, and where, it was hoped, the mild climate might do her some good. No improvement took place, however, and here, in a padded room, built expressly for her and isolated from the rest of the house, with attendants trained to wait upon her perfectly noiselessly, she has since lived in unremitting torture, but soothed by that perfect quiet which is, perhaps, the nearest approach to enjoyment that her state permits of. Every part of her body suffers perpetually without relief, night or day; but three or four times a year increased paroxysms seize upon her, and then her agonies are boundless. At these times the aggravation proceeds from a distinctly marked spot in the back, which is slowly mounting higher and higher. When it reaches the head they think she will either die or become a raving maniac. She has kept her senses hitherto, and her faculties are unimpaired, except that she has gradually become stone blind. Until that happened she used to occupy herself indefatigably whenever she could control the expression of her suffering. Many a beautiful little poem, and many a sweet story for children Mrs. Vernon has showed me of hers, besides innumerable pieces of fancy work so delicate one might have fancied that fairy fingers made them, and these all came from her half darkened rooms."

"And did you never see her, auntie, in all the many visits you paid the Vernons?"

"Yes, Kate, I saw her once more, and but once. Indeed, I would not willingly see her again, the impression that sight made on me was so terrible. I had frequently expressed to my friend, Mrs. Vernon, my wish to visit the poor sufferer, but she had always evaded my proposal to do so with some excuse, such as that it would do her no good, that her own family seldom troubled her with their presence, she was past that, and the like. At last, however, after the poor lady became stone blind, she promised me I should see her for a few moments, if I would carefully obey her directions, and not speak generally of my visit, as it was a privilege that had been allowed to none but her most immediate relatives. At the appointed time, having dressed myself, as directed, in soft, noiseless garments and thin shoes, and removed every ornament that could make the least jingling or rattling noise, to which she was painfully sensitive, I accompanied Mrs. Vernon down a long, carpeted corridor, that led away from the rooms in general use toward the part of the house which Agnes never left."

"Of course, I expected to find her terribly altered. More than twenty years had passed since I saw her—years of unmitigated suffering to her—and I was naturally figuring in my own mind what the changes would be, and wherein I might perhaps be still able to trace a dim, faded likeness to the wonderful beauty she had once possessed."

"As we approached the end of the corridor the most distressing cries I ever heard reached my ears; not loud, but low and piteous, like some dumb, panting animal, that can flee and struggle for its life no longer."

"She is suffering more than usual to-day," said Mrs. Vernon, "I would not take you in if I had not promised, and you are going away to-morrow." She hesitated. Perhaps some thought that the complete seclusion of her poor sister-in-law might give rise to remarks injurious to her husband and herself may have weighed with her, for in a moment she added: "Let us go on; it is nothing to her, poor thing!"

"We went to the farthest end of the passage. My companion opened the door of the room perfectly noiselessly, as it seemed to me; but the suffering frame of the inmate felt the jar, though she could not see light from darkness. She screamed out: 'Oh, don't, don't, don't come in now! Leave me to myself; leave me, pray!' Mrs. Vernon slowly closed the door. It was but a moment—a mere glimpse that I had—but should I live to forget everything else, what I saw in that moment will remain in my memory."

"The floor and sides of the room were thickly padded above the height of any person, light and air being admitted from the upper part of the wall above the padding. There was no furniture, except several couches, or rather raised divans, of various heights and sizes, in different parts of the room; these also were padded, and on one of the largest of them, bounding, twisting, writhing, was a little object, the like of which I never dreamed of. She was shrunken and shriveled in the most extraordinary manner to not more than half the size of an ordinary human being, and her frantic movements had the superhuman activity you see in those of a wild animal in a cage. Her skin was a dark brown color and one mass of small but very deep wrinkles. The hair—that beautiful golden hair—was snowy white, hanging loose upon her shoulders. She thrust her fingers into it—long, skinny, claw-like fingers—and tore it out in her mad agony. She waved her arms—which seemed unnaturally long in proportion to her shrunken frame—above her head, and quivered and palpitated all over as she beat her miserable body against the cushioned couch and walls. Then she wrung her thin hands and moaned, as if beseeching mercy; and then, with that low, wild, hunted cry, she dashed herself upon the floor, and struggled with her agony there."

"Oh, Kate, I never dreamed that a human being could suffer so and live; yet she is living still, and with no more prospect of relief than at the beginning of her great suffering, more than thirty years ago."

"Did papa ever know what became of her?"

"Not so far as I know, my dear. He never mentioned her name to me, and I had no reason for supposing that the 'Agnes' of his delirious ravings was Agnes Vernon until her miniature, so secretly preserved among his most precious treasures, carried me back to those old memories, and I saw a meaning in it I had never suspected before. I have never told her sad story to any one but you, dear Kate. Do not let it cloud your young life with sombre thoughts, but let it serve as a reminder, whenever you find your own heart flushed with exultation and triumph at the power which youth, and beauty, and high spirits give you—a reminder that she was once just such a one as you, and that life is not always summer."

J. F. W.

SAN FRANCISCO, January, 1879.

The mishap which befell a party from Boston last week in Philadelphia has caused much merriment in that city as well as in New York, where the unfortunates are quite well known. Among the round of entertainments provided for the visitors by their friends was an evening at the minstrels. The young relative who bought the tickets in the morning asked the ticket-seller whether there would be any "coarse jokes" or "improper allusions" during the performance. He simply asked, because "the Cliffords from Boston were coming." (The name is fictitious, but the story is true.) He was informed that "hardly ever" was there anything out of the way at the abode of minstrelsy. The evening came; a large audience filled the house; the overture was played, and one of the "end men" approached his first joke. Suddenly, up rose the whole band, and, motioning excitedly to the "bones," murmured: "Hush, be careful; the Cliffords from Boston are he-ah." At first the audience did not understand the joke, but when it was repeated, the annoyance of the party alluded to became so manifest that peals of laughter shook the house. At the third or fourth repetition "the Cliffords" could stand it no longer, and indignantly left the hall.

They have a dandy judge in England. The London World, in a recent article, says of Lord-Justice Cotton: "His robes, made evidently for the occasion of the present assizes, are of the brightest crimson, his ermine of the whitest. His Archbold's Criminal Pleading and Evidence, his Russell on Crimes, and his Stephen on Evidence, are each, notwithstanding certain symptoms of basty perusal, still radiant in the newest of covers. But his black cap!—that is indeed a sight worth a journey to Maidstone. Unlike the plain square of black cloth ordinarily used, it is daintily turned up at the corners, and secured apparently by pins, and presents somewhat the appearance of an ecclesiastical biretta. The shape and sit of this article of judicial attire have evidently been the subject of much thought, both on the part of his lordship and his body-clerk. Most judges, when they have to pronounce sentence of death, take the black cap from a drawer in the desk before them, or from their pocket, and place it on their own heads. Not so Lord-Justice Cotton. As the time approaches for sentence to be delivered, and while he is still addressing the prisoner, his body-clerk slips out of his seat, and, going behind the judicial chair, arranges the cap, pinned up as aforesaid, daintily on his lordship's wig, and lightly and noiselessly retires until sentence is passed, when my lord majestically retires to his private room, possibly with a view to study the effect at leisure."

They were sitting in an open buggy on the crossroad, and bounded on one side by the wood, and on the other by an orchard. The first we heard was: "Now stop, Will; you will muss my hair." He laughed, and she broke out with: "You don't love me one bit." The hugs he gave her would have made an anaconda turn pale, and as she threw up her head for breath, he said: "I am strong, eh, girl?" "Yes, you are; but I don't think you are as strong as you used to be."

A reverend gentleman who resides in a neighboring town has the misfortune to own a son who is addicted to drink. The other night, when the family had retired to rest, the son returned home in his usual condition. When the father opened the door to his graceless offspring, he exclaimed, sadly, "Drunk again, Henry! drunk again!" "All right, father," replied the staggering reprobate, "so am I!"

INTAGLIOS.

The Sonnet.

What is a sonnet? 'Tis a pearly shell
That murmurs of the far-off murmuring sea;
A precious jewel carved most curiously;
It is a little picture painted well.
What is a sonnet? 'Tis the tear that fell
From a great poet's hidden ecstasy;
A two-edged sword, a star, a song—ah, me!
Sometimes a heavy-tolling funeral bell.
This was the flame that shook with Dante's breath,
The solemn organ whereon Milton played,
And the clear glass where Shakspeare's shadow falls;
A sea this is—beware who ventureth!
For like a ford the narrow flow is laid
Deep as mid-ocean to sheer mountain walls.

RICHARD WATSON GILDER.

The Wanderer.

Love comes back to his vacant dwelling—
The old, old Love that we knew of yore!
We see him stand by the open door,
With his great eyes sad, and his bosom swelling.
He makes as though in our arms repelling
He fain would lie, as he lay before;
Love comes back to his vacant dwelling—
The old, old Love which we knew of yore!
Ah! who shall help us from over-spelling
That sweet forgotten, forbidden Lore!
E'en as we doubt, in our heart once more,
With a rush of tears to our eyelids welling,
Love comes back to his vacant dwelling!

ANONYMOUS.

Fair Mexico.

I look far down a dewy vale,
Where cool palms lean along a brook,
As crooked as a shepherd's crook;
Red parrots call from orange trees,
Where white blooms kiss the idle breeze;
The gray dove coos his low love-tale.

With cross outstretched—like pleading hands,
That mutely plead the faith of Christ—
Amid the palms a low church stands;
I would that man might learn from these
The priceless victories of peace,
And woo her 'mid these olive trees,
And win an earthly paradise.

I see black clouds of troops afar
Sweep like a surge that sweeps the shore.
I hear the hoarse-voiced cannon roar;
The red-mouthed orators of war
Plead as they never plead before.

JOAQUIN MILLER.

Starlight.

While the broad night above me broods,
In all her shadowy plenitudes,
I let my roaming vision fare
Through many an aisle of starry air.

"Bright throngs," I muse, "that o'er us bend, How vague the messages you send!"

"That fiery star, within whose rays
A wicked, blood-red ardor plays,
"May be some world where dwell serene
A race with souls divinely clean!"

"And that large tear of saintly light,
O'er the dead sunset throbbing white,
"Its snowy splendors looking, now,
Fit for some aureoled spirit's brow—

"That star through ages may have been Some great world world that teems with sin!"
From "A Masque of the Poets."

The Old, Old Story.

I love thee, yes! 'tis vain to soothe my tremor,
The thoughts that bleed, but fill my soul with grief;
Alas, the smile that charms another dreamer
Brings back the past that is my sole relief;
That recent past—through summer forests splendid,
When all seem'd thrilling with new life for me
And reason's promise—it is broke and ended.
I love thee, darling, but—it can not be.

Each vine-clad work appeared a hallow'd bower,
Where thou might dwell, to our enchanted gaze;
The love-lit day gave way to twilight's power,
And moonlight tender won our cooing praise;
Our fancy gave to all an added glory;
That only hearts through lovers' eyes can see;
And yet we feel it is the old, old story,
I love thee, darling, but—it can not be.

JOHN SAVAGE.

Inconstancy.

A stripling plucks a flower fair;
The bright gold of his maiden's hair,
The azure of her eyes are there;
Too fervent is his clasped hand's heat—
The blossom's fragrance lasts an hour;
He drops it wilted at his feet
And plucks another flower.

His maiden love, with soft caress,
And low words full of tenderness,
He close unto his heart doth press,
His kisses steal away the rose
That blooms in blushes on her cheek;
A brief hour's bliss—then forth he goes Another maid to seek.

Hearts Out of Tune.

Her white hand flashes on the strings,
Sweeping a swift and silver chord,
And wild and strong the great harp rings
Its throng of throbbing notes abroad;
Music and moonlight like a bloom
Throughout the rich and sombre room.

Oh, sweet the long and shivering swells,
And sweeter still the lingering flow—
Delicious as remembrance falls
Dying in distance long ago,
When evening winds from heavens were blown,
And the heart yearned for things unknown.

Across the lofty window-pace,
Peace fills the stainless sapphire deep;
One sentry star in outer space
His quenchless lamp lifts, half asleep;
Peace broods where falling waters flow,
Peace where the heavy roses blow.

And on the windless atmosphere
Wait all the fragrances of June,
The summer night is hushed to hear
The passion of the ancient tune;
Then why those sudden tears that start,
And why this pierced and aching heart?

Ah, listen! We and all our pain
Are mortal, and divine the song!
Idly our topos height we gain;
It spurns that height, and far along
Seeks in the heavens its splendid mark,
And we fall backward on the dark.

The Drama of Love.

Act one, we meet;
Act two, give clasping hands;
Act three, some kisses sweet;
Act four, cold barren lands;
Act five, a granite slab that lonely stands.

THOS. S. COLLIER.

PRESIDENT COFFEE,
PURE MOCHA COFFEE,
PURE JAVA COFFEE,

Ground to order at

LORING'S

Dealer in choice

JAPAN AND BLACK

TEAS

922 Market St.,

Between Stockton and Powell Streets, near the Baldwin.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS,
REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 510 SACRAMENTO STREET.

RARE ENGRAVINGS,
MODERN ETCHINGS.VISITORS WILL BE ALWAYS welcome to inspect collection.W. K. VICKERY,
22 Montgomery Street, opposite the Lick House.

JENNINGS S. COX.....OLIVER TEALL.

COX, TEALL & CO.,

REAL ESTATE AGENTS AND
AUCTIONEERS, 303 Montgomery Street, under the Nevada Bank, San Francisco.Auction Salesroom, H. M. NEWHALL & CO., 309, 311 and 313 Sansome Street.J. O. ELDRIDGE, Auctioneer.
ANDREW ONDERDONK, Civil Engineer.

C. O. DEAN, D.D.S.....F. M. HACKETT.

HACKETT & DEAN,

DENTISTS, Latham's Building, 126
Kearny Street, San Francisco.
Office hours from 8 A. M. until 5 P. M.

WM. F. SMITH, M. D.,

OCULIST,

HAS RETURNED TO THIS CITY,
and will resume practice immediately. Consultation Rooms as before, No. 331 BUSH STREET.
Office hours, from 12 M. to 3 P. M.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),
PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office
and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11
A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.DR. JAS. M. HUTCHINS, DENTIST, REMOVED TO 737 MARket Street, opposite Dupont.

J. J. CLARKE, M. D.

No. 106 Stockton Street, San Francisco.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST,
removed to 200 STOCKTON ST., cor. Geary, S. F.

ELECTRIC BELTS,

A sure cure for nervous debility, premature decay, exhaustion, etc. The only reliable cure. Circulars mailed
free. Address J. K. REEVES, 43 Chatham Street, N. Y.

The Best and Cheapest Advertising Medium.

THE NAPA
DAILY & WEEKLY REGISTER

NAPA, CALIFORNIA.

FRANCIS & SPALDING, Publishers and Proprietors.

THE REGISTER—Daily and Weekly—is unsurpassed as a Local and County Newspaper, both in the quantity and quality of reading matter, and in value as an advertising medium. The DAILY REGISTER is the only daily paper published in Napa County, and both Daily and Weekly have a large circulation.
Daily $6, and Weekly $3 a year.
G. M. FRANCIS.....H. S. SPALDING.LITTLE BELMONT
FOR SALE.

THIS BEAUTIFUL SUBURBAN

property, situated contiguous to the Belmont Mansion, twenty-seven miles from San Francisco, on the San Jose Railroad, is offered for rent or sale at reasonable terms.
The property is located in a beautiful valley, with a glimpse view of the Bay; contains thirty acres of land, highly improved, with fruit and ornamental trees. The residence is new, spacious, and elegant, with all modern improvements.
It has a detached cottage for servants, with laundry room
and offices; a stable with six stalls, carriage house, cow houses for thoroughbred stock, chicken house, grounds un-derlaid with water-pipe; outhouses provided with gas; gas
and water furnished from the works of larger Belmont;
water free. The residence and cottage are furnished with all fixed articles, such as book cases, armchairs, billiard table,
range, kitchen and dining-room furniture, floors carpeted,
rooms filled with attractive engravings, all of which will be disposed of with the property and at a low price. A bargain is offered in this property, and if not sold will be rented at a moderate figure for a summer residence. For particulars, inquiry may be made at the ARGONAUT office, No. 322 California Street.

CALABASAS
LAND AND MINING COMPANY.

DIRECTORS.

JOHN P. JONES,
JOHN CURREY,
EUGENE L. SULLIVAN,
GEORGE C. PERKINS,
CHARLES P. SYKES.

THE CALABASAS LAND AND

Mining Company are now prepared to offer special inducements to capitalists or actual settlers for a profitable investment in their attractive town site and mine, situated in the Santa Cruz Valley, in that portion of Southern Arizona acknowledged by all sanitary and descriptive writers to be the ITALY OF AMERICA.
For full particulars and description, send for Prospectus,
or apply at the Company's office, 32 Merchants' Exchange,
San Francisco.

REDINGTON'S

FLAVORING EXTRACTS

ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE
and highly concentrated Extracts of

FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary brands of Extracts.

Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap.
Wherever tested on THEIR MERITS, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON & CO.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

MULLER'S
OPTOMETER!
The only reliable instrument for Testing
Defective Vision.
135 Montgomery Street,
Near Bush, opposite the Occidental Hotel.

FINE
H. A. CALLENDER
650
MARKET ST.
Below Kearny.
JEWELER.
LOWEST PRICES
GOODS.

ANNUAL MEETING.—The Annual Meeting of the Stockholders of the Hale & Norcross S. M. Co., for an election of a Board of Trustees to serve the Company for the ensuing year, and for the transaction of other business, will be held at the office of the Company, Rooms Nos. 57 and 58 Nevada Block, northwest corner Pine and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California, on WEDNESDAY, March 12, 1879, at the hour of one o'clock P. M.
The Transfer Book will be closed on Saturday, March 1, 1879, at 12 M., and remain closed until after the meeting to be held on March 12, 1879.
By order Board of Trustees.
JOEL F. LIGHTNER, Secretary.

IN THE MATTER OF THE APPLIcation of the Brooklyn Land Company to be disincorporated.—Notice is hereby given, that the application of the Brooklyn Land Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, to be disincorporated, has been presented and filed in the County Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and that Monday, the 18th day of March, A. D. 1879, at the hour of 11 o'clock A. M. of that day, at the court-room of said court, in said City and County of San Francisco, has been fixed and appointed as the time and place for hearing the said application. THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

[SEAL.] By JOHN H. HARNEY, Deputy Clerk.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.
ALBERT BELANGER, plaintiff, vs. MARY BELAN-
GER, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to MARY BELANGER, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named plaintiff, in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days;
otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of divorce dissolving the bond of matrimony now and heretofore existing between the plaintiff and defendant, on the grounds
set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is specially made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.
Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this ninth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By JNO. H. MOTT, Deputy Clerk.
JNO. J. COFFEY, Attorney for Plaintiff, 606 Clay Street.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.
THOMAS O'SULLIVAN, plaintiff, vs. JOHN LI-
CENS, in signature and acknowledgment JOHN LINUS.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JOHN LICENS, signature and acknowledgment JOHN LINUS, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days;
otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court, adjudging that a certain deed executed by defendant on March 1st, 1858, and the reference therein made amended in the description of certain real property particularly described in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby expressly made, and for costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and
answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded therein.
Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 22d day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.
JOHN J. COFFEY, Attorney for Plaintiff.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.—NOTICE

is hereby given by the undersigned, Administrator
with the will annexed of the Estate of JOHN BLISS, deceased, to the creditors of, and all persons having claims against, the said decedent, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator at his place of business, Room 12, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, in the City and County of San Francisco.

Dated February 13th, 1879.
WILLIAM DOOLAN,
Administrator with the will annexed of the Estate of John
Bliss, deceased.
PHELPS & ELLIS, 66 Nevada Block, Attorneys for 1 state.

BELCHER SILVER MINING CO.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, State of Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the 27th day of February, 1879, an assessment (No.
17) of one ($1) dollar per share was levied on the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 12, No. 203 Bush Street, Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Wednesday, the twelfth day of March, 1879, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on THURSDAY, the first day of April, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.
JOHN CROCKETT, Secretary.
Office—Room 12, No. 203 Bush Street, Cosmopolitan
Hotel Building, San Francisco, California.

SAVAGE MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees, held on the seventh day of February, 1879, an assessment (No. 37) of one dollar per share, was levied on the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 15, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the eleventh (11th) day of March, 1879, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the thirty-first day of March, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

Office, Room 15, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery
Street, San Francisco, California.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Eureka Consolidated Mining Company, Nevada Block, Room 37, San Francisco, Feb. 18, 1879. At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above company, on this day, a dividend of 10% on the capital stock was declared, payable on WEDNESDAY, the 27th day of February, 1879. Transfer books closed on W. W. H.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 27, 1879.
MY DEAR MADGE:—You have heard long before this of Rose Eytinge's little flare of temper the other night, and will, therefore, understand how it came about that we have had another week of Florence. This is always a pleasure in itself, but when the great character actor follows hard upon a Cyril Searle, you can easily imagine how willingly we all went to see "Cap'n Cuttle" the other night.

What tortures close readers of Dickens suffer upon first seeing a dramatization of one of his works. How they watch and wait in vain for some familiar conceit that has caught the fancy. With what absolute consternation they view every hiatus. How frayed and ragged seems the adaptation. But a consecutive arrangement is impossible, so there is nothing to do but enjoy the character acting and never mind the story, nor the wild, improbable ways in which the dramatist leaps over time and distance, to say nothing of the people he leaves out altogether. Still, it does seem a little odd that Dombey and Son should be called Dombey and Son, when the poor little boy who was born Anno Dombey, and for whom Charles Dickens walked the streets of Paris all night in mourning and lamentation when they parted company, does not appear at all.

But we have "Captain Cuttle" in all the best scenes, although the MacStinger and her thorough rout of the old sailors is considerably omitted. Dear old fellow, how we all do love him, to be sure; and how thoroughly Florence has caught the spirit of good will in his heart, as well as the roystering heartiness of his manner. It was as if one opened the well-thumbed pages of "Dombey," and "Captain Cuttle," materializing himself, had walked out from the pages. His guileless goodness, his beaming good nature, are there, and a briny aroma seems to waft itself across the footlights, so perfect is the old tar's make-up from the top of his glistening head to the soles of his wide-spread feet. What a pity that there were no companion pictures. Yes, there was one, when I come to think—John Wilson's "Jack Bunsby." He really did take pains to give the Delphic wisdom of the sailor a proper setting. Mr. Bock made some approach to his part, and presented "Mr. Dombey's" inflexibility and his dignified peevishness, but not the intense pride and hauteur of the man.

As for the rest of the company, I fancy that, with delightful unanimity, they have one and all refrained from reading Dickens. Dear Madge, think of presenting "Edith Granger," the icy, statuesque, haughty "Edith Granger," as a spitfire! Miss de Forrest actually, in one scene, put up her hands as if she were going to scratch. "Edith Granger" scratching! Shade of the Master forgive them. It gave me chills to read of "Edith Granger;" her quiet, cold scorn is so piercing; her hardness so impenetrable, except to the gentle "Florence;" her pride so indomitable. But Miss de Forrest's "Edith" is another person altogether, and really, as I take it, no improvement upon the original.

Miss Marie Prescott as "Susan Nipper" took a new departure and combed those flying locks from off her brow. Also, she built on a nose. It was rather a remarkable affair, belonging to the snub type of architecture, but, as completed, it became a siphon. To this extraordinary structure she saw fit to add a pair of nostrils deeply, darkly, beautifully black. Her text would appear to have been the line which speaks of the ambiguous "Susan" as detaching "Florence" from a new friend by a wrench—as if she were a tooth. She played the spitfire with a capital S. In fact, Miss Prescott was really not bad, except that in moments of excitement her words were quite unintelligible. This is peculiar to the lady when she is visited with high spirits, so that we lost half of "Susan's" mysterious third person monologues. As for Miss Lottie Cobb, her "Florence Dombey" was really too inane to be worth mentioning, even to find fault with. "Mr. Carker," whose shining teeth gleam with a sinister significance through the whole sad story, might have been as toothless as a new-born babe for any dental suggestions on the part of "Mr. Carker." Mr. Bassett had a dim idea of what sly, old "Joey Bagstock" ought to be, and seemed to have lived on curry and red pepper for a month. Of course, I need not tell you that Mrs. Saunders as "Mrs. Skewton" did some justice to the faded "Cleopatra." Mrs. Saunders always does well enough and never does badly. But, then, she belongs to the old company—the real old company, not the one-half-and-half affair which people call the old company now, but which was the wreck of McCullough's managerial fortunes.

How strange that the actors will not take the trouble to dress themselves properly in a little play like this, where make-up goes for so much. In these plays, too, what with the profusely illustrated editions which abound, and the perfect familiarity of the mass of people with the text, ideals are formed which are easy enough for the actors to realize in appearance, at least. When so simple a thing as Florence's deft management of "Captain Cuttle's" book creates a positive delight, why should these other people, whose calling it also is to amuse and edify, hesitate to take a little extra trouble in doing so?

At the Grand, Willie Seymour in a minor part bestows an extra care on his make-up which certainly has its effect on the story. By the way, I do wish that critics and book-reviewers could be induced to refrain from revealing plots. There is really nothing to Gaborian's play Almost a Life, excepting the masterly manner in which he keeps the secret of the murder until the moment comes for its proper dramatic dénouement. If I had not known what was coming I would have been buried throughout the entire evening in a really delightful maze of conjecture, a phase of mind rarely to be enjoyed nowadays. As it was, I had read the dailies, as every reasonable person does, and knew all that was to happen before I went. Of course "things seen are mightier than things heard," but the interest was not so intense. It is a smoothly-flowing play and put together with remarkable ingenuity, but there is nothing really great in it except the scenery. The fire scene is the best I have ever seen on the stage. Of course, a chateau makes a prettier fire than a hamlet does, and this is an exceptionally beautiful chateau. In fact, the scenery throughout is wonderfully fine, for whatever people think of the auditorium, the stage at the Grand is magnificent, comparatively speaking, of course.

I wonder whether public opinion will suffer the "Passion Play" to be put upon its boards. I opine not. I commenced to read the cast the other day:

"Jesus of Nazareth—James O'Neill."

No one is deeply religious in these latter times, but I write that line with such a shock as I know you will read it with. I can appreciate the pure devotion of the humble wood-carvers of Ober Ammergan, and realize the solemnity with which, after two years of devout preparation, they enact the "Holy Play." But the simple piety of the isolated Tyrolese will not bear transplanting. This is a land of churches. The shadow of the Cross falls over on the Joss house, where the gimcrack idols are set up in solemn, hideous dignity. The towers of the synagogue cleave the sky in close juxtaposition to Lutheran and Wesleyan spires. Even the Maltese cross stretches its arms over a few long-robed, queer-coiffed priests. Yet withal we are not religious enough to accept the "Passion Play" in the spirit of devotion; per contra, we are not irreligious enough to accept it as a theatrical spectacle. It shocks all our finer feelings. It not only seems sacrilegious and profane, but coarse and revolting. We wonder at the hardihood of the actor or actress who will accept a part in the play. We wonder at the daring of the manager who will present it. Public feeling runs high, and, in point of fact, Madge, the whole affair is simply awful. I can not imagine even an atheist, who has ever sat at a mother's knee, looting carelessly in an orchestra seat and regarding the spectacle of the Crucifixion, for they intend to go even so far as presenting that. For my part, I should think an actor would hesitate even to play "Pontius Pilate." He does not shine in history with any excessive lustre, but he has been so reviled through all the generations that he could not be made too revolting to suit the multitude. And who would willingly play "Judas Iscariot?"

No good and sufficient reason has been given for bringing the play out except that E. J. Baldwin and Tom Maguire shed tears over it when it was read to them. While this reveals a very commendable gentleness of heart on the part of the management, it is not enough. Any one may go to the Cathedral on Holy Thursday and see whole brigades of pious people shed tears over the spectacle of the Bishop washing the Apostles' feet. I once saw a man six feet high and of corresponding weight weep like a babe over it. And when the form was over, he arose and wiped his tears away with a monogrammed handkerchief, and walked down town to his place of business, and sold whisky and eternal what-you-call'em to his fellow beings at twenty-five cents per glass—he did not keep a bit-house. Do the tears really go for nothing? I hope, Madge, that they will not try to force it upon the public. Of course we should all go out of sheer curiosity. We could not stay away. But we shall be outraged and shocked to the last fibre. We will be prejudiced forevermore against the actors, and the stage of the Grand will always be entwined with recollections of the awful gibbet. I defy the most flippant not to feel signally uncomfortable at the mere thought of it. If it excite discomfort in the mind of the loose principled or the careless, what must it be to those with whom religious feeling is deep, and holy, and sacred? Simply an outrage.

Let me tell of something more akin to theatres. We are to have Mother and Son—a very successful play—at the California next week. I do not see many familiar names on the bills; but the play, I believe, is the attraction, rather than the people, although the people are well spoken of.

At the Bush Street Theatre Nat Goodwin has introduced two imitatively good imitations of Sol Smith Russell and Gus Williams. Every one has imitated Booth and Barret, Fichter, and poor Stuart Robson; but Goodwin branches out and gives us a new one now and then. I wonder Florence does not come in for his share. One or two songs and some new dresses are the other advertised attractions. A queer advertisement, truly, for surely no one goes either to see the new dresses or to hear the new songs. Goodwin himself remains the attraction par excellence. He does not promise any change of bill. So that next week we shall have only Mother and Son, unless, indeed, the tears of the two managers are potent. Nous verrons. Thine, BETSY B.

A lady calling herself Mme. Roebert-Fechter writes from Paris to the Philadelphia Times, hotly denying the newspaper statements that Fechter, the actor, is married to an American, on the ground that he is married to her. That might be a good enough reason in Paris, but it doesn't go for anything over here; we have emancipated ourselves from the effete systems and inadequate methods of Old World controversy, and while we have no tears to waste upon the lady's domestic misfortune, we sincerely compassionate her ignorance of enlightened logic.

How George Washington, who was not born until February 22d, could have been hanged on February 21st, is a problem to the solution of which many of our facetious correspondents are now setting their wits; the circumstance that the George who was born was a Virginia white and the George who was hanged a Kentucky negro appearing to have been but imperfectly considered. The constitutional amendment may have obliterated the distinction between whites and blacks, but we submit that there is still a wide difference between a Virginian and a Kentuckian—and each fervently thanks heaven it exists.

SOME ANECDOTES.

The late General Cadwalader was sent at the head of his command to keep the naughty Baltimoreans in order during the rebellion; and when he got outside of the town with his troops sent for Prescott Smith as the most popular man of the place, and had a long and confidential talk with him in the sight of the whole populace, at the end of which Smith retired among the crowd. "What did he say? What did he want of you?" were their nervous questions. "If you will not speak of it I will tell you. It was an awful demand. He said: 'My dear fellow, I want to ask you as a great favor to go to Guy's, on Monument Square, and order me a dinner for twenty-five, of canvas-back ducks, terrapin, roast oysters, champagne, madeira, and sherry.'" The rebels were relieved.

Lord Beaconsfield is never unobservant of a slight, and he never forgets one; but he bides his time with a truly Jewish humility, having laid to heart that axiom of Cardinal de Retz: "La vengeance est un plat qui se mange froid." He never hits at random, and it is noticeable that he likes to select for punishment pushing men of the talkative sort. He once disposed of Lord Grey very contemptuously by alluding to him as "poor Lord Grey." Of Mr. Carlyle he said: "He has his reasons for writing civilly of Cromwell—Cromwell would have hanged him." Of Mr. Browning: "I like Mr. Browning's verses, and wish somebody would translate them into English." A member of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce came to tell him that the Chamber intended to vote some resolutions condemnatory of the ministerial policy on the Eastern question. "I have heard a great deal about Manchester 'clayed cotton,' which is disgracing the English name in China," observed his Lordship. "Please tell your Chamber that if they attend to my business, I will try and attend to theirs."

General Tyler told Commodore Vanderbilt that the reason he (Vanderbilt) succeeded so well was because he wore a white cravat, and every one took him for a clergyman. "That reminds me of a story," said the Commodore. "One day I got into a stage down at Bowling Green, and soon two young men, pretty well 'set up,' got in. I looked them over rather sharply, as I am accustomed to do, and one of them turning round, said: 'I suppose you think I'll go to hell?' No, I told him. He turned around very suddenly to the other one and yelled: 'Universalist, by G—!'"

General Grant, it is related by Miss Hooper, was asked what were his sensations when he stepped out upon the platform of an English railway station and saw before him a sea of human faces gathered only to gaze at him. "Madam," he replied, "I felt as though I were one of them."

The late Honorable George S. Hillard was always depended on to draw up resolutions on the death of a member of the Bar. On one occasion a friend found him thus employed. He looked up with a sad smile and said: "I wonder who will do this service for me when I am gone?" "They can not do better than to take some of your own resolutions," was the reply.

Dickens, it is said, used to tell a story to the effect that Godwin and his friend Holcroft determined one day that they would not die at all. They shook hands upon it and swore it.

A young Chinaman at Phillips Academy, Andover, Massachusetts, is exceedingly backward in his studies. The faculty of the school sent an official notification of this fact to the Chinese Government, at whose expense the blockhead is being educated. The Government acted promptly and vigorously. Its instructions were brief and comprehensive: "Send him home and we'll behead him."

When Haaslar, an eccentric Swiss, was engaged in making government surveys, at the beginning of the century, Congress appointed a committee to inspect his work. "You come to 'spect my vork, eh? Vat you know 'bout my vork? Vat you going to 'spect?" The gentlemen, conscious of their ignorance, tried to smooth his ruffled temper by an explanation, which only made matters worse. "You knows noting at all 'bout my vork. How can you 'spect my vork ven you knows noting? Get out of here; you in my vay. Congress be von big vool to send you to 'spect my vork. I 'ave no time to waste vith such as knows noting vat I am 'bout. Go back to Congress and tell them vat I say." The committee did "go back to Congress" and reported, amid uproarious laughter, the result of their inspecting interview.

The Marquis of Tseng, the new Chinese envoy to France, is a thorough diplomatist and man of the world. Before he left Peking he was admitted to an audience of the Empresses, and the Empress-Dowager referred to his well-known linguistic accomplishments and asked him how much he knew of English. "I hear," remarked the dowager, "that you are wonderfully au fait at foreign languages." "Madam," replied his lordship, modestly, "it is true that I can understand foreigners when they talk to me; but, unfortunately, they do not understand me when I talk to them!"

We have received from the Leonard Scott Publishing Company, New York, their excellent reprint of the London Quarterly Review. Following is its table of contents: "Lessing," Aggressive Non-conformity; The Reflection of English Character in English Art; Prince Bismarck; Our Schools and School-masters; Is Political Economy a Science?; Dr. Smiles's Works on Self Help; Russia and the Indian Frontier; Party Government. Readers who are willing to note and mark the learning, thought, and thoroughness with which English writers treat of "weighty matters," should get this quarterly and compare the articles with those of a similar class in our own reviews and magazines, by native "thinkers." Even the formulated ignorance which we call "a common-school education" can hardly get so wide and strong a grasp of its subject; and the "self-made man" shines less by comparison than by the reflected radiance of the intellect which admires him.

CATALAN CLIPPINGS.

EDITOR OF THE ARGONAUT:—The following are some extracts from a Barcelona journal, and translated from the Catalan dialect, which I thought you perhaps would think it worth while to give a place in the columns of the ARGONAUT. B.

When a child is born in Italy, the parents, anxious to know what will be its vocation, place it standing in the corner of a room, against the wall, and observe it closely. Does the little creature cry and scream, it will be a singer; is it quiet, its propensities are in the culinary line; does it kick, it will be a ballet dancer.

At Calabria they try a different process. There they show a child a silver spoon. If the infant puts its lips to the spoon, believing it to contain soup, the vocation is religious; does it seize the spoon, alas! nothing can prevent the cherished infant from becoming a thief.

The manner of detecting different nationalities: Place before each man a glass of beer, with a fly floating on the surface.

A Spaniard will seize glass, beer, and fly, and fling them against the wall. A Frenchman will ask for a silver spoon, and carefully fish out the fly. An Englishman will take out the fly with the tips of his fingers, and drink the beer. A German will swallow both at one draught. And last, the Russian will seize the fly, masticate it, and pitch the beer down his throat.

There is also a good way of telling the nationality of a soldier setting out for a campaign:

The German soldier carries a pipe and a flute; the Italian, his dagger and scapular; the English soldier takes a bottle of brandy and a good saucepan; the Spaniard never forgets his guitar and a slice of bacon.

According to an agreeable and inexorable law of 1803, no Frenchman can give his child a name not in the calendar or to be found in history. A Parisian mairie recently ruled out "Aramis" on this ground, and his Worship of the Sixth Arrondissement has been much perplexed over the proposition of a citizen to call his daughter "Odette."

"I beg your pardon," said the official, "but you can't call her that name; it's not in the calendar."

"Odette" is a historic name—that's the name of Charles VI.'s mistress, as you can see by consulting Halévy's book on the subject, or going to the opera."

"Wait a moment, please, till I consult my chief clerk," says the discomfited Mayor, and through the open door Odette's father hears the same dialogue practically repeated, but with a change in the roles, the Mayor finally crushing his subordinate by an appeal to the eminent historian, Halévy.

The following is a puzzle sonnet; the trick is to tell what animal it is about:

Minstrel that nightly at my garden gate
With shrilly yowl and catterwaul canorous,
Assemblest all thy feline mates in chorus,
Fiery-eyed chef, that on the fence elate
Through florid trills and tremulous ornate,
Leadeest thy tail'd orchestra sonorous,
And bringest all thy repertoire before us,
Nor hast regard for things aimed at thy pate;
I do not chide thee for thy strains forlorn,
I know 'tis Love that causes all thy labors;
Ver I beseech thee with thy pipes and tabors,
Thy dulcimers and rebeks, leave my door,
Stack all the baggage of thine amorous corps,
And get thee gone, I prithee, to my neighbors.

Baby was playing with the scissors, and his mother, perceiving this, snatched them away, saying:
"Do you know that if you play with those scissors and stick them into yourself, you'll be killed and die, and be dead, and mamma'll have no more little boy?"
"Yes'm."
"And do you know that when any one dies it's for a long time?"
"Yes'm, for all ooe's life."

Mr. Frank Buckland, the English naturalist, gives an account of a splendid live beetle which Mrs. Randolph Clay wears as a personal ornament. The beetle has been in captivity seven months, but does not eat. He is attached to his mistress by a chain of gold, and will move about the drawing-room table when the room is quite warm. The beetle was brought from Yucatan. The wing sheaths are of dead-gold color with ebony-black markings.

O king of the fiddle, Wilhelmj,
If truly you love me, just tellmij;
Just answer my sigh
By the glance of your eye:
Be honest, and don't try to sellmij.
With rapture your music did thrillmij,
With pleasure supreme did it fillmij,
And if I could believe
That you meant to deceive—
Wilhelmj, I think it would killmij.

Horny-handed son of a hod-carrier (loq.)—"Share all money equally, that's what I say." Wife of the same—"And what would ye do wid' your share, Michael O'Shaunnessey?" "Spind it like a brick, ye could fool." "And what would you do thin?" "Share it all over again, av course; hand me down that pipe."

"What does your husband do?" asked the census man. "He ain't doin' nothing at this time of the year," replied the young wife. "Is he a pauper?" asked the census man. She blushed scarlet to the ears. "Law, no!" she exclaimed, somewhat indignantly; "we ain't been married more'n six weeks."

Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett is a rather diminutive person, with a striking cast of features—regular, yet hardly beautiful—but with a quick mobility of expression, a lively sensibility, and the most penetrating, lovely eyes imaginable. They seem swimming in their own light.

A schoolmaster spoke of his pupils as having been so thoroughly disciplined that they were as quiet and orderly as the chairs themselves. It was probably because they were cane-bottomed.

"What is so rare as an honest man?" asks the Christian Intelligencer. Alas! yes; there are but few of us left now, and sometimes a feeling of loneliness—but let it pass.

"Ah," said the fly as it crawled around the bottle, "I have passed through the hatching age, the creeping age, and now I am in the moulting age, and—there it stuck."

In Sherman & Hyde's window is exhibited a fine, large photograph of Mrs. William J. Florence, surrounded by a circle of smaller "cabinet" pictures. They are executed in the best style of the art by the firm of Bradley & Rulofson, and attract a good deal of attention from the skill that has been applied to the creation of beauty where it was not, while preserving, at the same time, a fidelity of likeness that is surprising. It is to the solution of such difficult art problems as this that the firm of Bradley & Rulofson address their genius, with so eminent a degree of success as to shine among photographers like a sun among tallow candles.

An elegant assortment of gold watches and chains at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

Dr. E. O. Cochrane, Dentist, No. 850 Market Street, corner of Stockton (over drug store), San Francisco. Office hours, from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M.

Modern Artists' Etchings, 22 Montgomery Street.

Artistic novelties, manufactured from California quartz, at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

CONSUMPTION CURED.—An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for consumption, bronchitis, catarrh, asthma, and all throat and lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for nervous debility and all nervous complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it this recipe, with full directions for preparing and using, in German, French, or English. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. SHERAR, 149 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

STERLING SILVERWARE.—A large assortment of elegant designs at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

STANDARD THEATRE.

Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.

LESSEE AND MANAGER.....M. A. KENNEDY.
BUSINESS MANAGER.....P. H. KIRBY.

This (Saturday) evening, March 1st, and every evening until further notice.

MATINEE TO-DAY AT 2 P. M.

Gigantic Success—The Greatest Hit ever known—Genuine Sensation.

MATT MORGAN'S

LIVING ART PICTURES.

A beautiful series of Classical Statuary, representing Ancient Mythology, by the loveliest formed women in the world, superior to anything of the kind hitherto presented in this city. In addition will appear

MADAME RENTZ'S

CELEBRATED FEMALE MINSTRELS,

—AND—

MABEL SANTLEY'S

ENGLISH BURLESQUE COMBINATION,

In the sparkling burlesque,

FEMALE FORTY THIEVES.

Monday, March 3, entire change of specialties.

Seats at the box office one week in advance; also by speaking telephone at the principal telegraph stations throughout the city at theatre rates.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE,

Mission Street, between Third and Fourth.

LENTEN SEASON.

During the season of Lent, commencing Monday, March 3, will be rendered with all due solemnity and attention to historical facts,

THE PASSION,

Written by Salmi Morse, Esq., and given under his supervision.

A CHOIR OF EIGHTY VOICES—A LARGELY INCREASED BAND OF INSTRUMENTAL PERFORMERS.

THE PASSION

Will be presented on Saturday afternoon, at 2 o'clock.

The house will be closed on Sunday night, in order to give suitable time for preparation.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

TWO PERFORMANCES TO-DAY. MATINEE AT 2; NIGHT AT 8.

LAST TIMES OF HOBBIES.

Monday, March 3 (Last Week but One), Entire New Bill.

ELIZA WEATHERSBY'S FROLIQUES

AND MR. N. C. GOODWIN, JR.,

In the new Musical Extravaganza entitled the RAMBLERS.

MATINEES WEDNESDAY AND SATURDAY.

Monday, March 12, Farewell Week of the "Froliques."

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MACUIRE.....MANAGER.

TREMENDOUS SUCCESS OF

BARLOW, WILSON, PRIMROSE & WEST'S MINSTRELS.

Acknowledged to be the most brilliant and artistic combination before the public.

This (Saturday) afternoon and evening, March 1st, and every evening, including Sunday.

MILT. G. BARLOW, the great Comedian.

GEORGE WILSON, the unapproachable Character Actor.

PRIMROSE AND WEST, the unrivaled artists in Song and Dance, and Champion Clog Dancers of the World.

EDDIE FOX, the Minstrel Paganini.

THE QUEEN CITY QUARTET,

The Best Glee Party in the World.

WEDNESDAY MATINEE AT 2 O'CLOCK.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

Commencing Monday, March 3, the NEW YORK

UNION SQUARE COMBINATION

PROPRIETOR.....MR. SHERIDAN SHOOK.
MANAGER.....MR. A. M. PALMER.

In the last great New York success, the grand play in five acts, by Victorien Sardou, author of Diplomacy, entitled

MOTHER AND SON.

"The evil that men do lives after them."

The cast will include:

MR. GEORGE CLARKE,
MISS LILIAN CLEEVE CLARKE,
MISS ROSE OSBORNE,
MISS FANNY MORANT,
MISS MARIE WILKINS,
MR. BRADSHAW,

In their great original characters, supported by the California Theatre Company.

ONLY MOTHER AND SON MATINEE on Saturday

Seats at the Box Office.

LECTURE

.....BY.....

P. ANNETTA PECKHAM,

Latterly known as Mrs. John Wickliffe Ricks,

AT DASHAWAY HALL (Post St.).

Thursday Evening, March 6, 1879

Doors open at 7 o'clock. Lecture commences at 7:30.
Subject, "THAT DRUNKARD. Admission, 25 cents.

REMOVAL.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO.

MUSICAL BOX DEPOSITORY AND
WORK SHOP has been removed from No. 120
Sutter Street to

No. 31 Post St., San Francisco.

GRAND OPENING

SPRING STYLES
T-O-D-A-Y.

DOMESTIC SERVANTS.

JAPANESE and CHINESE Servants of all kinds will be speedily furnished by the undersigned, who, having had seven years' experience, feel confident of being able to give satisfaction in all cases. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to call and leave orders. PIERCE & SON, 609 Sacramento Street, up stairs, San Francisco.

VITAL HUMAN MAGNETISM

Nature's Chief Restorer of Impaired Vital Energy.

BY THIS MYSTERIOUS GIFT OF GOD TO MAN, THE MOST SHATTERED CONSTITUTION CAN BE BUILT UP IN THREE WEEKS; ACUTE CASES CURED IN A FEW MINUTES. ALL PAINS AND PAINS INSTANTLY DISAPPEARING, AND HEALTH RESTORED.

PARALYSIS CURED.

To whom it may concern.—This is to certify, that on the 15th of April, 1878, I had a stroke of paralysis of my left side, extending from my shoulder down to my hip. I found no help until I came to Mr. McLennan, 220 Stockton Street, who gave me instant relief, and saved my life. His power as a healer is wonderful. (Signed)

J. L. WILBERT, Dentist,
December 3, 1878. 18 Third St., S. F.

Besides the above, I can refer with pleasure to the following prominent gentlemen that have been under my treatment: Gov. A. K. P. Safford, of Arizona; Judge S. P. Hall, of San Francisco; Judge L. E. Pratt, San Francisco; Judge Currey, San Francisco; Rev. John Tyerman, Australia; and one thousand and six hundred others, besides very many ladies and physicians of high standing whose names I am not at liberty to publish.

J. D. MCLENNAN,
Vital Magnetic Healer,
No. 220 Stockton St.

LIBRARIES

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE

SUPPLIED AT

SPECIAL RATES

.....BY.....

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,

NOS. 3 AND 5 MONTGOMERY STREET,

MASONIC TEMPLE.

"DOMESTIC" SEWING MACHINE,

The only really light-running lock-stitch Sewing Machine in the market.

"DOMESTIC" PAPER FASHIONS

Elegant, stylish, and reliable.

J. W. EVANS, 20 Post Street, San Francisco.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARY A. WOOTEN, plaintiff, vs. JOHN WOOTEN, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to John Wooten, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby made, and for costs of this suit, counsel fees, and alimony; also for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 15th day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk,
By W. STEVENSON, Deputy.

R. P. & H. N. CLEMENT,

ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW.

Nos. 2, 3 and 4, Montgomery Street, N. F.

POUR LES DAMES.

The spring chronicles give us some interesting facts concerning spring toilets. I believe it is beginning to be conceded that whatever is becoming and graceful may now be considered fashionable, without much regard to absolute styles. There are some designs, however, that seem so universally suitable, that they will be widely used. Among them are the new model for a polonaise known as the "Lamballe," the "Zophie" and "Frida" overskirts, and the many varieties of cutaway basques and vests. The "Lamballe" deserves something more than a mere passing mention, for it is destined to be exceedingly popular this spring. It has a basque front trimmed to represent a vest, a slightly bouffant back, which is draped low upon the skirt and held in by elastics underneath. The sideform, which is cut in a very graceful curve, is caught at the side by a bow of silk or ribbon. As it is quite long, the only part of the underskirt visible is the trimming, about a quarter of a yard in depth. Basques are oftenest seen made very plainly and usually cut square, front and back, they, as well as the vests worn with them, being quite destitute of trimming, the "lavense" folds in which the majority of the overskirts are plaited being considered sufficient ornamentation for street costumes. Some are worn with broad fancy belts. For morning wrappers, the "Princesse" and "Watteau" are still favorites, and the "Duchesse matinee," a long, half-fitting sacque, with side fouses extending to the shoulders, bids fair to be received with great favor. Made in cashmeres, trimmed with lace, in foulards or the soft India silks, they are very beautiful. A pretty design for a linen duster, soon to be needed for summer wear, is the "Thekla" redingote. For complete walking suits, the straight mantelet or the fichu are to be worn. Usually, these wraps are of the same material and color as the costume, but of a different shade. The very pale mastic or putty color, so long fashionable, is giving place to a deeper shade, which verges on coffee color, for these morning suits, and fawn will be much worn also. An entirely new opera and theatre wrap is the "Serape," or Mexican cloak, worn both on horseback and on the promenade in Mexico. It passes over the head by means of a very wide slit in the centre, which, when drawn up, makes a rich shirring around the throat. This shirring is nicely decorated with gold thread and beads, and forms a most effective protection to the throat and chest. The garment is a yard and a half in depth, is cut circular, and has a deep border round the bottom edge, of gold thread and beaded embroidery, below which is a heavy fringe. A yellow and white material, with embroidery of scarlet, green, and gold, is very effective. A scarf or mantilla wrap for the head is the suitable thing to accompany this style of cloak. In spring and summer materials, besides the several varieties mentioned in my last letter, there are printed armures, something quite new and very desirable for house or country wear. The foundation color is usually white, with raised threads, like brilliantines, and for design have small pale-tinted flowers. Scotch gingham—in contrasting colors—in plaids and stripes, and called "Zephyrs," will be very useful for children's wear. Coteline is a stiff, partly transparent cotton material, woven in lengthwise cords and in cool-looking floral designs on white, cream, or Sevres blue ground. "Mummy cloth" is, notwithstanding its unpromising name, really a very pretty goods for summer suits. It comes in soft, faded colors, and the pattern is usually sprays of flowers and leaves. Eastern merchants have adopted the practice of having samples of these goods washed and otherwise tested by the severest processes, in order to show customers just how much they are capable of fading. This cloth comes a yard wide, and fourteen yards are ample for a suit. Russian braid lace is being largely imported to trim all these new goods. Percales in handkerchief patterns, polka dots, diamonds and stars, are pretty for the little ones; they have the soft foulard finish. Another decided novelty is French cambric with the design in different colors on the two sides, so that strips of one can be used to trim the other. The colored embroidered Coventry rufflings are available as trimmings for nearly all these summer fabrics, for walking, yachting, croquet, and garden suits, as well as house dresses, aprons, etc. I see that Madame Demorest has an excellent patent in the way of a machine for fringing silk, which is quite invaluable during the present fancy for that style of trimming. Among the more artistic garnitures are bands of velvet or satin, on which flowers, grasses, wheats, butterflies, birds, and similar designs are painted by hand, and which are used on rich materials. Black satin, with birds and butterflies of brilliant plumage, is especially effective; and the humming bird is said to be a favorite design from the fact that the species is nearly extinct—so unsparing has been the fashion that, for some years past, has called for the deaths of these exquisite creatures by the tens of thousands. Verily, there is truth in what the old German, Gleim, has said: "It is, as it were, born in maidens that they should wish to please everything that has eyes;" and to that end, nothing in nature is spared. Here is still another freak of the art fancy in the elaborate designs now used on garter clasps, some being as handsome as bracelets in design and finish: The garters themselves are merely curled silver wire, covered with light-colored ribbon or silk; but the clasps are ornamented with birds, female figures in relief, flowers, bees, harlequins, and laughing Cupids, but strictly mythological subjects seem to be best liked. Hand-painted dress buttons are novelties of the more expensive kind, as well; they are done on black or white silk, velvet, or satin, and a different figure or flower is painted on each. Flowers and birds, or insects, are the favorite representations, and there are some made to resemble the finest of mosaics. The "Ouch locket" is a new trinket, and is so called because the setting is left out, leaving open the socket, which is called by goldsmiths the ouch, or collet. The intention is to have the article—which, by the way, must be in an antique setting—appear to have lost its jewel through its extreme age. Whole necklaces are made after the same fashion. What with newly-bought laces dipped in coffee to give them the appearance of age, and now this new caprice, fashion will soon succeed in destroying the halo that has always surrounded the idea of relics. Some very exquisite designs in lace pins are shown. Among them is one in the form of a mousetrap, which appears to have fallen off the shelf, and is held by a gold band, that has a flagree cheese on it. A little rodent hangs by its tail dead. Another is a transparent green crystal whale, inside of which is a miniature Jonah moving on a wire, and preparing for his historical exit. The new "boudoir fan" is something unique. It has a handle terminating in an oblong section like a domino-box, which slides open, showing a piece of black powder and a puff. On one side is a perfumed bag and an ivory comb. The "Camargo" has a mirror set in it, and, of course, is screen-shaped, and does not shut up. On the back, behind the mirror, is a "leaf" of powder, being a preparation of blanc des perles, thinly spread. At the end of the pendant tassel is a little satin bag, in which is hidden a powder puff. With this fan comes a box containing several leaves of powder, to replenish as those already in use are exhausted. Each is intended to serve three times. But none equal the wonderful Rothschild fan, whose workmanship is so marvelously fine that it has to be seen through magnifying glasses. Fancy combs have not lost their place in the affections of the fashionable world, but the style is quite new. They are now worn in the narrow, three-forked, three-balled design, or in the shape of a poniard with one ball, or a cross-shaped hilt. This is a revival of the fashion in vogue when the great tragedienne, Rachel, was in this country, and wore, among other quaint and magnificent jewels, a golden poniard, in which were set three enormous diamonds. A singular design for sleeve buttons is a casque of pale golden, containing a model of the plaster cast of Charles XII.'s dead face, done in ivory, the very bullet hole in the cheek being reproduced with painful accuracy. Shawl-back slides are graceful novelties in lesser bijouterie. They are, in form, similar to lace pins, but less fragile and somewhat larger. The figures on them are dragon flies, beetles, satyrs, and the like, and the design being sunk in the surface of the pin, leaves the latter perfectly flat. New glove-stretchers come in solid gold frosted with silver, and with carbuncles or topazes in the extremity of each handle. New neck-gear is mostly of crêpe lisse, the handkerchief fichu being the most popular. These are gathered up on the left side and fastened with a spray of flowers, which are coming into favor again. Lace shoes are something new. They are of satin embroidered in white in the appliqué and guipure designs to simulate lace. The form of the shoe is the "Polignac," and it has the highest and narrowest heel yet worn. Velvet is sometimes made up in this way. We are really to have something new this month in the way of millinery. The "Da Vinci" hat, a cap with a wide-rolled brim and bell crown, like those in Leonardo's pictures, the "Turenne," that has a wide, flaring edge; and, for misses, a small crowned shape, with brim drooping on both sides, and known as the "Lotos," being among the prettiest of the new headgear. A very astonishing model is "La Surprise." It is only suited to carriage wear, and none but extremists will venture on it even there. The adjustment of the feather gives it its name, and is undeniably surprising, being attached to the forward part of the brim, on the right side, and dangling at its own sweet will. Three-quarters of a yard is the regulation length of feather, which is usually white or light, and the hat itself is of the "mouquetaire," Louis XIV., shape, and either garnet or navy blue. The multiplicity of new ribbons is something startling; moreover, all are exceedingly beautiful. "Pekin," or striped, and the "Jardinière," or brocaded, ribbons, are the most extensively shown so far. The first come in gauze, gros grain, and brocades of one color and two tones. Persian brocaded ribbons are light mixtures of the Sevres blue, one of the new shades, old gold and rose color, in palm leaf designs. The new reversible ribbons have one side of plain satin, the other striped in contrasting colors, or with a Persian brocaded pattern. Soft satins have a brocaded border down each side, or a Roman or Scotch plaid border. Plaided chinés, changeful as the chameleon's hues, are also to be popular, and plain gros grains are to be diversified by a Persian stripe on one side. In the "Pekins," basket-woven gauzes and twilled stripes come in one design, separated by a cord of two colors, some have three stripes; in others the stripes are reversible, one side being, for example, a black satin stripe, alternating with one of gay, mixed colors, while the opposite side is a white stripe with a mixed design. The "Jardinière" stripes on the Persian patterns will be used for trimming Leghorn hats and bonnets, and to blend with lace. For trimming, the preference will be given to No. 16 ribbon, over No. 12, which has been the favorite during the past winter. It is used as a substitute for bias silk, and is about two inches and a half wide. Still wider numbers will be used before the season is over. It is noted, as a new caprice, that everything must be perfumed of late. Imported goods are often scented before being dispatched from Europe. The newest colors are reseda, faience, and Sevres blues and dove's-throat, the blues particularly being employed in the new cotton goods. Altogether the spring campaign has opened most promisingly.

LILIAS DUBOIS.

Bill of Fare for Ten Persons.—Sunday, March 2, 1879.

Eastern Oysters on Shell.
Amber Soup.
Stewed Terrapin. Hominy.
Fillet of Beef, with Mushrooms.
Roast Turkey, Oyster Dressing, Cranberry Jelly.
Asparagus. New Potatoes.
Roast Mallard Duck.
Lettuce, French Dressing.
Ice Cream. Wine Jelly.
Lady Cake. Fruits.
Claret, Sherry, Burgundy, Champagne.
Coffee.

The electric light is said to have a particular effect on patients suffering from catalepsy and other nervous complaints. Professor Charcot, of the Salpêtrière, Paris, after making experiments with the electric light on hysterical subjects, found that a patient placed before a very bright electric light fell into an anæsthetic condition. The subject of this treatment stands as if fascinated, motionless, and with fixed, staring eyes. The limbs are stiff, but not so rigid that they can not be moved, and they preserve whatever position may be given to them. The patients neither see nor hear. In vain the operator speaks to them or makes signs; all communication between them and the outer world seems to be at an end.

He said he was a linguist; but, upon interrogating him in regard to the languages he spoke, he said they were Turkey, Coachenchina, and Gum Arabic.

THE LATEST MAGAZINE VERSES.

Bayard Taylor.

For us he wandered through strange lands and old;
We saw the world through him. The Arab's tent
To him its story-telling secret lent,
And, pleased, we listened to the tales he told.
His task, beguiled with songs that shall endure,
In manly, honest thoroughness he wrought;
From humble home-lays to the heights of thought
Slowly he climbed, but every step was sure.
How, with the generous pride that friendship hath,
We, who so loved him, saw at last the crown
Of civic honors on his brow pressed down,
Rejoiced, and knew not that the gift was death.
And now for him, whose praise in deafened ears
Two nations speak, we answer but with tears.

O Vale of Chester! trod by him so oft,
Green as thy June turf keep his memory. Let Nor wood, nor dell, nor storied stream forget,
Nor winds that blow round lonely Cedarcroft;
Let the home voices greet him in the far,
Strange land that holds him; let the messages
Of love pursue him o'er the charless seas
And unmappped vastness of his unknown star.
Love's language, heard beyond the loud discourse
Of perishable fame, in every sphere
Itself interprets; and its utterance here
Somewhere in God's unfolding universe
Shall reach our traveler, softening the surprise
Of his rapt gaze on unfamiliar skies.

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER, in Atlantic.

At Last.

We traveled side by side for years and years,
And yet our souls were many miles apart;
No mutual joys, no mingling of our tears,
Could bring us heart to heart.

Blossom and fruit we gathered from one tree,
Drank from one fountain, conned one sacred book,
And yet her spirit drew not near to me
In word, or deed, or look.

At last, when earth and sky were still and gray,
We stood together by a solemn shore,
And from our lives the veil was rent away,
And we were blind no more.

One swift bright glance into each other's souls,
One kiss which told us all our gain and loss,
And then the mystic tide between us rolls
That she may not recross.

Parted, when all the world might deem us near;
Near, when the world may think us far apart;
Oh, love, I wait till God makes all things clear
And brings me where thou art!

SARAH DOUDNEE, in Peterson.

Pictures in the Fire.

The blazing coals were glowing bright
Upon the hearth so broad and wide,
And I was sitting in their light,
And Elsie by my side.

The tangles in her cloudy hair
She pushed aside, and just to see
More plainly where the figures were
She leaned upon my knee.

A rustic boy with bare, brown feet,
Bright where the coals were deepest red,
Binding up roses among wheat,
She saw so plain, she said.

And then to make me see him too,
About my neck with witching grace
She put her arm, and softly drew
My face against her face.

Ah, is it strange I said I found
A picture that was very sweet,
But not a rustic boy that bound
Roses among the wheat?

Dear Elsie, in her modest tire,
I painted then with bashful art,
And said I saw her in the fire
A-burning in my heart.

And is it strange if new delight
Shook out to flowers our budding souls,
The while we sat and watched that night
For pictures in the coals?

—From Leisure Hours.

The Marguerite.

The angry winds the blossoms rudely rending
Had dropped a snowy shower,
And, underneath the locust branches bending,
She plucked a single flower,

A flower that bloomed alone; then, softly sighing,
She pulled its leaves apart,
As if to read some secret underlying
The white flower's yellow heart.

"What said the flower?" spoke one to her, close standing
Upon the leafy spot.
"It said," she slow replied, at his demanding,
"He loves me, loves me not!"

"A flower is but a flower; who knows its meaning?
Heed not the marguerite."
Then lower whispers, toward the maiden leaning,
"He loves, loves thee, oh, sweet."

MARIE S. LADD, in Peterson.

A Dialogue.

SHE.—The dandelions in the grass
Are blown to furries' clocks;
On this green bank I pluck'd, alas!
The last of lady-smocks.

HE.—Let them die,
What care I?
Roses come when field-flowers pass.

SHE.—But these sun-sated, sultry hours
Will make your roses fall;
Their large wide-open crimson flowers
Must die like daisies small.

HE.—Sweet as yet!
I'll forget
(When they die) they lived at all.

MARY F. ROBINSON, in Littell.

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

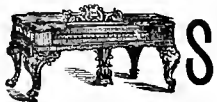

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.

WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

STATEMENT OF THE CONDITION
and Affairs of the

STATE INVESTMENT

.....AND.....

INSURANCE COMPANY OF SAN FRANCISCO,

In the State of California, on the 31st day of December, A. D. 1878, and for the year ending on that day, as made to the Insurance Commissioner of the State of California, pursuant to the provisions of Sections 610 and 611 of the Political Code, condensed as per blank furnished by the Commissioner

CAPITAL, $200,000.

Amount of Capital Stock paid up in Cash.....$200,000 00

ASSETS.

Real Estate owned by Company.....	$140,611 68
Loans on Bond and Mortgage.....	59,550 00
Cash market value of all Stocks and Bonds owned by Company.....	84,370 00
Amount of Loans secured by pledge of Bonds, Stocks, and other marketable securities as collateral.....	23,683 66
Cash in Company's office.....	6,000 03
Cash in Banks.....	28,688 35
Interest due and accrued on all Stocks and Loans.....	1,728 65
Interest due and accrued on Bonds and Mortgages.....	3,762 50
Premiums in the course of collection.....	42,452 07
Bills receivable, not matured, taken for Fire and Marine risks.....	19,447 15
Total Assets.....	$401,384 09

LIABILITIES.

Losses adjusted and unpaid.....	$6,402 50
Losses in process of adjustment or suspense.....	8,550 00
Gross Premium on Fire Risks running one year or less, $189,003 52—reinsurance 50 per cent.....	94,501 76
Gross Premiums on Fire Risks running more than one year, $3,067 60—reinsurance pro rata Gross Premiums on Marine and Inland Navigation Risks, $1,579 02—reinsurance 100 per cent.....	2,588 50
Gross premium on Marine Time Risks, $38,640 76—reinsurance 50 per cent.....	1,579 02
Cash Dividends declared to stockholders remaining unpaid.....	19,320 38
Marine Notes payable.....	82 00
Claim in Litigation.....	1,376 47
Total Liabilities.....	$215,372 63

INCOME.

Net Cash actually received for Fire Premiums.....	$186,786 82
Net Cash actually received for Marine Premiums.....	52,168 35
Bills and Notes received for premiums.....	19,447 15
Received for interest on Bonds and Mortgages.....	3,957 18
Received for interest and dividends on Bonds, Stocks, Loans, and from all other sources.....	9,465 69
Rents.....	11,655 00
Total Income.....	$266,033 04

EXPENDITURES.

Net amount paid for Fire Losses (including $4,641 98 losses of previous years).....	$69,580 88
Net amount paid for Marine Losses (including $6,981 92 losses of previous years).....	51,236 58
Dividends to stockholders.....	60,044 00
Paid or allowed for Commission or Brokerage.....	34,679 00
Paid for salaries, fees, and other charges for officers, clerks, etc.....	20,100 00
Paid for State, National, and local taxes, rents, Fire Patrol, advertising, printing, and all other expenses.....	23,558 33
Total Expenditures.....	$270,198 79

LOSSES.

	FIRE.	MARINE.
Incurred during the year.....	$75,741 40	$50,404 66

RISKS AND PREMIUMS.

	FIRE RISKS.	PREMIUMS.
Net amount of risks written during the year.....	$14,018,349	$214,118 94
Net amount of risks expired during the year.....	15,120,761	235,892 08
Net amount in force Dec. 31, 1878.....	12,863,901	192,971 12
Risks written in the State of California.....	12,472,560	177,935 65
	MARINE RISKS.	PREMIUMS.
Net amount of risks written during the year.....	$4,205,475	$70,807 36
Net amount of risks expired during the year.....	1,169,932	65,523 78
Net amount in force Dec. 31, 1878.....	456,035	40,219 85
Risks written in the State of California.....	1,205,415	70,807 36

A. J. BRYANT, President.

CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary.

Office, 218 and 220 Sansome St.,
IN COMPANY'S BUILDING.

THE Automatic SEWING MACHINE HAS NO EQUAL.

It runs the easiest and fastest and makes the least noise of any machine made. Just the machine for delicate ladies. Just the machine for ladies who are not delicate, as it will not injure them to run it. POSITIVELY NO TENSION. Makes the strongest seam, there being three threads in every stitch. A MARVEL OF MECHANISM. NOTHING LIKE IT IN THE WORLD. An investigation will convince any one.

WILLCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.
C. L. HOVEY, AGENT,

124 POST STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, AND 361 TWELFTH STREET, OAKLAND.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

NICOLL THE TAILOR

BRANCH OF NEW YORK,

Begs to inform his numerous patrons (and their name is Legion), that he employs only WHITE LABOR, and that the reason he is able to sell cheaper than any other Tailor is that, having Sixty Stores all over the United States, and a London House, he is able to buy and import in immense quantities direct from the Mills at home and abroad, thereby saving all the intermediate profits which other Tailors have to pay.

Gentlemen, before ordering elsewhere, will do well to call and inspect my immense stock at any of my branch stores, and their daily arrivals of New York and Paris fashions. Also, of French and English Goods from my London House.

Pants in Six Hours. Suits to order in One Day, if required.

TO ORDER:

Pants,	$4
Suits,	15
Overcoats,	15
Dress Coats,	20

Genuine 6 X

Yours Truly, Wm. D. Nicoll

TO ORDER

Black Doeskin
Pants,	$7
White Vests, fm	3
Fancy Vests,	6
Beaver Suits,	$55.

The Trade and Public supplied with Cloth and Trimmings at Wholesale Prices.

Any length cut, and all kinds of Cloth kept in Stock. Samples, with Instructions for Self-measurement, sent free.

A small stock of uncalled-for Goods to be sold at a great reduction.

CLOTH AND WOOLEN BROKER.

FINEST STOCK OF WOOLENS IN THE WORLD.

NICOLL THE TAILOR'S GRAND TAILORING EMPORIUM,

727 Market Street, 505 Montgomery Street, 18 Kearny Street,
And 853 Broadway, Oakland.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE,
320 POST STREET
San Francisco.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,
FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.
QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE
for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. 237 Entrance
south side of Court. A. D. SHARON.

HER MAJESTY'S OPERA CO.
OF LONDON.

A Flattering Compliment

—TO—

STEINWAY & SONS.

Academy of Music,
New York, Dec. 28, 1878.
Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS:
Gentlemen—Having used your celebrated Pianos in public and private during the present opera season, we desire to express our unqualified admiration of their sonority, evenness, richness, and astonishing duration of tone, most beautifully blending with and supporting the voice. These matchless qualities for accompanying the voice, together with precision of action and unequalled capacity for remaining in tune for a great length of time, render the Steinway Pianos, above all others, the most desirable instruments for students of vocal music and the musical public generally.

MINNIE HAUKE,
ETELKA GERSTEN,
MARIE ROZE,
CL. CAMPOBELLO,
G. LABLACHE,
LUIGI ARDITI,
ITALO CAMPANINI,
A. F. GALASSI,
G. DEL PUENTE,
J. FRAPOLLI,
A. J. FOLI,
F. DE RIALP,
J. H. MAPLESON.

NEW YORK, December, 1878.

Messrs. STEINWAY & SONS:
Dear Sirs—Allow me to express to you the entire satisfaction I feel in praising your magnificent Pianos. They are the finest and most superior instruments in the world, and I have therefore taken every opportunity, while in Europe, to extol their sterling qualities. Believe me, dear sir,
Yours, very sincerely,
MINNIE HAUKE,
Royal and Imperial Court Singer.

MARBLEIZED IRON MANTELS.

IN ELEGANCE OF DESIGN, QUALITY of finish, and durability of polish, they are every way superior to slate or marble. In point of economy, also, they cost very much less, are stronger, and certainly far more durable than either.

ALL SIZES AND STYLES

ENAMELED GRATES.

FRENCH COOKING

RANGES

All sizes, suitable for Hotels, Restaurants, Families, and Boarding-Houses.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, & 120 BATTERY ST.

The Argonaut.

VOL. IV. NO. 10.

SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 8, 1879.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

As these columns are entirely irresponsible, and as no man knows who writes them, we do not hesitate to place our unknown self upon record as a false prophet; hence, we declare that Kearney is the great leader in this State, and that he is destined to overwhelm and destroy all the other political organizations now existing. Circumstances have combined and are combining to bring about the fulfillment of our prophecy. We do not know who John the Baptist was, and it does not make much difference. He came howling out of the wilderness, clad in skins, barefoot, with a girdle about his loins, and living on locusts and wild honey. Nevertheless, he proclaimed the coming of the Son of Man; he heralded the dawn of a new religion; he was the avant-courrier that announced the glad tidings of salvation, and declared the new dispensation to an expectant world. Kearney, bog born, illiterate, vain, selfish, opinionated, irreverent, blasphemous, and brutal, proclaims to us a new political faith, denounces the old party idolatries, discards the old dogmas, and in rude and bestial language utters so much truth that he has challenged the attention of a class that feels mortified at taking heed of his utterances or thought of his ribald speech. He comes, like Saint Patrick, to put out the fires that blazed upon Druid altars on the slope of the Hill of Chariots, and relights them with a new blaze.

Kearney is an accident. He started with a "piece club." Some accidental trick of speech caught the public ear. A Chronicle reporter gave it expression in print. The first successful shot kicked Kearney into prominence, and a Bohemian, tickled by the effect, wrote him more speeches and more resolutions; the Chronicle, anxious for small advertisements and to rival the Call in the hearts of the foreign servant girls who desired to exchange their bad services for coin, printed; Kearney, delighted to see his ravings in print, became more and more insane. The Chronicle, delighted to see itself the oracle and mouthpiece of a business that hurt its rivals—the Bulletin and Call—continued to exalt the ass that had the voice that brayed denunciation to its enemies and gave to it the monopoly of a sensation. The Call and Bulletin first envied, then denounced, then fell down, then turned a somersault, then drooled, and then licked the foot of "Mr. President Kearney" that had so persistently kicked their editors.

Then came the Constitutional Convention. Governor Irwin and the leaders of the Democracy, intent upon their political future, had not the sense to see that the black, rotten spot at the core of their party potato was eating outward, and that Kearney would expose it if the opportunity were presented. The Democracy gave Kearney the opportunity in calling a Constitutional Convention. Kearney went to Sacramento and tongue-walloped the Democracy, till, like a whipped and beaten, mangy, kettle-tailed, cowardly dog, it ran howling away, and hid itself in a non-partisan affiliation with Republicans. The Republican party fell down; the Democracy fell down; and Kearney, with his greasy mob of cooks and scullions, tramps and demagogues, was the only representative of reform, or promise of reform. The Convention met, and, saving a few gentlemen of nerve and resolution, the old party leaders stepped down into the mud volcano and wallowed with Kearney's litter. With political adventurers on one side and Kearney on the other, the great, sensible, tax-ridden, burden-bearing, middle class had to throw their votes into one or the other of these scales. Old iniquities they knew about, the new promises sounded well, and the result was a Constitutional delegation of compact, earnest Kearneyites from San Francisco, comprising a working minority against jealous, divided non-partisans.

The result is a Constitution, and not an altogether bad one—an organic law that appeals to all the prejudices and passions of the hour; that promises certain needed reforms; that embodies many things that the people have demanded, and that have been denied them by both Republican and Democratic parties; an organic law that robs the water company by a most iniquitous provision regulating its charges; a law that places the railroad and other corporations at the mercy of those whose interest it will be to steal from them; that makes it almost impossible for banks and corporations to exist, and that threatens the rights of private property. This organic law is now being submitted to the people. The Chronicle champions it. Kearney is the Peter the Hermit who goes forth on his pilgrimage to secure its adoption. At this writing the Bulletin halts between two bundles of hay, like the doubting ass it has of late years become; and the Call prints this marvelous editorial—the most wonderful utterance that has ever been delivered since the time of Captain Jack Bunsby. In order to do full justice to it we reproduce it whole:

"WE DO NOT PREJUDGE.—We shall not prejudge the new Constitution in advance. The people must read it carefully, and then they will be able to determine what will be best. This is the policy which the Call intends to pursue. That course which the best interests of people require is what should be done."

Let the oracular Bunsby forever after hide his diminished head. This Constitution will be adopted; and when adopted the Chronicle and Kearney will claim that it was their achievement, and so it will be. And when this is done, and the house is swept and garnished, Kearney and the Chronicle, or the Chronicle and Kearney, which ever happens to be then on top—for they will quarrel—will nominate all the officers for the new government, State and city.

To aid Kearney in securing the political prestige due to the adoption of this Constitution, the Call and Chronicle—still in rivalry for small advertisements—will send reporters out with the sand-lot orator, and from now till election day these two widely circulated and most excellent newspapers—most excellent for news, but most contemptible for anything else—will flood the State with Kearney's foul-mouthed denunciations of every man who is above him and every sentiment at variance with his programme. Under the instructions of a most debauched and vicious press we have learned to suspect and distrust everybody; into this soil, thus prepared by the long and villainous cultivation of an utterly depraved press, Kearney will sow his seed, and it will come up bearing fruit an hundred-fold. The Constitution will be adopted. There will be no organization against it. The railroad and water-company, the stock exchanges, the banks and corporations, can not—in fact, dare not—move. The Republican party, selfish and unpatriotic, is even now scheming and intriguing whether Evans or Perkins shall be its candidate for Governor. The Democracy is demoralized to that extent that it has only one choice, whether it shall drop into Kearney's basket, beheaded by his guillotine, or drop into political annihilation. The press—all except the Chronicle—will squirm and wiggle to get time to see which side will win, and on that side they will turn up. Kearney will nominate a pretty good ticket if he holds to his present autocratic and insolent resolve. If, when he get to Los Angeles, he will snub Volney E. Howard, and, in San Joaquin will slap Judge Terry upon his political cheek; if he will kick Tinnin, of Trinity, and Larkin, of El Dorado, and cut the rattles from all the squirming tails that wriggle around him, and act upon his own judgment in selecting candidates for office, he can place a ticket in the field that no combination of parties, no amount of money, and no exertion can defeat.

And what of it? Is it not probable that such an administration as Kearney will give us will be as good as that which Jim Green, Charley Sonntag, and Governor Salomon on the part of the Republican party, and Brady, Mannix, and Joseph Nougues on the part of the Democracy, will accord to us? Where do we, the people, come in between these upper and nether millstones of intrigue and party profligacy? Perhaps we can stand it once, for such things only occur once. Perhaps an administration coming into power under all these promises of reform, with the hempen noose suspended over its head, watched by its own members and by everybody else, will be endurable until the community regathers its senses. Perhaps out of this chaos of confusion Kearney may give us as good a Governor as Evans, or Perkins, or Johnson, or any other politician would make. Perhaps this city might be run for less than $6,000,000 annually. Perhaps there are economies and reforms that might be introduced. Kearney will not be a permanent evil, and if this Constitution is not a bad one, or not adopted, Kearney may be that kind of commotion in the political atmosphere that purifies it. He is not a Rienzi, Artevelde, Stephen Marcel, nor Masaniello, but their fate will be his. He will, like Actæon, be in time destroyed by his own dogs; for, puffed with power, insane, and dizzy at his elevation from the dray, he will not be known to them, and they will rend him. Knight and Day have left him; his enemies increase. Wellock is drifting apart from him; the Chronicle will soon have no use for him, and when that time comes it will crucify him. The Call and Bulletin will denounce him just as soon as it is for their pecuniary interest to do so. When the Democracy overcomes its fright and gains courage, it will anathematize the wounded gladiator, and all the sand-lot will cry out: "Give us Barabbas, and crucify him who would be king of the mob-lots."

Had it not been for the Chronicle, Kearney had not been born. Had the Democracy had the sense to defer the calling of the Constitutional Convention, Kearney had not attained any political prominence. If our most unwise President and his benighted Republican Cabinet had not vetoed the Chinese bill, Kearney had struck twelve o'clock, and would have cut no prominent figure in our future politics. As affairs now are, he is the prominent central figure in this State, and there is a very strong presumption that he will secure the passage of this his Constitution, and that having legislated everybody out of office, he will have strength enough to make a State Government for California, and a City Government for San Francisco, in defiance of the Republican and Democratic parties, and in opposition to St. Patrick's Day and the Catholic Church, in disregard of the intelligence and wealth of the community, in contempt of the press, and in defiance of a popular opinion that will not unite to bring about the reforms that this charlatan promises. And if he does, it will serve us right. That such a result is possible is suggestive to all men who have wealth to protect, and who desire to preserve social order and good government. The moral of all this business is, that under a government republican in form, and where all the white male inhabitants of lawful age are entitled to vote, it behooves the men of families, of property, good morals, and intelligence to unite, and spare no exertion to secure an administration of public affairs more creditable than that which comes from indifference and party misrule.

We gratefully acknowledge the receipt of a pamphlet published in this city, entitled The Social Life of Heavenly Spheres. By Mary Washington. From the preface, written by Mr. T. B. Clarke, we learn that Washington, "while calling on Mrs. M. J. Upham Hendec, of San Francisco, a lady, who for twenty years has toiled as an instrument of the angel-world, controlled, and in substance said, that his mother, Mary, was anxious to give a message to the children of earth. Consenting to assist the spirit-world by sitting for this message, Mrs. Hendec," adds Mr. Clarke, "in my presence, in twenty-one sittings, in a semi-unconscious condition, wrote the contents of this little volume, impressed by the spirit of Mary Washington, word by word. This, with that of her son's, and Martha Washington's, already given to the world, open to us the gates of heaven, so that at last we can behold the realities of a tangible, spiritual world." As to the spiritual purport, meaning, and value of Mary Washington's revelation we do not hazard an opinion, inasmuch as we are still in the bonds of ignorance and unbelief; but on certain minor points she has incidentally enlightened us as we never were enlightened before: For examples, on page 8 we learn that a blending can add a beautiful lustre to a grave and solemn tread; on page 10, that geologic changes can work a glorious picture of times in which they live; on page 11, that the lion and lamb of negative and positive forces can balance each other harmoniously, that one can digress in a fashionless chain, and that soul-seeds can be embalmed; on page 12, that Franklin could arrange inspirational power; on page 13, that a restitution of soul-thrills can reverberate, and a link open a channel; on page 23, that murmuring streams can be decked with rarest flowers, and a starlit canopy be filled with lustrous mementoes of ancient records. But more surprising revelations follow—viz.: that there is a "music flower which makes the sweetest music, chiming with the cymbal waters." ("Cymbal," it is explained, "is the name given to certain bodies of water which give a sweet sound like tinkling bells, yet not distinct and apart, but sweetly blending in symphony"). This, of course, is in heaven, where "our libraries also are wonderful with the literary talent displayed, which had no recognition on earth"—Mr. Clarke's talent. But, really, we have not space to recount the surprises, chiefly literary, of this most remarkable volume, and must conclude by explaining what we suppose, however, is already obvious—that Mistress Mary Washington's private system of rhetoric and grammar is indeed like the terrestrial one of Mr. T. B. Clarke.

PLOTING AGAINST THE WHITES.

Warren Harrison was tall, handsome, distinguished-looking, and a misogynist—the fortunate possessor of four qualities dear to the feminine heart—so it was small wonder that he became instantly popular with the ladies of "Fair View Hall, Pine Stump Hill"—the pet designation of a cosy cabin in the Mendocino redwoods.

Warren Harrison was a man about town; an authority on claret and table-belongings generally; a connoisseur of pictures, tobacco, and the "newest fit"; a Bohemian by instinct, and the grace of a Philistine income, and as persistently careless if school kept or not as the wildest dare-devil of the famous "Stockton Street Howlers," in which detectable fraternity he was one of the "leather-lunged three."

It was in response to a letter, from which the following is an extract, that Warren Harrison left San Francisco at the close of the recent Christmas holidays, and buried himself for three memorable weeks in the wild woods of Mendocino:

"Are you enough the pot-hunter to shoot into a flock of a couple of hundred quail? Have you sufficient energy and grit to climb hills with back angles, and trust half the time to your eyelids? Can you imagine any fun in spearing twenty-pound salmon, or bringing home a spike-buck, out of season? Is there indeed for you any glamour left in life? If yes, then come to me for a fortnight, and I will show you the witchery of wonder-land; and teach you the symphonies of the primeval forest—and, with the coin you don't throw away in those two innocent weeks, you can build a founding hospital or a nunnery."

The letter in question was written by one of Warren's chums—a "newspaper fellow" out of harness—who was named the "Gannett" by his associates, from a certain literary likeness to one of Bayard Taylor's best drawn characters.

And because he had worn out his holiday resources, or because the unlawful "spike-buck" tempted his lawless desire, or for some other good and sufficient reason, the young man packed his valise and took the 11:40 boat for Point San Quentin, within forty-eight hours after receiving the Gannett's invitation.

"Hello, old boy!"

"Well, old man!"

"Nice place, eh?"

"Yes; stay here all night?"

"Not bad. See that turn out?"

"What! that old rattle-trap half full of petticoats?"

"Yes, why not? Guess 'twill hold together."

"And you had the cheek to bring me into a nest of women—a nest of wasps would be more comfortable. I didn't think it of you, by George!"

"Bosh! Warrie, they're tame—tame as mountain quail. One of 'em is the best cook and the nicest hostess in the redwoods. 'Nother can beat either of us shooting or driving or playing whist; and the little one on the back seat reads poetry, and sings like Di Murska. Come on and be introduced. We have an eight-mile drive before supper."

The stage road, running north from Duncan's, climbs upward and on for half a dozen miles, in the desperate Californian fashion, guileless of grade and lavish of jumping-off places. To Harrison, whose knowledge of roads was limited by his experiences on the "Cliff," the "Ocean House," the "Old San Bruno," the drives about Oakland and Berkeley, and through the "Park," the novelty of the situation was tinged with nervousness—neutralized, however, by a strong dash of Bohemian pride.

"It would read well in the Chronicle, wouldn't it?" he said, addressing the Gannett. "Big head lines—because of our social importance—'Prodigious Plunge! Spun Into Space! Dreadful Descent and Doleful Destruction near Duncan's.' You know how. The moonlight doesn't show the bottom. 'Bout eleven thousand feet, isn't it?"

"He's a terrible talker when he turns himself loose," whispered the Gannett to his companion, Mrs. Dick Noble, who was driving. The Gannett was a good enough driver—ordinary, but the lady was so thoroughly familiar with every inch of the road—which he was not—that the Gannett was not at all sorry to pocket his manly pride and turn over the reins to the backwoods "Lady Gay" beside him.

It was Mrs. Noble who replied to Harrison: "Oh, that is nothing, sir! Wait till you come to Bear Trap Knob—which is a great rock about three miles from here. The road runs right over it, and it is ever so many feet to the bottom of the cañon. You have to turn a corner when you come just to the middle of it, so sharp that the wind blows four ways there at once. That is really dangerous! But I'll tell you in time, so you can get out and walk."

"Thank you," said Harrison. He had forgotten his surroundings while he was growling to the Gannett, and he relapsed into monosyllables again, in an instant.

Harrison was seated with their hostess, Mrs. Perry Palmer, and her niece, Dora Dodd. Mrs. Palmer was a plump, frank, gracious young matron, of medium stature and wonderful precision of carriage. She talked less than most women; but then, also, she said more than most women—a paradox of great social diffusion. And whether she talked, or listened, whether she walked, or ran about, or beautified repose, she was always unmistakably a lady. Mrs. Dick Noble was at antipodes with her hostess in most things. She was not at all pretty, and scarcely even graceful; but in her lithe, willowy physique there was enough redundant vitality to serve a score of conventional women. Her brain was constantly active, her tongue was seldom idle, her supple frame knew scarcely a quiet moment; but she was none the less one of the best of wives, and she would have been one of the best of mothers had the fates willed that she should be a mother at all. Pretty, spirituelle Dora Dodd was to most people reserved—reserved almost to the verge of haughtiness. The dignity which certain little women infuse into their pretty infantile ways is often the most dangerous of their weapons. Miss Dodd captivated every one whom she admitted into the charmed nearness of her social self. But that was a privilege few enjoyed. She sang exquisite mezzo-soprano, as full and satisfying within its compass as the voice to which the Gannett made his daring comparison. She read even better than she sang; Tennyson in her hands was Tennyson—not, as so many render him, a whining Punch tricked out in the motley of Saturday's Post. But more dangerous than the gift of voice and sympathetic insight was the sorcery of her theurgic eyes, which were big and tender and limpid as a fawn's, or cold and set and inscrutable like a cat's, which were sometimes gray and sometimes blue, and sometimes an indescribable blending of colors—almost "Nile green," yet almost black—a hue which eludes description, because art has no name for it.

Bear Trap Knob was passed in safety, and about eight o'clock they halted at La Rule's ranch, where, by invitation, the party were to remain for the night. There they had a supper which the Gannett termed "gustful," and which Harrison could not help enjoying, despite its novel environment. Apart from their sharpened appetite, which would have made them enjoy the plainest possible fare, the travelers relished their supper at La Rule's ranch for its own sake. The author of the Strange Adventures of a Phaeton might do that supper justice—no other living writer can; and it is quite as well, for it is idle to paint the lily.

During the evening Harrison could not be less than civil to his companions and his hostess, but he was no more than civil; and Mrs. La Rule said sotto voce to the Gannett, as her guests were retiring for the night, "That's the quietest young man I've seen for months. He reminds me of my Berkeley eldest studying for 'Hamlet.'"

"Ah, Mrs. La Rule," replied the Gannett under his breath, "let me tell you a profound secret: my friend is a woman-hater, and we propose he shall tumble heels over head in the maddest sort of love before the middle of next week."

"With whom, pray? You interest me."

"Well, really it doesn't make very much difference whether it be Dora or May." May was Mrs. Dick Noble's Christian name. "He can't have either, you know."

"You are a bad boy," replied his hostess; "I am ashamed of you."

Fair View Hall commanded almost a bird's-eye view of the Little Walhalla Valley, to the north of which the beetling hills beyond Timber Cove vary the monotony of the almost unbroken forests, which climb to the horizon in every other direction. The Walhalla, glimmering like a silver thread among the trees two thousand feet below, was the first object which arrested Harrison's direct attention on the third morning after they reached the Palmer Cottage. On leaving La Rule's ranch they had made a detour of several miles in order to climb Pole Mountain, for the notable view to be had from its summit, and before they reached "Pine Stump Hill" the valley was shrouded in drizzling gloom, the prelude of a gathering storm. The next morning the rain was pouring with energetic vigor almost Oregonian. From the windows, in every direction, they could see nothing but the slanting palisades of mist, and there was clearly nothing they could wisely do except stay quietly indoors and make the best of it. So the party of six, including Mr. Richard Alden, spent the first morning and afternoon quietly enough; for to Harrison's intense relief, the ladies left the new-comer altogether to his own devices and the Gannett's chatter. But in the evening they had two songs from Miss Dodd, and a quartet, in which Mr. and Mrs. Dick Noble and the Gannett sang very pleasantly; and then Dora read the "Lotus Eaters" and Bryant's "Forest Hymn"; after which Harrison was allowed peaceably to go to bed, where he lay awake for an hour, listening to the patter of the rain upon the unceiled shingles. The following day was rainy also, and in its social features very like its fellow, but the ladies bantered Harrison a little, as if testing their weapons, and the young man managed to become signally uncomfortable long before music hour and bed time. When he tumbled hurriedly into bed that night—hurriedly because the clouds and rain had disappeared, and a nipping frost was falling—he found that the sheets were firmly sewed across the middle of the bed, and he scarcely knew whether to laugh or swear. Curbing himself with an effort, he did neither, and crept shivering into bed next to the blanket.

In those two days of forced companionship Harrison had been badgered by the Gannett into an admission that Miss Dodd was "pretty as a picture," and the consciousness that the woman-hater was more than ordinarily handsome had in the same time dawned upon all the ladies—and particularly upon Miss Dodd.

"I never thought there was anything so neat in nature," he said, half aloud. "Neat" was hardly the adjective to convey full expression of the pleasure which came to the city-bred young man, as he stood at the open window and gazed wonderingly about him. But then "neat" was one of the strongest words in the vocabulary of his set. It meant the maximum of the young man's appreciative praise; and the connoisseur of the "Stockton Street Howlers" was nothing if not sincere. Harrison finished dressing, clambered through the widow, and dropped from the low porch to the ground. He went to the edge of the almost perpendicular hillside and looked down on the little valley, saying to himself, "I wonder how far it is to the creek; perhaps I might get some trout."

"The vertical altitude is exactly eighteen hundred and seventeen feet. The angle makes it about two hundred feet further. It is against the law to catch trout now. Breakfast will be ready in half an hour. You could scarcely go and come in that time. It might improve your appetite, though."

He turned toward the sound as she began to speak, and saw that the speaker was Miss Dodd, who was regarding him with great scrutiny from the porch steps. His first impulse was to be confused; his second was to be provoked.

"I don't remember saying anything about trout or the distance to the water. Are you a clairvoyant?"

Skillfully ignoring the woman-hater's annoyed brusqueness, Miss Dodd replied: "You are grateful for the information, I see. If you really want to go down I will show you the way."

"Oh, thank you!" said Harrison, his anger merged into alarm. "It wouldn't be necessary, and I must go back and write a letter." And then he glanced nervously at the bedroom window, thinking how unheroic he would look scaling the porch.

"You can't send your letter before night. I really think the scramble might do you good. They will wait breakfast for us. I don't mind going. Don't hesitate on my account."

The young lady's eyes were beginning to dance provokingly, and her lips were wreathing themselves in saucy smiles. The humor of the situation was infectious. Harrison's own ridiculous position flashed before his eyes, and he smiled as he said, with delicious frankness:

"Didn't the Gannett warn you that I was unfit for ladies' society? I suppose not, for he never told me there were any ladies here. If he had I should not have come. Perhaps it may save some unnecessary trouble if I confess that I don't like ladies, and will not mind their neglect."

Miss Dodd did not exactly laugh, but she smiled tantalizingly, and replied:

"I adore truthfulness. Clearly, you are a young man worth saving. It is part of man's mission to amuse the better part, I think, and we shall expect you to amuse us while you are here. But we mean to be perfectly fair with you. If you behave nicely, you shall have an hour of solitude every day." And she left him before he could answer or protest, and entered the house.

"Cool! Cool is no name for it. The Gannett said she was reserved. Meddlesome Minerva reserved! By George, though, there's something decidedly taking about her—for a woman. But her name—jumping Jerusalem, what a name! D-o-r-a D-o-d-d! It would be a worthy charity to marry her just to give her a respectable name." And he strolled off to the stable to see his first milking.

Truly, for a reserved young lady, Miss Dodd had opened the campaign with conspicuous daring. And some explanation is due the reader in justification of the foregoing scene, and other happenings to follow, all manifestly inconsistent with a previous pen picture of Miss Dodd's temperament and manner. To explain this matter fully requires a "step to the rear"—a hazardous experiment in story-telling—a duty which will dissolve the awful fact that Dora Dodd's attention to Mr. Warren Harrison had no more Christian foundation than the exigencies of a five-handed wager.

One evening, just after Christmas, when conversation had begun to flag, and the ladies were picturesquely yawning over the whist-table, the Gannett said, abruptly, as if inspired:

"Did you ever see a real live woman-hater?"

"No; he does not exist," said the ladies in chorus.

"You are wrong again," said the Gannett, triumphantly.

"I know one—know him intimately. To prove it I'll have him here within ten days, and I'll bet you all around, anything you like, any odds, that neither Dora nor Mary can make the slightest impression—except, perhaps, to intensify his dislike. What do you say? Is it a go?"

"A 'go'! What is a 'go'?" asked the hostess, placidly.

"Can't you talk backwoods English for our benefit?"

"Is it a wager, then?"

"Yes; gloves all around," said Mrs. Dick Noble.

"Done," replied the Gannett.

"And I'll go you a little side un, for a fiver, that it's my wife who cooks his goose," said Mr. Richard Noble, with manifest pride.

"Take it," said the Gannett. "Any others?"

"It's what I call," observed the Hon. Perry Palmer, County Supervisor and ex-State Senator—"it's what I call plotting against the whites, and I wash my hands of the whole affair."

"My friend," remarked the Gannett, "you are too good for this world. Let me feel your pulse." And laughingly they separated for the night.

The train which Harrison met at Point San Quentin had on board the Honorable Perry Palmer, en route for Sacramento to have an eye on the Constitutional Convention. And the defection of the head of the house left the unfortunate misogynist without ally in Fair View Hall. At breakfast, that third morning, the hostess took up the skirmish line, as follows: "We are told that you are a great ladies' man, Mr. Harrison, a dancing man, and altogether a 'society sharp.' So we have arranged for a dance in our nearest neighbor's big barn. It will come off next Friday evening. I trust we have not been premature."

"Who said I was a society man? I never danced in my life. But I beg pardon—"

Harrison broke off suddenly—conscious that he was fast lapsing into rudeness.

"Oh, one must learn sometime. We can all practice with you evenings. Can't we, Dora? Can't we, May?"

"Certainly," said Dora.

"Why, of course," assented Mrs. Dick Noble.

"But I don't care to learn. I know too much already," he expostulated.

"Nonsense," said the Gannett; "you must learn. I am not going to be disgraced by my city chum's mulishness. Do you see any hope for him, Dick?"

"Not a glimmer. You are booked, Harrison. Keep a stiff upper lip and you'll pull through all right. It's nothing when you get used to it. Been there myself. Used to be so bashful mother had to put sticking-plaster over my cheeks for fear I'd blush myself to death."

"This is delicious coffee," said Harrison, in such a conciliatory turn that the placid hostess half relented for an instant. "Yes, thank you, I will take a cup. By the way, Mrs. Palmer, is there not a berry growing hereabouts which is said to resemble coffee. Have you ever tried it?"

"He's talking against time," whispered the Gannett to Mrs. Dick Noble, and then he deliberately winked across the table to that lady's husband, who replied in kind.

"And this morning," continued Mrs. Palmer, as, later on, they rose from the table, "Dora shall show you how pretty the creek is, while the others help me pare apples and stone raisins. Don't let him slip on the rocks, Dora."

Manifestly there was no help for it. One may not be a boor just to save one's self some trifling annoyance. And so Harrison followed Miss Dodd along the winding path, down into the valley and out upon the little strip of meadow at the foot of the hill. The young man wore an air of docile resignation which amused the young lady not a little. Furtively she read his looks from under her long lashes, and smiled composedly, yet wickedly withal, for her brain was on mischief bent, and the opportunity was perfect.

The little meadow was white with frost, but the taller grasses were studded with beads of transparent dew, each a glistening marvel of prismatic loveliness. It was all new to Harrison, and perhaps he enjoyed the unfolding surprises of their walk all the more keenly that he dared not vent his wonder in verbal expression. Tall, five-branched ferns, with black shining stems, crowded the little gulleys over which they passed; "wood ivy" crept along the bank, showing leaves which were green and brown and red and mottled; "Johnny jumpers" peered at them from behind their tufted leaves, with queer, puckered, inquisitive, monkey faces, startlingly human at a glance. In places the frosts had turned the leaves of the pines, redwoods, madroños, yellow and pink and bronze; and twice they found, close to some dark bank, that daintiest of woodland marvels, "white redwood," which looks like the most delicate wax-work.

"Are you a good walker, and not afraid of a tumble?"

asked Miss Dodd, after she had tired of sauntering, and had placed their treasures in a convenient hiding-place.

"I'll endeavor to keep up, if you don't walk too fast," he said, indifferently.

"Come on, then," and she led him a bonny chase over the slippery rocks for some two miles down the creek—a chase in which Harrison's Olympic Club training saved him from many an awkward tumble. At last she halted some little distance from a great moss-covered rock, shaped wonderfully like a huge recumbent grizzly. The resemblance was so striking that Harrison detected the likeness with an ejaculation of surprise.

"I thought you would admire this. We always show it off to city folks. It is big, and quite like a bear."

There was a mocking undertone to the words which nettled the young man, curiously. He looked at her fixedly for a moment, and his ordinarily, lazy-looking brown eyes flashed angrily; then he said, quietly: "We may as well have it out now. I am no match for you at small talk and badinage. I don't like women. I may as well tell you that at once. But I do like you. For a woman you are really very nice. Let us sign a truce. I'll do anything to please you if you'll only let me alone."

Miss Dodd looked him full in the face for an instant. Just a shade of amusement played about her lips as she answered: "I did not think you could be so eloquent. You quite dazzle me with your dazzling frankness, and, indeed, you almost tempt me to disloyalty; but, no, I can not desert my colors. Yet, since you have been so frank, I will be frank also. You are a captive, sir, under strict surveillance. We are three women and you are but one man. We have sworn to make you fall hopelessly in love with one of us, and we mean to win. So, in strictest confidence, I give you fair warning."

It was a rash speech, and the young lady regretted it the moment it was spoken. Strange to say, its effect upon Harrison was directly opposite to what might reasonably have been expected. It never occurred to him that the speech was extremely unconventional—almost unmaidenly. If he thought of the words at all, apart from their warning, he thought of them merely as the vagaries of the sex to which the young lady had the misfortune to belong. Mr. Warren Harrison's acquaintance with that sex was conspicuously slight, as has been indicated, but his ignorance at that special juncture was certainly inexplicable. And his reply to Miss Dodd's startling nonsense was in its turn quite as startling, and from her standpoint infinitely more serious.

"I think I understand it all now," he said, "and perhaps it is fortunate this has happened as it has. I suppose one must fall in love and marry sometime. They all do, don't they? I can't be a 'Howler' always—but you don't know about that. Yes, one must marry some time, and certainly one might do worse. You are a very nice girl, I think, and after awhile you would become busy with your own affairs and leave me to myself a good deal. I am sure you are good-natured at heart. You wouldn't enjoy making a fellow uncomfortable for any length of time, would you? I have part of a very respectable fortune left. Of course, we shall go to Europe and—"

How much longer he might have gone on may not fairly be estimated—apparently he might have emulated the brook at their feet. When he began to speak Miss Dodd looked at him amazedly, almost indignantly, forgetting the strong provocation. But, as he went on, she saw with growing astonishment that the young man was calmly, absurdly in earnest, and then, rising at once to the situation, she interrupted him, saying: "I must explain, Mr. Harrison. There is frankness and frankness, just as there is nonsense and nonsense. I have misunderstood you altogether. I thought you were merely a young man with a hobby—like the Gannett—and I resolved to cure you. I was widely mistaken. You are a very earnest young man, and I am a very foolish young woman. We will laugh and forget all this, and when we return to the house I will leave you quite to yourself, and will try and persuade the others to do likewise. Shall we return?"

It was Harrison's turn to be surprised, indignant, and then philosophically calm. He hesitated scarcely a second as he answered, with almost eager animation, looking her full in the face and compelling her eyes to meet his, momentarily: "But I don't care to forget, Miss Dodd. I don't wish to set my judgment against the rest of mankind. It was my ignorance, you see. I never really knew a lady till the other night. You are so much nicer than any other person I ever met that I am positively glad it happened. There has been no harm done. You wanted to make me in love with you—I am in love with you, and—"

"Hush!" broke in the lady, coldly. "This foolishness has gone quite far enough. It was a joke; a joke, don't you see? I am nothing to you, you are nothing to me. Let us be sensible, and go back."

"And do you mean to tell me," said the other, hotly, "that you have done this for pure wantonness?—that you brought me here to make a scientific experiment at my risk? And now that you have made a fool of me, you think about it as cold bloodedly as you talk. I was right, then, before!"

"No, sir; you were wrong then and now. As to the folly, it was all mine. Ignorance is not folly, but you ought surely to understand that I regret the scene as a man could not possibly regret it. You do not know what love means. If I were in love with you at this moment I should not let you know, I—"

There was a humid glimmer in the young girl's eyes as she became more and more excited with her defense. She raised her hand to her eyes to brush away the vexing tears which filled them. Was it accident or inspiration which nerved the young man to an act which set its impress on two lives in an instant—which made the world broader for both of them from that hour? "I should not let you know, I—"

"But I do know, and this is my answer." He had kissed her, and she had fainted.

Among the various commissions with which Mr. Warren Harrison was delightfully burdened, on the morning of his return trip to San Francisco, was one from the Gannett, the memorandum of which read as follows:

"Two pairs six-button kids, No. 5½.
" " " " " " 6½.
" " " " " " 7."

And by Mr. Richard Noble, Harrison was requested to send up a box of good cigars. "Imported, dark."

The Gannett drove Harrison to the station in a buckboard. They stayed all night at La Rule's ranch, and that morning the Gannett said to Mrs. La Rule, in rueful confidence:

"I was wrong again. He did fall in love; and—just my luck—has carried off the prize. He and Dora are engaged. They will probably be married some time next May. My only hope of revenge is the chance of writing up the wedding for the ARGONAUT."

"I congratulate them," said the hostess; "and, once more, I am ashamed of you!"

R. S. S.
HOWARD'S STATION, February, 1879.

Fishing with Cormorants.

I was invited one evening, during my sojourn at a small town not far from Kiyoto, the old capital of Japan, to accompany some yakunins (officials), who were then traveling with me, to the neighboring river for the purpose of witnessing the manner in which cormorants are employed in the catching of fish; at the same time I was informed that a pleasure boat had already been engaged for the occasion. I accepted the invitation eagerly, and, lanterns being provided, together with a guide to show the way, we set out, carefully picking our way along the narrow paths dividing the rice fields, the myriads of frogs in the water all round us keeping up a deafening roar, rendering it almost impossible to carry on conversation, while the mosquitoes were anything but friendly in their demonstrations.

When we were about five hundred yards from the place where our yane-bune (literally, roof-boat) was awaiting us, we were met by one of our boatmen bearing a lantern, who at once turned and preceded us to the little pier of stones.

On entering the boat, the bottom of which was comfortably covered with tatami (thick mats), over which was spread a gay-colored rug, I was agreeably surprised to find that everything requisite for spending a pleasant evening had been sent on before by my hosts. My after acquaintance with the people of this beautiful country has taught me that they never lose the opportunity to make merry, and will seize upon the most trifling excuse for organizing a picnic, and thoroughly enjoying themselves when such pleasures do not interfere with the strict performance of their public duties.

On the present occasion six geisha (female musicians) had been engaged, who sat at one side of the boat, while we of the other sex ranged ourselves on the mats on the other. Sweetmeats of various kinds were spread out on lacquered trays, as we all settled ourselves into the most comfortable attitudes, and the scudo (boatmen) were told to cast off.

After about fifteen minutes sculling we rounded a bend of the river, when a magnificent spectacle burst on our view. The river appeared to be on fire. Nearly two hundred fishing boats were in sight. At the bow of each, and attached to the end of a pole projecting over the water, was a brazier containing burning pine wood, blazing pieces of which every now and then fell through the bars into the water, thereby multiplying the number of lights, real and reflected, and adding to the general effect. Our boatmen now steered us right into the midst of the busy scene, and driving the boat-pole into the bed of the river, made fast to it, and sat down to smoke their kisero (pipes). Each of the boats possessed from ten to twenty cormorants, which, when not engaged in their duty of catching fish, remained silently perched on the gunwales awaiting their masters' commands.

The birds which are employed in this branch of industry are hatched from eggs obtained from the cliffs along the shore, and, being accustomed from the first to the company of man, are very tame. Each has a name given to it, and, on its owner's making a peculiar sound, will enter the water in search of the fish that would, were it free, be their natural prey. Large numbers of them were now swimming around the boats, their movements controlled by strings attached to rings round their necks, and held in the fishermen's hands. Whenever a bird spied a fish attracted by the glare of the fire, it seized it with its bill, but was prevented from swallowing it by the ring round its throat. The fisherman then uttered a peculiar cry, and gently drew it into the boat, where it was forced to give up the prize. Occasionally the birds are rewarded by being permitted to swallow a fish. In some parts of Japan considerable quantities of fish are taken in this manner.

One of my entertainers now hailed the nearest boat and bargained for some of the fresh-caught sakana (fish), and having provided a griddle for the occasion, had his purchase broiled over the hi-bachi (box holding charcoal fire); and this, with the wine, made a repast fit for an epicure. I partook heartily of this dish, which the Japanese know so well how to cook, and did not neglect the sake (wine) which was passed round pretty rapidly, and which was kept hot in a kan-dokuri (porcelain vessel in which wine is heated by being placed in a kettle of hot water) by one of the fair singers, who also took care that the bottle was replenished as fast as it was emptied. During all this time the geisha had been enlivening the feast with songs, accompanying themselves on their samisens (guitars), while in the interval jokes, puns, and repartee kept all in continual laughter.

My hosts now proposed to return, and, the boatmen having blown the remains of the tobacco out of their little pipes as a boy would blow a pea from a pea-shooter, the boat was unmoored, and we dropped gently down with the stream toward our landing-place; and just as I was beginning to cast rather tender glances (probably the effects of the fish or the wine) in the direction of a very pretty geisha seated opposite me we touched the pier, and, stepping ashore, took our way again through the rice fields, the scene enlivened by large numbers of hotaro (fire-flies) flitting hither and thither.

Outside our hotel we parted with our fair musicians and retired to rest, having spent a most pleasant evening.

SAN FRANCISCO, March, 1879. T. E. HALLIFAX.

Emile Zola has written a sequel to his famous novel, L'Assomoir. The heroine of the new tale is the daughter of the former one's heroine. Before the day of his success, M. Zola was a penniless Bohemian of the Latin Quarter, and afterward a stationer's clerk. He is to-day the talk of the Boulevards and the craze of all Paris, and many see in him the Wagner of a new literature. It is said that the novelist Turgueneff secured for M. Zola the position he holds as contributor to one of the ablest Russian reviews. He is a ghastly realist.

NOTABLES.

M. Emile de Girardin is now seventy-two years old, and extremely wealthy. He nevertheless lives with great simplicity and works hard. He is a man serious and laconic, fond of politics, art, and literature. He speaks no foreign language. He is of medium height and very slender.

President Grévy dresses very modestly, never having worn even the uniform of the National Guard. He is a man of Republican simplicity in all his ways. In his every day attire, even in Paris, he has always donned a wide-awake instead of a silk hat; and in summer time he may generally be seen sauntering about the Boulevards clad all in gray, and crowned with a panama. Though a man of considerable landed property, as estates go in France, he never set up a brougham till he became President of the Chamber, and he has always kept this modest, one-horse vehicle, with a coachman out of livery, at Versailles. In Paris he uses cabs and omnibuses; but it must be a very muddy day which compels him to ride at all. He delights in music, but his favorite pastime is to play billiards, and to smoke cigars while making his caroms. He and his close friend, M. Paul de Cassagnac, are two of the best billiard players known, and constantly play together. The two do not discuss politics, but feel a mutual esteem for their respective powers with the balls. M. Grévy is also a keen sportsman and an able agriculturist, and owns many vines, cattle, and fields of maize. He smokes much, speaks forcibly and frankly, and never loses his temper, and "he is no feeble than an iron bar."

The character of Dr. Channing was discussed in Boston, not for the first time, at Mr. Joseph Cook's. Dr. Bartol read a paper upon the great Unitarian leader, which contained some curious and interesting facts. Dr. Channing was short, slender, in weight not over one hundred pounds; but he stood high in the pulpit. People who went to see him, found him cold. He was without ambition, and read no notices of himself in the reviews. Profane language cut him to the heart. He had atmosphere, but no airs. The humorous element was not wanting in him; it was outgrown. He wrote and rewrote to the third time what he had to say, to make it more true.

Lord Beaconsfield to strangers is an amiable old gentleman, who converses with a languid interest about music and painting, with some animation about turnips and cattle, and with no fire at all, but rather a demure composure, about politics and the spread of Roman Catholicism in England. He has a loud, grating voice, which only grows tuneful when he is warmed. He likes flowers, perfumes, and fruits. He eats a great deal of champagne jelly, and drinks a great deal of black coffee. He never smokes. He dresses to perfection, knowing exactly what style of clothes best suits him. Into newspapers he hardly ever dips. Sometimes when sitting alone he rests his head on his hand and gazes into the fire or out of the window. No man can boast that he has obtained a glimpse of "the Sphinx's" true mind.

The late Pope, Pius IX., it is said, never allowed a lady to kiss his foot at his audiences, always giving her his hand. Pope Leo XIII., on the contrary, sees ladies go through the ceremony with calm indifference.

Mr. Froude is a constant visitor upon Mr. Carlyle, and to him, it is reported, were intrusted some materials for a Carlyle biography. It is not finally determined, however, that he shall do the work, and it is supposed that it may be undertaken by Carlyle's niece, Miss Aiken.

Mr. Arthur Sullivan is a good-looking young bachelor, with a round face and dark curly hair. Mr. W. S. Gilbert is forty-three years old, and has a fine head and an expressive face. Americans are at present much interested in these two gentlemen, though not to the extent of letting them profit a little from their own brain-work, except in one instance. Let it be recorded with hearty good feeling that Messrs. Ford & Zimmerman, of the Broad Street Theatre, Philadelphia, which is now giving the Pingpong, have advised Mr. Gilbert and Mr. Sullivan that a hundred pounds await their orders.

The eccentric King of Bavaria is said to have lately invited to dinner Louis XIV. and his court. "Louis II. himself," says the London World, "sat at the head of the table, and the place of honor was supposed to be occupied by the Grand Monarque, the other places being reserved for the twelve courtiers of his reign who were the most renowned for their wit. Thus the Bavarian King dined in solitary grandeur; for we need not say that the ghostly guests were conspicuous by their absence."

Mr. Gladstone (says Truth) lacks the sense of proportion. He can not discriminate between enemies who are worthy of his steel and those who are not; between little events and big ones; between mole-hills and mountains. "I see men walking about as trees," said the Galilean whose sight had been restored; and so Mr. Gladstone sees small opponents loom up like giant oaks.

Khalil Bey, who has just died at Constantinople, was well known in Paris high life. Gambling was the principal cause of his ruin, his last loss amounting to 1,800,000 francs. A friend of his trying to stop him was met with this profound rebuke: "Remember this, mon cher, I prefer losing by doing what I please, to winning by doing as you wish."

The Procuratore del Re at Genoa, Signor Alessandrini, is the discoverer of a new method for extracting confessions from accused persons. He simply orders them to his private room, submits them to a few so-called "moral manoeuvres," and then with an imperious tone of voice them to confess what they know of the matter. There is hardly one guilty knave who does not choose the cataleptic state for the purpose of asserting innocence.

OAKLAND THROUGH OTHER EYES.

OAKLAND, March 5, 1878.

AMIGO CARA JUANITA:—You complain of the dearth of eligibles in your windy village, but Oakland is simply unbearable. Don't dream of coming over here until you are married and well through the honeymoon. By that time you will probably require some new excitement. Get it by all means. This is a very paradise of married ladies—if young—and we poor girls do nought but sigh our lives away in vain repining, or, disgusted, pack our bags and start for Virginia City. If you come, there will be a regular routine to follow; consequently, you will need a pony phaeton; then give it "adventures." Drive out every pleasant afternoon; meet him—whoever he may happen to be at the moment; make desperate love for a sweet half hour per casum obliquum; then drive furiously down to the train, as a dutiful wife should, to meet poor, tired hubby. Entertain him on the way home with infant statistics, the latest scandal, and a gentle hint for a longer seal-skin. If, however, an accident should befall the boat, and hubby should put in an appearance just at the moment you are in the depths, don't let your conscience betray you into a confession, as one of my friends did the other day, bringing dire confusion on the head of her young gentleman friend. These young men are very remarkable creatures; but oh! Juanita, so young! They never will be serviceable, for, young as they are, all, nearly, are blasts. Poor dears, it is not their fault, only their misfortune—and ours? Well, about that opinions differ. They will shave, however, all of them. Why, the array of shaving cups in the tonsorial establishment at the Grand Central would absolutely appal you.

That barber! What he doesn't know, they say, is past finding out. He thrives on the subsidy granted by his gossip patrons. His secrets have regular market values. A reminder from one opens his stock. A like notice from another, and his mind is a blank—till the next customer enters. If you want to learn your pedigree come to Oakland, for, I must confess it, we do gossip. These poor victims of the clacquetting knight of the razor fall in love—invariably and repeatedly. Dulcy No. 1 wants a moustache, and glibly quotes the Spanish proverb of "A kiss and no moustache," etc. That settles it—the hair must come. It does; but in a week Dulcy No. 2 says they are nasty, ticklish things, full of cigarette smoke. Well, off it comes. A week—is that too short? Not at all; else how in eternity shall a young man who pretends to any regard for justice get through the list? I think the gallant little band must have an agreement, setting forth the length of time each shall go on duty, and just how and where he shall transfer his allegiance—and beard. Since the letters of the "Maid of Athens" I have been amused and greatly entertained by the performances of people, well known in society, trying to brave out their fear of being subjects of such delicate and insidious flattery. Young men have appeared in livery—yes, actually. Outrageous hats have been evolved from the inner consciousness of the would-be unterrified. People have displayed themselves going to market in over-crowded vehicles—three in a phaeton calculated to hold but two.

Lent has come, and with it resolutions of reform. How many of us adorned our lily brows with the typical ash spot last Wednesday? How many of us ought to have done so? Is Oakland so bad, then? Not at all. I think—I believe—we are very moral. In plainer language, our young men are discreet, non communicative, and withal considerate. They entertain feeling of the kindest and tenderest regard for husbands, possessors of so much loveliness. In fact, they look upon unfortunate members of the fraternity with the same interest commonly accorded to silent or sleeping partners in the same concern. Two of the heroes of my Grecian lady friend, Pythias and one Damon, have retired from society. Unlucky society! Cruel heroes! The advent of spring has raised in the nature-loving breast of Damon yearnings to imitate the frolics of the lamb who "gambles o'er the green;" and now with Sellers he exclaims, "Ace is my spot." Pythias suggests "they are waiting for him," but he wisely concludes not to "come in." He breathes "ace high," and concludes to travel for his health.

The German has been indefinitely postponed, so we content ourselves with the rink, moonlight drives (with a chap-eron to start with, even if she goes home after getting around the corner), and dancing-school. Next Monday night we commence another month in skating, and inaugurate a new policy. But that will be the end of skating. After that we will have a bathing club. I have attended the rink regularly, so far, wishing to learn the art of balancing, but being deficient in the sixth sense and naturally timid, I have been repelled by the formidable array of visitors, who, running no risk themselves, may safely laugh at our graceful tumblings. Visitors are to be excluded hereafter, except once a month, and we shall hold the session with closed doors.

One thing ought to be abolished: those awful boys with their whip-snap consigning us of the weaker sex to the benches. True, the benches are softer than the floor, as many a Goodfellow—I mean a good many fellows—will tell you. But just picture to yourself the excitement, the dim light, the hush before the storm, the silent gathering of the forces, the majestic march—then the rush and hurry. As the glorious band wails and sobs its poetic life into song, how they tug, and strain, and sw—no, perspire. Faster and faster they go; they waver. One tall Knight (No. 1) lays his hand upon the battlements of the fountain. Willard, in the centre, a very tower of strength, holds his line gallantly. On they come! Now the snap—dust and confusion—whist! Were you hurt badly?

Our present rage is Miss R., of Detroit, visiting Miss C. Rage, and no wonder; combining natural beauty of face and figure, with a style and dash and great conversational qualities. We will meet her at lunch at Mrs. C.'s on Friday. How accommodating Bob C. is! Falls down merely to encourage us poor amateurs, just to show us how easy it is. The twins in dead-gold suits have dissolved their amicable relations and are now rivals for the honor of introducing the latest and flashiest devices in neck wear. Notwithstanding the obligations one is under to the other for bringing him out into society, war has been declared. I infer, however, from the pin worn by one of them that he will be fully able to "paddle" his own canoe, especially with the encouragement of his fair auxiliary and color-bearer. The "Trio" was re-resented by Miss S—n, who chaperoned the beautiful Tubbs Hotel widow. Mr. H. has made an original remark: "You skate very well for a new beginner." Sounds like Lunt. Try again, my boy. But what can we expect? Mr. C., our handsome young lawyer, has essayed the pedestals but once, and is now recovering. What a study that man's face is upon occasions. At least I thought so last week, as I noted him giving his attention presumably to one lady, and dying all the while to hear what the other was talking about. Mr. E. pensively gives his undivided attention to fondling the strap to his ulster. Love is wearing him to the bone, and he rarely smiles. 'Tis said that one night he watered the old gum tree in the court with his tears, but the rain which immediately followed has rendered such gratuitous irrigation unnecessary. I think "Noah" has expiated on his new exercise on one skate just about as fully as such a limited experience will warrant. The delegation from Sycamore Street left early to take part in the Symposium at the Teutonia, where material cheer vies with mental invigoration.

The kettle-drum is a novelty over here, introduced by Mrs. W. She was followed by Miss H., and next came Miss L. We had made up such a nice party for Friday night, but I fear the rain precludes all possibility of it being anything but an intention. We were all going to attend the students' hop in the green groves of the Academe, not in stylish turnouts, but in the homely yet comfortable express wagon, with straw in the bottom. However, we must console ourselves with the dancing-school, as it is Lent, where, between 11 and 12, we are to have some new figures of the German, sans fairs. More anon.

Thine own WITCH OF ENDOR.

Queen Mary's Prayer.

EDITOR OF THE ARGONAUT:—Following are two versions that have come down to us of that exquisite gem known as "Queen Mary's Prayer," which, you will remember, is said to have been composed by herself while a prisoner at Fotheringay Castle. In the deep gloom of an afternoon in February—an afternoon heavy with clouds, "but not more gloomie than our hearts," as one of them afterward expressed himself—two noblemen appeared at Fotheringay Castle bearing the dread warrant for the execution of the ill-fated Queen of Scots. Eighteen long and weary years had passed since she had entered this castle a prisoner. These years of privation and sorrow had silvered over those locks, once so beautiful that an enamored French poet had declared them

"Streaming curls, steeped in golden sunshine."

The agonies and anxieties of a long imprisonment had robbed her figure somewhat of its elasticity and liteness, but had failed to touch the majesty of her mien. When the dreadful mandate was read to her she appeared to feel no terror. She listened to the close; then raising her melancholy eyes to heaven thanked her gracious God that the news had come at last, declaring how happy she should be to leave a world where she had suffered so cruelly. On the morrow when she was led forth to execution she kissed most earnestly the crucifix, and, making the sign of the cross, exclaimed: "As Thine arms, O my God! were spread out on the cross, so receive me within the arms of Thy mercy!" She then repeated her beautiful prayer:

"O Domine Deus! speravi in te!
Carissime Jesu! nunc libera me!
In dura catena, in misera pœna desidero te:
Languendo, genundo, et genuflectendo,
Adoro, imploro, ut liberes me."

Jehovah, my Saviour! my hope is in thee!
Jesus, most gracious, now liberate me!
In cruel endurings, in closest immurings,
My flesh and my spirit cry out after thee:
I languish in anguish, and, bending the knee,
Adore thee, implore thee to liberate me.

Here is the other version, with a somewhat different translation of identical passages:

"O Domine Deus! speravi in te!
O care me Jesu, nunc libera me.
In dura catena, in misera pœna
Desidero te:
Languendo gerendo, et genuflectendo,
Adoro, imploro, ut liberes me."

O Lord God Almighty! my hope is in thee!
O dearest Lord Jesus, now liberate me!
In durance repining, in sorrow reclining,
I long after thee:
With sighs never ending and knee ever bending,
I worship and pray thee to liberate me.

The prayer might be liberally paraphrased thus:

"In this last solemn and tremendous hour,
My Lord and Saviour, I invoke Thy power;
In this sad pang of anguish and of death,
Receive, O Lord! Thy suppliant's parting breath.
Before Thy hallowed cross she prostrate lies;
Oh! hear her prayers, commiserate her sighs;
Extend thine arms of mercy and of love,
And bear her to Thy peaceful realms above."

MARYSVILLE, March, 1879. OMNIUM GATHERUM.

Miss Haidee Heller is going to write a book on the great and good Robert. It will be, she modestly explains, "a book of varied attractions; a book full of good stories; a book from which much may be learned; a book to laugh at and cry over; a book which will be a prize to those who are interested in magic, and entertaining every way you look at it." Miss Haidee would seem to be a laidee who doesn't mean to keep her talent shaidée.

We have received from the Leonard Scott Publishing Company "Blackwood" for February and the Westminster Review for January; the reason of the latter's delay is to us unknown. The same house, we have before mentioned, issues also reprints of the British Quarterly and London Quarterly Reviews. These four publications give one a pretty complete insight into the methods and subjects of the best British thought of to-day. "Blackwood" must always possess a special tender interest from its age—it was the parent magazine in the English language—and its incomparably rich literary history.

VARIOUS LITERARY NOTES.

The Mind from immemorial night
And clouds is freed:
All men are able now to write,
And some can read.

Concerning the poem "The Fountain of Tears," which we republished a few weeks ago from an 1870 number of Harper's Weekly, as a denial of the claim of Mrs. Emma A. Dervan, who submitted it to us in manuscript as her own, Mr. W. K. Strong, of Eureka, reminds us that it had before appeared in our columns (May 4, 1878) credited to Arthur O'Shaughnessy—by whom, no doubt, it was written. There is no great merit in the verses; except for their lilting rhythm and trochaic rhymes they would hardly have lived so long as eight years.

Alexander Duncker, of Berlin, has begun the officially authorized publication of the Political Correspondence of Frederick the Great, drawn from the Prussian archives. It is to occupy thirty volumes, but as only two will be published in each year, the oldsters will have to complete the perusal in another and a better world, whereof, no doubt, its conclusion will form one of the chief delights.

Mary Wollstonecraft's letters to Gilbert Imlay, with a prefatory memoir by C. Kegan Paul, have been published in a handsome volume by Roberts Brothers. These letters are pathetic and passionate records of an unhappy episode in the life of a woman of genius. But Mary had a tenderness for Woman's Rights, which somewhat abates the reader's tenderness for Mary.

Roberts Brothers have been guilty of bringing out Canterbury Chimes; or Chaucer Tales Retold for Children—for the which sacrilege may heaven forgive the Vandals, as we do. Can't we now have a nursery edition of Hamlet or Faust?

A Hun named Gobrecht has, on the other hand, done Mother Goose into "regular poetry" for adults.

The Southern Review—whose leaves are the flannels of a literature as yet unborn—will henceforth be published at Richmond, Virginia. The "Sunny South" is not very strong in literature, journalism, and art.

A volume of autograph letters from the poet Southey to his brother has lately been acquired by the British Museum, and it is feared they will be published.

Among recently discovered manuscripts left by Charles Lamb are several facetious epitaphs on persons then living. In merit they take rank a little above the obituary verses in the Evening Post, and a little below those in the Morning Call.

One D. A. McDonald, who "contributes" to the March Lippincott's Magazine an indifferent story called "Joseph's Adventure," would do well to rise and explain. The tale is almost literally transcribed from one by Mrs. Frances Fuller Victor in the Overland Monthly of December, 1870, entitled "Mr. Ela's Story." The narrative was afterward (1877) published with others in a book with the title of The New Penelope and Other Stories, by A. L. Bancroft & Co., of this city. If D. A. McDonald professes to be a man the unreality and thinness of his tale ought to have betrayed him to the editor of Lippincott at once. The traces of the female mind evolving wild adventures from its inner consciousness are everywhere apparent.

We find the same story in the Morning Call of some date in '77, where it is credited to the London Argosy. Comparison shows that it was from this version that the McDonald person made his. He stole it either from a thief, or the dup of a thief, or the dupe of a thief's dupe. In any case he was, no doubt, paid for it, and got the credit of its authorship, and that gives his act its moral character.

Scandinavians who patriotically contend that this country was found by the Northmen exult in the translation of Professor Anderson's America Not Discovered by Columbus. The new version is called Amerika ikke opdaget af Columbus. We hold that it was opdaget af the Indians.

Colonel Stuart M. Taylor, of San Francisco, is a contributor to a new literary venture—Aquatic Monthly, of New York. Is it a burlesque of the Atlantic?

Mr. Clarence Cook says that the best criticism is the voice of the most of the people. It is the best for them and M. Cook.

The dunce who wrote of the "Tendencies of American Art," in the March Harper is—well, a dunce is a dunce.

An édition de luxe is announced of the poems of Mr. Eugene H. Munday. Who is Eugene H. Munday?—and why?

Adrift on the Black, Wild Tide is naturally by an officer of the Navy. A few weeks ago some officers of the Arm publicly recognized Mr. Thomas Nast's merits as an artist. Really, our national constabulary and harbor police are beginning to show "culture."

Lieutenant Flipper, "the colored Cadet," has wandered into print. His book is dull.

Few readers, we suspect, remember that some thirty years ago Professor Lowell girded at the late venerable Mr. Dana as follows:

"Here comes Dana, abstractedly loitering along,
Involved in a paulo-post-future of song,
Who'll be going to write what'll never be written,
Till the Muse, ere he thinks of it, gives him the mitten."

There is much more of this, but it is not much better.

STUDIES IN TONE AND COLOR.

The second Quintet Recital of the current series, which was given on last Tuesday evening, went far to illustrate the great interest which our music public takes in these excellent performances, since, in spite of the fact that it was one of the stormiest nights of the season, there was quite a large audience. The programme was one of the best—most harmonious—that has ever been given in this city, and was carried out with a degree of excellence that has seldom before been attained even at these concerts. The guests of the evening were Mr. Jacob Müller, whose beautiful baritone voice and artistic style were displayed at their best in Schubert's Wanderer—to which he added a song by Robauti as an encore—and the Abendstern of Wagner, and Mr. Fred. Mundwiler, who is entitled to much credit for his very musical playing of the viola part in Mozart's quintet. This quintet—the one for strings, in G minor—which brought the programme to a close, was really beautifully played throughout, and made the most delightful impression. And well it might, too, for it is one of the most perfect pieces of chamber music in the entire répertoire. The other ensemble numbers consisted of a movement from a Haydn quartet, the Abendleid of Schumann, and an exquisite allegretto of Rubenstein, also for quartet, and a trio (the posthumous Nocturne, op. 148) by Schubert, of which it is enough to say that it is thoroughly Schubert in themes and treatment, and consequently thoroughly beautiful. The soli were in the hands of Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., who made his usual success with an adagio of David and one of Brahms's Hungarian Dances in Joachim's transcription (adding, as an encore, the graceful Barcarolle of Spohr), and Miss Schmidt. This young lady seems to be steadily making her way up the ladder that leads to the blissful regions of piano-forte virtuoso-dom, and in her constant improvement gives proof of unremitting study and an ambition that will not be apt to permit her to rest contented until great things have been accomplished. Although not without its blemishes, her rendering of Liszt's difficult transcription of Wagner's Spinning Song was a fine effort, in which much was worthy of high praise, and seemed to me only to require somewhat more of self-possession and nerve to make it a very beautiful performance.

The performance of Mendelssohn's Athalie, which is announced by the Handel and Haydn Society for the 20th instant, will be the first of four grand concerts that are to be given during this year under the direction of Mr. William Toepke, the conductor of the society. A considerable subscription has been obtained, which will at once enable the society to continue its musical labors and secure it against the danger of financial shipwreck; and thus we may hope at last to have a series of choral performances well prepared and with adequate orchestral accompaniment. The soloists are to be Mrs. Tippet, Mrs. Pierce, Miss Rightmire, and Mr. Borneman; the chorus at present numbers nearly one hundred voices, and is said to be in excellent training.

It would be manifestly unjust to hold any man accountable for the idle vagaries and frolic utterances of overzealous friends, especially when the man in question happens to be a musician living in a community in which it is not possible that he should have many friends who are at all competent to judge of his work, be it good or bad. Like my former correspondent "B.," of Dr. Stone's congregation, these good people are very apt to "speak from the heart," and the said heart, beating in unison with the man rather than his work, is pretty sure to lead them into talking foolishness both for themselves and their protégé. Bearing this in mind, I listened complacently for several days preceding last Monday's performance of The Passion to a very considerable quantity of gush on the subject of the music that had been specially written for it by Mr. H. E. Widmer—how it was "strikingly appropriate," "masterly in construction," "beautifully written," etc., etc., and did not suffer myself to be prejudiced against it. I even permitted myself to be told that we were to behold the arising of a new light among us; one who occupied himself in composing Figures in eight parts; upon whom the mantle of Herold was to descend (may the day of its falling be long distant), and what more of other bosh, and remained unprejudiced. Then, on Monday evening, I went to hear the music, and a more dreary, monotonous, utterly spiritless evening-full of stuff I think I never heard. There is a passably pretty chorus—the first—in which the tameness of thought is somewhat alleviated by the pleasant natural sound of the voices; but in the following ones the voice parts are mostly so clumsily managed that there is absolutely nothing to atone for the thematic desolation. The themes—excepting the short rhythmic one of the Hallelujah, which is Handel's, and that of one of the Entr'actes, which is "borrowed" from a Prelude of Chopin—are as flat and stale as the treatment is conventional and pupil-like. In fact, the work has quite the air of being done by a German school-master who has learned somewhat of harmony and a little counterpoint at the seminary, and who cobbles his stuff together very much as he was wont to do his examination exercises. As for its appropriateness, I doubt not that Mr. Salmi Morse could have done as well, and with six months of harmony lessons, possibly better. During the entire first act, which plays in the Temple at Jerusalem, there was not a measure that in any way suggested local color—not even an attempt at it. There are some half a dozen synagogues in this city, either of which could have furnished Mr. Widmer with all the material required in order to be absolutely right on this point; but I suppose that the original music, even without ideas in it, was more to his liking. The use of a bit of the Stabat Mater of Rossini and a scrap from Bach's Passion was the only concession. The rest was pure, unadulterated Widmer—pompous, windy, turgid; in all this not entirely unlike the text of the play itself, and in so far, perhaps, rather appropriate. Au reste, the music was quite well played and the choruses nicely sung.

The Schmidt Quintet announce a series of five Matinées, to be given at Dashaway Hall on successive Saturdays, beginning next week, 15th instant. This will be welcome to many ladies who can not attend the evening concerts, Oaklanders, and others who have hitherto been obliged to content themselves with reading the posthumous notices.

Our excellent guitarist, Mr. Ferrer, has his concert at Dashaway Hall on next Wednesday, 12th instant, and offers a very strong bill, which, added to his own deserts, ought to draw a crowded house. Besides his talented daughter, Miss Jovita, Mr. Ferrer has secured the cooperation of Mrs. Anita F. Grant, of Headlsburg, who has a delightful soprano voice; Miss G. M. Greene, a budding contralto of much promise, and Messrs. Arrillaga, pianist, Solano, harpist, Geoffrie, violinist, and Kirn, guitarist. A male quartet will be under the direction of Mr. D. P. Hughes, the favorite tenor, who will also sing a solo.

The fourteenth exhibition of our local Art Association is now well under way, having opened with the usual Reception on last Wednesday evening, and I suppose the usual review is in order. I do not remember when I have sat down to a more discouraging, disheartening task. I can not imagine a gloomier, more hopeless future for our art than stares one in the face from the walls of these exhibition rooms. It seems to me indeed—I say it with no feeling but one of intense sorrow that it should be so—that our condition grows to be worse, instead of better, as the years go by; that the evidences of honest, earnest endeavor to do good work are fewer than ever before, and the tendency to the superficial and sensational is almost the only thing left apparent. The exhibition has simply the air of a sales gallery in which there is a considerable display of pictures that are got up with a view to attract the average buyer. It is like a milliner's "opening day," or a Christmas show at Ackerman's. There is some little good work; partly by artists who could not do bad, and partly by others who would not. But it is in the hopeless minority; it is an occasional oasis in a desert of arrogantly bedaubed canvases that are not only not well painted, but on which good work is not even attempted.

One of the most incomprehensible things about this exhibition is the manner in which the Hanging Committee has performed its labors. I can not understand how artists who have any respect for either art or consistency could consent to receive and hang some of the unmitigated atrocities there are to be found in both rooms; how it is that they could not see that in so doing they were insulting their art, their fellow-exhibitors, and the public. If they were influenced by considerations other than the quality of the work—which is probably what we shall be told—they were simply false to their trust, since in these matters there is a duty that should be above personal regard or influence. If they did not know better—but this is absurdly impossible; they must have known better. It does not require that one should be much of an artist to appreciate the absurdity of an arrangement that retires Mr. Rosenthal's large painting, No. 119, to the small room, and parades such pictures as Mr. Denny's No. 42, and Mr. Strong's No. 4, and Miss Bruner's No. 5 on the line in the main gallery. Surely, the nastiness of purple velvet that surrounds Mr. Rabjohn's "Evening on the Columbia," No. 6, might have been shunted off somewhere out of sight instead of being permitted to kill the color out of half a dozen pictures around it. Mr. Woodman's excellent portrait, No. 10, is strung up ceiling-ward, while Miss Strong occupies two or three places on the line with her crude, well-nigh impertinent attempts at sensation; and Mr. Williams's "Bit of Capri," No. 34, accurately the loveliest bit of color in the exhibition, is stuck away in a corner. All of this is excusable only on the plea of ignorance, and this is not presumable in such a quarter.

The good work—about enough to have covered one-half the wall-space of the large room—is well worth seeing, and some of it worth careful study. I reserve for next week a fuller review of it, hoping that in the meantime some one will buy, and carry away, the bad pictures. But it would require considerable money and a very bad pair of eyes. S. E.

An old woman with a hurdy-gurdy took up a good position, some weeks ago, on the sidewalk near the railroad offices on Fourth Street. To the same spot she every day returns with her instrument and, during business hours, patiently and continuously revolves its unwilling crank. Her choice of position displays a sagacity uncommon in hand-organists. The organ-grinder, as a rule, gets as near as possible to the intended victim, and trusts to pernicacity for success. Not so with this performer. Her instrument is planted just where it can be most effective. In fortissimo passages its strains are heard clear and distinct throughout the building, but when the music changes to pianissimo the official ear must be strained to follow the air. The ear soon becomes accustomed to loud sounds if they be continuous, and after a time they fail to attract attention; but frequent breaks in the continuity of such sounds, or occasional diminutions of their volume, distract the hearer's mind. This is the philosophy of the old lady's action, and it is in this way that she produces an intermittent fever of attention among the inmates of the railroad offices. When the music is loud and distinct they hear it, but they heed it not; their minds are intent upon business. But when the artful musician puts on the soft pedal and slows the crank, the effort to follow the melody is disturbing. Every day the torture increases, for the old lady's regularity and application to the business in hand make her a model for the imitation of the clerks. It is likely that she is but in training as yet—making sure of her ground, no doubt, and getting her hand in for Governor Stanford's return to business. With a degree of candor rare among her sex the musician exhibits a placard bearing the legend, "Born in 1811." It may be, though, that the date refers to the age of the hurdy-gurdy—perhaps a Stradivarius among barrel-organs. It remains to be seen what action the railroad company will take in the matter. If it be true that the aged musician has reached her sixty-eighth year—so near the allotted span—she may soon expire by limitation. It has been said that the old lady's establishment is merely an offshoot of the Chronicle—a sort of up-town office or agency of the de Youngs. The story has been started that the player's feminine garb is a cunning disguise worn by one of the Chronicle's proprietors, who are determined, by hook or by crook, to make their influence felt in that quarter.

Men, being egotists, suffer a woman's love for themselves to cover a multitude of sins—their sins.

NEVADA SILVER.—CALIFORNIA MUD.

Impressed with the conviction that the Comstock lode, its wonderful returns, its mode of working, its peculiar relations to the present and future welfare of San Francisco, deserved some different consideration than that being accorded to it by the San Francisco press—especially the Chronicle—we solicited a friend to write us a paper that would somewhat more broadly treat so important a subject. To denounce stock gambling, to personally assault the members of the bonanza firm, did not seem to us to be a profitable way to consider this question, that has so interwoven itself with the material interests of this State. Vituperation, abuse, and personal assault by word-pelting, of the men who control and manage these great mines are, in our judgment, both unwise and impolitic.

San Francisco is in a large manner dependent on the Comstock mines. Their working is interwoven with the progress of the city, property values largely depend upon it, and there are many reasons why there should be a frank understanding and a friendly cooperation between the men who own the mines and the men who own the town. Whatever prejudice may exist against Stanford & Co., as railroad builders, it is admitted that they hold in their hands a power to largely aid or largely injure our city. As they are citizens of our city, and as their success runs parallel with ours, and as it is their interest to promote our interest, and as we can make money if they make money, it has been the policy of the ARGONAUT to keep the two powers in friendly, and not in hostile, relations. The same reasoning suggests the same policy toward the great mine-owners. Nothing is to be gained by abuse and personal assault. We take it that the mine men are of as good average moral worth as other men, and are as good and pure as, for example, the average editor; that human nature is of about the same relative goodness; that all communities that are tempted to gamble, gamble; that all men who secure colossal fortunes, and become great millionaires, act about alike. We recognize the fact that no good is likely to be accomplished by personal abuse, and that some good may be accomplished by having a better understanding between the bonanza millionaires and the community in which they reside. For instance, it would be better to have the firm of Flood & Co. invest $30,000,000 in San Francisco by loaning it at four per cent. per annum than to put the same amount in government bonds, and let us pay eight per cent. per annum interest on mortgages. It would be better for us that Messrs. Hopkins, Stanford, Crocker, Flood, Mackay, and Fair should each build within our city a costly home than to go elsewhere to display and spend his wealth; and yet this ever-scolding, never-ending, always-insulting, and altogether inexcusable newspaper din does not encourage capitalists to invest their moneys or build their homes where the press is hounding on the mob to over-tax their wealth and burn their dwellings. Post and Chronicle, Bulletin and Call, are blowing their bugles and beating their gongs in tuneless discordance upon this one dreary theme. They have divided among themselves and parceled out the rich men for their abuse. Each one has its pet aversion. One or two rich men to vilify is a newspaper's capital. The Chronicle is most prosperous because it takes a wider range of personal denunciation. The field of journalism was nearly occupied when we came into it; all the rich were monopolized, and the only thing left us to assault was that double-barreled, bog-born blatherskite, Kearney; and while we are doing pretty well in this direction, our talent is cramped, and our chances of money-making greatly diminished.

We have almost forgotten our theme. We asked a friend to write us an article about the Comstock mines and the Bonanza firm, in the hope that these important interests might be brought into more friendly relations with this community. The following note contains the reason of his declination, and because he declined is why we have made this preface larger than the note:

SAN FRANCISCO, February 27, 1879.

EDITORS OF THE ARGONAUT:—I've thought over your proposition faithfully, and I don't see my way.

First, I've not read any of the Chronicle attacks. It is not material to do so.

Second, although vast advantages have accrued, and are accruing, to the world in general, and to this coast in particular, from the mining operations on the Comstock vein; and the merit that has accrued, and is accruing, to the bonanza gentlemen from these operations directly is, that they mine wisely and well; yet this proposition—viz.: that their mining operations are wise and excellent—is a technical one. It can be shown to be true only by comparison with kindred operations, which the public would neither understand nor care for. Such an argument is, by its nature, incapable of being made a popular one. Or, should we appeal to authority, the only competent opinions accessible to us must come from sources that would be assailed as biased. You and I, and scores of others who have been interested in mining as an art and industry, are aware that the Comstock work is superb, surpassing the finest of like kind in Europe, unrivaled by any similar operations in the world—one reason being that no other mineral deposits in our time have been such as to warrant an equal boldness in undertaking. The opportunity surpassed all others, and the Comstock men proved equal to the opportunity.

This is, of course, the chiefest merit they could exhibit—the chiefest the situation can admit; but it is not of the picturesque kind that strikes the popular imagination. The service which the Comstock miners are rendering in their generation to their country and mankind simply by realizing without waste or loss the dominant wealth of that ground is, perhaps, not second to any other of the industrial operations of our days. But this proposition is technical, too, and rests on principles of political economy, and how the devil are you to make readable matter out of political economy? Peace hath her victories, and this is one of them; but the victories of peace are prosaic, and the multitude can not be expected to forgive the victors their pecuniary reward. If they would but bankrupt themselves, now, how could all raise their voices in exalting the achievements of Belisarius, fallen and poor! But Belisarius at the head of his legions of moneys, and leading his cohorts of bonds—Belisarius triumphing in his chariot and we stumping it about—hi! shall we not gather a gob of mud from the gutter and have a shy at that bloated Illyrian?

No. Your proposition is in effect that we construct a shield of ARGONAUTS to interpose betwixt the mud-gobs and the too successful bonanza miners. In this programme only two things are altogether clear—viz.: that the mud will continue to fly, and that the shield-bearer will be the party plastered. In other words, the Chronicle will continue to blackguard the bonanza firm as long as the bonanza firm have money enough to insure popular sympathy for the blackguard. As a newspaper sharp yourself, you know that there is money in it for a paper of the Chronicle's peculiar standing, as a cold question of business. Even aside from which, I fear Judah hath a personal and a grief. So he must continue to employ his squirt, and he must put up with the shower. If you will needs build the mud, I think I have indicated the proper pattern. Yours,

RELIGION.

By Nathan, an Essenian.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST NUMBER.]

The Jews, the Greeks, the Romans, and countless other peoples, held that this sacrifice for sin might be bulls, goats, etc. (or that the sacrifice of these might be typical of a true and necessary, but unknown, sacrifice, it is not certain which). The astute and delicate Hindoo believed that this sacrifice would be a divine being born out of the right flank of a sacred heifer (a virgin cow), because the pure and beautiful thought of this wonderful people ages ago demanded that their sacrifice must be of "immaculate conception," and the heifer being sinless and sacred, the sacrifice would be so. Other utterances of this necessary and universal truth obtained more or less articulately in other ages and races; but the truth itself, a want in human consciousness of a perfect righteousness available by faith only for the justification of man, is beyond cavil or dispute.

Now, to the highest thought upon this high theme, it must infallibly appear that this perfect righteousness and sacrifice can not by any possibility be God, for God is He to whom we are to be reconciled by this sacrifice (the Trinity is, therefore, merely a mistake); it must appear with equal certainty that the sacrifice can not be man, because the necessity for the sacrifice grows out of man's consciousness that he is possessed of no perfect righteousness, and is unable to justify himself; and yet, by the most singular and most necessary paradox in all the realm of thought this sacrifice, which can not be either God or man, must of necessity be both Human and Divine: human, that man may be able to trust its love and its willingness to justify him; and divine, that he may believe it has authority and power to do so. Now observe, if you please, that not a single idea has been advanced in reference to God, Christ, Sin, Faith, and Sacrifice that is not perfectly verified by the clearest, unquestionable testimony of human consciousness itself. These ideas are, therefore, true, or else consciousness itself, which is the very root of reason, is a lie clear through, and the only thing that we can ever know certainly is that we can never know anything. So, also, if one shall cast aside all ecclesiastical and metaphysical linen-cambrics, and seize human nature and ravel out the very warp and woof of it, and find out what it is made of, he shall find that Christ knew it omnisciently well, and that all that He taught is rooted in the inevitable consciousness itself. The great Essenian taught just these truths. "He knew what was in man." He was a poor hand at doctrines, and dogmas, and ecclesiasticisms, or rather He condemned the whole batch of Pharisaisms and Scribeisms together; but in few, short, simple, and comprehensive terms, He announced the very truth of the faith which is part of consciousness, the misconception of which essential and necessary truth has filled the world with false religions from the very dawn of time. As a teacher of spiritual truth He taught nothing which consciousness does not absolutely affirm, except that He claimed to be the Christ, the perfect righteousness and sacrifice which is an eternal necessity of human nature. The Jews never doubted any part of this necessary truth; admitting this truth to its fullest extent, and loving, believing in, and waiting for its advent under the title of Messiah, they denied that Jesus was the Christ: because they wanted a king that would free them from Caesar, and Jesus refused to sanction any government over the people; because they wanted wealth, and rank, and power for themselves and for their nation, and Jesus taught communism as a higher truth than property, and democracy as a higher truth than government; therefore, "the chief priests and rulers of the people" denied Him to be the Christ. But everything that pertains to real Christianity as a system of spiritual truth is verified by consciousness, and is absolutely true. The only open question is, therefore, not whether there is somewhere a perfect righteousness and sacrifice which human consciousness wants and demands, but is only this: Was Jesus the Christ? That is all that there is to dispute about.

There are two salient points in the position assumed by Jesus, first of all men in this contest, which seem to be impregnable—at least every Communist ought to see in them conclusive evidences of His Divinity; and, first, the fact that He based the justification of the sinner on faith only, and that in strict accord with this position He sought out the poor chiefly, "the weary and the heavy laden," while all other men toadied to the rich, the great, the powerful. Suppose that justification, which is a necessity common to all men, had been proposed as the result of wealth, or power, or knowledge, or nationality, or residence, or pilgrimage, or official station, or of any thing to be done by somebody else, or by the sinner himself, or of any conceivable thing except faith only, is it not apparent that the condition of justification would have been possible to the few only and impossible to the many—to the poor, the humble, "the multitude" for whom He died? For "faith only" is an essentially communistic condition, free to all alike, available for all, out of the reach of any ecclesiastical or political police courts and pettifoggery whatever; independent of all social, theological, and political surroundings and sanctities whatever; a gospel for all, especially for the poor. For, however galling the facts may be to the Princes of the Church and to all ecclesiastical, political, and social "respectability," the facts are that there can not be any monopoly of the privilege of justification without denying Christ, so long as it remains true that He was the son of a carpenter, and so long as the condition of justification is the essentially communistic principle of "faith only"; although, perhaps, Christianity might have been a more "respectable" thing if the crucifixion had occurred a few centuries sooner and a son of Solomon, or some other "gentleman by birth," had been the victim.

But the voice of nature pleads for perfect righteousness and sacrifice available by faith only, and if justification had been based upon any condition except faith only, that fact would have been sufficient to prove the system false.

But a second point, which ought to demonstrate to the satisfaction of Communists at last that Christ is a Divine Teacher, is found in the fact that not only did Christ base His spiritual truth upon the communistic principle of faith only, but assuming that if any man really believed that "He was a teacher sent from God," that man, under the power of that faith, would accept his social and political teachings as of Divine authority. Christ made the very same principle not only the basis of all social and political truths. He never supposed that selfishness would leave its god—Mammon—give up government over the people, surrender private property-rights, and cleave to communism, a pure democracy social and political, except from the basis of faith only; because it was hard for a rich man to enter into the Kingdom of Heaven, so hard that He never expected one of them to do so unless he should first have unquestioning faith in Christ and then realize that there was no other entrance into that kingdom, although faith might justify the believer. Should the Communists then permit the ecclesiasticism which, ever since the days of Constantine, has been trumpeting abroad its faith in Christ's spiritual truth, while denying His whole social and political truth, to lie them out and drive them away from his spiritual truth while they are seeking for the communistic democracy which He taught to be necessary for temporal salvation just as earnestly as he taught spiritual truth for men's eternal good? The fatal error of ecclesiasticism was in teaching one-half the gospel—spiritual truth alone. Will Communists repeat the same error by teaching the other half—social and political truth alone? Or will they be wise enough to demand the whole gospel at last together and neither half of it separately? Surely, less than this is folly, for "the general welfare," the social, political, and spiritual regeneration of mankind, depends upon the whole gospel and not upon either half of it alone. But if Communists now claim one-half of Christ's truth and are ready to pass through seas of blood and limitless tracts of flame to inaugurate it, ought they to deny the other half of it? Christ taught both.

But Jesus was divinely right in basing his truth on faith only, because faith is the key to knowledge, and without antecedent faith it is impossible to learn or to know. Faith precedes all knowledge; Belief is the oldest sister, and leads Knowledge by the hand; and unless we first believe we can never know. Call your child to your knee, and show to him a symbol made by the imposition of a horizontal line upon two other lines joined at the top and thence divergent to the ends, thus: "A." Ask the yet uneducated child what that symbol is, and he will say, "I don't know." Tell him then it stands for an articulate sound—that is, "A." Now what prime necessity is laid on that child's nature? Only faith. If he is born without faith as a natural, primitive, inevitable function of his being, if he is born indifferent even between faith and unfaith, how, by any possibility, can he ever know the alphabet? But because faith is the inevitable act of intelligence, when you tell him it is "A" he receives the fact by faith only, and can not otherwise possibly receive it at all, and because he must do so, it is possible for him to learn and to know; otherwise not possible at all; for there are children born indifferent between faith and unfaith; these children never can learn or know, because they are incapable of belief; for every child so born is born an idiot. Whether because mind is wanting to them, or because the physical organism through which it is manifested is abnormally dull and defective, we do not know. Knowledge, then, is impossible without antecedent faith. Is it not a species of basest ingratitude for those pseudo-philosophers, who have learned all that they know, outside of the limited range of things palpable to the senses, by faith only, to go back on the mother of knowledge, and declare that they will believe nothing which they do not know, when in truth they can know nothing which they have not first believed? But as the whole sum of knowledge which we have acquired through the slow lapse of ages came to us by the instrumentality of faith only, revealing to us the treasures of the physical and intellectual universe, and as this knowledge could not have been acquired except upon the condition of faith only, is it too hard a thing for us that Christ should ordain that we can not acquire social, political, and spiritual truth upon any other condition than this, of faith only? "If any man do the will of Him that sent me, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself." Here is a man who claims to be a teacher sent from God to teach us what is best for all—that is, to teach us spiritual, social, and political truth. We say unto him, Rabbi, art thou be that was to come, (i. e., the perfect righteousness and sacrifice that human nature longs for, whom Plato, Elijah and other prophets, foretold, because they in their age also longed for him), or do we look for another? And when he answers, I am the way, the truth, and the life, we say where is the proof of thy divinity? what are the evidences of Christianity? And he answers: If you would know the truth, you must learn it as you have learned all else that you know: you must first accept the facts by faith only, and then demonstrate them by experience, as every man has done in regard to all other truth. Believe, and ye shall know. We carp at that, and, without ever giving his truth any fair trial at all, we begin to flout our philosophies, stateisms, and ecclesiasticisms right in his meek and holy face, and to cry out crucify him! crucify him! Is it fair? Is it brave? Is it manly? Is it even common sense to condemn any man without a trial? For, mark you, Christ first taught every man's personal rights, responsibility, duty—social, political, spiritual; he addresses our will only; he says distinctly that there is no evidence of his truth except faith and experience. So that when any man of science, that has not believed in Christ and tried his truth in the only way it can be tried, pretends to know that it is not true, that man or that science is a liar—nothing more, nothing less; just a liar, that's all.

Of course this truth, in all of its aspects, social, political, and spiritual, is beyond the reach of ecclesiasticism that has for fourteen centuries been dabbling up to its eyes in stateisms, feudalisms, and other "isms" and "ologies," literary, scientific, theological, and what not, attempting to found Christ's truth on a foundation of mere intellectual dung—a business of making silk purses out of sow's ears; and, of course, widespread and constantly increasing infidelity is necessarily and rightly the result. "Faith is the substance of things hoped for; the evidence of things not seen;" and there is no other substance or evidence of those things at all. The churches are built upon chronologies, apostolical successions, baptisms, decretals, creeds, constitutions, catechisms, law and order, government and civilization, empires, kingdoms, states, republics, and an endless catalogue of long-legged, big-voiced words; yet it is true that "there is no other name given under heaven or among men whereby we can be saved," except that of Jesus Christ. By faith only; by faith in Him, and in the democracy, social and political, based upon faith in Christ and in man, which He pledged His own Godhood should be sufficient for the regeneration of the race—sufficient to banish want and wretchedness and crime from human life, so that virtue might be possible, and a true, spiritual existence grafted on physical prosperity.

Did Christ make any mistake about this matter? Let us examine into this question a little.

It is not to be forgotten that the teachings of Christ were addressed uniformly and only to the individual, and that He uniformly declared that faith was the only basis from which His truth could be learned, and experience the only test by which it could be tried. Take the case of the justification of a sinner. If he is consciously convicted of sin, is there any room for argument against this fact or any place for scientific or theological straddlebugism whatever? Might you not as well seek to prove to a man who suffers that pain is a mere delusion, and that he is mistaken in believing that he suffers? And if this man believes that God, for Christ's sake, pardons his sins, is he not consciously justified? And is it not sheer nonsense to wage any argument against this consciousness? Note that the question here presented is not whether faith proves anything at all, but is simply whether the results of faith in Christ follows of necessity whenever and wherever it is exercised? Did any man ever believe and was not justified? If he believes that God for Christ's sake pardons him, does it not by logical necessity follow that he is consciously justified? He believes in God, in Christ, in the necessity of moral distinctions; he is conscious of sin; he believes that by reason of faith he is justified, and is it not impossible that consciousness could ever fail to respond to this faith? If any man, or science, has not believed and is not justified, the testimony of that man, or of that science, is simply a negation; to-wit, he has not believed, and does not know, and is incompetent to testify to anything else about it at all. But he who has believed, does know, and this knowledge is a fact in his own consciousness, as clearly beyond the reach of any scientific or theological schools, or sanhedrim, as is the fact that he hungers, or thirsts, or suffers, or enjoys. And Christ and his followers exercised thaumaturgical powers in order that men "might believe." As to this fact then of justification of a sinner, there was no error in basing the certainty of it upon faith only. Was there any mistake in basing His political and social truth upon the same ground of faith only?

Hark! The hum of mighty hosts! It rose and fell fainter and more faint; then the murmur of water was heard and lost again, as it swelled and gathered and burst in one grand volume of sound, like a hallelujah from myriad lips. Out of the resounding echo, out of the dying cadence, a single female voice arose. Clear, pure, rich, it soared above the tumult of the host that hushed itself, a living thing. Higher, sweeter, it seemed to break the fetters of mortality and tremble in sublime adoration before the Infinite. My breath stilled with awe. Was it a spirit voice—one of the glittering host in the jasper city, "that had no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it?" And the water, was it the river, clear as crystal, flowing from the great white throne?—But no! The tone now floated out soft, sad, human. There was no sorrowful strain in that nightless land, where the leaves of the trees were for the healing of the natives. The beautiful voice was of the earth and sin-stricken. From the sobbing that mingled with the faint ripple of water, it went up once more, ringing gladly, joyfully; it went up inspired with praise to the sky, and—bark! the Hebrew tongue:

"The horse and his rider hath He thrown into the sea." Then the voice of the multitude swelled again, and a crash of music broke forth from innumerable timbrels. I raised my head quickly—it was the song of Miriam after the passage of the Red Sea.

Teach your boys that a true lady may be found in calico quite as frequently as in velvet.

Teach them that a common school education with common sense is far better than a college education without it.

Teach them that one good, honest trade, well mastered, is worth a dozen beggarly "professions."

Teach them to respect their elders and themselves.

Teach them that, as they expect to be men some day, they can not too soon learn to protect the weak and helpless.

Teach them that to wear patched clothes is no disgrace, but to wear a black eye is.

Teach them that God is no respecter of sex, and that when He gave the seventh commandment, He meant it for them as well as for their sisters.

Teach them that by indulging their depraved appetites in the worst forms of dissipation, they are not fitting themselves to become the husbands of pure girls.

Teach them that it is better to be an honest man seven days in the week than to be a Christian one day and a villain six days.

If all this instruction is too much trouble, teach your boys to think, and you need not worry yourself about anything else. They will review all your opinions and revise your decisions for themselves, anyhow, and the earlier you qualify them to do so the better.

"When I went to Paris one time," he said, "everywhere here was thirteen. If I took a fiacre, it was number thirteen; if I took up at a house, thirteen; if I paid for zis or zat, thirteen. Ah! it was fatality, and it brought Brignoli bad luck." As to Friday, the tenor is less particular; but still he regards the day with suspicion, and would not make his first appearance then. His pet superstition is regarding the virtues of a deer's head, and for years he never traveled without one. He wears a scarf pin made in the shape of a deer's head, and even the Scotch cap, which is part of his costume in Lucia di Lammermoor, bears the same figure on it. Brignoli never sees a hunchback without rubbing his hump for good luck. "One night at ze Grand Opera, in Paris," he said, "I see a hunchback in the crowd as ze people were leaving. He went very fast, and I had to run after heem. I thought I would never catch; but at last I reached heem, and brushed hees hump. 'Ah!' said I, 'I beg your pardon, Monsieur; I took you for a friend of mine. Excuse.'"

Crows are plenty and fat in Liberia, and the negro emigrants from South Carolina write home that cooked crow goes first-rate with roast monkey.

MIRACLE PLAYS.

There seems to be much interest just now excited in this community on the subject of the old miracle plays, as a proposition is made to revive some of the most sacred. Perhaps, then, some account of their history may interest your readers.

They arose in the Middle Ages, when the Scriptures, locked up in an unknown tongue, could be read only by the highly educated. To teach their truths, therefore, to the masses, the plan was devised of representing their historical scenes in plays, and thus reaching the mind through the eye. Sometimes these were well executed and conceived in a reverential spirit, particularly when intended for the higher classes. For example, we give a few lines from one in the Latin language, which pictures the scene at our Lord's sepulchre, where the narrative of Scripture has been rigidly carried out. The two angels address Mary Magdalene:

Mulier, quid ploras?

MARIA.
Quia tulcrunt Dominum meum,
Et nescio ubi posuerunt eum.

ANGELUS.
Noli flere, Maria! resurrexit Dominus,
Alleluia!

MARIA.
Ardens est cor meum desiderio
Videre Dominum meum;
Quero et non invenio
Ubi posuerunt eum.
Alleluia!

Interim veniat quidam præparatus in similitudinem hortulani, stansque ad caput sepulchri, dicit:

Mulier, quid ploras? quem queris?

Scenes like these, however, were exceptions. The plays were often, evidently prepared by illiterate monks, for the lower class, and nothing can be conceived more grotesque and absurd than the pictures they give. We will quote a single example from one of the plays formerly acted at Chester, only reducing the old English, in which it is written, to modern phraseology. It is a dialogue between Noah and his wife, when he is trying to persuade her to enter the ark:

NOAH.
Wife, come in! Why standest thou there?
Thou art ever forward. I dare well swear.
Come in, in God's name, half time it were,
For fear lest thou should'st drown.

NOAH'S WIFE.
Yea, sir, set up your sail,
And row forth with evil hail;
For, without fail, I will not out—
Out of this town.
Unless I have my gossips every one,
One foot farther I will not go—
They shall not drown, by Saint John!

If I may save their life.
They loved me full well, by Christ!
And if thou wilt not let them go into that chest,
Go forth, Noah, wherever you like,
And get thee a new wife.

NOAH.
Son Shem, lo! thy mother is near;
By God, such another I do not see.

SHEM.
Father, I will fetch her in, I trow,
Without any fail.
Mother, my father after thee sends,
And prays thee to go into yonder vessel.
Look up, and see the wind,
For we be ready to sail.

NOAH'S WIFE.
Shem, go again to him. I say
I will not go therein to-day.

NOAH.
Come in, wife, in twenty devils' way,
Or else stand there all day.

HAM.
Shall we all fetch her in?

NOAH.
Yea, sons, for Christ's sake and mine,
I would ye do it quickly,
For of this flood I am in doubt.

NOAH'S WIFE.
The flood comes flowing in full fast,
On every side that spreads full far;
For fear of drowning I am aghast.
Good gossips, let us draw near,
And let us drink ere we go,
For oftimes we have done so;
For at a draught thou drinkest a quart,
And so will I do ere I go.
Here is a bottle full of malmsey, good and strong;
It will rejoice both heart and tongue.
Though Noah think us never so long,
Yet we will drink alike.

JAPHET.
Mother, we all of us beseech you—
For we are here, your own children—
Come into the ship for fear of the weather,
For his sake that died for you.

NOAH'S WIFE.
That will I not for your call,
Unless I have my gossips all.

SHEM.
In faith, mother, thou shalt,
Whether thou wilt or not. [They bring her in by force.]

NOAH.
Welcome, wife, into this boat.

NOAH'S WIFE.
Take that for thy note. [Slaps his face.]

NOAH.
Ha! ha! marry, this is hot—
It is good for to be sull.

The gross anachronisms, where she speaks of Christ and St. John, and talks of a "bottle full of malmsey," were characteristic of those plays.

The oldest miracle play which has survived is called The Harrowing of Hell, and was written in the reign of Edward II. It describes the descent of our Lord to hell,

"To bring thence His own,
And lead them to Paradise."

We will quote the first few lines to show the character of the old English in which it is written:

"Alle herkeneth to me nou!
A strif wolte y-tellen ou
Of Jhesu ant of Sathan—
Tho Jhesu wes to helle y-gan
Forte vacche thenne hys,
Ant bringen hem to Farays."

The descent of Christ into hell to rescue the souls of the good—founded upon the apocryphal gospel of Nicodemus—was a favorite subject of illustration through the Middle Ages. There was quite a series on this subject. Of one of these, called Extractio Animarum ab Inferno, we will give a short analysis:

Christ descends to the gates, stating the object of his visit—"to chalange that is myne." Adam perceives the "gleme" of His coming, and announces it to Eve and the prophets, who sing for joy, "Et cantent omnes, Salvator Mundi." Rybald, one of the demons and the porter of hell, is in great alarm, and calls out to Beelzebub to prepare for resistance:

"Since first that hell was made and I was put therein,
Such sorrow never ere I had, nor heard I such a din!
My heart begins to start, my wit waxes thin;
I am afraid we can't rejoice, these souls must from us twin [go].
Ho, Beelzebub! bind these boys, such noise was never heard in hell."

The terror becomes general, and "Astarot and Anaball, Berith and Belyall," together with Satan and Lucifer, are summoned, while watches are set on the walls. Satan threatens to beat out Beelzebub's brains for disturbing him. The devils refuse to open the gate, but Christ exclaiming: "Attolite portas, principes, vestras et elevamini, portæ æternales, et introibit rex gloriæ," they burst, Beelzebub exclaiming:

"Harro! our gates begin to crack;
In sunder, I trow, they go,
And hell, I trow, will together shake.
Alas! what am I, wo!"

Satan, from below, orders his fiends to "dyng the dastard downe," and Beelzebub replies: "That is soon said!" Satan ascends from the pit of hell, and Christ tells him that He is come to fetch His own, and that His Father sent Him. Satan answers that he "knew His Father well by sight," and reasons with Christ on the impolicy and injustice of releasing those already damned. Argument failing, he entreats Christ to take him out of hell also. To which our Saviour replies, "that He will leave him some company—Cain, Judas, Achitophel, Cato, and some others who had destroyed themselves," and He adds, "that such as obey His laws shall never come to hell." This rejoices Satan, and he congratulates himself that hell will soon be fuller than ever, as he intended to walk East and West, in order to seduce mankind from obedience. But Christ replies:

"Nay, fiend, thou shalt be fast,
So that thou shalt not stir."

Satan then sinks "into hell pyt," and Jesus frees Adam, Eve, Moses, David, Isaia, and others, who conclude the play by singing Te Deum laudamus.

Such were the miracle plays of the middle ages; often not only most absurd in their statements, but also shocking in their impiety. Still they were used as one means of inculcating in the people the cardinal truths of Christianity. With the invention of printing and the diffusion of literature this necessity ceased, and the miracle plays were gradually laid aside. At present they seem only to linger in an obscure corner of the Bavarian Alps, where once in every ten years there is performed at Ober-Ammergau a representation of the scenes of the Passion of our Lord.

Than such a representation on the public stage of a theatre, a more fearful impiety could not be devised. Think of the Redeemer of the world personified by a play actor! A few months ago it was attempted in London, but it caused such a burst of popular indignation that the Aquarium Company had to abandon the project and apologize to the public. When it is performed in the Alps by the simple peasants at Ober-Ammergau, it is a strictly religious service, under the direction of the priests. Those only take part whose religious tone and purity of character render them, in some respects, fit exponents of these solemn scenes, and they prepare for it by fasting and prayer. How fearful the contrast between this and the boards and actors of a California theatre! We trust, therefore, that the feelings of our religious people will no more be outraged by making the scenes of our Lord's Passion the objects of flippant criticism in this irreverent community.

WM. INGRAHAM KIP.

A story comes from St. Petersburg which is pretty enough to bear repeating. Not long since a Government functionary died in utter destitution, leaving, without friends or relations, two small children, one of whom was a boy about seven years old. Alone, moneyless, foodless, with his little sister crying for bread, he wrote on a piece of paper, as a last resort, the petition, "Please, God, send me three copceks to buy my little sister a roll." This he carried to the nearest church to drop it into an alms-box, and start it on its way to heaven. A passing priest, seeing him trying to put the paper in the box, took it and read it, whereupon he carried the children to his house, fed them and clothed them. The next Sunday he preached a sermon on charity, in which he alluded to the incident. The collection that followed amounted to nearly $1,000.

Swinburne writes a hand which it is almost impossible to read, using a quill pen. Ruskin's chirography is as fine as if written with a pin point. Lowell writes a ladylike, running hand, very plain, with the exception of his signature. Froude's penmanship is distinct and fine; Kate Field's square and bold; George McDonald's large and manly, and William Winter's is like forked lightning. Robert Buchanan writes an "easily read, affectedly literary hand, as though he were trying to be unintelligible, but did not like to be altogether so." He also decorates his letters with boyish curly queues. Mrs. Oliphant writes worse than anybody else, apparently using the point of a hair.

Jefferson Davis is now, since the death of Caleb Cushing, the sole survivor of Pierce's Cabinet.

To eat with decency and composure is the final triumph of civilization.

OUR OWN POETS.

[We recently invited our poets—who have all a mania for sonnetteering—to compete for honors by sending us a sonnet each. Only three have had the courage to respond, and be their work good or bad (vide infra) they are the only local bards who have henceforth the right to sonnetize in our columns; if we ever print the sonnets of the timorous singers who have not dared to "come to the test," it will be from motives of mere mercy and charitable toleration—for which qualities, however, we are eminent among the wronged ones of the earth.]

THE ROSE.

Who hath not marked the young imperial rose
On which the morn's first sunbeam, newly caught, Lies drowned in drops of dew, which night hath brought
To deck the sweetest, fairest flower that blows?
Rose of thy native city, round thee glows
A light as pure, in every heavenly thought
That plays along those glowing features, fraught
With the calm grandeur of the soul's repose!
Ah! it is well that there are pleasant flowers
For the poor wanderers of the waste to cull;
And it is well that through the darkest hours
There gleam some visions of the beautiful.
While such as thou art blooming in our bowers,
Earth is no wild, life ceases to be dull.

MARYSVILLE.

OMNIUM GATHERUM.

SAN FRANCISCO.

Mushroom of cities, couched thy hills upon,
Whose tops o'look the western sea's expanse,
And catch the morning sunbeams as they glance
Above Sierra's summits from the sun.
How like the fungus growth thy growth begun;
How like some magic city built by chance
From out the woof of Time and Circumstance,
To fill the glorious purpose it has done.
But unlike magic cities reared in space,
That vanish with the cloud that bears them past,
You stand to-day the wonder of the world,
As real, as firm as Atlatl on its base,
While at thy doors from many a tapering mast
The flags of all the nations are unfurled.

SAN FRANCISCO.

PERCY VERE.

NAPA VALLEY.

Fair is the valley of the blue and gold!
Above shine skies of amethystine hue,
While far and near, impetred with morning dew,
The golden grain springs from the fertile mould;
Close by a stream which winds from far away
The lovely City of the Wood-nymphs lies,
By Flora almost hid from mortal eyes,
And far to south the white sails speck the bay.
Here St. Helena proudly holds her sway
And woos soft breezes from the western sea,
While Health and Peace and Joy her will obey,
And Learning, 'neath her sceptre, bends the knee.
Here, traveler, rest and make life's sunset sweet—
The Eden-land of earth lies at thy feet!

PETALUMA.

CLARENCE U. THOMAS.

Sunday.

AIR—"We bipped made up of frail clay."

We zealots, made up of stiff clay,
The sour-looking children of sorrow,
While not over jolly to-day,
Resolve to be wretched to-morrow.
We can't for a certainty tell
What mirth may molest us on Monday;
But at least, to begin the week well,
Let us all be unhappy on Sunday.

That day, the calm season of rest,
Shall come to us freezing and frigid;
A gloom all our thoughts shall invest
Such as Calvin would call over-rigid.
With sermons from morning till night
We'll strive to be decent and dreary;
To preachers a praise and delight,
Who think not that sermons can weary.

All tradesmen cry up their own wares—
In this they agree well together;
The mason by stone and lime swears,
The tanner is always for leather;
The smith still for iron would go,
The schoolmaster stands up for teaching,
And the parson would have you to know
There's nothing on earth like his preaching.

The face of kind Nature is fair,
But our system obscures its effulgence.
How sweet is a breath of fresh air!
But our rules don't allow us indulgence.
These gardens, their walks and green bowers,
Might be free to the poor man for one day;
But no, the glad plants and gay flowers
Mustn't bloom or smell sweetly on Sunday.

What though a good precept we strain
Till hateful and hurtful we make it—
What though in thus pulling the rein
We may draw it so tight as to break it;
Abroad we forbid folks to roam,
For fear they get social or frisky;
But of course they can sit still at home,
And get dismally drunk upon whisky.

Then, though we can't certainly tell
How mirth may molest us on Monday;
At least, to begin the work well,
Let us all be unhappy on Sunday.

ALAMEDA, February, 1879.

D.

Three Years.

A love as sweet as the world can give
Was mine, mine own, for a little day,
And out of my thankful heart uprose
Such prayers as only the happy pray.
I thanked my God for a gift so sweet,
While happiest tears bedewed my eyes,
And through the days of the swift, glad year
My soul found wings for the upper skies.

A year, and the vow was stronger bound;
Death, nor time, nor the world's sad change,
Could sever the souls for ever wed
With a love beyond life's narrow range.
And so we thought, and dreamed, and hoped
For a brighter morn to our blissful dream,
While the roses faded and summer fled
On the current of time's resistless stream.

Another year, and the faint, dim glow
'Neath ashes and dust alone remained
Of all the glory of hope and trust
That over my life its joy had rained.
Faded and cold and passionless,
No thrilling kisses, no trance of touch,
Dead beyond prayer, for ever dead,
The beautiful hope that I loved so

RICHMOND, IND., February, 1879.

MRS. D.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per 4 weeks. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

FRANK M. PIXLEY, }
 FRED. M. SOMERS, } Editors.

SATURDAY, MARCH 8, 1879.

The bill restricting Chinese immigration fails to become a law by reason of the Executive veto. This is a great disappointment to the people of our coast. Intelligent opinion is in almost unanimous accord that some proper legislation should be devised to arrest a too great influx of Chinese to our continent. Honest differences of opinion are entertained upon the extent and threatening character of this immigration, as well as the mode of controlling it. We are somewhat mortified, and some of our more impulsive minds are indignant, that our judgment should not control and our wishes be decisive upon a question so near to us, and one that we think ourselves better entitled to determine than those who are far removed from its influence and have less means of estimating its results than we. Yet we are constrained to admit that there is force in the reasons that have influenced the President's mind and his Cabinet advisers. We did, as a nation, enter into a treaty with China. This compact possesses all the force of international law. It has a right to bind our conscience and govern our action until it is abrogated in a proper manner. We must regard our national dignity and our national honor in dealing with the government of China; we must be more careful in adjusting this matter than if we were treating with a strong European power having at its command arms, armies, and newspapers. The Chinese among us have rights, and these rights we must protect with a jealous regard to ourselves. We must be more particular to throw the shield of our laws over them because it is the only protection they have. The Chinese are here at our invitation, by virtue of a solemn treaty; they have a right to appeal to our sense of justice, generosity, and chivalry; and whenever they have no other defense, we must see to it that this is ample for guarding the rights of their persons and their property.

We upon this coast regard this question as one of first importance, and our brethren of the East must be patient and forbearing with us if, in our anxiety to avert a great, threatened, and irrepressible evil, we are not as cool and as self-possessed as they in their safe distance from the impending blow. We stand upon the western borders of our continent—upon the shore of the ocean that looks to Asia. We see this great armada preparing to invade us. We note the proportions of an innumerable host of enemies—enemies to our religion, our civilization, our families, our material interests, our republican form of government, and our national existence. We tremble with an honest fear that every thing we hold dear and sacred is involved in an impending catastrophe. If we are hasty, passionate, unreasonable, let the people of the East remember that we are in earnest and we are honest. For thirty years we have seen this cloud growing. At first it was no bigger than a man's hand. It now darkens our horizon. It not only threatens to invade and overwhelm us, but it is upon us. The first advance guard of this "innumerable caravan" has found lodgment upon our coast. It has begun to ravage and destroy. The first to feel the wrong and to smart under the contact were our laboring poor. In their hurt they have cried out with all the passionate anger of the unreasoning brute. It was the natural outburst of passion against the giver of the blow. The middle classes who labor next felt the tooth of the wolf. The manufacturing and mechanical industries began to melt away in the presence of this patient, industrious, economical, tolling monster. Then the mercantile, property, and professional classes saw the gleaming white teeth of the hungry fiend, and when they found that the moral, social, and financial condition of the State was being imperiled they began to think and resolved to act. Political parties first, and sentimentalists last; and now everybody but the selfish, the mercenary, and the indifferent sees and realizes the danger of unlimited Chinese immigration. We attempted to sweep back this combing wave that threatened us by municipal and State legislation. We have passed inefficient, vain, useless, and foolish laws in our endeavor to cope with this invasion; we have sympathized with the passionate utterances of our defenseless working poor when they threatened to resort to violence; we have petitioned Congress; we have turned our faces to the East, as to Mecca, and prayed for legislation, for relief, for protection; we have elected Governors and State officers upon the issue; we have passed laws and secured sympathetic judges to administer them; we have passed municipal ordinances—and all this time we have done no wrong to the Chinese among us. We have protected them from the violence of ourselves. In our anger at the Chinese we have been just to the stranger. We have defended him from violence and acted as American citizens, loyal to the law. We have guarded the invader, and in all the heat, and passion, and hatred to an alien race we have disgraced our State by no riot or uprising.

We accept the blow given us by a Republican President and a Republican Cabinet, under the pressure of Republican public opinion. We think this public opinion wrong. We believe it results from ignorance, misapprehension of facts, misdirected sympathy, and a morbid, sentimental, mock piety, that is altogether unworthy an intelligent people. We feel as did the Roman citizen when, at the gates of the imperial city, the Goth and Vandal threatened their assault. We feel as the English felt when the Spanish armada threatened to sweep down upon and destroy them. We feel that in our peril we are mocked and jeered by a false and cowardly indifference in those to whom we have a right to look for aid and sympathy. We are loyal in friendship to our Eastern homes, loyal to our country. We have been mindful of our Eastern brethren when they have been overtaken by conflagrations, calamities, and war; have aided their sanitary fund, and of our abundance have freely and generously given. We are loyal still. We have not talked of secession; we have not thought of it. We resent the fact that the Eastern press should catch up the insane ravings of an alien mob of idlers, tramps, and criminals, and call it the public sentiment of the Pacific Coast. We do not dream of resorting to violence; but we do demand, in the name of humanity and a common brotherhood, that the press and politicians, statesmen and legislators, should heed our prayers, and hasten to give us protection from a danger that threatens, first to destroy us, and then to overwhelm them. We demand of the President that he take not his council from the pulpit of an ignorant church; we demand that he take his advice from no pulpit, no sectarianism, false, morbid, sentimental pietism. We demand of Roscoe Conkling, Senator from New York, that he take no thought of the interest of the merchants and moneyed classes of the metropolis he represents, nor regard the material interest of those who deal in boxes of tea and in bales of merchandise. We demand of Boston that she listen not to her preachers and traders; nor Connecticut, to her clock-makers; nor Massachusetts, to her cotton-spinners; that the Republican party give no weight to the considerations of political expediency involved in pandering to the prejudices of the religious or the sentimental; that the Democratic party be governed by some higher motive than a desire to bid for our twelve electoral votes; and that they all consider this question of Chinese immigration from the higher and broader standpoint of Christian civilization and national security.

We say to our own people, be not discouraged. We are making progress. The question that was local yesterday is national to-day. We have given it the emphasis and dignity of a passage through both houses of the National Congress. We have forced its consideration upon the pulpit of the nation, and it must preach and pray about it openly. The only path to God is through the brains, conscience, and pockets of an intelligent, thinking class; and when it sees the Chinese question in its true light, it will take quick resolve that the homes and firesides of the American people be not imperiled by this horde of male barbarians. The churches will see to it that the souls of our children be not lost in the vain hope to snatch from the wrath to come the vagabond infidels of Asia; that in the conflict between Christ and Confucius, Christ must have the aid of His own; that in the rival contests of the two civilizations, ours shall not be sacrificed; that republican government shall not be overthrown in morbid sympathy for the starving hosts of redundant Asia. We have forced this question upon the press, and it must reason it out. We have forced it upon the politicians, and they must fight it out. We have forced it upon the conscience, the thought, and intellect of the nation, and it must think it out. And if all these working forces are indifferent or neglectful, we upon this coast must give our votes and our influence to that political party that will take our view of this question, and aid us to solve it our way.

The "Passion Play" belongs to another age and to a condition of things long since passed away. It may have been proper enough in a time of ignorance and superstition, when the religious feelings could only be influenced through the exhibition of spectacular plays, music, pictures, and church pageanties; when books were found only in running brooks, and when sermons were best understood by stoning the martyrs of unbelief. It had the sanction of the church of that period, and these plays were undertaken after prayerful preparation and in a spirit of deepest devotion. Since then the world has changed, the church has changed, the stage has changed. That which to the Alpine peasant would be a spectacle of religious worship, filling his simple mind with pious ecstasy in contemplating the sublime mysteries of the life and passion of Christ, comes in these enlightened times to be but an absurd and irreverent money-making spectacle. The stage has its privileges; the church has its higher duties and responsibilities. The law can not define the boundary line between them, and only good sense and right feeling may determine where the feather-edge of amusement, pleasure, and innocent folly shades into the deeper lines of spiritual concern. While we would not encourage the church to frown upon the stage, we would not sympathize with the Reverend Doctor Smith, of the Tabernacle, in invoking the thunders of Sinai to destroy the Grand Opera House. As to the propriety of presenting this play upon the stage, we have no especial feeling. We are not prepared to admit that it would do any harm at all to those who did not go to witness it, nor work any serious injury to those who did. We do not believe it would undermine any of the eternal truths upon which the Christian church is founded. We know its author, Mr. Salmi Morse, heard his play read at the church of the Jesuit fathers, and were impressed with the beauty of the sacred story told in the elegant diction of literature. We are not convinced that the spectacular representation of scenes in the life and death of our Saviour would otherwise than beneficially impress the thoughtless who never go to churches that they may hear the story of his birth, his life, his betrayal, crucifixion, death, and resurrection. Upon this question we have no fixed opinions, and because we have none of our own we accept those of the clergy of the Christian church. If, in the opinion of religious and intelligent persons, this spectacle shall be regarded as hurtful and sacrilegious; if it wound the feelings of our Christian community, and by our Christian teachers shall be deemed of evil influence, then we say it should be withdrawn from the stage. We would respect the sensibilities of our Christian people, and in this respect allow their judgment to control ours.

We received a circular last week signed by several gentlemen, of whom we personally know but one—Mr. John P. H. Wentworth—calling attention to the desirableness of organizing to promote the immigration of the industrial classes to California. We recognize the question as important, but think immigration desirable only if confined to certain classes. After a very careful and deliberate consideration of the question in all its bearings—industrial, social, and political—it is our deliberate conviction that the less exertion we make to bring from Europe the class that is likely to respond to our invitation the better. We have convinced ourselves that our national and material welfare is not likely to be promoted by any further increase of alien people; that it is better for us, and for the future of this coast, that the influx of the pauper element of Europe be discouraged. Nearly all our social disturbances arise from this kind of immigration; and while we desire to speak kindly of and treat generously those of our adopted citizens who have sought our shores, we claim the privilege of saying that we think we have gone far enough in this direction. Without desiring to offend any, or to wound the feelings of any, we may be permitted most emphatically to declare that there is no immigration so desirable to California as an American one, and while we would put forth every exertion to bring to our coast American families from the East, the North, the South, and the Middle West, we would not encourage the coming of unassorted immigrants from every one of the European countries. We have a bad social element from Germany and from Ireland, and in view of the differences in the political, religious, and social training of these and all other Europeans, we think it in the interest of the country and the coast that the increase of their numbers be not encouraged. There are in the trans-Mississippi country nearly forty millions of people from among whom we could, by proper inducement, increase our population—persons of means, industrious, intelligent, and native born. It would improve their condition to come to us; it would add to the prosperity of our State to have them come. Any organization that will aid and encourage this class to cross over to our side of the continent we are willing to aid, and any other kind of immigration bureau, scheme, or organization has our best wishes for its failure.

Kirwin, who has been for twenty-six years in penal servitude, and was the oldest convict in Great Britain, has been released by the Government and sent to America. Thanks; we need immigration—will Great Britain accept some more bank presidents in return?

The New York Sun says San Francisco has forty weekly papers. What are the names of the other thirty-nine?

AFTERMATH.

At a Baptist conference in New York (whether full dip or sprinkle we are not informed) the Rev. Dr. Read, of California (and who he is we are not informed) entered a "protest" on the part of "Christians, and the Baptists in particular," against the "persecution" of the Chinese, and said that "all the Christians and Baptists in California favored the veto," except (with an unctuous sneer) "a Methodist, one Presbyterian, a Congregationalist, one or two Catholic priests, and one Baptist Church—which afterward repented and backed down." How many direct lies, how many of false suggestion, and how many of suppression this reverend libeler crammed into these few lines of misrepresentation let our readers compute for themselves. There is not one well-informed Christian gentleman in ten, of any church (Protestant or Catholic) in California, not one well-informed Baptist, not one religious newspaper on the coast, not one disinterested clergyman (of good standing) in any evangelical congregation, who advocates the unrestricted immigration of Mongolions to this coast.

When the Episcopal Bishop of California, than whom there is not a more devout churchman; when the Reverend Doctor Scott, of the Presbyterian Church, than whom there is not a more learned and pious clergyman in any organization; when the Catholic Archbishop and his more prominent clergy; when the Reverend Elkan Cohn, Rabbi of the Jewish Synagogue, the Reverend Mr. Noble, of the Congregationalists, and others whose names we have not before us—men of learning, piety, and influence—take position upon this question, it scarcely becomes this unknown and obscure Baptist parson to either lie about their church standing or sneer at their motives. It is just such men as we presume this hard-shell libeler to be that give reproach to the Christian church; for, because he is bigoted, ungenerous, and illiberal, we presume him to be as ignorant as he is untruthful.

His is a deliberate misrepresentation of the Christian sentiment of the Pacific coast. Good men here of all denominations, and good men who belong to none, would kindly treat and honorably deal with the Chinese among us, would protect them in their lives and pursuits, but would desire in all proper legal ways to discourage their larger immigration. This is the sentiment of the Chinese Six Companies, of the Consulate and Colonel Bee, and of intelligent Chinese themselves. We commend this buncombe Baptist to the Reverend Doctor Kallloch, who is entitled to speak for the Baptist Church of California, because he is the ablest preacher in it, has the largest congregation, and wields the greatest influence—a man of earnestness and eloquence and sound judgment. He has a newspaper, and if his congregation has "repented and backed down" upon this proposition we shall be interested to know it.

And then comes the Reverend Henry Ward Beecher, whose visit to California gave him a net profit of $25,000. We know of only one apostle who ever made a tenth part so much money for betraying his master, and he had the decency to go and hang himself. This fat and oily man of God, Beecher, addressed three thousand people in Philadelphia in strong defense of the pigtails, in misrepresenting popular sentiment on this coast, in holding up to ridicule and contempt our people, in abusing the white working men and women and contrasting them with the Chinese—pronounced the Chinese a "blessing" to the country, and declared that the only opposition to the Chinese is because they can not vote. We declare that it is our confident belief that the Chinese have done more to debauch our youth than any other thing, except one, in the last generation; and that one thing is the nasty, indecent, and demoralizing details of the Henry Ward Beecher scandal trial. From such men, preachers though they be, we decline to receive our religious or our political teachings.

Jefferson wrote: "I served with General Washington in the Legislature of Virginia before the Revolution, and during it with Dr. Franklin in Congress. I never heard either of them speak ten minutes at a time, nor to any but the main point, which was to decide the question. They laid their shoulders to the great points, knowing that the little ones would follow of themselves." Through civility to the members of the Constitutional Convention we have withheld this quotation until after adjournment. Why should we emphasize their inferiority in one respect to men whom they so excel in others. George Washington could not tell a lie; it is obvious that Beerstretcher can. Benjamin Franklin could draw lightning only from the clouds; Vacquerel can draw it from a bottle.

It is curious to observe that the persons who are loudest in condemning the newspapers for meddling with their personal or domestic affairs, when the meddling takes the form of censure, are the persons who most persistently scheme, bargain, and beg for it if it will take the form of praise. The man who runs to an editor to get a puff of his new house, his picture from the East, or his rare edition of Erasmus, would raise the demon's own delight if the editor, of his own motion, should choose to say that the house was a fright, the painting a fraud, or the volume a fac-simile reprint. Similarly, a newspaper may say—indeed is frequently importuned and even paid to say—that a certain lady at a ball was "lovely in a thingamy dress machichiolated with cardinal flambanikins cut agonywise," and it is all right; but let it say she was hideous in a dowdy costume, and how the fond husband will lay back, the top of his head and howl! The good people who love newspaper notoriety forget that in recognizing an editor's right to say anything about their personal character and private affairs they concede his right to say of them whatever he may think fit.

The bearing of these remarks lies in the application of 'em. Let it be understood that we are not averse at this office to puffing all our friends and our friends' friends, exalting all their belongings and affirming the incomparable superiority of their ways to the ways of mortals—when we are in the mood. But let it not be overlooked that by so doing we consider ourselves to have purchased and paid for the right to tell a different story at another time. The right to condemn is coextensive with the right to commend, and if invited into the domestic circle to bless we shall not hesitate to go in there and curse. These are the hard but just conditions on which the favor of public flattery will be accorded to private persons in this journal.

Just the least bit of political bosh was enacted in the Senate of the United States over the proposition to pension Jefferson Davis. A few Southern gentlemen had opportunity to air their cherished devotion to the lost cause over the name of its martyr chief. The rebel and perjured traitor did not get his pension. We feel very kind, and very generous, and very indulgent toward our erring brethren of the lost cause, but we claim the right to indulge ourselves in the luxury of keeping ever green our hatred to the memory of Jefferson Davis. We have embalmed it with Judas Iscariot, Guy Fawkes, Benedict Arnold, and the devil. We can't forgive everybody.

The practice of the law has fallen to such infinite depths, and so many illiterate shysters have through one device and another crawled within its portals, that we see no reason why respectable women of good attainments may not be admitted to practice. The legal profession has reached a point where there is no possible danger of its further demoralization. We vote for the crinoline.

On several evenings of the present week there has been produced at one of our principal theatres a play that has more strongly fixed public attention than any play ever acted in California—a play upon the merit and morality of which opinions differed as widely as the limits of thought allowed, and which addressed the strongest feelings of human nature. Two newspapers in this city, which habitually criticise plays, appear to have known nothing of this one—did not discover that it had been put upon the stage, were unaware that anybody had been to see it. It was not advertised in their columns—they did not permit it to be. Now, what are the Bulletin and the Call?—they are certainly not newspapers.

The Bulletin and Call, that is to say, do not advertise anything which has not their sanction, do not relate anything of the occurrence of which they disprove. Ergo, they do approve of "magnetic healing," fortune telling, abortion, quack doctoring, and "procuring"—for all these things they advertise. They do approve of murder, arson, theft, swindling, adultery, and rape, for all these things they recount with minute particularity. On the whole, are Messrs. Fitch and Pickering any better as moral protectors of the public than they would be as purveyors of news?

The subject of the Passion Play has sent the writer of this paragraph to a diary which he kept some years ago while living in Coventry, England, where these singular dramas were once performed, and he finds copied into it an entry from the books of a pious manager of that distant day and place: "Paid for a Cote for God and a payre of Gloves, 3 shillings."

In a miracle play once popular in Coventry one of the Magi, approaching the sacred manger, not only removes his hat but presents it to the infant Saviour. Another, not to be outdone in piety, gives the mittens from his hands—the plays were brought out at Christmastide in Coventry, in the open air, and it was cold work; while a third takes the pipe out of his teeth and gives that, the Divine Babe accepting and smoking it with great apparent satisfaction. This, we venture to think, was going a little too far; for, even in that golden age of Art the moral sensibilities demanded recognition, and the æsthetic merits of the play could not wholly overcome the natural scruples of those who did not favor the use of tobacco.

Perhaps the most valid objection that can be urged against Mr. Morse's play, as performed at the Grand Opera House, is that when one has seen a certain part well played by a certain actor there always thereafter exists in the mind a confusion of identity between the character in the play and the person who played it. There are few theatre-goers to-day who can think of "Hamlet" apart from Mr. Edwin Booth, or figure to themselves a "Rip Van Winkle" who does not resemble Mr. Joseph Jefferson. Now, it would be no end awkward and embarrassing if a frequenter of the Grand Opera House, dying in the odor of Passion Play sanctity and entering heaven, should be moved to exclaim, "Why, Jimmy O'Neill, old boy, I didn't expect to see you here!"—and—and it should not be Jimmy!

Mr. Adair Welcker is the author of a new volume of Oakland verses—A Voyage with Death and Other Poems—one of the others being conspicuously entitled "Memoræ." It is an Oaklandish word, the meaning whereof we imperfectly apprehend. There is a spirited effort to revive failing religious animosities in the first stanza of "The Mountain Meadows Massacre:"

"Sweet Muses from the plain of heaven,
Let inspiration now be given;
Down, on the star's soft ray of light,
Speak to me, through the gloom of night;
For there is done a deed so dark,
That on black night would leave a mark."

In the words italicized the reader will hail (with pleasure, we hope) an old acquaintance in a new dress; all have heard of the darky who was so black that charcoal would make a white mark on him—an idea which is itself a refinement on Milton's "new morn risen on midday;" or perhaps it is "midnoon"—having our Welcker we do not need our Milton.

We have not space for that elaborate review of Mr. Welcker's work which it will no doubt receive from the Nation, the Atlantic, the Saturday Review, the Athenæum, and the Bulletin, but at least we can not forbear to get ahead of Psalm Williams in pointing out the beauty of the following passage:

"But hush!
I hear some church bell in yon white-earthed moon
Call out in ringing melody the hour
Marked three o'clock, upon the black-faced night!
Then I'll to bed, and rest worn thought on dreams."

It is true we do not know what this means, but neither do we catch the exact and accurate significance of a cabbage rose, or the mystic wail of the night-blooming tomat. Beauty exists in and for itself, is its own reward, stands on its own bottom, and doesn't give a darn.

Mr. Adair Welcker, you can not write poetry, nor anything that is like poetry. You have mistaken an unconstructed liking for the jingle of verse for a capacity to produce something with which that has no more necessary connection than has a picture with its frame, or a woman with her clothes. Stop writing in metre (even your metre is hideously incorrect) and devote the time so saved to the acquisition of skill in some simple parlor game like Simon-says-thumbs-up. It will be of greater benefit to the world, will bring as much money and less ridicule to yourself, and be a strong recommendation to the mercy of whatever deities are justly offended by your ill-advised attempt to scale the serene Olympus that you fancy a mole-hill.

Our Minister to England is a Mr. Welsh, a sugar refiner of Philadelphia, who was sent to London, having for his sole qualification the fact that he was rich. He now complains that his salary of $17,500 is insufficient to maintain him "genteelly." The former Minister eked out an insufficient compensation by poker, a game which our present ambassador does not understand. What Mr. Welsh has done to earn the $17,500 salary he now receives, we have never heard. He may acquire poker, live more economically, or resign. We know a good poker player that would cheerfully take his place.

A man in Mississippi who wanted a pair of postal routes sent two dollars to the Postmaster-General and promised to pay the same amount yearly if he secured the routes. It is creditable to this Administration that the bribe was loftily refused.

Somebody has collected "a mass of evidence" proving that the late Peter Ney, of North Carolina, was no other than Marshal Ney, of France. The histories of the two men—we say two for convenience—are absolutely identical up to the year 1815, when the Marshal was publicly shot to death in the garden of the Luxembourg palace, at Paris; from then down to the time of Pete's death in 1846 there was just sufficient apparent divergence to give a color of plausibility to the arguments of the doubters—who will now, however, be covered with confusion by the "mass of evidence."

Lindsey Muse is a messenger in the Navy Department at Washington, and has been ever since 1828. He is old now and can not take a very active part in political affairs, but his petition to the successor of the present Secretary of the Navy to be retained is receiving a good many signatures, and his chances are about as good as the average. Lindsey's memory is not so good as it used to be, but happily his voice is a little cracked and disobedient, and when he hurrah on the wrong side—as, having served all parties so often, he sometimes does—he is thought to be coughing or choking, and is not reported for dismissal. Lindsey who want his place there is, of course, the chief of all resign.

REMINISCENCES OF CENTRAL AMERICA.

Hule y Huleros.

"Chico," said I to Paniaguas one morning, as we sat on the stoop of the hotel at Greytown, indolently dispersing the aroma of our puros, "van a salir luego algunos huleros?"

"No sé, señor."

"What say you, Chico, to our making a trip into the bush with the next party that starts on a rubber-cutting expedition?"

"Me gustaria mucho," was his reply, as I well knew it would be.

"Well, will you find out when the next boats leave, and try and make arrangements for us to go with them? See what they'll charge for us and our provisions and traps. You can tell them, Chico, that we want to go into the woods hunting for a month or two, and shall in no way be competitors in their business."

Chico was off with alacrity. He was a good rubber-cutter himself, and had often described to me the method employed in extracting the "milk" from the tree and converting it into the corresponding article of commerce; had narrated to me incidents of flood and field that occur during expeditions into remote forest recesses, never entered but by the prospecting hulero; had told of rapids to be passed, and capsize therein; of the wild-hog hunt; of the tapir and manati; and had curdled my blood with stories of innumerable yaros of unnumbered snakes. But I wanted to see these things for myself, particularly the production of rubber.

In an hour he returned with the news that three dug-outs would leave in a day or two for the Rio Sudio, and that the party would take us with them for $40, we to provide ourselves with all necessities. The next day was spent in preparation, and the following morning at day-break we were off up the San Juan. The explorers were nine in number, making a total with ourselves of eleven in all; and a more motley group, numbers considered, could hardly be found. The Negro, the Anglo-Saxon, the Carib, the Nicaraguan half-breed, and the piebald Mosquito Indian were all represented. I know of no epithet that describes more aptly than "piebald" the appearance of great numbers of the Mosquito Indians, and even of many of the natives of Central America outside this race; such specimens being mottled with large patches of a darker, or it may be lighter, shade than the prevailing ground color of their skins. Their canoes were loaded, though not too heavily, with provisions and the paraphernalia of their calling. There was flour in half-barrels, beans, rice, plantains, salt, coffee, sugar, lard, tins of biscuit and hard-bake, and demijohns of cut-throat; some salt pork and beef, though not in a quantity proportionate to the other stores. Rubber-cutters depend in a great measure upon river and forest to supply them with other than farinaceous food; and fish, and wild hog, deer and iguana, turkey, tapir, mountain hen, armadillo, parrot—or even the ubiquitous monkey, when these fail—contribute in turn to their bill of fare while in the bush. There were buckets and tins, calabashes, pan-nikins, kettles, frying-pans, an iron pot, tin plates, blankets, mosquito bars, an axe, machetes, rusty guns, fish spears, hooks and lines, small shot, buckshot, bullets, and powder horns; every provision, in fact, for work or repose, and the capture of fish, flesh, and fowl.

The first day we paddled about twenty miles. Oars are never used, except on the clumsy bungoes that ply up and down the river to and from the inland lakes of Nicaragua. The nude galley-slave crews of these unwieldy crafts can not, while ascending, get near enough the sides to avail themselves of the moderated current and back eddies, but have to labor, well out in the river, at oar and pole, or by sinking anchors some distance ahead slowly and tediously haul their vessels up stream. Any reader, who may happen to have been on the San Juan in the days of the Transit Company, will recall to mind its densely wooded banks, with occasional plain patches appearing here and there; and their cane shanties, thatched with palm leaves, and shaded by the thick mango or luxuriant bread-fruit tree. He will recollect, too, its turbid water, deep and rapid stream in the rainy season; or, if he made the passage during the dry months, its narrow, shallow channel, winding its tortuous course among mud-banks and sand-beds. In the latter case, he will doubtless grimly bear in mind the steamer's running aground, backing off, then getting aground again, and finally sticking fast for good. He will not forget, moreover, the patience and Christian resignation of the passengers, their good humor and pious ejaculations, the emphatic compliments they paid the company and I. C. Wood, their agent, for their enterprise, energy, and management; nor, lastly, his own triumphal entry into Greytown in a bungo or canoe.

Having passed the night in one of the shanties alluded to above, protected by our mosquito-bars against the sanguinary insect foe, we reached the mouth of the Rio Sudio shortly after noon the following day. The stream is a tributary of the Serapiqui, joining it a few miles above that river's influence into the San Juan. It derives its name, "Dirty Water," from the muddy color of its water which, at ordinary and low stages, bears a marked contrast with the more limpid stream of the Serapiqui, and can be distinctly traced in its course through it down to the San Juan, where it loses its individuality in the great volume of the latter. As we ascended it, its banks rose higher and higher above us, and drew nearer and nearer to each other. We are now in solitude with nature, and shall see none but those of our own party for the next two months. On each side of us the enormous trees stretch out their gigantic arms to greet each other, as it were, across the narrowing water, and we make our way through alcoves and under canopies of perennial verdure. From the loftiest branches hang garlands and festoons of leaves and flowers in endless variety of color and design. Perfumed orchids scent the air, flocks of gay parrots and glistening paroquets scream overhead as they pass by in rapid flight, and gaudy macaws, on slower wing, utter their hoarse protest against our intrusion, or hold noisy council in the neighboring woods. The silent crane, disturbed in his occupation as we turn the bends, rises heavily before us. Troops of monkeys jabber and yell from the limbs of the wild fig-tree, and mow at us from among the foliage like quickened gargoyles; while ever and anon the hasty tramp and snap of the unseen wild hog are heard in the thick underwood. But these are sights and sounds far to our rubber-cutters, and they have work to do compared with which their previous toil has been but child's play. The river has become harder and harder to ascend, and progress is slow. The men are incessantly in and out of the canoes as it narrows and expands in width, now plying paddle and pole with the utmost strength against a rapid, now laboriously dragging their boats across shoals and sand-bars. Snags have to be cleared away, passages cut through prostrate trees, while falls and impracticable places must be surmounted by unloading and carrying both freight and canoes to favorable points above them. The hulero's occupation is no easy one, but this portion of it is by far the most laborious, toiling as he does all day in the heat of a burning sun, or in a deluge of rain, and seeking his rest at night on sand-banks or in the wet bush. When arrived at the ground he selects for his operations his work is still trying, and attended with exposure to sickness and accidents from falls and cuts. He roams great distances from camp in quest of the tree he is in search of, cutting his way through otherwise impenetrable thickets, in peril of the lurking snake at every step he takes. His greatest danger, indeed, is from these reptiles, whether he treads on terra firma or climbs aloft among the branches to tap the trees he finds. In some localities they actually swarm, and rubber-cutters will not infrequently kill in such places as many as fifty or sixty in a few minutes. Working, moreover, for weeks together in drenching rain and a hot-house atmosphere, these men have to contend against damp and malaria; and fever, ague, and diarrhoea are foes ever on the alert to attack them. After two days' struggle from dawn to night-fall the indications were favorable. Examination of the few rubber trees that appeared here and there near the banks now showed that they had never been tapped, proving that the ground we had arrived at had not been visited. It was, therefore, decided on the morning of our fifth day from Greytown to pitch camp, and preparations for a lengthened stay were at once commenced. The first thing to be done was the erection of temporary shanties. It is astonishing how rapidly these weather-proof dwellings are thrown up by men accustomed to pass much of their time in the bush. The forest and river-banks supply every requisite—bi-forked corner posts, poles for rafters and roof frame-work, palm and other leaves for thatch, tall strong canes for sides and ends, and the never-failing bejuco with which to lash and fasten all firmly together. This last most serviceable plant is a creeper found everywhere in the woods. It climbs the loftiest trees, and hangs pendant from the branches down to the ground in straight, unbroken, and leafless lengths of every thickness, from that of a boy's top-string to a cable's. On account of its strength and durability, bejuco is of the greatest use in that country to all whose occupation sends them into the bush. The mahogany, rubber, and dye-wood cutters, the sarsaparilla gatherers, and the settlers on the river-banks, all alike avail themselves of it. Tenements are built with it, fences tied, and parcels and packages of all sizes made up with it; it serves, in fact, every purpose of rope, cord and pack thread. In a few hours three shanties were thrown up, provided with cane-stretchers for beds. The boats were unloaded and hauled into secure positions. There is no trouble in crossing the now insignificant stream, yet, if a freshet occur, it may rise thirty feet in a single night and become a rushing torrent, sweeping away all before it. The remainder of the day was passed in well-earned indolent repose, and on the following morning the party commenced operations.

From this time to that of our return the daily routine was unchanged. The men were busily occupied in prospecting and working in the woods, always in company, two or three together, or in the manufacture of the rubber. They would carry home the juice from the trees near at hand to convert it in camp, while they operated upon that obtained at remote distances on the spot. The rubber, or caoutchouc, tree attains to a great size at full age, having a girth of from fifteen to even twenty feet. Its trunk is fluted, as it were, near the ground, throwing out supporting buttress-like flanges, which commence at a height of six or eight feet, gradually widen out toward their bases, and terminate in massive lateral roots, extending, only partially buried, for some distance on the surface. Virgin trees will yield from ten to twenty-five gallons of juice—according to size and time of tapping. Rubber-cutters are unanimous in the assertion that the tree bleeds better when the moon is rising to the full than when on the wane. The juice, which has the appearance of cream, and is called the "milk," or leche in Spanish, is obtained from the bark, which in full-grown trees is from three to four inches. They bleed the trunk, and main limbs which are thrown out at some height from the ground, the workman availing himself of the pendent bejuco, or making ladders with it to enable him to use his machete with the necessary skill. Formerly it was the practice to girdle the tree with a spiral, wedge-shaped channel, cut downward into and through the bark. But this method of girdling proved to be very destructive, generally killing the tree, and the less wasteful plan of cross-ribbing is now generally adopted, since the tree, under this system, in time recovers of its wounds, and will sustain a second, third, and even fourth bleeding, though yielding less and less juice on each occasion.

The "milk," following the course of the channel, is conducted by small tin spouts, driven into the tree near the ground, to the receiving vessels, into which it flows in a stream.

Rubber, as shipped from the Atlantic ports of Central America, is in three forms—the torta or cake, the cucro or hide, and the "pickings," the torta being largely in excess as to quantity. The two first classes are manufactured. The last requires no preparation other than washing and cleaning, being the rubber that forms naturally on the wounds of the trees by the slow exudation of the sap after the milk has been extracted, and which, as implied by the name, is picked off when sufficiently dry. Most of it is gathered by the workmen just before their final departure, and comes off in rough, ragged strips and broken lumps. The torta is manufactured by the aid of a ground creeper generally to be found in the neighborhood of the rubber tree. The tendrils and leaves of this plant, after being well bruised, are soaked in water for the necessary length of time. When the sub-acid extraction thus obtained is of the required strength, it is mixed in proper proportion with the rubber milk, which it turns into curds and whey. The curds are strained and rolled out into flat oval cakes, a quarter of an inch thick and about two pounds in weight each. These are then hung out on bejuco lines under cover to dry, when they soon change from white to black by exposure to the air. It is considered that a gallon of milk yields two pounds of hule.

The above method is always employed, when practicable, on account of the quickness with which the milk can be turned into rubber. In localities, however, where the necessary vine cannot be found, the slower process of making cucros has to be resorted to. It is as follows: The milk is put into barrels, or any suitable vessel, and mixed with water in the proportion of one-third of the former to two of the latter. The mixture is well stirred up together and then allowed to rest. In twelve hours or so the servicable portion of the juice has risen to the surface in the form of a thick cream, much of its aqueous ingredient having been extracted. The water is now let off by a trap at the bottom of the vessel, the flow being stopped immediately upon the appearance of the milk. In the meantime, shallow rectangular pits, about three inches deep, have been formed in suitable spots, a sandy soil being always selected for their site if possible. Roofs of palm leaves are built over them as a protection against the frequent and heavy showers that fall on the Atlantic side of the Cordilleras, even during the dry season. Into these pits the rubber cream is poured and no further attention given to it, absorption and evaporation slowly converting it into slabs of caoutchouc about half an inch thick, which have obtained the name of cucros, and only require to be washed before being submitted to the hypercritical examination of the merchant who may become their purchaser.

After eight weeks' successful work our supply of provisions was well-nigh exhausted, and all ripe pickings having been gathered in, we left with loaded boats and a favorable height of water for Greytown, making the return trip in a day and a half. The whole distance we had gone did not exceed a hundred miles. On arrival at port, our huleros at once dispose of their rubber, pay their debts, and proceed to enjoy themselves, as long as the balance of their cash lasts, in the customary recreations of gambling and imbibition; which duties to themselves and the commercial interests of the town having been faithfully discharged, they will again betake themselves to the woods, para ganar plata, to enable them to repeat their display of the warm interest they take in the promotion of other people's wealth.

SAN FRANCISCO, March, 1879. ROBT. D. MILNE.

The New York Weekly Dispatch presents the following information concerning a literary character of whom little is known further than his name—which is commonly mispronounced—and his resemblance to "Eli Perkins" in the matter of veracity: "Baron Hieronymus Karl Friedrich von Munchausen was a German soldier, born at Bodenwerder, Hanover, in 1720. He passed his youth as a cavalry officer in the Russian Army, and spent his latter days in Hanover. He delighted in narrating the most wonderful stories of his adventures in the campaign against the Turks in 1737-39, and thereby gained the reputation of being one of the greatest liars who ever lived. The stories were repeated from one end of the country to the other, and created great universal merriment. They are said to have been first compiled by Rudolph Eric Raspe, a man of letters, who, being compelled to flee from Cassel to England on account of a charge of embezzlement, was engaged in London in literary pursuits, and is generally believed to have published anonymously an English edition of the stories under the title of 'Baron Munchausen's Narrative of His Marvelous Travels and Campaigns in Russia' (London, 1785.) Many of the wondrous stories are traced to other stories." Munchausen died in Hanover in 1797.

Each finger has its distinctive and its individual habits. The third finger, which has less independent motion than either of the others, has the compensating honor of being the ring finger; and Dr. Humphrey believes it owes its honor to its deficiency, and not, as tradition tells, to the belief of the ancients, that it is connected by some particular nerve with the heart, so more readily to convey or receive sympathetic impressions. "It can not," he says, "be bent or straightened much without being accompanied by one or both of those next to it. This is partly because its exterior tendon is connected by means of a band of fibres with the tendon on either side of it. You may discern these connecting bands working up and down under the skin on the back of the hand when you move the fingers to and fro. The ring finger is therefore always more or less protected by the other fingers; and it owes to this circumstance a comparative immunity from injury, as well, probably, as the privilege of being selected especially to bear the ring in matrimony. The left hand is chosen for a similar reason, a ring placed upon it being less likely to be damaged than it would be upon the right hand."

A newspaper correspondent tells of a Boston school-girl of thirteen years of age, who, with her strap of school-books on her arm, sat reading in the horse-car a book called the Demon's Bride, or Wedded to Her Doom. It had this touching motto: "Hast thou suffered? If not, this book is not for thee."

Miss Helen is just six years old. Her uncle bought her some New Year's presents.

"Embrace me, at least," he said.

The child kissed him and then said: "Gracious, how I spoil you!"

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, March 9, 1879.

Soup.—Giblet, with Leeks.
Smelts a l'Espagnole (see No. 5, Vol. I).
Fried New Potatoes.
Lamb Chops, Force of Tomatoes.
Fried Parsnip Cakes.
Roast Turkey, Currant Jelly.
Cabbage Salad.
Ital an Cream.
Wine Jelly.
Fruit-bowl of Apples, Pears, Bananas, and Oranges in sections.
To MAKE GIBLET SOUP WITH LEEKS.—Parboil two giblets either of turkey or goose. Save the livers for further use. Wipe, pare, and divide them into small pieces; put them into a stewpan with three ounces of butter; fry long enough to evaporate the moisture; drain off the butter, add two pints of beef stock (clear), and one pint of water, a small head of celery, bunch of parsley, and the whites of six large leeks. Boil until well cooked, remove the leeks, strain the soup, cut the leeks into inch lengths, return to the soup. Parboil the livers, cut into slices, and add to the soup when serving.

INTAGLIOS.

Good-Bye, Sweetheart.

Good-bye, sweetheart! Nay, stand there still!
Let these last moments have their fill
Of tender looks, so dainty sweet
Pale snow and pearly rose-tints meet
On this dear face; so softly lies
My last kiss, fragrant, blossom-wise
Across the lips that still would sigh
'Neath kiss and flower: Sweetheart, good-bye!

Good-bye, sweetheart! Your cheek is pale;
Hush, listen forth! The nightingale
His song the salt of Love's salt tears
Kept through the world's long lapse of years—
Weeps mutely into perfect flower
The rose that drooped in yonder bower.
An hour to love—an hour to die;
O Rose of my heart's young dreams, good-bye!

O fitful heart, that used to be Tender with Love's young truth to me!
Dear heart, sweet heart, that all day long
Once matched the sparrows' spring-time song,
Now waxing, waning, sigh by sigh,
Pass on, poor heart; proud heart, good-bye!

Not yet? not go? Oh, false, good-bye!
Oh, sweet-shamed lips—oh, dear blue eyes!
Look up, lean on me; faring so,
Forth to the world, sweetheart, I'll go,
By primrose paths that upward lie
Till death shall cross life's latest sigh.
Breathing with blessing farewell low—
Good-bye—good-bye!

—Springfield Republican.

My Heart, I Can Not Still It.

My heart, I can not still it,
Is a nest with song-birds in it;
And when the last shall go,
The dreary days, to fill it,
Instead of lark or linnet
Will bring dead leaves and snow.

And were they sparrows only,
Without the passion stronger
Of joy that soars and sings,
Woe's me, I shall be lonely
When I can feel no longer
The impatience of their wings.

ANONYMOUS.

Mnemosyne.

Time, near 2:30; scene, the parlor car
That brought us here. "I was at the Hartford station
We noted first a bright, particular star,
"A dame, whose bearing, staid our admiration.
"Perchance," we thought, "she comes from parts afar
To view the sacred places of our nation.
Perchance, like some Elektra or Antigone,
Has wept above the urn of Mrs. Sigourney."
Even thus we thought, so classical her mien,
And worn with such a Grecian grace her raiment.
She took her seat beside a queen,
Began to chat as if she there to stay meant—
Soon gave her card, the which when I had seen
I judged my wife and said: "Our friendship's claimant,
It seems, the morganatic wife of Zeus is—Mnemosyne, the mother of the muses!"
Then spoke aloud: "What errand to our land
Has brought you, madame, over Neptune's waters?"
"A quest," she said, "you scarcely understand,
Recalling the sad story of my daughters,
Torn from their ancient shrines, a hapless band,
And scattered far in search of other quarters;
Poor things! since then, in many realms and ages,
I've sought them with a grief that naught assuages!"
E. C. STEEDMAN.

Forget-me-not.

The East Wind sprang into a lovely place,
And cried: "I'll slay the flowers and leave no trace
Of all their blooming in this happy spot!"
And, as before his breath the sweet flowers died,
One little bright-eyed blossom moaned and cried:
"O woods! I forget me not! I forget me not!"

"O woods of waving trees! O living streams!
In all your noon-tide joys and starry dreams,
Let me, for love, let me be unforgotten;
O birds that sing your carols while I die,
O list to me! O hear my piteous cry—
Forget me not! alas! I forget me not."

And the gods heard her plaint and swept away
The bitter, fanned, strong East Wind from his prey,
And smiled upon the flower and changed her lot.
So now that, as we mark her azure leaf,
We think of life and love and parting grief,
And sigh forget me not! forget me not!
DR. JOYCE.

Mortality.

How do the roses die?
Do their leaves fall together,
Thrown down and scattered by the sky
Of angry weather?
No, the sad thunder-stroke
O'erwhelms their lowly bower;
The storm that tramples on the oak
Relents above the flower.

No violence makes them grieve,
No wrath hath done them wrong,
When with sad secrecy they leave
The branch to which they clung.
They yield them, one by one,
To the light breeze and shower,
To the soft dew, cool shade, bright sun,
Time, and the hour.
J. S. D.

At the Convent Gate.

Wisteria blossoms trail and fall
Above the length of barrier wall;
And softly, now and then,
The shy, staid-breasted doves will flit
From roof to gateway-top, and sit
And watch the ways of men.

The gate's ajar. If one might peep!
Ah, what a haunt of rest and sleep
The shadowy garden seems!
And note how dimly to and fro
The grave, grey-hooded Sisters go,
Like figures seen in dreams.

Look, there is one that tells her beads;
And yonder one apart that reads
A tiny missal's page;
And see, beside the well, the two
That, kneeling, strive to lure anew
The magpie to its cage!

Not beautiful—not all! But each
With that mild grace, outlying speech,
Which comes of even blood:
The veil unseen that women wear
With heart-whole thought, and quiet care,
And hope of higher good.

"A placid life—a peaceful life!
What need to these the name of Wife?
What gentler task," I said,
What worthier—e'en your arts among—
Than tend the sick, and teach the young,
And give the hungry bread?"

"No worthier task!" re-echoes she,
Who, closely clinging, leans with me
To face the road again;
And yet, in that warm heart of hers,
She means the doves, for she prefers
To "watch the ways of men."
ACSTIN DOBSON.

ABOUT WOMEN.

Rose Terry Cooke, in her childhood, used to have to commit to memory every day a column of Walker's Dictionary.

It is a very kindly and proper thing when a man asks, "Will you give me your hand?" to reply,
"With all my heart, sir."

Pocahontas is to have a monument. Up to the present time there has not been so much as a tablet
by the tomb at Gravesend, where she lies.

A gushy correspondent (Washington, of course) describes Gail Hamilton as "an unassuming, rosy, girlish, witty, wise, gentle, and friendly lady."

Mrs. John J. Astor has, at her own expense, during the past ten years, secured homes and the means of a good livelihood for some 450 homeless children, at a cost of about $67,000.

The Countess de Trobriand, who is an American, is also very patriotic. At her recent reception in Paris she furnished her refreshment table exclusively with American viands, and made her guests all sick.

Miss Juliet Carson, the other day, conveyed through Fulton Market, New York, a bevy of young women, and among the meat and fish stands gave them a practical lesson in the art of buying household supplies.

Rebecca at the well wore a nose-ring—not earrings. "I put the ring upon her nose and bracelets upon her hands," the Hebrew reads, though the Septuagint and the Vulgate have an incorrect rendering, which is followed by the Authorized Version.

A new economy in fashionable female society is knitting—not woolen socks and mittens; but silk stockings, in all the new, delicate, and ravishing shades. One spool of the silk costs two dollars and fifty cents. It takes four or five spools to knit a pair of stockings.

A Washington correspondent, whose coat-of-arms is a cherry tree and a little hatchet, writes that a woman in that city is so proud, and elevates her nose to such an altitude when passing a treasury girl, that she frequently has the skin scraped off that organ by coming in contact with the telegraph wire.

A woman lecturer advertises herself in Providence as a "child of nature, wearing the unmistakable crown of genius, and doing her share in the ever-appointed work of genius—the work of making the whole world kin. She brings with her the electricity of the North, the brilliancy of the aurora borealis, and all who meet her are magnetized."

An unknown, but evidently married, paragrapher says when a woman combs her back hair into two ropes, holds one in her mouth until she winds the other upon her tuck comb, and then finds that she has lost her last hair pin, she feels that the sex needs two mouths—one to hold the hair in and the other to make remarks with.

A writer in the Woman's Journal complains of meeting in Boston young ladies reduced to the appearance of idiocy by a peculiar method of combing the hair down over the forehead, familiarly known as "banging," and asks: "Is it a protest against being considered strong-minded that the young women thus assume what is evidently copied from the lunatic asylums?"

A young negro woman in New Orleans has phrenomenally big and ill-shaped feet. She was induced by a photographer to sit for a portrait, and, after several trials, he gave her a picture that she carried away with delight. A few days later she ascertained his real motive, for she saw a life-sized view of her feet displayed for sale in the stores. She has instituted a suit for damages.

According to a London journal, at least one of the tastes of the ladies of ancient Rome would appear to be shared by some of the ladies at Aldershot, and they gratify it by visiting the gymnasium there during the morning hours of work, scrutinizing the athletic deeds of officers and soldiers with a keenness not at all abated by the fact that the dress, etc., of these men are not intended for woman's eyes. Have the curious virgins and critical matrons who attend the exhibitions of our Olympic Club ever been pained to observe a similar indecency in one another?

The beauty of the evening at a large ball recently given by Queco Margaret of Italy was pronounced to be the Marquise Villeneuve, who, although over 40, and a grandmother, attracted universal admiration.
Queen Margaret, dressed in a white gown with a cherry sash, danced, among others, with that high official, Signor Minghetti, who, not being versed in the accomplishment, made so many mistakes and caused so much amusement, that the quadrille could not be danced out, and terminated rather abruptly.
King Humbert coughed often, did not dance, and retired early.

A gentleman met an old woman to whom he was in the habit of giving alms, and finding her in distress, asked her what was the matter. "What's the matter, your honor? I'm a ruined woman, that's what's the matter. My little grandchild, Jimmy, the baby was blind and had the sweet face, and that I've begged with on my arms so long, and never saw the day he wasn't worth three francs, is"—and great sobs choked her utterance. "Is dead?" said the gentleman, kindly. "Dead! Divil the luck. His eyes is cured, and for business purposes he's ruined entirely. Och, wirasthu—ventrebille!"

A widow in Brussels, having lost one of her eyes through an accident, caused it to be replaced by an artificial eye of glass. There would, of course, have been nothing remarkable in this if the new eye had been glass and nothing more. But the lady was not content with an ordinary feature, and "out of a spirit of coquetry, and with a view of giving greater brilliancy to the eyeball," she had it set in diamonds at a considerable cost. The fame of the precious eye not only spread throughout Brussels, but even attracted to the widow's side a skillful adventurer from Paris, who finally stole it out of its socket when it and its mate were asleep.

PRESIDENT COFFEE,

PURE MOCHA COFFEE,

PURE JAVA COFFEE,

Ground to order at

LORING'S

Dealer in choice

JAPAN AND BLACK

TEAS

922 Market St.,

Between Stockton and Powell Streets, near the Baldwin.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS,

REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 510 SACRAMENTO STREET.

RARE ENGRAVINGS,
MODERN ETCHINGS.

VISITORS WILL BE ALWAYS

welcome to inspect collection.

W. K. VICKERY,

22 Montgomery Street, opposite the Lick House.

JENNINGS S. COX.....OLIVER TEALL.

COX, TEALL & CO.,

REAL ESTATE AGENTS AND
AUCTIONEERS, 303 Montgomery Street, under
the Nevada Bank, San Francisco.Auction Salesroom, H. M. NEWHALL & CO., 309, 311
and 313 Sansome Street.

J. O. ELDRIDGE, Auctioneer.

ANDREW ONDERDONK, Civil Engineer.

C. O. DEAN, D.D.S.....F. M. HACKETT.

HACKETT & DEAN,

DENTISTS, Latham's Building, 126
Kearny Street, San Francisco.
Office hours from 8 A. M. until 5 P. M.

WM. F. SMITH, M. D.,

OCULIST.

HAS RETURNED TO THIS CITY,
and will resume practice immediately. Consultation Rooms as before, No. 331 BUSH STREET.
Office hours, from 12 M. to 3 P. M.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office
and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11
A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

DR. JAS. M. HUTCHINS,

DENTIST, REMOVED TO 737 MARket Street, opposite Dupont.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST,
removed to 200 STOCKTON ST., cor. Geary, S. F.

ELECTRIC BELTS,

A sure cure for nervous debility, premature decay, exhaustion, etc. The only reliable cure. Circulars mailed
free. Address J. K. REEVES, 43 Chatham Street, N. Y.

NOOK FARM.

THIS PLEASANT COUNTRY

HOME is now open for the reception of visitors.
Important additions and improvements have been made since last season, which add greatly to the comfort and pleasure of guests. The same good cheer and home surroundings will be found in the future as in the past.Remember that the pleasantest part of the year in the country is the spring and early summer.
For particulars, address
E. B. SMITH,
Rutherford, Napa County.

DOMESTIC SERVANTS.

JAPANESE and CHINESE Servants of all kinds will be speedily furnished by the undersigned, who, having had seven years' experience, feel confident of being able to give satisfaction in all cases. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to call and leave orders. PIERCE & SON, 609 Sacramento Street, up stairs, San Francisco.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

ALBERT BELANGER, plaintiff, vs. MARY BELAN-

GER, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.The People of the State of California send greeting to MARY BELANGER, defendant:You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named plaintiff, in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days;
otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.The said action is brought to obtain a decree of divorce dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between the plaintiff and defendant, on the grounds
set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is specially made, and for general relief.And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.
Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this ninth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

By JNO. H. MOTT, Deputy Clerk.

JNO. J. COFFEY, Attorney for Plaintiff, 606 Clay Street.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

THOMAS O'SULLIVAN, plaintiff, vs. JOHN LI-

CENS, in signature and acknowledgment JOHN LINUS.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.The People of the State of California send greeting to JOHN LICENS, in signature and acknowledgment JOHN LINUS, defendant.You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out
of this county, but in this district, within twenty days—
otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court, adjudging that a certain deed executed by defendant to plaintiff, on March 4th, 1858, be reformed and amended in the description of certain real property particularly described in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby expressly made, and for costs of suit.And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded therein.Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 22d
day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.

JOHN J. COFFEY, Attorney for Plaintiff.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARY A. WOOTEN, plaintiff, vs. JOHN WOOTEN,

defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.The People of the State of California send greeting to John Wooten, defendant:You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days;
otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds
set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby made, and for costs of this suit, counsel fees, and alimony; also for general relief.And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.
Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 15th day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

By W. STEVENSON, Deputy.

R. THOMPSON, Plaintiff's Attorney.

BELCHER SILVER MINING CO.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, State of Nevada.Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the 7th day of February, 1879, an assessment (No.
17) of one ($1) dollar per share was levied on the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 12, No. 203 Bush Street, Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, San Francisco, California.Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Wednesday, the twelfth day of March, 1879, will be deficient, and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on THURSDAY, the first day of April, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment,
together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

JOHN CROCKETT, Secretary.

Office—Room 12, No. 203 Bush Street, Cosmopolitan
Hotel Building, San Francisco, California.

SAVAGE MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Trustees, held on the seventh day of February, 1879, an assessment (No. 37) of one dollar per share, was levied
on the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately
in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 15, Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the seventh (7th) day of March, 1879, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and, unless payment is made before, will be sold on MONDAY, the thirty-first day of March, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.Office, Room 15, Nevada Block, Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 7, 1879.

MY DEAR MADGE:—The "Passion Play" was produced after all, and has been the general theme of conversation ever since in club, drawing-room, reading-room, and street. The newspapers alone, strangely enough, have kept out of the discussion. Why? I can not say. Perhaps to discourage its continuance by refraining from a notice, which would be an advertisement. Perhaps because they see nothing wrong in the production, but hesitate to say so while the present state of feeling exists.

You will be surprised to know that Mr. Salmi Morse has advocates even among Christian, God-fearing people, and that none of these uphold him more warmly than those who object to the theatrical pomp and display of the Roman Catholic Church. They advance arguments innumerable, as it is always possible to do in religious discussion; but it may be they are animated rather by a desire to be eccentric, and to appear to have overcome the prejudices of their early training, than by a genuine approval. At all events, they have not sustained their opinions by patronizing Mr. Salmi Morse's experiment. That gentleman himself is not a Christian, and seven-eighths of the first audience were of his own faith. To those with whom the divinity of Christ is but a myth the "Passion Play" is a series of beautiful tableaux and inspiring music; and yet, from association with Christians, and familiarity with their traditions, even those of the other faith seemed to feel that the veil had been lifted from our Holy of Holies with a ruthless hand.

To do justice to Mr. Salmi Morse, he is an admirable stage manager. The costumes, the chorus, the tableaux, the music, were arranged with a taste which is beyond cavil. As for the text, it was, wherever it departed from the language of the Bible, a lot of meaningless polysyllabic drivel. It can not, therefore, be the pride of authorship which led the gentleman to the stage. Neither, since he is of an alien faith, can it be a devout spirit which lures him to the footlights. It is simply that he has chosen to make a paying spectacle of the holiest traditions of Christianity by making them the vulgar sensation of an hour. It is not a noble motive. The play begins with the Presentation in the Temple. There is a very artistic commingling of colors, a burst of glorious harmony, and nothing absolutely sacrilegious excepting that a very unpleasant-looking infant in Miss Wilke's arms is hailed as the Son of God. This is followed by the Massacre of the Innocents—a striking tableau. Then comes the death of "John the Baptist." Mr. Piercy, as "Herod," has a lot of stuff to speak which is tedious excessively, and amounts to nothing. His sanguinary wife, in the person of Miss Kate Denin, is arrayed with oriental magnificence, and is a beautiful sight to look upon; but the dramatic honors, if there be any, are carried off by Miss Olive West, a débutante of no personal charm save a graceful carriage, but of exceptional promise.

Thus far there is nothing really shocking, but what follows should not be allowed—the Last Supper, the Agony in the Garden, the Crowning of Thorns. Out of deference to the storm of protest which had been raised they did omit the last awful scene; but it could not have been worse than what was presented. Whatever delight the cold artistic eye may have taken in the picture of the Last Supper, the most callous could not fail to be shocked at the literal rendering. It was blasphemous, desecrating, unholy. It was said of James O'Neill that he manifested an extraordinary reluctance to appear in the "Passion Play." Paradoxically, it may be said that he gave to the task all due reverence, but he has yet something to be ashamed of all the rest of his life. In fact, it is not necessary to take high religious ground to condemn the spectacle. Upon the simple doctrine of good will why should a presentation be commended which flaunts its indelicacy to the deeper feelings and holier prejudices of nine-tenths of the community? Salmi Morse & Co. have had but an equivocal success.

At the California, although the elements have waged successful war, there has been a good play to see, and fairly well played. Mother and Son had not the mosaic finish nor the deep interest of Diplomacy; but then one man does not often write two plays like that. To say truth, Mother and Son really drags through the first two acts, which might easily be combined; but in the third the interest becomes vivid and is sustained to the last. It deals with the heroic self-sacrifice of a son for his mother's sake—a favorite theme with the French. There is a very pretty set of complications built about a very awkward dilemma, with an untangling at the close which is more satisfactory than one could anticipate. The new people are all good stock people, and, as such, more satisfactory than a star with a bunch of sticks. George Clarke, the leading man, is of the accepted New York cut. You know how much alike the New York men all are, Madge. I can't see, for the life of me, how the girls in that city ever have any special bias for their inclination. He has a good round voice, I should think, under favorable circumstances; but the entire company were obliged to interpolate various solos, duos, and trios of coughing, so that it would hardly be fair to judge of them. At all events, he has a pleasant accent, which is something pleasant to bear.

Of the observation of many models, and of the mannerisms sometimes with good effect, sometimes bad. He is never hearty, spontaneous, or real, yet, withal, he is not unpleasant—is even agreeable in lighter comedy, but is hardly up to melodrama. There is but one other gentleman in the combination—a Mr. Bradshaw—who has a marvelous French accent and a hard humor.

I am in doubt as to which of the ladies is leading lady, but I take it to be Miss Rose Osborne. She has neither much beauty nor force to recommend her, but I fancied her exceedingly. She has neither millinery nor jewels as accessories to her appearance, for she plays but an humble part—that of a dressmaker. But she has a native refinement of manner and a quiet intensity which fit admirably to the part, and to me she is very interesting.

Miss Lillian Cleaves Clarke, though pretty and well dressed, is less so. She has a handsome, serious face, and a deep, sweet, untrained voice. She has but one scene—as indeed every one has, for the plan of the drama seems to have been laid out with that intention—and although she plays it well enough to give pleasure, betrays inexperience with every demand upon her. Nevertheless, with no claims to greatness, the new people shone with a brilliant effulgence beside the members of the old company, although Miss Prescott, in a red coiffure and a new mauve dress, looked as handsome as a picture, which circumstance condoned much of her loose-edged acting. I recommend her to try Taxi! Aze and Crown some day, when she shall have toned down her style, and learned the beauties of delicate finish. She looked the impetuous young Elizabeth to the life.

Miss Long appeared in a most extraordinary combination of blue, purple, and orange, also in her favorite manner, which I first observed in Kit—a combination of dignity and "bossiness," which, in such a tiny speck of a creature, is vastly amusing. Both Miss Long and Mr. Welles roared out their "asides" until the ratters rang again. It is a peculiarity with them.

Miss Morant returns to us with all her duchess manner, her elegant appearance, her superb English, and not one whit of added softness. There are parts of Mother and Son which might have been written for her, so admirably does she fill them, but when she suffers—on the stage—she suffers in so adamantine a way that visions of granite, Fear stone, nether millstones, and all sorts of such things, dance into one's brain.

Miss Marie Wilkins, the amiable old "Mother Frochard" of the Two Orphans, has the part of one of those broad old French women, figuratively and literally speaking—broad enough to delight the gallery, and to not altogether displease the circle. She is inimitable in the part, though it is not a pretty one. Why, oh why, Madge, are there so many sticks, when it takes such a very little thing, well done, to delight a crowd. For five minutes of lively play of features she really carried off the honors of the evening.

Mr. Russell Bassett once more narrowly escaped doing something well. He has cried "wolf" so often that we expect nothing any more, and are never disappointed. I heard Karl Formes sing one night when he was in particularly bad voice, and I never suffered so much for so little cause in my life. He had all the ways of a man who expected such a volume of voice to roll out from that great chest as would shake the building itself, but when it came it was broken and uncertain, and all the assuredness of his old-time manner could not carry it off well. Mr. Bassett affects me in the same way. He has a genius for making himself up. He looked as French as a Frenchman the other night, and his entrance promised everything until he spoke, when the fatal commonplace drawl ruined everything, as usual; that is to say, everything in his own special part. It would really take more than Mr. Bassett at his worst to ruin Mother and Son, with its endless list of characters and its most interesting chain of incidents.

There is no news at the other houses, excepting a change of bill at the Bush Street Theatre, where Nat Goodwin will play yet another week. Yours ever, BETSY B.

Obscure Intimations.

SINGLE-LINE.—You say you are "a good gospel-gobbler"; all the same, something has gone wrong with your digestive and assimilative organs. Wherefore you are a spiritual dyspeptic. Avant!

DENMAN THOMPSON.—You need not send us newspapers with marked articles relating your successes. We care nothing for you and your successes.

A SACRAMENTO SUBSCRIBER.—Your error seems to have been natural, and our remarks were more for others than for you. On reflection, you will perceive how necessary it is that an editor should know who his correspondent or contributor is—a point on which we tire of insisting.

A FRIEND OF THE MANY.—Who are you?

BOTHWELL & HINTON, New York.—Please send copy of your publication containing puff of ours. Now there!

HOWARD'S.—We shall be pleased to consider it if not too long. But it would have a better chance of acceptance if you would first get it rejected by the Call. One can't lose in coppering Mr. Pickering's literary judgment.

AUSTRALIAN SHEPHERDER.—The ensor literarum from whose decision there is no appeal, save to the poniard or the potion, has sat down upon you.

O. G., Mariaburg.—Your nom de plume distresses us. It lacks dignity—the strong point of this journal.

M. A.—Don't be alarmed; they have not come within a mile of you.

Macmillan & Co. have published a volume of translations from Heine. There is quite a Heine craze just now in England and America; people read him and are delighted who don't know how to pronounce his name. Many think he is writing for the New York Tribune.

Eastlake, who has given his name to furniture, is a contributor to Scribner's for March. He discusses taste in manners and art. Bric-à-brac bunters will hold their breath until they learn what so great a man has to say.

He who buys what he does not need may soon need what he can not buy.

POUR LES DAMES.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—Slowly, but surely, the beautiful spring is dawning upon us, and Fashion, who, in these transition months, is as coy as the sunshine itself, is beginning to smile on her votaries with hints and half-promises of charming novelties. Let us begin this week with a look at the latest caprices in the way of festive entertainments. "Ladies' Lunches" are by no means new institutions, but considerable novelty may be gained by varying the dishes offered according to the season. For these reunions invitations are issued a week in advance, and the dress to be worn is as elegant a street toilet as one can afford. In fact, at all these so-called informal gatherings the motto seems to be, after the advice of the sage old Polonius, "Costly thy habit as thy purse can buy." The menu may also be as elaborate as the hostess sees fit—game, oysters, terrapin, cake, and sweetmeats, together with tea, coffee, and chocolate, forming the staples, varied, as I have suggested, by some special delicacy on each occasion. There is a new way of serving oysters; namely, in "oyster blocks," which consist of, first, a tin box, into which is set a block of perfectly clear ice, and around whose edges are twined the prettiest and most graceful seaweeds that can be obtained. The raw oysters are laid on this ice block, and so served up. "Little Neck" clams can be served in the same manner; also the small crabs that are frequently served up with oysters. Russian tea is an innovation that meets with considerable favor, but it would hardly seem to be suited to any but well-seasoned heads, as it must be made exceedingly strong and largely diluted with—rum. Frozen fruits, like oranges or pineapples, are always seasonable and delicious.

"Dove parties" differ but little from the lunches just described, except that there is a stringent rule excluding all demoiselles under fifteen. The limit at the other extreme has not yet been decided upon, so it is safe to assume that the "doves" may attain to unlimited longevity without prejudice to their claims. These parties are held in the afternoon, and the provender consists of everything dainty and toothsome. Candy is a special item, and the brain of the confectioner is taxed to the utmost to furnish novelties in this line. The last new fancy evolved is chocolate nougat.

Game of all kinds is sought after for these "feeds," particularly the smaller birds, reed birds and quails in their proper seasons, and even blackbirds, while squabs may be considered one of the standard dishes. It may not be amiss to add that the elegant menu cards laid at each plate are at these, as well as all other entertainments, intended to be carried home by the guests, as souvenirs of the occasion; many hostesses being nowadays sufficiently artistic to paint these for themselves, they are still more desirable as keepsakes on that account. The day hours, which have been so long set apart as sacred to work, are beginning to take a considerable share in the pleasures hitherto relegated to the evening time. This is an excellent thing in many ways, and could be made still better if the lunches and "dove parties" would open their doors to their gentlemen friends, offering them inducements in the way of "no full dress allowed," and limiting the requirements of politeness to an hour's stay. I am inclined to think they would be found to be much more agreeable, and, at the same time, encourage a salutary change in our driving, bustling, American business life.

Afternoon weddings, too, are decidedly popular just now, since Lord Carrington set the fashion in aristocratic London circles. And à propos of weddings, no one who aspires to be thought entirely fashionable will enter on a bridal tour under two weeks after marriage, and then everything must be done in the quietest manner possible. From which, you see, the world positively moves, and in the right direction. Perhaps, dear ARGONAUT, before you and I are gray we may see the good sense and delicacy of elegant society altogether abolish the vulgar display of the wedding trip, and its kindred abomination, the "bridal chamber."

I have alluded to the costume admissible on these occasions, and though the Lenten season with its austerities is supposed to be engaging our whole attention just now, there will still be those among us who will be interested to know of even such carnal things as new bonnets and other furbelows. In the former it is said that the Clarissa Harlowe shape, a large bonnet with the brim flaring above the forehead and tied down closely at the side, is to be one of the most taking novelties of the spring season. Chips and other straws will be largely imported, with close fronts, soft crowns of velvet or satin, and trimmed in the Alsatian style, with a large bow on the top. Three-cornered handkerchiefs of white satin, embroidered in colors, and edged with Breton lace, are to be used as crowns of chip bonnets. Wine colored chip is a novelty, intended to be made up in the solid color, or alternating with braids of white or black, and wine color and cream will be a very popular combination in satin ribbons. Flaring brims, so becoming to slender, oval faces, are made exceedingly quaint in character by a simple shirring of silk or satin by way of a face trimming—wreaths of reeds or grasses in the new reed green, and satin ribbon, the latter passing over the crown in a flat band and tying under the chin, being the most fashionable outside finish. Satsuma, the new shade of cream, is often combined with this green in the reversible ribbons. India muslin and Breton lace are still another combination for the trimming of white chips. Round hats are very handsome, made of white China crape, with very broad brims, which are turned up directly over the forehead, and filled in with crushed roses or a combination of two kinds of flowers. White ostrich plumes constitute the outside garniture. Leghorns call for large square satin bows and field flowers. Persian damask ribbons will be used to decorate the compact gray chips, and black chips for city wear will be in the shape known last year as the Equestrienne. Flowers will be profuse, wreaths and field flowers, and more notably bunches of long-stemmed roses, being the prospective favorites. LILLIAS DUBOIS.

EDITOR OF THE ARGONAUT:—I am moved to address you another note. In to-day's issue of the ARGONAUT I read, in reference to the Passion Play: "Jesus of Nazareth, James O'Neill." This representation affronts my taste and shocks my feelings. Of course you understand: my pride protests against the part of a Jew being performed by an Irishman. I am, etc., A JEW.

CHIPS FROM OTHER BLOCKHEADS.

"That's a nice new suit you have on; what did you have to pay for it?" "Sixty dollars—and costs."

If an actor is desirous of appearing in "several pieces" in one evening, let him smoke a cigar in a powder mill.

The Indians used to "bury" their dead in the tops of high trees. This was considered an awful joke on the Ohio medical student, burrowing around in the ground beneath.

A Frenchman was just married and was about engaging a valet. After some other questions, he asked the man who had presented himself: "Are you married?" "No, sir; but I understand. Monsieur need not be alarmed. I will treat Madame as if she were my own daughter."

It is the fulfilled prerogative of every man to make a fool of himself. What causes no end of trouble in the world is the perversity of our fellow-mortals in preferring to make fools of themselves after their own methods to accepting our own peculiar and darling mode of doing the same.

A gentleman, who has just had a family tomb constructed, takes his wife to the cemetery, and she recoils with horror on beholding cut in the stone: "To the memory of my Beloved Wife." "But I am not dead?" she cries. "I know it, darling, but I wished to please you by showing you what my affection would lead me to say when you did die."

"How do you like your hats?" said one young man to another while dining in a restaurant. "Well," he replied, "I like them bell-crowned, with a rolled brim and broad band. Why do you ask?" "Oh, I wanted to know how you liked them; if you prefer your hat well doled, all right; but if you wish it rare, you had better take it off that red-hot stove!"

"Sambo, human natur am de same all froo. Dar's mean wharfo jiss' de same as dar's mean niggers!" "Wharfo, Clem?" "Well, take dat are fish dat gulf Jonah! Dar was 'freshments' nuff in dat old man ter make a 'spectable' lunch for several wales, but dat old hog-fish preferred ter cram hisself an' git his stummock out of jint, rudder'n ax in his frien's an' divide."

"Is the doctor in?" asks an anxious-looking young man, as he pushed half way up the stairs leading to the doctor's office. "No, I guess not," replied the person addressed, "but you can leave an order on the slate." "Well, I guess I could hardly have time to wait." "Is it a very urgent case?" "Well, yes," the young man said, "rather urgent, I think. Just as I started away from home my youngest brother was falling out of a second-story window."

Joseph's master, while dining in the morning, let fall a piece of money which rolled and hid itself under a sofa. At the call of his master Joseph ran to him. "Joseph," he said, "I let a ten-dollar piece fall." "Joseph knelt down and found the piece which had fallen. He grew pale when he saw it. He handed it to his master, and said tremblingly: 'I swear that it isn't my fault.' "What?" "I have found but half of it." It was a five-dollar piece which had dropped.

Miss B. is a pretty brunette; she is very elegant and fragile, but alas! one misfortune to trouble her. She is a Spaniard by birth, and her voice has the masculine tone so peculiar to the beauties of Spain. It was one day, and she was walking along the street just behind a marvel of grandeur in military uniform; a blind beggar stepped across and intercepted their progress, asking for alms. She withdrew her elegantly-gloved hand from her muff, opened her purse, and slipped some coppers into the vagrant's outstretched palm, accompanying the gift with a few suitable words of kindness, spoken as softly and amiably as possible. The blind man felt, listened, and replied in a voice choked with emotion, "Thank you, Colonel!"

A lady of St. Louis indulges in this reminiscence: "I was at Saratoga eight or nine years ago and attended an entertainment in the ball-room of the United States Hotel. At the close an old French gentleman arose and begged the audience to listen to his daughter sing. Among the few who attended to the request, this lady saw two rather shabby figures advance behind the old gentleman; they were his daughters, and one was the Albani of to-day, who was then listened to merely as a matter of courtesy, as there was nothing at all in her voice then to foreshadow the great fame she now enjoys. The father would, however, persist that his daughter could sing; and when others turned away in disbelief he held steadfastly to his faith, and she, in spite of slights and difficulties, persisted.

A Paris paper relates the following: The Vicomte de X—has been married for a year to a most charming person. The Vicomte has a great name but no fortune. He is a gambler, but a gambler of sense. To him gambling is a profession; he never loses and he makes a great deal of money by it. In fact, he makes at the tables all the money he does make. To carry on his business it is necessary that he pass every night at the club, and so when he married a young wife he found himself in a rather difficult position. But he hit upon a brilliant idea. Every night at one o'clock he went to his room, and he put in his bed a dummy figure. It was a well-arranged dummy, and when he had turned the face to the wall nobody would suspect it. This precaution taken, the Vicomte went every night happy and with clear conscience to his duty. One night the Vicomte had a horrible dream. She dreamt that '93 had returned; again they were filling the prisons with the nobility; she heard the shouts of the angry crowd; she saw the carts with their living loads on their way to the guillotine. To her terror, her husband was in one of them; his hands were tied behind his back; they were going to chop off his head. He reached the square. He mounted the fatal steps. His head fell. The Vicomte awoke with a scream. She was all in a tremble. She ran to the room of her husband. Ah! there he was of course, soundly asleep. Her alarm was childish, but she would embrace him. She leaned over and caught him up to her arms. His head rolled to the floor. She fell forward in a dead faint. And so the Vicomte found her when he returned at six in the morning. Unfortunately, she is still ill, and it will be a long while before she recovers.

A German physician has started a new theory with regard to food. He contends that both the vegetarians and the meat-eaters are on the wrong tack. Vegetables are not more wholesome than meat or meat than vegetables, and nothing is gained by consuming a compound of both. Whatever nutritive qualities they may possess, he says, are destroyed in a measure and often entirely by the process of cooking. All food should be eaten raw. If this practice were adopted there would be little or no illness among human beings. They would live their apportioned time and simply fade away, like animals in a wild state, from old age. Let those affected with gout, rheumatism, and indigestion try for a time the effect of a simple uncooked diet, such as oysters and fruit, for instance, and they will find all medicines unnecessary and such rapid improvement of their health that they will forswear all cooked articles of food at once and forever. Intemperance would also, it is urged, no longer be the curse of civilized communities. The yearning for drink is caused by the unnatural abstraction from what are termed "solids" of the aqueous element they contain—uncooked beef, for example, containing from seventy to eighty per cent., and some vegetables even a larger proportion of water. There would be less thirst, and consequently less desire to drink, if our food were consumed in its natural state without first being subjected to the action of fire. Clothing, our adviser also thinks, is a mistake, but he admits that the world is not yet far enough advanced in civilization to go about undressed. Whatever differences of opinion may exist as to this anti-cooking theory, there can not be a doubt that in getting rid of the kitchen with all its abuses—including the cook—housekeepers would be spared a vast amount of worry, and probably on this account alone would live to a greater age than at present.

The train is halted alongside of a cattle train, while the other cattle, those in the passenger car, go up town and get dinner. After dinner the passengers solemnly contemplate the cattle, packed in at the rate of about three or four to the square inch. "How on earth," asks a very pretty young lady; "how on earth do they pack them in so close?" "Why," asks a mild-looking young man, with tender blonde whiskers and wistful blue eyes; he is an escaped divinity student, just going out to take charge of a church; "why," he says, "did you never see them load cattle into a car?" "No," said the pretty girl, with a quick look of interest. "I never did; how do they do it?" "Why," the divinity student remarked, slowly and very earnestly, "they drive them all in except one, a big fellow, with thin shoulders and broad quarters; they save him for a wedge and drive him in with a hammer." Somehow or other it didn't look hardly fair; nobody protested against its admission, however, so it went on record; but the conversation went into utter bankruptcy right there, and the theological-looking young man was the only person in the car who looked supremely satisfied with himself.

There is a religious newspaper in New York which has beaten the crowd in the way of business, for it offers to every new subscriber a genuine seven-shooter revolver. It seems to have some sort of notion that seven-shooters are not precisely the instruments which an organ of christianity should be engaged in distributing; it admits that its offer is extraordinary, but does not think its proposition inconsistent with the spirit of its columns "in these days of tramps and burglars." Perhaps not; indeed it would not be surprising if tramps and burglars should be found availing themselves of this excellent opportunity of getting seven-voiced barkers cheap. Who knows but they may also be led in this way to read a serious journal? And who can say what will come of it if they do? The journal will at least serve to supply them with wads for the revolvers.

The Boston Journal asserts that an industrious reporter present at the dinner of the Papyrus Club, in that city, inspired by the spirit of the occasion, was writing a portion of his report when he was astonished to find that in order to make his manuscript complete it would be necessary to carry of a portion of the table-cloth.

Dogs chased a deer into the town of Beebe, Arkansas, and in the excitement of the moment three ministers who were passing along the street pulled out seven-shooters and began firing at it. After the deer was down a fourth man cut its throat with a bowie-knife, which he pulled from his boot; but he was only a deacon.

A valuable dog has come to its death, it is said, in Boston, by acting as newspaper carrier for its master. It took his newspaper home to him daily and the fresh printer's ink is thought to have poisoned the animal. It is hard to see what there is in printing-ink to kill anybody—except bad politicians.

There is general complaint about the Associated Press that it fails, when reporting a railroad accident, to tell whether the train boys who yell out every five seconds "fresh pea nuts," were killed or not.

Mr. Dane, of Indianapolis, preserved for many years the pen with which his grandfather wrote a sermon on commercial honesty, and now his son has used the same pen in forging a check.

An elegant assortment of gold watches and chains at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

The artists who can neither truly draw nor correctly color, but who can sneer with tolerable facility at photography as having "nothing to do with art," should visit the Yosemite Gallery, 25 Montgomery Street, and learn (in order to the more vehemently reiterate their parroting opinion) that the sun can do almost as good work as they. The man who feels most keenly the truth he denies has a distinct advantage; it makes him louder and more impetuous. Mr. Boyd, the proprietor of the gallery mentioned, is an Artist—mark that.

Artistic novelties, manufactured from California quartz, at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

Wanted, a copy of the ARGONAUT of November 3, 1877 (Vol. 1, No. 33).

Dr. E. O. Cochrane, Dentist, No. 850 Market Street, corner of Stockton (over drug store), San Francisco. Office hours, from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M.

STERLING SILVERWARE.—A large assortment of elegant designs at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

When a tradesman undertakes to cultivate the aesthetic taste of the community by providing for its enjoyment genuine works of art, and to the enterprise of the trader adds the taste of the artist and the generosity of a cultured gentleman, he is entitled to a notice withheld, and properly withheld, from the mere merchant. It is the inevitable tendency of trade to degenerate into a mere money-making machine. The man who allows his soul no other scope than to contemplate how much money he can gain by the interchange of commodities may be a very good citizen, but in his money-making selfishness he is not to be compared with the higher and more cultured intellect, that, while intent upon commercial gain, does not altogether lose sight of the artistic and the beautiful. Such a man and such a merchant is Colonel Andrews of the Diamond Palace. His store on Montgomery Street is not only a casket for the safe-keeping and sale of precious jewels, but is of itself a thing of beauty. For now several weeks, as we have passed by his store, we saw the scaffolding upon which, we were informed, the eminent Italian artist Ghibraldi was at work—working as did Michael Angelo, Raphael, Giordano, and the other distinguished painters who gave immortality to medieval art, lying prone upon their backs. The scaffolding comes away, and lo, a pictured arch of perfect beauty. In addition to the fresco decorations there are panels of oil paintings done in the highest style of art—veritable gems, that would adorn the walls of any gallery, or beautify the saloon of any home. Upon the walls and ceiling of this beautiful store are sixteen of these oil paintings by Ghibraldi. Giving a unique and, of course, most brilliant effect to all the figures in these paintings, there are added real gems for ornaments. Jewels set into the canvases, ornamenting crowns, girdles, necklaces, bracelets—diamonds, rubies, and other precious jewels—thus the painted figures are blazing with pendants and solitaires, giving to the work of the artist brilliant and startling effect. We are not in sufficient command of technical art terms to describe the rich adornments of this store. There are fine bronzes, chandeliers with their brilliant crystal pendants, revolving jewel cases with glittering gems, the show window with its splendid display of rich jewelry artistically arranged with mirrors, in itself a complete picture. The whole store is so lined with mirrors that it produces a curious effect of breadth and depth, and one must touch its walls to be convinced that it has any. Nor is this store given entirely up to ornamentation and glitter; it is filled with such a variety of rare and costly goods as we have seldom seen displayed elsewhere. A catalogue of its contents would embrace all that is elegant and unique in the range of the goldsmith's art. There is not, we believe, such another one in the world. We have visited London, Venice, Vienna, and Paris; we have seen the costly displays of the great Art Expositions in Europe and America, and the like of this store is not elsewhere seen. The same store in Paris or London would be visited, described, and raved over by every American tourist. We commend every person who has a taste for the beautiful to visit Colonel Andrews' Diamond Palace. If the Colonel can persuade to the purchase of his goods, that is his matter. We are simply calling attention to the beautiful casket that contains the gems.

Modern Artists' Etchings, 22 Montgomery Street.

WANTED,

BY A YOUNG LADY, A POSITION as Governess or Companion. Can teach Piano Music, French, and English. Highest testimonials given. Moderate compensation. City or country. Address MISS M. JAY, this office.

NEW BOOKS

The Bedouins of the Euphrates. Lady Anne Blunt. $2.50
Short History of German Literature. J. K. Hosmer. 25
Famous Books by Eminent Authors. W. Davenport Adams. 50
The Statesman's Year Book. Fred'k Martin. 1.50
Hebrew Men and Times. J. H. Allen. 1.50
The English Reformation. Dr. C. Geikie. 2.00
At the Back of the Moon. By A. Lunar Wray. 50
Bibels and Curios. Frederic Voss. 75
The German. How to Give it, How to Lead it, How to Dance it. 1.25
The Currency Question. Robert W. Hughes. 1.25
The Model Prayer. George D. Boardman. 1.25
American Authors—Washington Irving. By Prof. David J. Hill. 1.00
Sylbil Brotherton. A Love Story. Mrs. Southworth. 50
Poems of Oliver Goldsmith. Half Hour Series. 20
Afganistan. By Constable, an old Bengal gunner. 25
Half Hour Series. 25
The Awakening. A Tale of English Life. Half Hour Series. 15
Vixen. Miss M. E. Braddon. Franklin Square. 15
The Last of Her Line. Franklin Square. 15

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO., BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,

NOS. 3 AND 5 MONTGOMERY STREET,

MASONIC TEMPLE.

SPRING STYLES
ALL IN NOW!

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—THE STATE INVESTMENT AND INSURANCE COMPANY.—Dividend No. 70.—The monthly dividend for February, 1879, will be paid on March 10, 1879, at their office, Nos. 218 and 220 Sansone Street. CHS. H. CUSHING, Secretary. San Francisco, March 5, 1879.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.

This (Saturday) afternoon and evening, March 8, last performances of

BARLOW, WILSON, PRIMROSE & WEST'S MINSTRELS.

Sunday evening, March 9, Complimentary Benefit tendered to Messrs. PRIMROSE and WEST, on which occasion an extra bill will be given.

Monday, March 10,

ROSE EYTINGE

Will appear for the first time at this theatre in her new play, expressly written for her by Charles Reade, Esq.

THE MINER'S DAUGHTER,

Supported by the whole of the great legitimate company.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

Two Gala Performances To-day. Only Matinee of THE RAMBLERS at 2 P. M.

ELIZA WEATHERSBY'S FROLIQUES

AND MR. N. C. GOODWIN, JR.,

For the last time in the chef-d'œuvre of burlesques, the

RAMBLERS.

Monday, March 10, Farewell Week, distributed as follows:

Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, the

RAMBLERS.

Thursday, March 13, Benefit of N. C. GOODWIN, JR.

Scenes from

RAMBLERS AND HOBBIES.

Friday evening and the balance of the week,

HOBBIES.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE,

Mission Street, between Third and Fourth.

This (Saturday) and Sunday evenings, March 8th and 9th, will be rendered with all due solemnity and attention to historical facts,

THE PASSION,

Written by Salmi Morse, Esq.

The Hymns, Chorales, and Chants sung by a full Choir of Eighty Singers. Selections from the Passion Music of J. Sebastian Bach, given by a full Band of Instrumental Performers. The Paintings of

JERUSALEM AND THE HOLY LAND,

By Mr. Dayton and Assistants. The characters costumed with historical accuracy. Concluding with the celebrated picture of Rubens,

"IT IS FINISHED."

Afternoon rendering on Saturday at 2 o'clock.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.

BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

Monday, March 10, Last Week and Continued Success of the NEW YORK

UNION SQUARE COMBINATION

PROPRIETOR.....MR. SHERIDAN SHOOK.

MANAGER.....MR. A. M. PALMER.

In the last great New York success, the grand play in five acts, by Victorien Sardou, author of Diplomacy, translated and adapted by A. K. Cazauran,

MOTHER AND SON.

The cast will include:

MISS FANNY MORANT, MR. GEORGE CLARKE

MISS MARIE WILKINS, MISS ROSE OSBORNE.

MISS LILIAN CLEVES CLARKE, MR. C. H. BRADSHAW

In their great original characters, supported by the California Theatre Company.

LAST MOTHER AND SON MATINEE on Saturday

Seats at the Box Office.

STANDARD THEATRE.

Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny

M. B. LEAVITT.....MANAGER

This (Saturday) evening, March 8th, and every evening, until further notice.

MATINEE TO DAY AT 2 P. M.

The most successful entertainment in the city. Look at the great sensation features this week.

THE VOLUPTUOUS MODEL ARTISTS, the love-lorn Women in the world. THE LIV'NG

ALMIE. The Spicy French comedy.

OUR INNOCENT PASTOR,

Received with screams of laughter. In addition, the great

MME. RENTZ MINSTRELS

—AND—

MABEL SANTLEY'S

ENGLISH BURLESQUE COMBINATION.

Monday, March 10, the CAN-CAN.

Seats at the box office, speaking telephone at 10, throughout the city at 10.

STATEMENT OF THE CONDITION
and Affairs of the
STATE INVESTMENT
.....AND.....
INSURANCE COMPANY
OF SAN FRANCISCO,

In the State of California, on the 31st day of December, A. D. 1878, and for the year ending on that day, as made to the Insurance Commissioner of the State of California, pursuant to the provisions of Sections 610 and 611 of the Political Code, condensed as per blank furnished by the Commissioner

CAPITAL, $200,000.
Amount of Capital Stock paid up in Cash.....	$200,000 00
ASSETS.
Real Estate owned by Company.....	$140,611 68
Loans on Bond and Mortgage.....	59,550 00
Cash market value of all Stocks and Bonds owned by Company.....	84,370 00
Amount of Loans secured by pledge of Bonds, Stocks, and other marketable securities as collateral.....	23,683 66
Cash in Company's office.....	6,090 03
Cash in Banks.....	28,688 35
Interest due and accrued on all Stocks and Loans.....	1,728 65
Interest due and accrued on Bonds and Mortgages.....	3,762 50
Premiums in due course of collection.....	42,452 07
Bills receivable, not matured, taken for Fire and Marine risks.....	19,447 15
Total Assets.....	$401,384 09
LIABILITIES.
Losses adjusted and unpaid.....	$5,400 50
Reserve for losses of adjustment and suspense.....	5,530 00
Gross Premium on Fire Risks running one year or less, $123,003 52—reinsurance 50 per cent.....	94,501 76
Gross Premiums on Fire Risks running more than one year, $3,067 60—reinsurance pro rata	2,588 50
Gross Premiums on Marine and Inland Navigation Risks, $1,579 02—reinsurance 100 per cent.....	1,579 02
Gross Premiums on Marine Time Risks, $38,640 76—reinsurance 50 per cent.....	19,320 38
Cash Dividends declared to stockholders remaining unpaid.....	32 00
Marine Notes payable.....	1,376 47
Claim in Litigation.....	972 00
Total Liabilities.....	$135,372 63
INCOME.
Net Cash actually received for Fire Premiums.....	$106,786 32
Net Cash actually received for Marine Premiums	52,168 35
Bills and Notes received for premiums.....	$10,447 15
Received for interest on Bonds and Mortgages.....	3,957 18
Received for interest and dividends on Bonds, Stocks, Loans, and from all other sources.....	9,465 69
Rents.....	11,655 00
Total Income.....	$265,033 04
EXPENDITURES.
Net amount paid for Fire Losses (including $4,641 98 losses of previous years).....	$69,580 88
Net amount paid for Marine Losses (including $6,981 92 losses of previous years).....	33,236 58
Dividends to stockholders.....	60,044 00
Paid or allowed for Commission or Brokerage.....	34,679 00
Paid for salaries, fees, and other charges for officers, clerks, etc.....	29,100 00
Paid for State, National, and local taxes, rents, Fire Patrol, advertising, printing, and all other expenses.....	23,558 33
Total Expenditures.....	$270,198 79
LOSSES.
Incurred during the year.....	FIRE. $75,741 40 MARINE. $50,424 66
RISKS AND PREMIUMS.
Net amount of risks written during the year.....	FIRE RISKS. $14,018,349 PREMIUMS. $214,118 94
Net amount of risks expired during the year.....	15,120,761 235,820 08
Net amount in force Dec. 31, 1878	12,863,901 192,971 12
Risks written in the State of California.....	12,472,560 177,935 65
Net amount of risks written during the year.....	MARINE RISKS. $1,205,415 PREMIUMS. $70,807 56
Net amount of risks expired during the year.....	1,169,932 65,323 78
Net amount in force Dec. 31, 1878	450,035 40,219 85
Risks written in the State of California.....	1,205,415 70,807 56
CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary.
A. J. BRYANT, President.

Office, 218 and 220 Sansome St.,
IN COMPANY'S BUILDING.
LITTLE BELMONT
FOR SALE.

THIS BEAUTIFUL SUBURBAN
property, situated contiguous to the Belmont Mar-sion, twenty-seven miles from San Francisco, on the San Jose Railroad, is offered for rent or sale at reasonable terms.
The property is located in a beautiful valley, with a glimpse view of the Bay; contains thirty acres of land, highly improved, with fruit and ornamental trees. The residence is new, spacious, and elegant, with all modern improvements.
It has a detached cottage for servants, with laundry room
and offices; a stable with six stalls, carriage house, cow houses for thoroughbred stock, chicken house, grounds un-derlaid with water-pipe; out-houses provided with gas; gas
and water furnished from the works of larger Belmont;
water free. The residence and cottage are furnished with all fixed articles, such as book cases, armchairs, billiard table,
range, kitchen and dining-room furniture, floors carpeted,
rooms filled with attractive engravings, all of which will be sold with the property at a low price. A bargain property, and if not sold will be rented at a low price for summer residence. For particulars, apply to the ARGONAUT office, No. 522 Cali-

OUR NEW-YEARS GIFT.
OUR $4.50 PREMIUM GIFT
—OF—
COIN-SILVER TABLEWARE
Given Away
TO EVERY SUBSCRIBER OF THIS PAPER!
CONSISTING OF

OUR NEW-YEARS GIFT.

An Elegant Set of Warranted Extra Coin-Silver Plated TEA-SPOONS that retails at $4.50 per set, and an Elegant Extra Coin-Silver Plated FIVE-BOTTLE CASTER that retails at $7.00.
A NEW-YEARS GIFT TO EVERY SUBSCRIBER.

Table Silverware furnished under this New-Year's Premium Proposition is from the well-known and reliable EAGLE GOLD AND SILVER PLATING CO. of Cincinnati, O. Under a very favorable proposition from said house, we offer our subscribers during the next 60 days one $4.50 Set of Extra Coin-Silver Plated Tea-spoons as a Premium New-Year's Gift, and with the set received the Eagle Gold and Silver Plating Co. will send a list of other Premium Silver Tableware for your selection.

The Tea-spoons we send you are of the latest-style pattern, and warranted first class in every particular. Each article is to be engraved with your name or initials if desired. Don't neglect to send your name with order to be engraved.

Subscribers will therefore cut out the following Premium Order from this paper and send same to the EAGLE GOLD AND SILVER PLATING CO. for redemption, together with sufficient to simply pay the expense of engraving your initials, boxing, postage or express charges, which is 75 cents; but if you do not wish your initials engraved, only send 60 cents. Under our arrangement this Silverware is to cost you nothing more than the expense of engraving your initials, boxing, postage or express charges, and then it is to be DELIVERED TO YOU FREE AND PROMPTLY.

Read the following: CINCINNATI, O., December 1st, 1878.
Assure your subscribers that the Silverware is first class in every respect, and of latest style of pattern, and that we do not retail a single set at less than $4.50, and will not send the goods to any of your subscribers at a less price unless accompanied with the following Premium Order.
EAGLE GOLD AND SILVER PLATING CO.

CUT THIS PREMIUM ORDER OUT, AS IT IS WORTH $4.50.

ON receipt of this Premium Order and 75 Cents to pay cost of engraving name, postage or express charges, we will send free
ONE SET OF EXTRA COIN-SILVER PLATED TEA-SPOONS worth $4.50, at retail, and each article is to have your name engraved. If you do not wish your name engraved, send only 60 Cents.
Remember we make this offer good only for 60 days from date of this paper. So send for the Silverware as soon as possible. Address this Premium Order to EAGLE GOLD AND SILVER PLATING CO., 180 ELM ST., CINCINNATI, O.

Be sure and cut out and send us the above Order so that we may know you are entitled to it, as we will not send the Silverware at less than $4.50 unless you send the premium order; and when that is received, with the amount named in same, the goods will be shipped you promptly and delivered free. This offer will not be made again.
Address all orders to EAGLE GOLD AND SILVER PLATING CO., 180 Elm St., CINCINNATI, O.

OUR NEW-YEARS GIFT.

THE ARGONAUT,
A Political, Satirical, and Society Journal, published every Saturday, at 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.

FRANK M. PIXLEY, }
FRED. M. SOMERS, } EDITORS.

The ARGONAUT is essentially a Californian publication—bright, breezy of the Pacific, and the medium of the good things of current literature. Sent, post paid, to any address on receipt of $4.00, the yearly subscription price.

THE ARGONAUT PUBLISHING COMPANY,
A. P. STANTON, Business Manager. 522 California Street.

AMERICAN DISTRICT TELEGRAPH.
UNIFORMED MESSENCERS.

Special Detail to Deliver Christmas and New Year's Presents.

OFFICES:
222 SANSOME ST.,
211 KEARNY ST.,
833 SUTTER ST.,
965 MISSION ST.,
POWELL AND UNION,
CALIFORNIA AND FILLMORE, MISSION AND TWENTIETH,
FOURTH AND BLUXOME,
HAYES AND LAGUNA, BUTCHERTOWN.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.—NOTICE is hereby given by the undersigned, Administrator with the will annexed of the Estate of JOHN ELISS, deceased, to the creditors of, and all persons having claims against, the said decedent, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator at his place of business, Room 12, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, in the City and County of San Francisco.
Dated February 13th, 1879.
WILLIAM DOOLAN,
Administrator with the will annexed of the Estate of John Eliss, deceased.
PHELPS & ELLIS, 66 Nevada Block, Attorneys for Estate.

ANNUAL MEETING.—The Annual
Meeting of the Stockholders of the Hale & Norcross S. M. Co., for an election of a Board of Trustees to serve the Company for the ensuing year, and for the transaction of other business, will be held at the office of the Company, Rooms Nos. 57 and 58 Nevada Block, northwest corner Pine and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California, on WEDNESDAY, March 12, 1879, at the hour of one o'clock P. M.
The Transfer Book will be closed on Saturday, March 1, 1879, at 12 M., and remain closed until after the meeting to be held on March 12, 1879.
By order Board of Trustees.
JOEL F. LIGHTNER, Secretary.

REDINGTON'S
FLAVORING EXTRACTS
ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE
and highly concentrated Extracts of
FRESH FRUITS
Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding TWICE as much as ordinary brands of Extracts.
Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap.
Wherever tested on THEIR MERITS, they have been adopted in preference to all others, and now are the
STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS
Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON & CO.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

ASSESSOR'S OFFICE.
NOTICE TO TAXPAYERS,
1879-80.

ALL PERSONS, COMPANIES, ASsociations, or firms, in the City and County of San Francisco are requested, either in person or by their proper representatives, to deliver at the Assessor's Office, New City Hall, in said City and County, before the SECOND MONDAY IN APRIL, 1879, a statement under oath of all the property, both Personal and Real, owned or claimed by him or them, or which is in his or their possession, or which is held or controlled by any other person in trust for or for the benefit of him or them. See Political Code, Sections 3633—3648.

All persons owning Real Estate that has heretofore been assessed in the wrong name, or misspelled, or otherwise misdescribed in last year's Real Estate Assessment Roll, or who have purchased Real Estate within the last year, are requested to appear personally, or send their Deeds to the Assessor's office, and have the proper changes made for the Real Estate Roll for the fiscal year 1879-80. Immediate attention is necessary, as work on the Roll will commence in a few days, after which it will be too late for any alterations.

POLL TAX,
TWO DOLLARS, NOW DUE AT THIS OFFICE, or to a Deputy. Will be THREE DOLLARS when delinquent, and constitute a lien upon other property.

ALEXANDER BADLAM,
City and County Assessor.
March 1, 1879.

NOTICE.

The public are hereby notified that the Field Deputies of this office will commence assessing property MONDAY, March 3, 1879.

The duties assigned to those Deputies are too well known to the community to require explanation, and while I have been careful in making my selections to fill the positions by men favorably known in the community for their competency and integrity, and am confident that the duties will be discharged by them to the satisfaction of all concerned, I urgently request Taxpayers to report to this office any dereliction of duty by any of my Deputies, and assure them that any complaints will receive immediate attention.

ALEXANDER BADLAM,
City and County Assessor.
March 1, 1879.

CALABASAS
LAND AND MINING COMPANY.

DIRECTORS.
JOHN P. JONES,
JOHN CURREY,
EUGENE L. SULLIVAN,
GEORGE C. PERKINS,
CHARLES P. SYKES.

THE CALABASAS LAND AND
Mining Company are now prepared to offer special inducements to capitalists or actual settlers for a profitable investment in their attractive town site and mine, situated in the Santa Cruz Valley, in that portion of Southern Arizona acknowledged by all sanitary and descriptive writers to be the ITALY OF AMERICA.
For full particulars and description, send for Prospectus, or apply at the Company's office, 32 Merchants' Exchange, San Francisco

MULLER'S
OPTOMETER!
The only reliable instrument for Testing Defective Vision.
135 Montgomery Street,
Near Bush, opposite the Occidental Hotel.

MULLER'S IS THE LEADING OPTICIAN
135 Montgomery St.

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.
WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

PIANOS

NO. 12 TYLER STREET, S. F.

These Pianos are all three-stringed, with ivory keys, not imitation.

STOVES

FOR PARLORS, OFFICES, HALLS
BED-ROOMS, CHURCHES,
STORES, ETC., ETC.

THE LARGEST STOCK AND
the greatest variety on the Pacific Coast.

500

DIFFERENT SIZES, STYLES, AND PATTERNS to select from.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, & 120 BATTERY ST.

REMOVAL.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO.

MUSICAL BOX DEPOSITORY AND
WORK SHOP has been removed from No. 120
Sutter Street to

No. 31 Post St., San Francisco.

LEE D. CRAIG,

Notary Public and Commissioner
of Deeds.

TAKING OF DEPOSITIONS, Searching of Records, Conveyancing, and the incorporating of Companies, specialties.
COURT STREET, N. E. CORNER OF CLAY
SAN FRANCISCO.
to F. V. Scudder.

THE Automatic SEWING MACHINE HAS NO EQUAL.

It runs the easiest and fastest and makes the least noise of any machine made. Just the machine for delicate ladies. Just the machine for ladies who are not delicate, as it will not injure them to run it. POSITIVELY NO TENSION. Makes the strongest seam, there being three threads in every stitch. A MARVEL OF MECHANISM. NOTHING LIKE IT IN THE WORLD. An investigation will convince any one.

WILLCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.
C. L. HOVEY, AGENT,

124 POST STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, AND 361 TWELFTH STREET, OAKLAND.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

NICOLL THE TAILOR

BRANCH OF NEW YORK,

Begs to inform his numerous patrons (and their name is Legion), that he employs only WHITE LABOR, and that the reason he is able to sell cheaper than any other Tailor is that, having Sixty Stores all over the United States, and a London House, he is able to buy and import in immense quantities direct from the Mills at home and abroad, thereby saving all the intermediate profits which other Tailors have to pay.

Gentlemen, before ordering elsewhere, will do well to call and inspect my immense stock at any of my branch stores, and their daily arrivals of New York and Paris fashions. Also, of French and English Goods from my London House.

Pants in Six Hours. Suits to order in One Day, if required.

TO ORDER:

Pants, - - - $4
Suits, - - - 15
Overcoats, - 15
Dress Coats, - 20

Genuine 6 X

TO ORDER

Black Doeskin
Pants, - - - $7
White Vests, fm 3
Fancy Vests, - - 6
Beaver Suits, $55.

The Trade and Public supplied with Cloth and Trimmings at Wholesale Prices.

Any length cut, and all kinds of Cloth kept in Stock. Samples, with Instructions for Self-measurement, sent free.

A small stock of uncalled-for Goods to be sold at a great reduction.

CLOTH AND WOOLEN BROKER.

FINEST STOCK OF WOOLENS IN THE WORLD.

NICOLL THE TAILOR'S GRAND TAILORING EMPORIUM,

127 Market Street, 505 Montgomery Street, 18 Kearny Street,
And 853 Broadway, Oakland.

BUSINESS COLLEGE,
320 POST STREET
San Francisco.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,
FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.
QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE
for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. 227 Entrance
south side of Court.
A. D. SHARON.

NEW STORE

McDONALD
& WILLIAMS

MERCHANT

TAILORS.

We have recently opened the fine large store at No. 14 MONTGOMERY STREET, opposite the Lick House, with a large stock of the most fashionable English, French, and Domestic Cassimeres, Cloths, Worsteds, Beavers, Doeskins, Piqués, Outlines, Meltons, Kerseys; in fact, full lines of all the materials necessary to conduct a first class tailoring establishment, which we propose offering to the public at the following low prices:

Pants, from $5
Suits, from 20
Overcoats, from 15
Usters, from 15
Dress Coats, from 20
White Vests, from 3
Silk and Wool Vests, from 6

Uniforms of All Kinds Made.

Boys' and Children's Clothing.

Money returned if goods prove not satisfactory. Work made on the premises by White Labor.

Short Time Orders Carefully Attended to.

PUNCTUALITY GUARANTEED.

Samples and Self-measurement Rules sent postage paid.

Measures for future reference cheerfully taken

SUSPENDERS ON WHEELS

ARGOSY.

The Bachelor's Blessing.
No Pulling Off Buttons.
No Rubber or Elastic.
The Most Durable.
The Most Comfortable.
For Sale Everywhere.

THE TRADE SUPPLIED AT

223 Sacramento St

SAN FRANCISCO

INDEPENDENT LINE

—FOR—

ASTORIA AND PORTLAND, OREGON.
The Splendid Low-pressure, Side Wheel American Steam-ship

GREAT REPUBLIC,

382 TONS,

JAMES CARROLL.....Commander

Will sail from Spear Street wharf, for the above ports,
On WEDNESDAY, March 12, at 12 o'clock M.

Steerage Passage $2 00
Cabin Passage 7 00
In Bridal Rooms 10 00
Freight at Lowest Rates

FREIGHT RECEIVED DAILY.

For freight or passage apply at the office on Spear Street wharf. Tickets also for sale at No. 3 New Montgomery Street, under Grand Hotel.

P. B. CORNWALL.

The Argonaut.

VOL. IV. NO. 11.

SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 15, 1879.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK, March 2d.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—After a full, freezing, and fretful month I have finally come to rest here in Gotham, with the only opportunity and inclination I have yet had to write you, for it has taken me all my spare time to keep warm, and the "go" has been a continuous one. First, a week's dance across the continent, with a bounce from the rails beyond Elko and a night in the ditch on the desert; thence to Chicago; to Niagara, to see the immense ice-bridge that spans the river below the falls, and the spray-covered trees, which, it has been suggested, ought to be further decorated with the bodies of dead hackmen, as the perfected and ripened fruit of the fraudulent place; thence to Boston, and its suburbs, and the interior of Massachusetts, to meet and greet my orthodox friends, and gabble about California, and climate, and Chinamen, and go to church, and dive into great voluptuous feather beds at night, and refuse to get up in the morning, and then after snow storms, and sleigh rides, and scriptural suggestions, and general benedictions innumerable, back to Boston again, and the theatres, and freedom from restraint.

Oh, I had such a good time in Boston—the "Hub!" I wandered about its streets, and looked again at scenes so familiar to me as a boy; went coasting on the Common on a "double runner," and skating on the pond in the public garden, and stood on Washington Street and saw the rosy-cheeked and fair-faced girls troop by with their cunning little red mittens on—the swell thing in handwear this winter. I saw Harry Edwards at the Park House, and shook hands with him, and heard him tell how well he liked Boston, and how well satisfied Boston was with him. I saw Alice Harrison at the Deacon's theatre—the Museum—as the "Little Duke," and Alice was actually captivating the people, though she couldn't sing the score, and wasn't allowed to sling the unlimited slang she was so generously permitted in California.

I went to see the great picture, the "Siege of Paris," in an iron building of its own on Columbus Avenue. It is a magnificent work of art, an oil painting something like 400 feet in length, and 40 or 50 feet high, representing Paris and the surrounding country, and the movements of the French and German armies, and the great forts, and the big siege guns of the Prussians. All the figures are life-size, and the canvas is so arranged in a circle, and the effect so heightened by gaslight and real properties in the foreground, as to make it an exciting bit of realism. You stand on the artificial heights erected in the centre of the building, and with a good pair of opera glasses you seem to be part of an actuality. There is nothing to suggest a painted picture—no frame, nor beginning, nor end. You cannot tell where the real rock is joined with the painted in the foreground, and the perspective is a marvel that you can scarcely comprehend. The picture is to go to San Francisco, I understand, building and all. It will take a whole train of cars to move it, and the moving will cost over $11,000; but you will all go to see it, and the speculation will be a paying one.

I also saw Boston take leave of Kellogg—Clara Louise—whom Boston admires. The audience was a very fashionable and dressy and enthusiastic one. The programme was an act each from Lohengrin, Rigoletto, and Les Huguenots—the applause and encores were tremendous, and the floral offerings overwhelming, Annie Louise Cary presenting her rival with a floral Cupid, and a floral arrow aimed direct at the forty-two-year-old-heart of Clara Louise. This Cupid fairly made the house howl with appreciation. The following afternoon (Saturday) I attended the matinée to hear Clara Louise sing "Carmen," in the new opera of that name. The sight was an inspiring one. The Boston Theatre was packed from pit to dome, ladies even occupying the gallery of the gods. Four tiers of beauty and of bonnets and little red mittens, four layers of intellectual faces, four thousand representative feminine souls from Boston and its suburbs—the old maid from Haverhill and the young maid from Lynn. And the opera? How I wish I could interpret to you this musical novelty which has had London and Paris by the ears and is now carrying us away. The story is a simple one. "Carmen" is a cigar girl of Seville, in sunny Spain, pretty, bewitching, and wicked. She is beloved by an officer and loves him not in return, though she carefully keeps this fact in the background. She tempts him from his regiment and induces him to become a brigand and a smuggler, and then, as a gypsy, she taunts him and reproaches him for his love of another, and finally runs away with a torreador or successful bull-fighter of Seville, and, being followed by the reckless and infatuated "Don José," is stabbed to death by him on the circus steps. It is a startling and tragic bit of Spanish story, full of romance, of gypsies, and smugglers, and soldiers, and cigar girls, of street uproar, love, jealousy, murder, merriment, the dance, the knife, and the clicking castanet—picturesque, bustling, brilliant. The music, a strange rhythm, full of wild, weird, ear-catching measures; the instrumentation sweeping you insanely along from one bar to another, keeping you close to the time, the place, the story, dropping you into the very heart of empty tunes and dragging you out again to the step of those peculiar accompaniments known only to those who have an idea of what Spanish music really is, and leading you a reckless chase to finally leave you breathless at the feet of a dare-devil in petticoats with a cigarette between her gleaming teeth and swaying in a voluptuous dance that would tempt the oldest man in all America.

The "Carmen" of Clara Louise Kellogg was all that Bizet, the composer, with his delicate and poetic fancy, painted it, because it exactly suited the woman's disposition. The sneer and the scorn and the sarcasm came from original stock-on-hand, and the part was so well played, and the dress so pretty, and the cigarette so fragrant, and the tempting dance so enticing, and the click of the castanets so inspiring, that, in spite of the knowledge that Kellogg was a forty-two-year-old, I would have done, under similar temptation, just exactly what "Don José" did and been the wildest brigand on the border, and all for the love of the poetry of circumstance and motion, and to be the slave of that subtle music that breathes the very breath of fascination and sings loud and long the song of seductiveness. Though I have since heard Minnie Hauk as "Carmen," and the opera better interpreted by orchestra and chorus, I still cling to Kellogg as the most satisfying, picturesque, voluptuous, and unprincipled cigar-girl that I ever met.

And now while I am in opera I want to tell you what we have here, and what I have been reveling in beyond the possibility of being satiated: Her Majesty's Grand Opera Company, under the Mapleson management, and with the following swell musical personnel: Prime Donne, Soprani e Contralti—Madame Etelka Gerster, Madame Marie Roze, Mademoiselle Parodi, Madame Sinico, Mademoiselle Lido, Madame Robiati, Madame Lablache, Mademoiselle Pisani, and Mademoiselle Minnie Hauk. Primi Tenori—Signor Campanini, Signor Frapolli, Signor Tecchi, Signor Bignardi, Signor Grazi, Signor Bolli, Signor Leli, and Signor Gillandi. Primi Baritoni—Signor del Puente, Signor Franceschi, and Signor Galassi. Primi Bassi—Monsieur Thierry, Signor Pyatt, and Signor Foli. Director and Conductor—Signor Arditi.

The way these people interpret opera music is of that description that makes one enthusiastic. Gerster sings like a bird, and Marie Roze and Minnie Hauk are not very far behind her. The first named, however, is the nightingale—a Hungarian one at that, like di Murska; an artist who a little over two years ago was wholly unknown, but is now considered the first representative of the school of florid execution. Berlin and London and St. Petersburg have raved about her, and the New Yorkers are not done yet; for, though this is the second subscription season and the beginning of Lent, there is not a seat to be had at the Academy of Music except from the speculators at an exorbitant figure.

Yesterday afternoon I heard Gerster in La Sonnambula, with Campanini and Foli in the cast. The great house was crammed beyond its standing capacity. Women squatted in the aisles till they were blocked, and though the many-buttoned and ponderous policemen were sent in, club in hand, to clean the passage ways, they were obliged to retire to the lobby again, for the women wouldn't budge an inch, and would look the policeman and the club scornfully in the eye. The performance was a great success. It was one of Gerster's favorites, and she sang the score as only Gerster can sing it. Campanini, the tenor, was in superb voice, and to hear him was to applaud. The chorus was strong and efficient; fifty musicians were packed in the orchestra box, and for once I heard La Sonnambula as the Italians sing it. Next week we are to have Il Barbiere di Siviglia, with Minnie Hauk as "Rosina," Lohengrin, with Gerster as "Elsa," and Campanini as "Lohengrin;" Faust, with Hauk, and The Magic Flute, with Marie Roze, and Gerster in Carmen for the matinée. I had a chat with Mapleson the other day about the possibility of a trip to San Francisco with Her Majesty's Opera Company, but there is nothing to promise till next season.

In the matter of the drama the success here is The Banker's Daughter at the Union Square Theatre, which by the time you get this will have reached its one hundredth performance. The play is by Bronson Howard—the author of Saratoga, Old Love Letters, etc.—revamped by Cazauran, is in five acts, and thrilling in interest, being an illustration of the beatitude of the mariage de convenance and the curse of business matrimonial management. I learn that the play has been secured for the California Theatre, and if so the California will have a prize, though I am afraid it will be ruined in the cast they give it. As I saw it at the Union Square the other night—its ninety-somethingth presentation—it was a finished performance, with Charles R. Thorne, John Parsloe, J. H. Stoddard, J. B. Polk, W. J. Le Moine, M. V. Lingham, Walden Ramsey, Sara Jewett, and Maude Harrison having the principal parts in hand.

It did me good to see and hear Maude Harrison once more. She was a San Francisco favorite, you know, and has since developed into a popular and talented artist here, and almost carries off the entire applause with her presentation of "Mrs. Florence St. Vincent Brown." Engaged, which was stolen by Maguire and played under another name, is having a great run here at the Park, and is cast far and away beyond the San Francisco possibility. Outside of these two productions there is nothing wonderful going on. The city is full of Pinafore companies, and the halls are filled with female pedestrians trying to walk three or four thousand quarter miles in as many thousand quarter hours, and the men about town are occupied with the features of the Buckingham Palace advertised as the American Mabille. There is also a Cremorne Garden just started, and just as much wickedness in the air as though it wasn't Lent; and there is the never ceasing stream on the Bowery and Grand Street—a sight I never tire of.

To use the expression of a Nevada friend of mine who is sojourning here, "this is a mighty big camp." One hardly knows how to compass it. You can't take it all in. It takes ten hours of hard and steady labor to read the morning papers through and get posted on the Chinese question in California. By the way, do you know that you are frightening people to death here with the talk of setting up an independent Empire of the Pacific in revenge for Hayes' veto? It is a fact. An old newspaper man said to me the other day: "This talk of yours out on the Pacific slope about what you will and what you won't stand sounds like '61. I don't like it." So be careful, very careful, what is telegraphed back here, especially regarding General McComb. There is a growing belief that McComb is a "bigger man," not "than old Grant," but than Kearney, and that the cry will soon be, not that "the Chinese must go," but that California will go, and that McComb will be the inspiration. I don't know how the impression got abroad, but something in the Associated Press dispatches has put McComb in the attitude of an Escobedo, or a Diaz, or a Lerdo; and if anything of a revolutionary nature should be attempted, or any secession movement made, I know that the General will be held responsible. Beyond this fear of Californians setting up an independent empire, there is but one sentiment abroad, and that is sympathy for the Chinaman. It is a pity that the almond-eyed angel can't, by some special arrangement of Providence, be dropped right down here where he is so much better appreciated and prayed for. If this could only be, we should not only be relieved of the obloquy of being persecutors, but hundreds of these sallow-complexioned and hollow-cheeked preachers, who have for the last two weeks been pounding the dust out of their pulpit cushions in violent denunciation of our unchristian like demands and action, would be happy for about ten or fifteen days in the possession of a few thousand select saffron-colored souls. On the broad Josh Billings proposition that the best place for a boil is on some other fellow, is about the only way that I see to capture legislation or reason on the Chinese problem. But enough of this letter, with its general dullness and wild incoherence. It is as good, however, as its surroundings, and that is its satisfaction to the unfortunate reader.

Very truly yours,

FRED.

BILL CALLOWAY'S POST-MORTEM.

By James H. Lawrence.

"Bill Calloway has passed in his checks."

That's the way Jo Decker told the news. Jo had ridden through from the Calloway's place, over a rough road, crossing deep gulleys and swollen streams, in the teeth of a blinding storm. It was the close of one of those spring rains, in the foothills of the Sierra, known among the natives as "the clearing-up shower." Jo and his horse had caught a benefit.

The guests and idlers at the Pine Tree Hotel circled about him. Kreutzer, the landlord, laid his spectacles off, set out a decanter and glasses, and solemnly responded: "Ish dot so?" Except a stranger tourist on his way to Yosemite, lately from England, and who had never heard of Bill Calloway, everybody had a question similar in import to that of Kreutzer. "Is it possible?" "Bill Calloway dead?" "Are you sure?" chorused a dozen voices. "Sure enough," responded Jo; "Bill's gone to Shut-eye Town. I promised to stay with him and see it out. I had my arm under his pillow when he drew his last breath. He knew he had to go, and he faced the music like a man. About ten minutes before he died I gave him a little brandy toddy. He braced up—says Bill, says he: 'Jo, I'm going. I never'll see the sun rise on Forked Lightning Ranch again. The old woman and the children—that's all that worries me. But the boys will look out that they don't suffer.' Then he kind o' dozed a bit. Then he half opened his eyes and I felt him grip my hand like a vice. Then he let go all holts. It was his 'Good-bye, Jo,' just as plain as if he'd spoke it. No use multiplying words, boys. Bill was a good one. He was a nail-driver."

"But I've got lots to attend to. There is a grave to dig. Anybody seen old Lazarus Perkins? There he is, going up the street. One of you go up with him to the graveyard and show him that nice smooth spot on yon side of the four little pines. It's about ten feet south of where Jerry Simms was buried. Bill and Jerry were big friends. Jerry would like to have Bill alongside of him. Now somebody has got to go out to Forked Lightning. Everybody there is used up with watching and nursing. The old woman is takin' on awful, and one of his children is badly off with a sore throat. It's rough times with the Calloway family, but if the Mariposa boys haven't lost their grip they'll not suffer for something to eat and clothes to wear. Where's the Doc, did you say? He's snoozing along somewhere on the road. I see the rain is over. I'll just skip round to Higgins's shop and speak to him about the coffin."

Jo "skipped" out.

Jo's audience, excepting the landlord and his English guest, dispersed to spread the news.

"Some prominent and noted citizen of your village suddenly deceased?" queried the tourist, as he lighted a fresh cigar.

"Vell, no," replied Kreutzer, deliberately, wiping the glasses; "nobody has anything against Bill. He was a good man—yun of der poys. Everybody likes him—everybody knows Bill Calloway. Vell, vell! he's dead and gone. He has a big funeral. I dink I go and raise down der flag."

And, as is uniformly the case when good men die in that burg, the stars and stripes were lowered to half-mast.

When Kreutzer said "everybody," he referred to the territory embraced in that portion of Mariposa County south of the Merced River and east of Bear Mountain. Bill was not a great man (and he knew it), neither was he an aspirant for office, nor was he ever indicted by a grand jury. His popularity was a home production—a spontaneous growth of the area in which "everybody knew him." He had friends among the old miners at Sherlock's, Whitlock's, and Colorado; Mormon Bar, Bridgeport, and Yaqui Gulch glorified his name; Buckeye and Agua Frio went their "last red" on "Bill." Buckeye claimed to have found him first. It was in that camp he pitched his tent, he and a dozen other young stalwart fellows. They were a lively crowd—full of fun, jollity, and animal spirits; and Bill was, in all these characteristics, the acknowledged chief.

This was early in 1850, and the survivors of that period, who mined in that locality, will remember Bill. Age, about twenty-four; weight, one hundred and eighty; height, five feet, ten inches; complexion ruddy, the glow of perfect health in his face, which beamed with mirth and good-humor; the strength of a young Hercules and the activity of a wildcat.

Everybody drank in those days, and the Buckeye boys were not behind their fellows in their "regular tods" and occasional "big spreeds." Bill would stand in with them and usually put the other fellows to bed. They would crawl out with dreadful headaches and stomachs of no earthly use, while he would go around whistling and singing and doing the good Samaritan business—for he was kind and obliging. In this regard he had a way of making himself generally useful. He had seen a few years' service in the coasting trade on the Atlantic side, and could splice a rope and manipulate knots complex as the worst kind of a problem in Euclid. He could deftly stitch and mend torn garments, and cut and make canvas pantaloons, which were perfect in fit and warranted to never rip.

There was not much sickness in mining camps in those times, except such as resulted from excesses in liquor. Physical ailments came at a later day, when a more refined civilization put in an appearance, and people began to live in houses and take cold, neuralgia, rheumatism, and things. Once in a while a miner got disabled by accident. Usually a purse was raised to help the poor fellow "back to the States." Bill Calloway frequently led off in these benevolent movements. He was on hand to stand his watch by the bedside of the sufferer, and would go to the bottom of his purse, if necessary, for pecuniary aid.

Bill was good, jolly company—so everybody conceded. It was not for any brilliant wit or originality of expression. He had two or three old sea songs, worn threadbare before the revolutionary war, and a répertoire of ancient yarns and witticisms which have done duty in almanacs for a century or more. Most men, if they escaped a booting in a club-room, would be coughed down or ridiculed into respectful silence. They dared inflict them on an assemblage numbering over

Bill could sing those doleful ballads and spin those yarns, and every listener would applaud, laugh, and encore. Bill laughed louder than anybody, and that's the way to account for it. His laugh was mirthful, jolly, melodious, rich—it was contagious.

Two or three years brought a change in Buckeye and the neighboring camps. Families had settled here and there. "Families" means old women, widows (of both kinds), and young girls of sundry and divers ages. It means houses—houses built of lumber; houses with floors in them—plank floors. At intervals, and in central locations, a class of roomy, capacious buildings, defying all rules of architecture and suggestive of nothing in particular, had sprung into existence. Sometimes they were two stories in height; they were usually whitewashed, and conspicuously in view of the public gleamed, in bold-faced black letters, the single word, "HOTEL." It meant a capacious bar-room in front, a long dining-room extending rearward, a stable and corral somewhere on the premises, plenty to eat and a place to sleep—if a man wasn't too particular. Sometimes the establishment included a hall specially set apart for dancing, and again the big dining-room was made to do this extra duty. With the advent of the American woman there had also been imported white shirts, black frock coats, neck-ties, and high-heeled boots—articles of apparel primarily unknown in the wardrobe of the honest miner, and deemed to be the special regalia of preachers and card sports. Balls and social parties had become a necessity. "Grand Ball!" was the heading of the advertisement announcing these affairs in the county newspaper and displayed in half-sheet posters at conspicuous corners in the neighboring camps. Dancing was the standard amusement, and the most important factor in the holidays. Christmas Eve, New Year's, Washington's Birthday, Fourth of July, St. Patrick's Day, were each and all celebrated with a "Grand Ball"—to say nothing of Benefit Balls for the relief of poor widows and crippled miners. The etiquette of the times demanded the attendance of every person who could dance and who resided within twenty miles of the place. There was none of this foolishness in the way of sailing into the hall at nine or ten o'clock. If the proprietor didn't have his premises in order, and the musicians their instruments in tune, by early candle-light, the former lost patronage and the latter were individually and collectively damned. Women came long distances on horseback, bringing infants in arms—infants that required maternal care and sustenance. Men rode in attendance with more children, and here and there, attached to the saddle, a carpet-bag, valise, and a package or two. The belles of the period (unencumbered ones) were not numerous, and rivalry was intense, at times, for the privilege of a cavalier or supernumerary attendant in one of these small family processions. Bill never missed a dance. He may not have been up to the modern standard of grace and elegance, but he was active, vigorous, and untiring. Like Ames's money, he placed himself where he could "do the most good." He knew all the figures in the most intricate quadrilles, and had the rare accomplishment of "calling"—if occasion required. He was a ready volunteer in tightening saddle girths, packing baggage, and tending the babies; could wait on the table with a most marvelous dexterity, and had been known to ride ten miles and return with a missing fiddler, who was considered indispensable to the success of one of these grand balls. On one occasion a desperate fellow took umbrage at some imagined affront, and, swearing that he'd "break up the ball," drew a pistol and, in pursuance of his threat, proceeded to shoot the lights out. There were screaming and fainting among the gentler sex, and confusion all over the house; in the midst of which came a collision, the sound of a blow or two, and the "bumpety-bump" of a human body tumbling down stairs. The body that tumbled was in a limp, bruised, and demoralized condition. It was the remains of the desperate chap. He didn't attend a ball again for more than a month. Bill stood at the head of the stairs with the six-shooter of the prostrate bully. "I'm afraid that fellow has hurt himself," was the remark he made.

A short time before this a pugnacious shoulder-bitter had jumped the claim of the little old lame man at Buckeye. Bill Calloway heard of it, and ventured to say in the presence of the jumper that it was "a shame to impose on an old man and a cripple;" whereupon the pugilistic adventurer said, "May be you'd like to take it up." Bill's answer is not recorded in words. "Uncle Brewer," who lived on Buckeye, and saw the fight, said it was "like two of these 'ere Texas bulls coming together on a prairie, and just about as much hair and dust a flyin'." But, he added, "the other fellow didn't last a minute. Bill lifted him in the air the first lick, and hit him one as he was coming down; dog my cats, if I didn't think he had broke him in two. Gentlemen, I'd rather be kicked by a mule."

Bill didn't seek difficulties, but good pluck, and an honest intention to see fair play, occasionally led him into affrays where lead and steel were used. His bearing and prowess in these encounters made him still more popular. He was "game."

A year or two later he quitted mining—the placers beginning to give out. He and a "cattle man" from the plains built a corral and slaughter yard, opened a meat market, and for a while did a thriving business. Bill could turn his hand to anything in that line. He could ride a bucking mustang, throw a lariat with the precision of a Mexican vaquero, skin a beef and artistically dissect it; and when it came to packing it around to customers, he was there. This was his specialty. "The boys" gladly recognized his cheerful "whoopie" when he "lit in on 'em" about sunrise. In open-air camps, brush shanties, cabins, and tents, as well as the more pretentious residences within the scope of country constituting his rounds, he was a welcome visitor. Young children ran out to meet him—they loved him for the little rides he gave them on his gentle horse; old women leaned toward him and swapped gossip—he brought them the latest news; the young ladies met him with smiles—don't they rather like a man who is good-looking, generous, and has fight in him?

There were several groceries and saloons in his circuit, kept by friends of his, all customers, and in a sociable, friendly way, Bill would treat, or be treated, till it was not unusual for him to take in the matter of a dozen drinks before breakfast, and perhaps four times that amount on the round trip. He nevertheless kept his head level, and no one was ever heard to say that he was the worse for liquor. But it came to be remarked: "Bill Calloway is pizen-proof;" "It's like pouring it into a gopher hole;" and many an old practitioner, as well as the amateur drinkers, would sigh, and regretfully protest that they couldn't carry off whisky like Bill.

A few years more rolled by, and the camps and mining towns of that region showed visible signs of decay. "Decay" is hardly the term for the rapid gait at which some of them went to pieces. They tumbled. Bridgeport lost most of its first citizens by emigration—they left in droves. The Buckeye diggings were worked out, and a few scattering brush huts, with Chinese occupants, held the places where "the boys" used to mine. Mormon Bar collapsed, and instead of two stores there was only one, and people wondered how the proprietor lived. Upper and Lower Agua Frio melted into thin air. Prosperity departed from Yaqui Gulch. Carson's was hardly known by its Christian name, and Arkansas Flat was wiped from the face of the earth. Bill had trusted everybody, and scores of his customers left without paying their bills. Poor fellows! some of them couldn't help it. Others stayed and couldn't pay, but still bought beef. This class could have helped it. Bill got disgusted and sold out. Between bad debts and general loose management he didn't clean up much cash, but what he had he took with him to the county seat, and invested in a partnership in the saloon business; there are plenty of men who are willing take a partner in on easy terms when business is on the down grade. For a time things ran smoothly, Bill's popularity with the "old-timers" drawing well; but it was soon evident that the town was partaking of the general collapse, and, with it, the retail whisky trade was on the wane.

About this time he married. It had been the wonder of all the gossip women and old-maid men for miles around, and for the last decade or two, that he hadn't married before, so it was not altogether a surprise when Bill confided to a few friends that he was "going to get spliced." There was a general jollification at the wedding, and when it was over, the bride, who was an honest, industrious girl, and accustomed to housework, went right along with the domestic affairs of the matrimonial firm, like old folks, while Bill attended to the saloon branch, and whistled, sang, and tried to make business lively. It all wouldn't do. The flush times were past; the pockets of the few old friends who still lingered were empty as the once rich pockets in the gulches; and the more recent immigrants came with less reckless habits—more nearly conforming to the period. Bill's partner "took in" another man and wisely slid out of the concern. The new man and Bill didn't agree. They had a few growls, resulting in a proposition from the latter to buy or sell, which met the views of the new man, who took Bill's interest at a very low figure.

This transaction, which left him in still more reduced circumstances, was followed by another removal. Bill took a smaller saloon in another part of the town. It was a little, old, one-horse affair, and had been a sort of half-way place between time and eternity for three or four superannuated monte dealers and rheumatic short-card sports. It had been successively known as the "Gem," the "Hole in the Wall," and the "Deadfall." Bill called it the "Shebang"—whatever that means; who knows can tell. It had a couple of rooms in the rear of the little ten-by-twelve front, and these were occupied by the Calloway family—for, by this time, Mrs. Calloway had a baby.

The business of the "Shebang" didn't keep pace with increasing responsibilities. For four years its proprietor lingered along with it, and annually, with the regularity of the precession of the equinoxes or the occurrence of Christmas, there was added another responsibility.

It soon became apparent that the "Shebang" must close. Not only had it ceased to be a bare living, but for some months it failed to meet current expenses, not taking into account household items. Something must be done—a change made. "If I only had a little place outside of town—sort of a wayside stopping place—where a fellow could pick up a dollar once in a while from the stage passengers, and keep a few pigs and chickens, and have a garden and raise truck," soliloquized Bill. "What do you think about it, Lizzy Jane?" he asked of his patient, plodding wife, after he had outlined the plan. Lizzy Jane looked up from her sewing (she was making a shirt for one of the little Calloways out of an old calico shirt of Bill's) and answered that she thought "it would be nice." In fact, it didn't make any difference to Lizzy Jane. Everything was nice in her estimation—that is, everything approved by Bill.

There was a location seven or eight miles from town where there was a good spring of clear water, a small patch of arable land, and plenty of timber for firewood and fencing. It was originally a miners' camp, but had fallen into the hands of a long, lank, lazy hoosier, who had fitted up a horse-trough outside and a sort of bar inside. A canvas sign hung pendant from the awning front, upon which was inscribed, in irregular hieroglyphics, "LIQUORS and SE-GARS." Wickerby was the proprietor's name, but he was better known as "Legs." Except that he justly earned the reputation of keeping the worst article of "rot" that ever destroyed a mucous membrane, there was nothing remarkable about "Legs." The boys attached all sorts of labels to the stuff he passed over the counter, but finally settled on "Forked Lightning." This name stuck, and was eventually attached to the locality, which was thereafter known as "Forked Lightning Ranch." It was for sale.

"Legs" had assigned his interest in the premises to a creditor, and it was advertised to be sold at a bargain. It struck Bill Calloway as being about the thing. He called in an old confidential friend, one Gideon Wardwell—"Uncle Gid" was the name by which he was best known. Uncle Gid was a good, plain, blunt, honest man. He, too, was one of the indispensables of that region. Besides numerous sterling qualities which go to make up a good citizen, Uncle Gid had accomplishments. He could play the violin, and it had come to be considered that unless Uncle Gid and his fiddle were in the orchestra of a ball-room the ball stopped. This was what had particularly endeared him to Bill Calloway. "He can come nearer tearing a fiddle all to pieces than any man I ever knew," was the way he expressed his admiration for Uncle Gid's musical talent. (Just the sort of man to call in for a consultation on a practical business matter). Uncle Gid more than approved the proposition. He added inducements Bill hadn't thought of.

"Suppose you haven't got everything you want to stock your place—can't you make it? I'll swear, Bill, you order take enough in at the bar in one season to buy you a span of horses, a wagon, and all the tools you need. It's just about the right distance from town for a ride. Get up a ball once in a while. Thar's money in it, Bill. Ned Wales made his first raise off a ball out at Wild Goose Ranch. I played for him—why, you was thar, Bill?—and the old man branched off into a review of social gatherings of twenty years before, where he and his old fiddle had played a conspicuous part. They were living in the past, having bridged over the intervening time, with its changes—all fatal to the schemes in which Calloway proposed to figure.

The move was made. In due course of time an open wagon with a scant load of furniture, a good-natured looking woman, four tow-headed children, and driven by a bald-headed and rather corpulent man, rolled out in the direction of "Forked Lightning Ranch." It was Bill Calloway who drove, but changed wondrously—sadly changed from the rollicking, fresh, healthful, and vigorous Bill of earlier years. The rosy hue of youth and health had given place to a mottled yellow and purple complexion; his bright blue eyes were blurred and blood-shot; his form had acquired rotundity—he was bloated. The elastic step of old times had gone; his gait was shuffling, limpy, and awkward. He stopped the team in front of the principal saloon, at the invitation of a dozen or more old friends to "come in and take a parting drink." "Come out and see me when you can—all of you. It will be a little rough for a few days, but we'll have the shanty fixed in a week or so. Uncle Gid is going out to help me straighten up things." And Uncle Gid was already aboard the wagon with his kit of carpenter tools and that extraordinary fiddle.

There were brief handshakings, a concord of good wishes, and a waving of hats as the wagon again started. A variety of comments followed this new departure. They were not altogether favorable, though it was generally conceded that almost anything was better than stopping in town. "What do you think about it, Lige?" This query was propounded to a gaunt, sallow-complexioned, shock-headed person, half sport and half miner, who appeared to be inextricably tangled in the rounds of a chair he had tilted against a favorite post.

"What do I think? I'll tell you, boys: I think, if old Gid Wardwell wasn't an old man, I'd like to bounce a four-year-old club off his head. He has put Bill up to this croquet. Farm be dog-goned. What does Bill Calloway know about farming? If he did know all about it, what good would it do him? There isn't over an acre of ground on the place that will grow anything. There's a little patch back of the house that might do for garden truck. That's all of it. The balance wouldn't sprout black-eyed peas. No, that isn't what he's on. He thinks he'll take in slathers of coin from the stage passengers. The blamed fool—he ought to know that these Yosemite tourists ain't the sort who used to go over the road when stages ran from Mariposa through to Stockton. Fellows who'd bounce out of the coach into a bar-room, call up everybody in sight, treat all hands, throw a five-dollar piece on the counter, and not wait for change—scatter their money like they'd found it in the road. They are a nice sort who travel now. They carry lunch baskets, and when they drink it's out of a private bottle. Not one in twenty of 'em will ever get out at Forked Lightning. They'll stay in their seats, and if they happen to feel right dry they'll ask the driver if he'll please be so kind as to hand 'em a drink of water. Then the old man has got Bill stuffed full of the idea of giving balls and shooting matches—same as we used to have in old times. Where's the money coming from to keep up that sort of thing? How many of Bill Calloway's surviving friends can afford to ante up for a ball ticket, horse hire, and Concord harness? I tell you the country's played out; the collateral isn't here. I'm a friend of Bill's—I wish him well—but I just know how it will be. He'll linger along maybe for a year and then you'll see—he and his Forked Lightning speculation will peter out. He's a gone fawn-skin. Good fellow? of course he is; but he's like some of the balance of us—one of the has-beens?"

Lige was about right. The first ball at Forked Lightning was a dead failure. It was in the winter season, and an unfortunate storm assisted in bringing about this financial result; but even under more favorable auspices, in the nature of things it could not be much better. The "collateral" was wanting. Then, when the season opened for Yosemite travel, the prediction of Lige was verified with the certainty of prophecy. To sum it up, "Forked Lightning petered," and all too late Bill had practically demonstrated that there was "nothing in it."

About fifteen months had elapsed since his last move. Sometimes two or three of his old-time associates would drop in on him "to see how he was getting on," and add an occasional four-bit piece to his lean income. The reports from Forked Lightning were of dull times and worse a-coming. Meanwhile it began to be rumored that Bill was "poorly." He had been complaining of the "rheumatiz, or a cold, or something." Uncle Gid said he had "a misery in his stomach." One day news came that Bill was "right sick." Then the doctor was sent for. Not many weeks before this he had been summoned to attend Mrs. Calloway professionally. It was her fifth.

"The boys" called in force. They went out to the ranch by twos and fours, took it turn about in sitting up with him, and did everything that was possible under the circumstances. The wife and babies were not forgotten. The women took it in hand, and got up little sewing circles; not to make garments for distant heathens who don't wear clothes, but for the little Calloways, who were of Christian parentage, and in need of raiment. A rough, bearded mountaineer went around with a subscription paper for their benefit. The broken-down sport, Lige, turned his pockets inside out, and headed the list with $4.25. "The last button on Gabe's coat," he remarked. Great-hearted fellows, who had known Bill in '49 and '50, went for their "bottom dollar," regretting that they hadn't more to give. Uncle Gid suggested that it would be a "good idea" to get up a "benefit ball," and offered to play for nothing. He was persuaded that it wasn't just the thing at that particular time. He felt grieved that his suggestion was not adopted, but he fell into line with "the boys," and contributed liberally. The wife and babies were provided for. The town went to sleep to dream of little tow-headed angels in clean clothes, stuffing themselves with bread and butter; it woke to hear the sensational announcement of Jo Decker, that "Bill Calloway had passed in his checks."

SAN GORGONIO PASS, February, 1879.

CONCLUDED IN NEXT NUMBER.]

REMINISCENCES OF CENTRAL AMERICA.

How Chico Paniaguas Gained His Freedom.

Chico Paniaguas was a true child of nature, and in no human breast could a stronger love of liberty and personal freedom exist than that which reigned in this half-breed's heart. It influenced his actions, directed his pursuits, and was his dominating guide in the path of life. By birth a Guatemalan mestizo, it may well have happened that some portion of the blue blood of that adventurous Spanish nobility which wrested the ground he trod upon from its ancient possessors coursed through his veins, implanting in him the pride, rude notions of honor, and restlessness of spirit which were prominent traits in his somewhat irregular and contradictory character. "Son of the soil" as he was, he was brave and childlike; trustworthy, yet thoroughly faithful; manly, but of puerile simplicity; inconsistent, but persevering; independent and indifferent in matters which others would deem of importance, but curious withal about trifles. Calm and self-possessed in moments of great peril, he displayed a boyish excitement and unsteadiness in pursuit of amusement or when participating in the national sports. Cheerful, merry, and talkative, active, experienced, and capable, he was an amusing companion and a valuable servant. Servant, however, is a misnomer, as applied to Chico, inasmuch as the services he rendered, in return for a stipulated sum to be paid for them, had no smack of servitude about them in his appreciation of his position as seller of them. An agreement was made and carried out by him with about the same condescension that a fashionable tailor would have exhibited in providing Don Chico Paniaguas himself with a suit to be paid for on delivery. Telling him to do anything would not serve your purpose—you had to ask him. An order was unheeded; a request cheerfully and promptly attended to. Chico had, moreover, his accomplishments. He danced, sang, and twanged the guitar second to none; swore to perfection when occasion required, while his easy style of profanity was natural and free from all consciousness of merit on his part on the score of its originality and comprehensive depth and breadth. His morals, it is true, were not of that high order required in more advanced communities, and might have been declared to contain a large proportion of alloy if tested in the crucible of our own virtuous and cherished Pecksniffs. Still, he was a man, every inch of him, and for what faults he had human nature is responsible. In person and physique he possessed all those qualities most requisite in the reckless roaming life he led. His slight figure was straight, lithe, and rather tall; his limbs spare, but of that wiry, sinewy cast that indicates great powers of endurance under considerable exertion, rather than the capability of efforts of great strength. His activity was wonderful, and to his ready hand, and its simultaneous action in unison with his quick eye, he often owed his escape from sudden and deadly danger. No one could touch him with the machete—a weapon, wood-knife, and implement of a dozen different uses in his country. His face was handsome and pleasing, and, with his frank address, won his way for him in his adventures among the fair as successfully as did his physical resources in the mountains and forests. Settled home he had none; friends he had everywhere. In one sense he might be styled a vagabond, for, born in Guatemala, he had wandered all over Central America in the assertion and enjoyment of his personal freedom, and was as well acquainted with the other four States as with his own.

I first met him in Greytown, Nicaragua. He had been recommended to me as a trustworthy guide over the Cordilleras to San José, the capital of Costa Rica. The road—a narrow mule-track across the mountains—is rough and wearisome. Nor is it without danger. There are streams to ford which at times become perilous torrents, though at others they are hardly ankle-deep. The descents in places are all but precipitous, while for miles and miles the way stretches along the edges of perpendicular cliffs that overhang gorges which have never been entered by any human being. The distant hum of the wild river that, thousands of feet below, rushes on in its sinuous course over its broken and rocky bed, strikes faintly on the ear with ever-varying cadence. Were it not for the hardships of the road, and the incessant showers of heavy rain, the journey would be a delightful recreation. From some points the scenes are grand beyond description. To right and left, above and below, the mountain forms rise and sink in a tumultuous confusion of wild figures and combinations. Eastward the ocean can, from here and there, be dimly seen, blending, in the indistinctness of distance, with the neutralized, hazy color of the leaf-clad forest that covers nine-tenths of Central America. Dense woodland everywhere, from the highest summits to the lowest stretches of the flat coast—but woodland interwoven with the silvery threads of its rivers and streams, and adorned with the continually changing play of cloud-shadow and sun-gleam.

It was not, however, my good fortune to see views like these on my first journey on this unfrequented route. The weather on that occasion was bad. It rained incessantly, and, from time to time, with a downfall that no one who has not experienced the shower-bath force of tropical rain would imagine. The thunder storms that daily broke over us were truly terrible. The blinding flashes in rapid succession, and the simultaneous reports, multiplied by a hundred echoes till the din was deafening, bewildered one; the air had a sulphurous smell; the angry whiz of the close lightning made one's flesh creep; and as, in mad sport, it crashed through tree or rent some pointed rock, it startlingly proclaimed to us our insignificance and helplessness. Chico was accustomed to this kind of thing, and evinced an imperturbability which I should have been heartily glad to share in. Twice during this trip I was a witness to his coolness and presence of mind on occasions when the least false move had cost him his life. In the early days of the Central American Transit Company an attempt had been made to open this route to general traffic. The company had obtained valuable privileges from the Costa Rican Government. A considerable portion of the road was actually made, and the project might have been carried through had the Transit Company succeeded; but with the sure prospect of that undertaking being ultimately a failure, work on the Serapiqui road—as it was called—soon ceased, the part completed fell rapidly into disrepair, and the company's deserted building on the lonely Desengaño Mountain was soon all that was left to tell of the enterprise.

At certain places on the line of the survey they had had to cut the road along mountain sides that were almost perpendicular. In one of these cuttings we found that a land slide had occurred, carrying away the road for the distance of a dozen yards or more, and presenting to us a precipitous slope to be crossed. Chico, without hesitation, at once urged his mule across this dangerous place. But the loose earth failed the sure-footed animal, and in a few steps it was hanging, heels downward, over the chasm, clinging with all four feet and cat-like grip to the treacherous ground. At the first slip I had given up man and beast for lost; but the rider was equal to the emergency. Lasso in hand, he had left the saddle instantly, and in a few bounds had reached firm foothold on the other side, from whence he aided his mule with hand and voice to claw its way out of its dangerous position. It may be unnecessary to add that, as to myself, I made the crossing on foot with a hitch of Chico's lasso around my waist. The other occasions on which he had to display his intrepidity occurred at the last of the mountain streams we had to pass. These streams were swollen by the rains, and, having crossed the previous one with some difficulty, Chico determined to decide this one's depth on foot; for, should the mules once lose the bottom here, nothing could save them, as the river, a few yards below the ford, plunged in roaring cataracts down a succession of rugged steps. With pole in hand my guide essayed the crossing, but slipped, in the rush of the water, when midway, and when he would have recovered himself with the support of his pole, it snapped. It was impossible, now, for him to hold his own. Just over the edge of the fall hung a rough rock, round which the waters broke and seethed. Without an effort at resistance, turning face to this at once, he directed his course to it, allowing himself to be hurried along by the impetuous stream. Grasping the rugged edges of the stone, he clung to it with limpet-like tenacity, and, with a laugh, called to me from his perilous hold to throw him the lasso. Had he, through want of self-possession, lost for one moment the control of his action, never more would human eye have seen our Chico Paniaguas.

Chico and I were on the most friendly terms when we arrived at our journey's end, and during the next six or seven years he was more than once my companion on the same road, and frequently my guide on expeditions into other unfrequented parts of the country. The last time I saw him was at Guatemala early in 1871. The revolution which turned Cerna out of the Presidential chair was in preparation. An armed force was mustering on the Mexican frontier, and internal conspiracy within the capital itself was causing agitation and anxiety among the inhabitants. In the country agriculture was greatly neglected, owing to the flight of the laboring classes to places of security in the mountains to avoid conscription. Poor Chico, who loved his freedom so dearly, was not so fortunate as to escape, and had been pressed into the service while staying in the city. Had he been engaged in active campaign, he would have enjoyed the excitement, I believe; but he was detailed for garrison duty in the fort which commands Guatemala, and the confinement and restraint were unendurable to him. When I arrived in the city, he had been removed to the barracks situated on the west side of the principal plaza. It was just before the outbreak of hostilities which terminated in Cerna's overthrow and flight, and the public mind was in a state of great excitement and expectation. I had endeavored, without success, to obtain Chico's release, and had almost decided to pay the sum required for his exemption from service, so wretched, sad, and gloomy had the poor fellow looked in the morning I had told him of my failure. About sunset that same day rapid reports of musketry were suddenly heard inside the walls of the barracks, and much alarm prevailed among the merchants and the peaceably inclined of the citizens, as it was feared that a part of the garrison had mutinied in favor of the revolution, and that the war would be carried on in the capital. The firing soon ceased, however, and before long it was known that a crazy soldier had shot his commanding officer and several others. At a later hour, accompanied by an officer with whom I was well acquainted, I visited the scene of the tragedy. A blanket covered the form of the dead soldier who had caused the fatal fray. Upon its removal, I looked upon the calm and rigid countenance of Chico, who had gone on his last journey. Urged by some sudden impulse which his companions in arms understood not, though I well could, he had shot down his officer while passing in front of the guard-room, and, having control over a stack of loaded arms, had carried on an indiscriminate fire upon all who opposed themselves to him, killing and wounding no less than seven men before bullet and bayonet-thrust laid him low. And thus it was that Chico Paniaguas gained his freedom.

R. D. MILNE.

STOCKTON, March 11, 1879.

The following extract from a letter from Canada gives a fair idea of the sport called tobogganing, and affords at the same time an interesting glimpse of "greatness at play." "The Governor-General tried his hand at it, and a bit of his coat got loose somehow under the toboggan, which is always fatal. Over he went in the steepest part of the second plunge, but luckily the snow was too soft to hurt. Then he took it into his head to try going down a shorter hill with a jump right on to the skating-rink. We tried hard to dissuade him, for if persons are shot off with such an impetus on the ice is a very different landing to the soft snow, and we knew what would happen if the Princess caught sight of him. However, off he went; the toboggan rose straight in the snow like a horse does at a fence, shot on to the ice, and right across the rink all safe. Then several gentlemen followed him. By this time up came the Princess, who we had hoped was safe at the bottom of the big slide and too busy hauling up her toboggan to notice us. Of course, nothing would suit her but she must try it at that instant herself, so all that could be done was to level the snow-bank a little, so as to make the toboggan jump a little less violently, and put someone to catch her on the other side, and off she went. Luckily she kept the toboggan quite straight and on the rock, so she spun across right to the curling-rink long-stop, as he was christened, caught and broke through, which might otherwise have damaged the toboggan wonderfully plucky, but His Excellency would not let it any more."

FOUR MALEFACTORS.

Our community stands in the presence of a great peril. Circumstances, accidental in their nature, have culminated to the point of danger. An individual, dangerous in himself and representing a dangerous class, is threatening the very foundations of society. Social order and the rights of property are menaced. We have allowed the class to which we refer to have its way in framing an organic law utterly subversive of the rights of persons, and one which, if allowed to become a law by its adoption, will do more to destroy the prosperity and hinder the progress of California than all things else. An organic law that makes communistic and agrarian legislation mandatory will do more to imperil the welfare of our State than all the calamities to which we have alluded. This dream of the sand-lots, if carried into effect, will strike a blow at capital which will react upon values of property and the prices of labor. Demagogism has arrayed capital against labor. The man who has nothing is endeavoring to rob the man who has something. It is an encounter between the idle and profligate on one side and the industrious and economical on the other. The daily press of San Francisco is directly and alone responsible for this condition of things—the Chronicle, the Bulletin, the Call, and the Post; we name them in the order of their villainy. The Chronicle originated and invented this devilish mechanism; the Bulletin, Call, and Post are cowardly and selfish abettors. Without these journals—their lying and their cowardly machinations, their miserable jealousies, and their greed of small advertisements—there had been no Kearney, no sand-lot organization, no ephemeral political triumph, no communistic and agrarian Constitution. They have, by cowardly silence and by mercenary misrepresentations, given importance to what was at best but unorganized discontent, till now it has become a formidable menace to property values, to social order, and to the progress and prosperity of the coast. These journals ought to be punished by the community. They depend upon their advertisements for their existence. Withdraw from them the advertising patronage of our merchants and business men, and not one of the journalistic proprietors has money enough to print his paper sixty days. Our citizens are thus placed in the absurd position of paying for the papers that are injuring them. They are supporting the men who are endeavoring to destroy them. They are responsible directly for the possibility of the adoption of the new Constitution, for the possibility of a Kearney administration. The Chronicle and Call encourage Kearney to go through the country denouncing with foul-mouthed calumnies the best men and best interests of the State. The four journals named have decided to stake their existence upon the triumph of idle rogues and political vagabonds; they have tied their fortunes to the sand-lots. Now, let the business community sit down on those papers and withdraw their patronage, and let us see whether newspapers are supported by the intelligence, wealth, business, and industry of this city or by the moblots of the sand meetings. Let the merchants take their advertising away from those papers and let them advertise Kearney. To do this effectually, let one hundred merchants and leading business men get together and establish a cheap, decent, dignified, and respectable newspaper; let them properly capitalize it; give it the Eastern news dispatches; put it under the editorial control of an able and discreet writer; give it respectable men as reporters. Let it be truthful; let it avoid sensation, scandal, and nastiness. Let it be cheap—given away, if necessary, for three months. Let it have an honest business management. Let the business community—the men who own it—support it by their own advertisements. It would bankrupt the whole daily press in six months; it would send every mother's son of them scratching in the direction of decency in order to regain the confidence of the community they have all betrayed. There is a power greater than the press—it is the power of the purse; and this city can hold it like the sword of Damocles over the heads of these small, jealous, intriguing, cowardly journalists, and compel them to take the side of right, justice, decency, and good government. It will take less money to build up a good daily paper than it costs every year to bribe our present newspapers to the support of the right. The railroad, the steamship, the banking, the mining, the manufacturing, the mechanical corporations are being directly assaulted; the names of their prominent corporators are held up by the Chronicle to daily abuse, and the other journals are too cowardly to say an honest word in defense either of the persons assailed or of the industries in which they are engaged. Such a shameful and utterly debauched condition of things exists no where else upon the continent. A new and respectable paper would take all the legitimate business from the journals we have named. The religious community of all classes, the decent people in all the walks of life, would support. Even the suggestion of a movement in this direction will frighten these newspaper men, and we prophesy that this article will aid to drive them from their offices and make them take sides upon this constitutional and Kearney question. We shall see them come around the next week. This advice is unselfish; there is no one to be benefited by it. THE ARGONAUT that desires connection with a daily journal.

STUDIES IN TONE AND COLOR.

My classification of the pictures in the present exhibition of the Art Association, stands about thus: Those in which good work has been attempted, successful or otherwise, and those others in which the evident effort is bad or illegitimate, with no matter what result—although, naturally, in this later case the result as art work can be only bad. The good work is that which bears upon its face the imprint of an honest effort to do the best with its subject that the artist is capable of, without any arrière-pensée as to what impression it is going to make upon the public, and without consideration of its market value in dollars and cents. This is the nature of the work of the true student—for the artist is always a student—the conditions of its production being, firstly, the power to see aright—that is, with that clearer and more subtle appreciation of the picturesque that is the essential quality of the artist; then the ability to portray, and, lastly, a correct judgment (made up equally of knowledge, experience, reverence, and modesty) in the selection of the proper subjects to treat. The bad work is based upon the very opposite of these qualities; perhaps not all of them are at once lacking, but generally some one whose presence is essential. The strongest characteristic of the bad work in this exhibition is the utter absence in most of it of either modesty or a proper respect for the nature of the thing attempted. Too much of it is painted with the intention of making an impression on the more ignorant beholder and with the view of making it appear to be worth the price affixed to it in the catalogue; whereas, more than one-half of the work is not really worth fifty per cent. of the price asked for it, and some of it worth accurately nothing at all. And the worst side of the matter is that some of this worthless work is done by those who are quite well aware of its worthlessness, and who could have done better had they but tried.

Of Mr. Thomas Hill's large landscape, No. 44, entitled "California," it seems to me there can be but one opinion: it is great. Painted in a lower key than we are accustomed to in the larger pictures of this artist, and dealing with our landscape at a period (the late autumn) when the prevalence in it of hot browns makes it peculiarly difficult to treat, Mr. Hill has succeeded in realizing the utmost truthfulness to nature without sacrificing either beauty or harmony of color. The arrangement of the composition is full of a grand repose, and the handling that of a master. I can not but regret to see it flanked by his large "Garden Corner," which, although a praiseworthy effort, is after all more a pièce d'occasion than a great work, and from an artist who can paint the "California" we have a right to expect only masterpieces. If the first place in landscape belongs this year to Mr. Hill, there is no doubt in my mind as to who is entitled to the second. It is Mr. Yelland, whose "Glimpse of Monterey Bay," No. 60, is one of the loveliest pictures in the room; it is at once a perfectly accurate and very poetic statement of a fact. It is a subtle and refined interweaving of the literal rendering of rocks, sky, and water, with the romance, the essence of it. It is well drawn, beautiful in color—in short, admirable in technique; and yet the technique is about the last thing one thinks of in this picture. It is the beauty of the scene and the artist's expression of it.

Of other larger landscapes we have some half a dozen of Bradford's Arctic views, that are becoming rather tiresome. Mr. Bradford, in fact, reminds one somewhat of the party with the one story that is trotted out on all occasions; he needs to hunt a new audience occasionally. The larger of his pictures—a sort of Nocturne in pink ice cream—is certainly effective and pretty, but it is tawdry effect and not very deep beauty. Mr. Keith, who has two or three bright, shiny bits of Napa Valley and Shasta scenery, seems somewhat troubled with his usual dyspepsia, and exhibits (small room, Nos. 130 and 139) two cold and cheerless canvases, and one large one, "Autumn Sunset," No. 30, that is a perfect blaze of gorgeous color. If Mr. Bradford's large picture is a Nocturne, this one of Mr. Keith is no less than a Grand Caprice Militaire; it is a blast of trumpets and drums, it is a war-whoop, a yell, a salvo of artillery, an almost anything loud. As a picture I do not pretend to understand it. I think I can see the intention of the thing, and do not suspect Mr. Keith of any desire to do an unworthy piece of work—surely he is above the necessity of painting "stunners"—but this deluge of yellow and red looks strangely like it. It is not a strong picture, it is not a good picture; it is only very showy. Another showy picture, although not without some meritorious features, is the "Baranca Honda" of Mr. Rix, No. 27. Economy is undoubtedly an admirable virtue in a young man, and one that I respect withal, but it does seem to me as though in most of the work we have seen from his easel Mr. Rix endeavors to purchase his effects with too meagre an expenditure of pains or study, and that consequently they are a little—well, cheap. There is a stunning bit of light thrown on a mountain side with a certain show of what is meant to represent strength, but is only violence; a passage of vivid green that stands for verdure in strong light (where does the light come from?) but is only green paint; an undoubted picturesqueness of general treatment, and a certain aplomb in handling, but —! I think Mr. Rix can do better work than this; I hope he can, for if he can not I fear that he has got his entire growth without having much stature. Better work, although with less agreeable result, is to be seen in Mr. Strauss's, No. 26, "Founding the Mission." This picture is evidently the outcome of much patient and careful study; its fault lies perhaps in this very condition, for it seems overlabored and somewhat dry. The landscape (the figures are merely accessory) is carefully and ably drawn, but the color has the air of having had the life worked out of it, while the atmosphere has turned to dust, and is really stifling. It is evidently a studio picture; it groans with the recollection of weary hours of hopeless labor; it knew from the first that it was too much for its author, and now that it is finished it is convinced that it was right.

One of the most ambitious, and at the same time interesting canvases in the main gallery, is Mr. Tavernier's "Awaiting Montezuma," No. 3, a picture of decidedly original conception as well as treatment. Not that there is any marked originality in the use of landscape in the historic sense, or in the introduction of the bits of gold leaf with which Mr. Tavernier brightens up his sacred fires; but this picture, as indeed everything from the same hand, has character, quality, and bears the impress of a decided individuality and pronounced artistic temperament. I find it difficult to sympathize with Mr. Tavernier's conception of the picturesque, and not unfrequently feel as if it were rather strained or exaggerated—a little melo-dramatic, say; but I think I recognize the standpoint from which he regards nature as well as art, and can not but respect it. In this picture he shows some of his best qualities of technique; it is skillfully composed and admirably painted. I wish I could say as much for Mr. R. J. Bush's "Catskill Creek," No. 1. Mr. Bush has made the serious mistake of attempting to do something that he certainly should be aware is quite beyond his present ability, and to this mistake is added the still more serious one of exhibiting it in its present condition. Mr. Bush has one picture, "Feeding-time," No. 29, that is quite meritorious in color and handling; he should have contented himself with this one. Mr. Rabjohn's "Evening on the Columbia," No. 6, is one of those amateurish works that should never have passed the Hanging Committee. This applies also to Mr. Wytenbach's No. 12. Mr. Page has a faithful study from nature, No. 8, in which he mildly, but pleasantly, tells us just what he saw there. Mr. Johnstone says but little in his Nos. 23 and 37, but says that little well. Mr. Sears gets beyond his depth in a "Moonlight," No. 33, and recovers himself in his "Mountain Lake," No. 25, which is harmonious in color and altogether pleasant. Mr. Dickinson—well, Mr. Dickinson's place is in the small gallery, where I hope to meet him anon.

I have been trying for the past ten minutes to begin upon the marine views, and can not get a word upon paper for thinking of Mr. Brookes' "Salmon Trout," No. 11. The thing isn't a marine view in any sense that I am aware of, nor can I imagine any sort of reason why it should come between me and my work, unless—ah! I have it—it's the ultra-marine landscape that he has painted in as a background! Why did Mr. Brookes do it? His fish are so fishy, so scaly, so—well, so all the things that dead fish ought to be; they are so well drawn, and colored, and painted generally, that surely they don't deserve to have a bad landscape stuck up behind them just to show that he can paint one even though it be bad! I wish somebody would invent a new species of fish! I wish—pshaw; I was going to look at the marines.

I have looked at them, and with but little comfort or edification. There is a large, ambitious one by Mr. Denny, "Running the Blockade," No. 42, that is too large for the place it occupies by every inch of it, since it is hastily and carelessly painted, and not at all up to its author's usual standard. There are two considerable ones by Mr. Coulter that remind one of Stanfield's early (bad, hard, and cold) manner; the larger one, however, No. 13, having lots of "go" in it. There is a breezy bit of progress from Mr. Shed—"Off Sandy Hook," No. 53—and a capital "Foggy Afternoon," by Mr. C. D. Robinson (No. 17), in which the play of broken light upon water is very delicately rendered, and which is altogether very picturesque, albeit a little Turner-esque in treatment. Then there are some more by Mr. Bradford—but, no; frozen water can hardly be brought under the heading of "Marines." Voilà tout.

Mr. Ferrer's concert, at Dashaway Hall, last Wednesday evening, was largely attended and brought a varied programme, skillfully arranged, and mostly very well carried out. There was some excellent singing of part songs by the Hughes Quartet of Oakland—the voices nicely balanced and in tune; a Fantasia for harp, played by Mr. Solano in his usual masterly manner; a violin solo by Herr Geoffrie—an antiquated set of variations played in a more than antiquated style, and occasionally a little "off" in intonation; a guitar solo by Mr. Kim (pupil of Mr. Ferrer), that well merited its encore, and a spirited and dramatic rendering of Schumann's "Two Grenadiers" by Mr. L. A. Dochez. The more serious work was mostly in the hands of the ladies. Madame Grant, of Healdsburg, in the aria from Ernani, displayed a beautiful voice and very good style, and made a point in her selection of Mendelssohn's "First Violin" for the encore that was vociferously demanded. Miss Grace H. Greene (of Oakland, I believe) has a beautiful, sympathetic contralto voice, and also sang—notably her encore—very tastefully. Miss Jovita Ferrer seems to be constantly improving in voice and style, and will, ere long, become one of our most attractive concert singers. Her little "Spanish song"—a recent composition of Mr. Ferrer's—created quite a furor. Miss Eugenia Ferrer played the Rondo Capriccioso of Mendelssohn—a sub-tropical version of it—as well as well-trained fingers and a sudden attack of stage-fright would permit, but redeemed herself fully in the Souvenir d'Andalusia of Gottschalk (encore), which was given with a precision and beauty of touch that reflect great credit upon her master, Señor Arrillaga, who did himself an injustice in playing the first movement from Chopin's E minor Concerto without accompaniment and after accompanying steadily for more than an hour, but who, nevertheless, did it in a way that proved him to be an excellent pianist. Mr. Hughes sacrificed himself and his lovely tenor voice at the opening of the programme; but somebody had to do it, and Mr. Hughes's singing is delightful whether it comes first or last. S. E.

EDITORS OF THE ARGONAUT:—"My pride protests against the part of a Jew being performed by an Irishman." Your correspondent "A Jew" makes the above remark in speaking of James O'Neill playing "Jesus" in Mr. Salmi Morse's Passion Play. If your correspondent will read ancient Irish history he will be apt to find that Uriah's beautiful wife, which made David seek his life, was a Hov Nial on the mother's side. Therefore, as the O'Neills were once the Hov Nials, and as Uriah's wife was King Solomon's mother, and as Solomon was the distinguished ancestor of Jesus, it stands to reason that James O'Neill is anthropologically a proper person to play that character. Let "A Jew" read history.*

SINGLE-LINE.

*See Ogygia; Bede's Church Hist.; Keating—O'Flaherty; Denis Burns, the Piper; Gratianus Lucius; Tara's Hall; The Book of Job; Hittell's History of San Francisco; The Ancient Observations of the Hon. Philip de la Roche, etc.

THE OTHER SIDE.

From the mass of Eastern opinion on the Chinese question, in its present stage of development and phase of manifestation, we select the following editorial utterance of Mr. George William Curtis, as being about the fairest exposition of the views of that class which alone is entitled to a hearing—the men of brains and education, unconnected with church, commerce, or partisan politics. It is not enough that we know the right; we must also know the wrong as held by our most respectable and powerful antagonists. Audi alteram partem is not only an utterance of justice—it is a maxim of discretion: "It is long since the country has been stirred with so genuine an indignation as that produced by the passage of the Chinese bill. It was so wanton a breach of the faith of treaties, so gross a wrong, committed with such haste, and without a pretense of the necessity of haste, that the popular condemnation was immediate and universal. The Senators who advocated the bill spoke as if a hundred thousand Chinese on the Pacific Coast were such an imminent and appalling peril to American civilization and forty millions of Americans that the public honor and American principles and international comity must all be thrown to the winds in order to avert the danger. Press and people of all parties have seldom been so unanimous as they were in protesting against this bill, and seldom has the fact that Congress does not always represent the country been made more evident. It was well understood that the reasons alleged for passing the bill were not the real reasons. It was and is generally believed to have been hurried through not from any honest apprehension that such an act was necessary to save American civilization or to protect American labor, but to save the autumn elections in California, and protect the interests of the party that should show itself to be the most zealous on the subject. The vote showed, as we said last week, that the Democrats bore away the palm of such zeal. Almost the entire Republican weight of the Senate was thrown against the bill, and in that act represented the Republican sentiment of the country. Such legislation was felt to be a price much too high to pay for party success, desirable as it may be, and as a bid for the California vote the Democratic party is entitled to the prize. Senators Hoar and Hamlin took the position that the Republican senatorial leaders of other days would have taken. Seward, Sumner, Fessenden, would have denounced the bill on every ground, and would have scorned such an effort for such a purpose. The earnestness and feeling of the brief discussion in the Senate, and the overwhelming force of the argument against the bill, recalled the energy of the radical debates of twenty years ago, when the Republican minority carried off the honors. What is the imminent danger against which the bill, abruptly breaking a treaty which we had warmly welcomed, was supposed to protect us? It is the torrent of barbarism which, as is alleged, is setting in with terrible force upon our Pacific coast. What are the alarming facts? That the movement to and from China during thirty years has left a hundred thousand Chinese upon our shores, and that during the last six months more than twice as many Chinese have returned to China as have come to America. In the face of such facts Congress resolved abruptly to break a treaty, to withdraw from American citizens and commercial interests in China all treaty safeguards, and to serve notice upon every country with which we have treaty engagements that we shall violate them without notice, and whenever we choose. And all this to carry an election in California. There could have been no doubt what the Executive would do. The question was not of Chinese immigration, nor of the influx of barbarism; it was a question of the faith of treaties and of the national honor. It was precisely one of the occasions which illustrate the wisdom of the veto power conferred to the Executive, and which shows how the President with the veto may more truly represent public sentiment than a Congress of politicians attempting to outbid each other for a party advantage."

Obscure Intimations.

- ENGLISHMAN, from Australia.—We don't know who you are. Is there any reason why we should not have been informed? Many of our volunteer contributors appear to be afraid we will give them up to the police.
- "1675."—We have the matter under consideration, and will let you know next week.
- "PERSONAL PROTEST."—You neglected (inadvertently, no doubt) to append your name to the letter in which you make complaints of our conduct and ask us not to repeat it. About how much importance do you suppose we accord to an unknown person's complaint of a grievance not stated?—if it's a fair question.
- "INTERVIEW."—We confiscate your stamps, and shall not return the verses, except some time in print. Keep still, can't you?
- SALINAS.—Can not find the poem. Wait a week or two, and we shall be able to give you an answer by mail.
- J. C. F.—The reason we did not credit the article was that it was handed us "torn from its parent stem," and we were in doubt as to its paternity—in our gross ignorance deeming it a burlesque on your publication, the name of which we good naturedly suppressed.
- E. C.—We don't know how many St. Peters there are, or were. The circumstance that in the Passion Play of Mr. Morse the rabbi instructing the infant Jesus sworn by St. Peter does not make us think there are two St. Peters as much as it makes us hope there is only one Mr. Morse.
- DOMINO, S. F.—You will never be able to write poetry, pray that you may some day be able to see that you can't. That will be a higher and rarer distinction than the fame of a poet.
- C. C.—We think you have the poetic faculty; what you need is intellectual training—study. If we find you a "bore," we shall shut you up, as requested, and you may be thankful in that case if you escape without being called many, many names.

We need not concern ourselves to indignantly deny that Puck has made a "palpable hit" in re-naming our State "Kearneyfornia." Kearneyfornia is good—devilish good, 'egad!

SUBURBAN SAUCE.

OAKLAND, March 14, 1879.

DEAR JUNO:—I come to the front once more, and this time as the champion of my people. That the pen is mightier than the sword is an immensely consolatory idea to me just at present. Happy am I that a weapon so trusty and sure is given me on which I can impale that maligner of my people, the "Witch of Endor." Now, in the first place, I shall strip all concealment from him. It is just no witch at all, Juno, dear; it is a man, and I know who he is. Tell you? No, not yet. I will give him one more chance to retract all the wicked things he has said of us. Perhaps he does not believe that I know who he is. What about that San Francisco lady to whom a friend introduced him and whose society he subsequently treacherously cultivated unknown to his confiding friend? How now, my bonny boy?—for he is a boy, Juno, and a very young one at that. He is said to be sensitive on this point; of course the malignancy of my conduct stands confessed when I state this fact so openly, taunting and deriding him with it as I do. Indeed, Juno, I feel strangely aggressive toward this youth. He has taken my nice little band, Captain Pythias and his four Damos, in whose welfare and good name I have a sort of god-motherly interest; he has taken them—all men old enough to entitle them to his respect—and introduced them to the public in the redoubtable company of the barber as gossips and flirts; and in the case of one Damon there was something about "aces" that savored of gaming. Now, I asked my brother Bob if it was that, and he said he did not know. If there is one thing more than another that I am proud of it is my brother Bob's innocence. So, I don't feel ashamed—no, not one bit—to have to confess that he could not tell me. Well, I have made up my mind, all alone, that it meant my friend played for steaks, or stakes—oh, dear! which is it? Juno, this is very wicked in that old Mr. "Witch," for he knows, as I know, and as everybody knows, that the gentleman referred to has had a very pious bringing up, and never—what, never?—well, hardly ever, has been guilty of such a thing.

Then there are the twins. To think, after all the trouble I have had with them—the mental anxiety and nervous energy I have expended in their training and in regulating all the little differences between them, and finally, after I thought all was smooth sailing, and they had really grown to like one another, and that soon I could offer them to the public as specimens of what a true and beautiful "twinism" should be—to think that this party hailing from Endor should now step in and endeavor to foment trouble. I can positively state to the public that prior to his malicious suggestion there was no trouble. If the dead-gold suits are discarded, his article suggested the idea, and it has been done since it appeared. If they have clinched in mortal neck-tie combat, for this, too, he is responsible. Moral responsibility is a fearful thing to contemplate. Juno, I wonder if he shudders at what he has done now. I must confess, dear, there was one point of radical difference between the twins that I had almost despaired of ever seeing reconciled. They would not speak the same tongue, or, rather, the juvenile member wouldn't. He it was that oftentimes would indulge in the strangest flights, going into a land where no man could follow him. As I heard a young lady say once, "It is the queerest talk I ever heard; it is not Spanish, Sanscrit, French, thieves' vernacular, or anything. What is it?" I fear it never will be known, Juno. Like Hobbie's Fairy, it probably was "blown in," a divine inspiration infused identically with the breath of life. Well, I even felt sorry for the other twin when he was thus deserted; he looked so forlorn, so utterly lonely, always reminding me forcibly of a poor, wee chick when its playfellow duck essays a plunge into that watery element where it can not follow.

And the ladies! What was it the "Witch" suggested about them? That they flirted? Oh, horrors of horrors! False and wicked chronicler! Juno, I ask you terrifiedly, was it not just about the time that that calumny went to press that the artillery of heaven was heard hereabouts. You remember the other day the peal after peal of hoarse, raging sound that passed over our little town. Can not you believe the very heavens intended to express their horror at so cruel and false a statement. I can. I almost consider this refutation enough; but in addition, I will state the fact, that the whole national character of our Athenian women is diametrically opposed to flirtation. They are of a serious, metaphysical mind, with high art culture and tastes existing among them. In evidence, I offer the fact of one lady friend, who attends lectures at the University. Now, minds imbued with thoughts and tastes so different can not, and do not, as is well known, descend to what is vulgarly termed flirtation. No, no, no, a thousand times no! So, now I warn the "Witch." You must take back all you have so falsely said of us or I will expose you.

Mr. Lunt's dancing-school is a great success. The young Southerner (he would be so charming if he would be less precise and practical and more sentimental) has finally brought his brother out. This gentleman proves to be a magnificent specimen of manhood—"a modern Achilles," as I heard one enthusiastic lady observe. I think this system of oppression that exists among the older toward the younger brothers in many of our Athenian families a thing greatly to be deplored. These unfortunates are kept in a species of nursery-bondage by their tyrants of elder brothers until, for very shame, they have to bring them out. If I belonged to this enslaved class I would quickly organize and rise in revolt. As it is, I often feel that I will get out a writ of habeas corpus, calling upon these jailers to produce their captives. I know that so many of them would be such an acquisition to our society.

The Occidental Club is mourning over the loss of its greatest legal luminary. This only goes to prove that some gentlemen have after all a latent sense of the obligation of family ties. I wish we could see more of our little friend of the Naval family—he is very nice. I like his name, too; it reminds me of a gem-strewn Pescadero beach. By the way, marriage has improved our friend of the double-sounding name, H. H.; he is positively devoted in the quarter that he should be. I always said that man would be a model Benedict yet. J. W., now that the cloud of sickness has risen from over his household, is as jovial and gallant as ever on the Oakland boat. Speaking of the boat, what funny conversations one does overhear there sometimes. I said funny, but I must confess that there are times when they are anything but that. For instance, when one has to sit by and be slowly tortured in hearing one's friend's family discussed. This thing has happened before this. Otherwise, if the subject is not of a personal nature, one is often edified and amused. I have acquired much valuable information in this way. The other day I overheard a young lady giving gravely to a companion an antidote for ennui—the "blues." Her tone was very solemn and earnest all the while. Said she: "He came, the poor little ragged boy, one day about dinner time to the kitchen door. He merely told me the regulation tramp's story of inability to get work, hunger, and exposure to cold and storm. There was something in his face, though, that reminded me of brother. I could not turn him away. I believed in him and took him in, and oh! he has amply repaid me since for all I have done for him, not only by his manual labor about our house and grounds, but in the revived zest and interest he has given me in life. Beautiful! beautiful!" Her sweet brown eyes grew very luminous just here, Ju. "I am superintending his reading. In three days he has finished That Wife of Mine and is now nearly through The Woman in White. His use, too, of tobacco I have reduced to a sound hygienic basis, he agreeing to forswear the use of it if I will furnish him with enough of brother's cigarettes to make it a fair exchange. I have already purloined a sufficient quantity of John's hosiery, linen, and clothing." Poor brother, I thought, Juno, he has indeed had to pay dearly for that resemblance. "My lad is very, very happy; I am amused, diverted, and haven't had an attack of my old bête noir—the blues—since my protégé arrived."

I made a mental note of this recipe, dearie, just as I have here given it to you. I have been testing it, too. I waited until one day when I had a regular case of the "dumps" fastened on me; then, arming myself with a package of Bob's cigarettes, I haunted the culinary department the whole of that day. It certainly proved an immense diversion, this thing; but, as a complete eradicator of the blues, I can not recommend it. In the first place, I was unsuccessful in finding one tramp that was willing to abide with us; they were all migratory—regular birds of passage. Then, I didn't succeed either in getting a single stroke of work out of any one of them. But as to expression—just what Parrhasius once so eagerly sought—I got any quantity of that when I offered as a last persuasion the cigarettes—expression, too, of a high order, the regular, ecstatic, beatitude kind. The idea occurred to me, Ju, that your painter's soul would instantly take fire at this, and that you might be able to give us some sort of a refutation of a picture I always particularly detested: the one with the deadly sick youth clinging to the lamp post. Your trouble will be in getting your subject to stay and give you more than one sitting. Perhaps you can manage it better than I did; try it.

I have just thought of two bits of news that may interest you. First, there is something the matter with our "little Mac"; he has not been attempting to show off lately. Evidently he has palled on the taste of the public at last, and is off the bills. Poor fellow, I hope he has guarded against this contingency, and has a berth secured in the Actor's Home or County Hospital. Second, I have to tell you that the offending president of our skating club resigned, and the matter of costumes was placed in the hands of a committee. The president's friend, who originated this idea of dress reform and caused all the trouble, still blindly and stubbornly maintains his claims to be considered an "artiste." He intends, in conjunction with neighbors who once had a wide metropolitan reputation in this business, to soon open an Emporium of Fashion. He has our best wishes in his new venture.

The equestrian season will begin soon, I suppose. I don't mean the circus, but our horseback exercise. The vanguard, Noah's brother, is already out on his cream-colored pacer. The many-hued costume of this gentleman, Ju, is enough to take your breath away. He looks as though he had broken loose from a circus or race track—half jockey, half clown. Now, this is a case where I do believe an elder brother should exert some authority. In the interest of Art and the eternal fitness of things this young gentleman should be repressed. Do do it, Noah, please. Your loving

MAID OF ATHENS.

The End of the Shooting Season.

One last day on the hills, and then,
The season closed—the guns put by.
Till brown September comes again
No more the coverts we will try.

To-morrow morn the quail will be,
Through all these sylvan solitudes,
Unvexed of dogs, from sportsmen free,
To mate and nest and raise their broods.

The buckeye leaves are putting forth,
With buttercups the fields are gay,
And on his summer journey north
The sun serenely rolls his way.

With purple buds the oaks are crowned,
The almond trees are all about,
And where the laughing streamlets bound
The yellow mustard blossoms glow.

A thousand tender shades of green
Spread over all the smiling land;
Unnumbered flowerets deck the scene
With varied hues on every hand.

'Neath where their scarlet clusters clung
The Christmas berries scattered lie;
Spring's sweet profusion round them flung
But marks their time to fade and die.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 14, 1879. GEORGE CHISMORE.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, March 16, 1879.

Eastern Oysters.
Vermicelli Soup.
Brains fried with Parsley.
Shallots and Sherry Wine, served in paper cases.
Asparagus à l'Argonaut. New Potatoes fried in Butter.
Roast Lamb, Pickled Peaches.
Sweet Potatoes.
Tomato Salad, Parsley, Onion, and Mayonnaise Dressing.
Chocolate Ice Cream, Orange Cake.
Fruit-bowl of Apples, Bananas, and Oranges.

To COOK ASPARAGUS à l'ARGONAUT.—Boil and drain very hot dish; sprinkle upon it two tablespoonsfuls grated lard, a little sprinkle of red pepper. Put on a layer of asparagus, then more asparagus, etc. Four melted butter over, and

THE MILL OF ETRETAT.

A Legend of Normandy.

I.

Etretat was not always the pretty and coquettish little nook it is now, where folks bathe and dance, the piano tinkles, and voices sing day and night. There was a time when bathers did not promenade the beach in oilskin caps and harlequin suits. Indeed, it is barely thirty years since the shore knew no other frequenters than stout, hoarse sailors, fishermen and their wives and little ones, tanned by the sun and salty air, and coarsely clad.

Before that—so long before that the memory of that time survives but as a faint tradition—Etretat had no need of cits and fashionables, the strangers who yearly go there to barter their money for fresh air. "They bring water to the mill," the local proverb hath it, and water is precisely what Etretat stands sorely in need of. There folks must drink the water precisely as they find it—sometimes turbid, sometimes brackish—and put their dependence mainly in the rains, when with infinite trouble the farmers fill their cisterns. Indeed, so scarce is water there that a majority of the country-folk have entirely renounced its use, and instead slake their thirst with a particularly fine cider or a particularly vigorous brandy.

II.

Once upon a time there was no scarcity of water at Etretat.

Then in the midst of the lowlands, between poplars, willows, and fair apple trees, ran a charming brook that brawled and murmured over its pebbles and among its cresses, and at last sought the sea near the spot where Mother Hatville now serves up a very excellent dish of fresh fish with a cream sauce which is marvelous.

There was then at Etretat a poor woman, Coquin by name, a widow, with two children. Her husband, Ludwig, man-at-arms in the service of the Lord of Criqueot, was so handsome, so resplendent, so proud in casque and cuirass, that his companions called him Ludwig le Coq, a name changed to Ludwig Coquin, and of which the wearer was deservedly proud.

But Ludwig Coquin, who had followed his lord to the second Crusade, after performing prodigies of valor and sending scores of infidels down to the shades, had at last fallen in the Holy Land upon the body of his master, the Lord of Criqueot, and nothing had ever been heard of him; and his poor wife, Clotilda, lived with her two little ones in extreme poverty, awaiting the return of him who was never to come back.

Upon the brink of the brooklet, hard by the cot she owed to the generosity of the Lord of Criqueot, was a mean shed in which was a heavy millstone, to crush the corn from which the peasants made their black bread; but the stone had to be turned with the same painful labor applied to the fisher's capstan on the beach. This was of little consequence when the stout Ludwig was there to apply his broad breast to the bar; but since his departure, and since the boat of Clotilda's father had gone down at sea with all its crew, the task had been found well nigh too arduous for the poor woman, although her eldest son, young Ludwig, brought willingly to her assistance the strength of his small arms. Only with the utmost difficulty could she obtain by her labor enough to satisfy her daily wants; nevertheless she endured her hardships with patience, awaiting hopefully the return of her beloved husband and the growing in strength of her boys.

III.

But all her troubles had not been told, for her younger son, a child of four, was stricken with one of the cruel complaints that are so often found in Normandy; a malady which wastes their flesh, saps their forces, and at last kills them—the local name of which is carreau.

One evening, as little Jehan, pale, weak, his visage sunken with pain, lay moaning in his cradle—while Clotilda and little Ludwig were straining at the bar that turned the millstone—an old man approached, walking with difficulty, and seated himself on the stone bench at the door. He was sheltered but indifferently from the sharp breeze of evening in the folds of the remnant of a torn cloak, and his bare feet were dusty and bleeding. He did not speak, but his aspect spoke for him.

Clotilda ceased her labor at the mill, and, approaching him, said: "My father, you are tired, and doubtless hungry; God knows there is little enough for the children and me, but what there is, I beseech you, come and share with us."

"Be blessed, my daughter," said the old man, in a gentle voice; "you alone of the whole country-side have opened your door to me." And entering the cottage he sat down to meat, not without having cast a searching and pitying glance at the humble surroundings.

Noticing the cradle of little Jehan, the old man went to it, took the child in his arms, and, laying his hand on its hard and swollen stomach, pronounced a brief prayer. "There, woman," he said, giving her the little one, on whose cheek the rose of health had suddenly bloomed, "your child is cured. This work is too hard for you; hereafter let the water which runs before your door do the work for you. It will enrich you and yours so long as you and they remain as I have found you—pious, compassionate, succoring the poor, and trusting in God."

At that moment the mean hovel shone with a celestial light. The old man was transformed and became young; a golden helmet glittered on his head; his breast-plate glowed like flame; he mounted a white horse that an angel, clad in white, held at the door; on his shoulders he wore the same fragment of a cloak* the needy wayfarer had wrapped himself in.

Clotilda, pressing her two children to her breast, fell upon her knees, for she recognized the great Saint Martin, who often appeared in Normandy, where still dwelt descendants of his family.

Saint Martin stretched his hand toward the stream—toward the hut; his horse sprang forward, and the vision vanished in a luminous ray.

IV.

Next morning, when Clotilda and the children awakened, they could not believe their eyes. The little rill had become a great, broad creek, and the shed a great stone building.

* Martin, it may be remembered, cut his soldier's cloak in twain to give garment to a beggar. He always appears wearing the fragment.

A dam stretched across the stream, whose pent-up waters drove a huge wheel, that filled the air with its harmonious tic-tac, and turned six beautiful sets of millstones—stones that gave a flour so fine and white that never had there been seen its like in all Normandy. Besides this, the stream watered and fattened the land through which it flowed; the fields it watered yielded triple crops, and the cattle that pastured there thrived as none others did.

The mill of Etretat became famous throughout the country. There was no farmer so far off but he sent his grist to it, and soon Clotilda's poverty gave place to wealth, and she and her children died rich, happy, and full of days, after having done great good upon the earth, and never having closed their door to the poor.

V.

Long, long afterward the possessor of the famous mill, naturally a descendant of Clotilda, was one William Coquin. He was rich, as none of his forefathers had been, but he had inherited none of their good qualities, being hard to his servants, greedy of gain, haughty toward his inferiors, and pitiless for the poor and unfortunate. "If they suffer," he would cry, "it is because they deserve to suffer." Unhappily, all the country-side followed his sad and cruel example, so prosperous and independent had Etretat become.

One evening William Coquin was enjoying the cool of the day in his arbor, listening to the murmur of the mill-stream and the joyous whirr of the wheel that never rested, night nor day; on the table were a fine mug of cider, a fair, white, wheaten loaf, and a delicious little cream-cheese. Looking up, the miller beheld approach timidly an old fisherman, old and bent—so old and bent that he seemed well nigh broken in twain. He was tanned as brown as leather, and a ragged fragment of a cloak was wrapped around his shoulders.

"Master," he said, humbly, "a morsel of bread and a draught of cider; I have walked a long distance to-day, and am worn out; my boat has been shipwrecked, and I have lost all but these rags. Have mercy on me, and I will pray for you."

"Out of here! Get out!" screamed the angry miller, falling into a frightful passion; "away, you dog! How dared you, miserable vagabond! enter my grounds without permission? Go! Had you behaved yourself you would not have had to beg and sponge on others. Off—to the devil with you!"

And as the old man still begged a bit of bread, the miller called his men to drive him out.

VI.

But they had not laid hands on him when a tremendous gust of wind smote the country, and laid everything level with the ground—mill, trees, dwellings, barns. The earth trembled, the skies were black as ink; the roaring waves ran up and swallowed the ruins.

This old fisherman was none other than the great Saint Martin. The white horse on which he now appeared cast a lurid light, and the rider's cuirass glowed like lightning in the pitchy darkness.

"William Coquin," said the Saint, sternly, "you have proved false to the faith and the promise of your fathers. Of the fortune and wealth God gave you you have made an evil use; you have neither been liberal nor just toward the poor and unhappy, who are the friends of God. Therefore you shall become poorer and more wretched than the meanest of them, and your name even, hitherto blessed and honored, become the designation of all that are wicked and all that are vile."

He said this, and disappeared at a gallop, in the midst of a sheet of lightning that cast a baleful glare over the wrecked and ruined country-side.

On the morrow no trace could be seen of mill, stones or creek; nay, there was not even the original rivulet left.

History records that the wicked miller was reduced to such frightful destitution that he was forced to dispute with the swine the rotten apples that the farmers cast aside as worthless. At last he vanished from the Norman country—no one cared to ask whither.

VII.

As the great Saint had predicted, the name of Coquin assumed a new and disgraceful meaning, and when nowadays it is said of a man that he is a *coquin there needs not to be said much more about him. Nevertheless there still live at Etretat a family of excellent, honest folk, descendants of Clotilda, who have nothing in common with the unworthy miller except the name.

As for the river, if ever you go to Etretat you can see for yourself that no trace of it remains, neither is there a mill, nor yet any source of prosperity save the tide of strangers that once a year breaks upon the lonely and rugged shore.

At low tide, however, Saint Martin, having pity upon the poor women that needed soft water for their washing, has permitted the lost creek to reappear here and there in little pools among the bowlders of its old bed, so that for a little while daily or nightly they can beetle their linen. When the tide comes in, however, you see no more of the stream than if there never had been such a thing.

Finally, as for the great Saint Martin, it is many a long day since his apparition in Normandy has been credibly recorded, possibly because of his indifferent success on a previous occasion. It is, however, known that at the beginning of the last century a family tracing its descent from him lived and flourished in Normandy, and it is altogether probable that its representatives survive to this day. Indeed, less than forty years ago such representatives dwelt in the chateaux of Lions-la-Forêt and Neufchâtel, to whom their great progenitor had bequeathed the power of curing the carreau by the imposition of hands; so that annually, in the month of September, the sailors and peasants brought their children from all parts of the country to invoke the protection of the Saint, through the instrumentality of his descendants.

Such as it is, this is the legend of the Mill of Etretat and the Great Saint Martin.

* Coquin—Knaave, rascal.

A Washington bride wore a wreath of carnations, instead of orange blossoms, at her wedding recently.

It is a fashion at Paris weddings to have two pages instead of bridesmaids.

LEON GAMBETTA.

Gambetta was born at Cahors, and is the son of a crockery dealer in that town, who sent him to the seminary, intending that he should become a priest. The Abbé Massabie, his uncle on the mother's side—an excellent man, who still lives—had sought to instill into him principles of religion, and was pleased with the lad's impetuosity in mastering Scripture history, which he mistook for holy zeal; but young Léon had not been two years at the seminary before he was expelled for repeated acts of insubordination, and the Superior dolefully wrote to his parents: "You will never make a priest of him. He has an utterly undisciplinable character." One may compare this with an opinion expressed many years later by M. Grévy, who bluntly said: "You'll die in the skin of a Revolutionist." It is worth remarking that the four Frenchmen who may be regarded as the worst bugbears of the Clerical party all began life under ecclesiastical auspices. Ernest Renan was the pet pupil of Dupanloup at the Séminaire St. Sulpice; Victor Hugo was educated by a Jesuit, and composed his first ode in a deeply religious vein in honor of Charles X.; Henri Rochefort earned his first academical laurels by a sonnet to the Virgin Mary. Gambetta, on leaving the seminary of Cahors, proceeded to the Lycée of that town, and he was still there when he met with the accident which deprived him of an eye. He was playing in the shop of a carpenter, his father's neighbor, one half-holiday afternoon, when an apprentice whom he was teasing made a lunge at him with a pointed stick, and inadvertently poked the eye out of its socket. This cruel mishap indirectly made the boy's fortune, for had he retained the sight of both his eyes he would have studied for the medical profession, whereas now it became necessary to prepare him for a profession where he would only have to use his tongue.

In 1867, he was already known as a rising man, awaiting his opportunity—a jovial, leather-lunged, brazen-voiced fellow, who would tread in the steps of Danton if occasion served, and yet never let himself be guillotined by a new Robespierre. Everybody even then rendered justice to his Italian astuteness, derived from Genoese blood. When an Italian is at once eloquent and shrewd, fervid in speech but circumspect in action, he towers above any Frenchman by a head and shoulders, for Frenchmen are seldom good "all round" in politics. No great country has boasted so few real statesmen as France. It has had orators who rushed into politics and got lost as in a fog, and diplomats who, having come to power, thought that men were to be governed by finessing. The art of over-reaching men and that of ruling them are, however, distinct. He possesses all the qualities of the statesman, some being in their maturity whilst others are yet in the bud. Having come to office, he will rule France with almost unprecedented success and for a very long time.

He became famous and popular all at once in December, 1868, when speaking as counsel for the Réveil, which had been prosecuted for organizing a subscription to raise a monument to the Representative Baudin, who was slain at the coup d'état of 1851. He delivered a harangue, which was one long, impassioned, and scathing philippic against Napoleon III. Most people wondered that the Judges of the Sixth Chamber should have allowed him to proceed to the end of this denunciation unchecked; but one must have heard Gambetta speak to understand the entrancing charm of his oratory. In April, 1870, he uttered his memorable speech about the "irreconcilables," plainly telling the Ollivier Ministry that he and his followers only accepted the Liberal concessions of the Empire as a "bridge" toward the Republic. In the ardor of his peroration he swept his hand over the ledge of the tribune, and knocked a bowl of beef broth which had been brought for his refreshment on to the heads of two ushers beneath. In the case of ordinary speakers this mishap would have raised inextinguishable laughter; but as it was, no one even smiled, and the two ushers wiped their hair, ears, and coats in the mutest resignation. Gambetta came to demolish Napoleon's throne, just at the time when a man of his sort was wanted.

The generation which had seen the butcheries of December, 1851, had half passed away, and the new generation was inclined to judge of the Empire by its pinchbeck splendor and the great material prosperity it had conferred on the land. Gambetta roused the conscience of the nation by reminding it of the crimes which it had no business to bury in oblivion. He came like Daniel at the feast of Belshazzar, but he did more than interpret the writing on the wall; he himself wrote the "Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin" with the blood of the martyred Baudin. From the first it was never doubtful that his prophecies would be fulfilled. All Paris felt that great events were impending; but Gambetta himself had an idea that he should be suddenly arrested and shipped off to Cayenne. The writer met him a few days after the battles of Woerth and Forbach, when the Empress Regent had put Paris in a state of siege, and at parting said: "Au revoir au Capitole." He shook his head and answered that he thought Palikao, the Prime Minister, would try to kidnap him. "All my footsteps are dogged," said he, "and my poor aunt advises me to carry a revolver about with me. But that would do no good." The apprehension of being arrested did not shake Gambetta's nerve or interfere with his spirits. He had not taken to "doing Banting" in those days, and after every one of those copious repasts in which he delighted, and where Burgundy was his staple wine, he would jest in a truly Rabalaisian style about his imperial enemies.

Letters from Byron, Moore, Rogers, Montgomery, and others celebrated in literature at the beginning of the century, will be found in the two-volume Memoir of the Rev. Francis Hodgson, B. D., written by his son, and published by Macmillan. There are letters from Mrs. Leigh full of mention of her "darling brother," Byron.

The Empress of Japan takes great interest in the silk spinning and other industries of the country, and it has been stated in the native papers that the tea shrubs growing in the garden of the imperial palace were picked by one hundred girls, in holiday attire, in the presence of her majesty.

The average opera libretto is said to be "the substance of things hoped for and the evidence of things not sung."

MR. MASTHEAD, JOURNALIST.

When I was in Kansas I purchased a weekly newspaper—the Claybank Thundergust of Reform. This paper had never paid its expenses; it had quite ruined four consecutive publishers; but my brother-in-law, Mr. Jefferson Scandril, of Weedhaven, was going to run for the Legislature, and I naturally desired his defeat; so it became necessary to have an organ in Claybank to assist in his political extermination. When the establishment came into my hands, the editor was a fellow about as fit for his position as Simon Cameron for the presidency of an asylum for widows—a fellow who had “opinions,” and him I at once discharged with an admonition. I had some difficulty in procuring a successor; every man in the county applied for the place. I could not appoint one without having to fight a majority of the others, and was eventually compelled to write to a friend at Warm Springs, in the adjoining State of Missouri, to send me an editor from abroad whose installment at the helm of manifest destiny could have no local significance.

The man he sent me was a frowsy, seedy fellow, named Masthead—not larger, apparently, than a boy of sixteen years, though it was difficult to say from the outside how much of him was editor and how much cast-off clothing; for in the matter of apparel he had acted upon his favorite professional maxim, and “sunk the individual,” his attire—eminently eclectic, and in a sense national—quite overcame him at all points. However, as my friend had assured me he was “a graduate of one of the largest institutions in his native State,” I took him in and bought a pen for him. My instructions to him were brief and simple.

“Mr. Masthead,” said I, “it is the policy of the Thundergust first, last, and all the time, in this world and the next, to prevent the intrusion of Mr. Jefferson Scandril into legislation.”

The first thing the little rascal did was to write a withering leader denouncing Mr. Scandril as “a demagogue, the degradation of whose political opinions was only equalled by the disgustfulness of the family connections of which those opinions were the spawn!”

I hastened to point out to Mr. Masthead that it had never been the policy of the Thundergust to attack the family relations of an offensive candidate, although this was not strictly true.

“I am very sorry,” he replied, running his head up out of his clothes till it towered as much as six inches above the table at which he sat; “no offense, I hope.”

“Oh, none in the world,” said I, as carelessly as I could manage it; “only I don’t think it a legitimate—that is, an effective, method of attack.”

“Mr. Johnson,” said he—I was passing as Johnson at that time, I remember—“Mr. Johnson, I think it is an effective method. Personally I might perhaps prefer another line of argument in this particular case, and personally perhaps you might; but in our profession personal considerations must be blown to the winds of the horizon; we must ‘sink the individual.’ In opposing the election of your relative, sir, you have set the seal of your heavy displeasure upon the sin of nepotism, and for this I respect you; nepotism must be got under! But in the display of Roman virtues, sir, we must go the whole hog. When in the interest of public morality”—Mr. Masthead was now gesticulating earnestly with the sleeves of his coat—“Virginius stabbed his daughter, was he influenced by personal considerations? When Curtius leaped into the yawning gulf, did he not sink the individual?”

I admitted that he did, but feeling in a contentious mood, prolonged the discussion by leisurely loading and capping a revolver; but, prescient of my argument, Mr. Masthead avoided refutation by hastily adjourning the debate. I sent him a note that evening, filling in a few of the details of the policy which I had before sketched in outline. Amongst other things I submitted that it would be better for us to exalt Mr. Scandril’s opponent than to degrade himself. To this Mr. Masthead reluctantly assented. “Sinking the individual,” he reproachfully explained, “in the dependent employe—the powerless bondsman!” The next issue of the Thundergust contained, under the heading, “Invigorating Zephyrs,” the following paragraph:

“Last week we declared our unalterable opposition to the candidacy of Mr. Jefferson Scandril, and gave reasons for the faith that is in us. For the first time in its history this paper made a clear, thoughtful, and adequate avowal and exposition of eternal principle! Abandoning for the present the stand we then took, let us trace the antecedents of Mr. Scandril’s opponent up to their source. It has been urged against Mr. Broskin that he spent some years of his life in the Lunatic Asylum at Warm Springs, in the adjoining commonwealth of Missouri. This cuckoo cry—raised though it is by dogs of political darkness—we shall not stoop to controvert, for it is accidentally true; but next week we shall show, as by the stroke of an enchanter’s wand, that this great statesman’s detractors would probably not derive any benefit from a residence in the same institution, their mental aberration being rottenly incurable!”

I thought this rather strong and not quite to the point; but Masthead said it was a fact that our candidate, who was very little known in Claybank, had “served a term” in the Warm Springs Asylum, and the issue must be boldly met—that evasion and denial were but forms of prostration beneath the iron wheels of Truth! As he said this he seemed to inflate and expand so as to almost fill his clothes, and the fire of his eye somehow burned into me an impression—since effaced—that a just cause is not imperiled by a trifling concession to fact. So, leaving the matter quite in my editor’s hands I went away to keep some important engagements, the paragraph having involved me in several duels with the friends of Mr. Broskin. I thought it rather hard that I should have to defend my new editor’s policy against the supporters of my own candidate, particularly as I was clearly in the right and they knew nothing whatever about the matter in dispute, not one of them having ever before so much as heard of the now famous Warm Springs Asylum. But I would not shrink even the humblest journalistic duty; I fought these fellows and acquitted myself as became a man of letters and a politician. The hurts I got were some time healing, and in the interval every prominent member of my party who came to Claybank to speak to the people regarded it as a simple duty to call first at my house, make a tender inquiry as to the progress of my recovery, and leave a challenge. My physician forbade me to read a line of anything; the consequence was that Masthead had it all his own way with the paper. In looking over the old files now, I find that he devoted his entire talent and all the space of the paper, including what had been the advertising columns, to confessing that our candidate had been an inmate of a lunatic asylum, and contemptuously asking the opposing party what they were going to do about it.

All this time Mr. Broskin made no sign; but when the challenges became intolerable I indignantly instructed Mr. Masthead to whip round to the other side and support my brother-in-law. Masthead “sank the individual,” and duly announced, with his accustomed frankness, our change of policy. Then Mr. Broskin came down to Claybank—to thank me! He was a fine, respectable-looking old gentleman, and impressed me very favorably. But Masthead was in when he called, and the effect upon him was different. He shrank into a mere heap of old clothes, turned white, and chattered his teeth. Noting this extraordinary behavior, I at once sought an explanation.

“Mr. Broskin,” said I, with a meaning glance at the trembling editor, “from certain indications I am led to fear that owing to some mistake we may have been doing you an injustice. May I ask if you were really ever in the Lunatic Asylum at Warm Springs, Missouri?”

“For three years,” he replied, quietly, “I was the physician in charge of that institution. Your son”—turning to Masthead, who was flying all sorts of colors—“was, if I mistake not, one of my patients. I learn that a few weeks ago a friend of yours, named Norton, secured the young man’s release upon your promise to take care of him yourself in future. I hope that home associations have improved the poor fellow. It’s very sad!”

It was indeed. Norton was the name of the man to whom I had written for an editor, and who had sent me one! Norton was ever an obliging fellow.

B.
SAN FRANCISCO, March 11, 1879.

Criticism as is Criticism.—By Single-line.

I want to call your attention to a British author whom I read some, and partly understand. This author ought to be better known to English-speaking readers than he is. I would, therefore, recommend to the writers and critics in our language the speedy formation of associations for the purpose of teaching Shakespeare—I mean William Shakespeare; he has no middle name, so far as I know. In this last respect he resembles another man who ought to be better known, particularly in America. I refer to George Washington. Both of these men are, or ought to be, great joys to the mudsills of society, because they are both eminent “scrubs.” No matter what tuff-hunters and flunkedom say or write, there is not a traceable drop of “noble” or “royal” blood in Shakespeare or Washington.

The very names of these two men bespeak plebeian origin. Take Washington’s name. What can be easier than washing-town. If it had been wash-house it would have been all the same. His great, wise health would have been all the same. He was, in mind and body, the healthiest man of two centuries; another strong evidence that he was a scrub. I’m very glad, however, that his name was not Smith; that is to say, I am glad on America’s account. The Smith family can be glad or sorry on their own account, just as they please—there is enough of them.

But let us stick to Shakespeare. His name is not Shakespeare—that is his play-writing and rhyming name. All of us great men—truly great—have literary names. When it came to plain prose and to the signing of deeds or other documents this great author’s name was Shakspeare; or, Jacques, père; which, again, being translated from French into English, gives us James-the-father. Hence, this author was offspring of a man distinguished only for being named James, and for being a father. From this it is plain as Nob Hill that his ancestors, immediate and remote, were as “scrubby” as Jack and Jill, or Darby and Joan. If he had been born in Scotland his name would have been Jamieson—and then what would have become of him? All the talk of the gossips at Stratford-on-Avon about a coat of arms, a crest, etc., with a picture of a goose playing circus with a spear is yellowplush bosh.

The mudsills ought to back up against Shakspeare and Washington and cease to be sore when they are called mudsills. There is no dishonor in the name. A wooden mudsill is the beginning of a house—a living mudsill the beginning of house, home, and civilization. What more honor does any man merit than in being a mudsill. I’ve been a mudsill for forty years, and I know all about it. Therefore, dry up.

This Mr. Shakspeare wrote some very good plays about which something ought to be said. I have read one of his plays, which he calls “Macbeth.” He wrote this play to show what becomes of a pretty good fellow when a lot of old women get their work in on him. One old woman told Mr. Macbeth one thing, then another old woman told him another thing, then a third old woman came along and told him something else; and then a devil’s mimm of old women go: an old tea-kettle; got up a dance and a tea-party, to which they invited Mr. M. He attended the tea-party. That ruined him. It is a mighty nice play, and easy to understand if you take a right view of it.

“Scrub” and “scrubby” are here used in the horse-racer sense, the opposites of “bloody” and “blooded.”
“Devil’s mimm” is not strictly Shakespearean, but it ought to be when applied to the weird sisters.

Professor H. W. Longfellow was seventy-two years old on Thursday. The children of Cambridge celebrated the occasion very prettily by a gift of an elaborately carved arm-chair, made from the ancient horse-chestnut tree whose perfections are chanted in the “Village Blacksmith.” The carving represents horse-chestnut leaves, blossoms, and burrs. On a small brass plate is this inscription: “To the author of the ‘Village Blacksmith’ this chair, made from the wood of the spreading chestnut tree, is presented as an expression of grateful regard and veneration by the children of Cambridge, who, with their friends, join in best wishes and congratulations on this anniversary. February 27, 1879.”

Rumor says that Mrs. Scott-Siddons owes her beauty to her descent from a Hindoo Prince, one of the Kings of Delhi.

OUR OWN POETS.

The Tolling of the Bell.

A sound is throbbing in the air,
On its bosom sobbing lowly—
A sound so shocking to Life’s ear,
Wailing sadly, tolling slowly;
Above the crashing of the streets,
Floating solemn, chanting holy;
Above the roaring when strifes meet,
Awful warnings lifting slowly;
A black smoke floating from the spire,
Veiling beauty, palling glory;
A dragon gloating, grim and dire,
O’er our sorrow’s piteous story;
A serpent coiling round our souls,
Hissing odious, unwholesome,
Laughter strangling in its folds,
From the belfry creeping dolesome.
A ghoul is stalking o’er my head,
Grinning grimly, leering, nodding,
His finger pointing to the dead
While he pauses in his plodding.
Falls the light from cloudless skies,
In the blighting of that smiling;
Far and witching sound all cries
In that ghostlight, souls affrighting—
Its burden bearing ‘gainst the winds,
Weary, panting ‘mid its groanings;
So loud lamenting as it dins—
Widows’ tears and orphans’ moanings.
My heart is tolling in my breast,
Tolling slowly to that timing;
My blood is eddying to rest,
Curled by that wizard chiming.
The grave seems near and life is drear;
Vain and dream-like seems our waking;
The leaves of Spring are brown and sere,
In the air-gusts shivering, shaking.
Oh, cease thy doling out our doom,
All the noonlight sombre-cloaking;
Soon will creep the twilight gloom—
Timely then will be thy croaking.
Ring, merry bells, the wedding peal,
Joyous swinging, swiftly flinging
O’er loving hearts the hope of weal—
New joys winging ‘mid thy singing.
O holy bells, call loud to prayer,
Souls uplifting, promise bearing;
Tell to all who sorrow bear,
For His children God is caring.
But ring no more, thou knell of death,
Sorrow sowing, woe creating;
Enough of gloom has human breath—
Gloom that knoweth no abating.

SANTA ROSA, March, 1879. HAM BURLIN.

Rocking the Baby.

I hear her rocking the baby—
Her room is just next to mine—
And I fancy I feel the dimpled arms
That round her neck entwine,
As she rocks, and rocks the baby,
In the room just next to mine.
I hear her rocking the baby
Each day when the twilight comes,
And I know there’s a world of blessing and love
In the “baby bye” she hums.
I can see the restless fingers
Playing with “mamma’s” rings,
And the sweet little smiling, pouting mouth
That to hers in kissing clings,
As she rocks and sings to the baby,
And dreams as she rocks and sings.
I hear her rocking the baby,
Slower and slower now,
And I know she is leaving her good-night kiss
On its eyes, and cheek, and brow.
From her rocking, rocking, rocking,
I wonder would she start
Could she know, through the wall between us,
She is rocking on a heart.
While my empty arms are aching
For a form they may not press,
And my emptier heart is breaking
In its desolate loneliness,
I list to the rocking, rocking,
In the room just next to mine,
And breathe a prayer in silence,
At a mother’s broken shrine,
For the woman who rocks the baby
In the room just next to mine.

SAN JOSE, February, 1879. MAOGE MORRIS.

A November Afternoon.

A lowering mass of cloud shuts out the sun;
The wind flings floatant banners of the rain
In sudden sweeps against the window-pane;
The smoke-rings fall, storm-beaten, one by one,
And melt into the mists enfolding dun
November woods, whose fretted leaves in vain
Cling to the boughs, in effort to maintain Their Spring-time hold in the stern war begun.
Indoors I watch the flamy firelight glow
With calm enjoyment, listening to the stream
Of the long sobbing wind, whose fitful flow
Is broken by the distant lightning’s gleam
And the deep fragor of the rent heaven’s woe,
While twilight folds me softly as a dream.

NORTH COLUMBIA, March, 1879. MAY N. HAWLEY.

The Flirt.

I have murdered men some twenty,
You have broken hearts a score;
We have had gay times a-plenty—
You’re a woman I adore.
I have lived a bloody revél,
You have always been a belle;
If there be a decent devil
He will surely treat us well.

But the men whom I have slain, love,
They had little time for tears,
While the victims whom you pain, love,
Feel the sting of shame for years.
So, when Satan we shall see,
I shall scarce know what to do;
He’ll hardly cast a glance at me:
“Madame, la place à vous.”

MARYSVILLE, March, 1879.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
Rates of Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per 4 weeks. Single copies, 10 cents.
Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 15, 1879.

Denis Kearney has an undoubted right to decent treatment. If he is doing good he has a right to be correctly represented; if he is doing or threatening evil he has no right to have himself curried with soft words. This much we say in defense to innumerable persuasions that come to us—some anonymously, some over the signatures of good citizens, some bearing the promise of gifts, some couched in the insolent language of personal menace. That Kearney has bubbled up in the seething pot of politics is natural and not discreditable to him. Such party abuses as we have endured for many years always result in agitation; agitation always results in reform. Better men than Kearney—more honest, more earnest, more thoughtful—have felt and fought against existing political abuses. It is perhaps little creditable to our community that it is never stirred to reformatory action except through fear; hence, to the argument of honest-minded gentlemen, the community has been deaf and indifferent. It took, perhaps, just such rude and vulgar abuse, just such blackguard philippics as only Kearney can use, to stir the popular heart. Perhaps it was necessary to light bonfires around the elegant homes of Nob Hill, and to threaten with the firebrand and fagot this city of San Francisco; to organize the bumming banditti of the slums into military companies; to make "Mr." Kearney "Lieutenant-General and Commander of the Forces;" to allow an alien Englishman to parade the city of San José on election day with a bempen noose dangling from his carriage; to denounce in vile and ribald language all officials; to proclaim the division of property and the confiscation of private accumulations; for Germans in a foreign tongue to menace the life and property of American citizens; to proclaim the overthrow of the laws by force and the right to invade homes and by violence drive from them their servants; to send threatening letters to women and wives; to denounce national treaties and subvert municipal laws; to set up a reign of terror with processions of tramps and viragos, and endeavor to incite riot and civil war and create a bloody strife in our city. We say perhaps it was necessary to do, or attempt to do, all these things in order to awaken our community to the necessity of legislating against the influx of the Chinese, the aggression of capital, the insolence of officials, the monopoly of lands, the vexatious delays of courts, the burden of taxes, and the extravagance of government. If all this was necessary to arouse reflection, action, and reform, it was little creditable either to the intelligence or moral worth of the community in which we live. We may recognize the necessity of a Kearney as we would that of a night cart or odorless excavator. An epidemic may be indispensable to arouse our health officers to sweep our streets and cleanse our sewers. It would be ungenerous to withhold from Kearney the acknowledgement of any good he may accomplish. It would be unfair if we did not admit that he shows some virtues; that he is sober; that he has not been detected in the commission of crime; that he is bold enough to dare the clergy of his church, the St. Patrick paraders among his countrymen, and the newspaper that stood god-father and sponsor at his political baptism; that he no longer indulges in the talk of burning our houses or hanging our citizens. And while we may admit his possession of a rich vocabulary of most apt and vile phrases of abuse, and that he can scold like a drab, we may admit also that he turns the sluices of his billingsgate upon many who deserve it. Perhaps good may come out of this most unpromising Nazareth. "Mr." Kearney has learned one lesson, and perhaps he has partially received it from the ARGONAUT. He has been taught and been convinced that threats of personal violence to individuals carried with them no terrors; that vituperation, abuse, and personal insult were not convincing arguments; that all the courage of the community was not confined to the vile mob that surrounded him; and that when he should arouse the better part of the community to a realization of danger to themselves, their families, or their property, there was enough of manliness to resent his insults and laugh at his menaces and his threats of violence. If "Mr." Kearney has turned over a new leaf, and shall honestly endeavor to reform great political abuses by recommending the adoption of a new constitution, and having swept and garnished the house, shall cooperate with good citizens to bring about reforms in a legal and constitutional manner, many will cooperate with him. So long as he works in the harness of reform and honestly endeavors to bring about a better condition of political affairs, his ignorance and his vanity may be overlooked. He may regard himself as the leader and plume himself upon having alone accomplished results—all this is the harmless vapor of a shallow mind. We acknowledge the value of the bell that sounds an alarm, although, considered of itself, it is but a long-tongued, empty-headed, brazen-faced, noisy thing. Denis Kearney represents to us the blackguard and vagabond element of society, a class for which we have no respect and of which we have no fear. We distrust this Trojan horse, though bearing the gift of much-needed reforms. We recognize the existence of social and political wrongs; we recognize the long-continued abuse of parties; we have, lo! these many years, observed the slimy path of the wriggling politician as he climbed to the highest places of honor and trust; we have noted the utter abasement of party leaders, and have observed how shamefully they have manipulated the material now composing the Kearney following. The rank and file of the Democracy have been made up of ignorant Irish and German mercenaries, who now compose the mass of the Kearney party. A Workingman's party is a Democratic party under another name and a meaner leadership. We recognize that it is the same compact organization of ignorance and foreign insolence that has for so many years cursed the land under the guise of Democracy. To have taken from the Democratic party its foreign vote at any time within these forty years, there had not been any Democratic party left. Now comes this revolt, this rebellion or civil war within its organization. Kearney, stepping from the ranks to the front, usurps the leadership, and all this commotion is simply a change of captains.

Perhaps Kearney is better than the old leaders. We do not think so. He is loud in promises, he is violent in denunciation; but when all is said and done it will be the same old hide-bound Democratic party. When the leopard shall have changed its spots, it will be the same Democratic cat. When the Ethiopian shall have changed his skin, he will still be the same old Democratic nigger in the fece. We see no sense in throwing overboard from the Democratic party all that was reputable in it, and in the place of gentlemen putting this exhalation of the slums. The Democratic party was bad enough when it was under the restraining influence of gentlemen—when it had in its ranks something of property and decency and was under social and even religious restraint. What it will become under the influence of this untutored Irish savage, who began his career by setting the law at defiance and by threatening his fellow-citizens with death and their property with confiscation, we leave our sober-minded fellow-citizens to consider. We stand amazed that intelligent native-born men should enlist under the banner of this alien; amazed that respectable citizens of foreign birth should follow this ignorant pretender; amazed that the Chronicle, the Call, the Post, the Bulletin, should give the encouragement of their columns to the vile heresies of this political mountebank; amazed that the community should give one moment's consideration to his quack remedies of political economy, or for one moment believe that he is honest or in earnest in his denunciations of official abuse or in the promise of governmental reform. As for ourselves, we intend to be caught with no such chaff. The stream never rises above its source, and bad as are existing parties, they are better than one of which the file and leadership are composed of the lowest and most ignorant of the European immigration. We have seen Know-nothingism rise, flourish, and decay. If American birth and American nationality are not a broad enough basis upon which a permanent political party may be reared, then, in the name of common sense, we ask what shall be the fate of an organization in which all its leaders are men of alien birth and nearly all of its following both alien and ignorant?

This is the opportunity of the Republican party. It possesses the intelligence, the moral sentiment, the wealth, the social respectability of this State. It ought to step to the front under the leadership of disinterested and honest men and give to the State and to San Francisco an honest administration. Every gentleman in the Democratic party should promptly enroll his name in the organization, and the test at the primaries and the qualification of membership should simply be a promise to vote the ticket made in opposition to this uprising of the gutter. Every intelligent foreigner should join hands with this movement, in order that he might give assurance to the country of his adoption that he is not in sympathy with the refuse of his native land, whom, in our mistaken generosity, we have clothed with political authority. Every Catholic, every Protestant, every one interested in good government and order, should join such a party, and it would be in the highest and best sense independent. Under such leadership and such influence as a party might thus obtain by an appeal to the higher and better sentiment of the people it would be invincible. It would drive back to their holes all the small larvæ that hope to warm themselves through the transition of worm, grub, and butterfly into some official position. It would send Denis Kearney and his band of tramps back to the obscurity from which he and they have crawled, through the indifference of better men and the encouragement of a press that has only two degrees of infamous distinction, viz: cowardice and greed.

There are forty millions of people in the United States of America, of which number it is estimated that six millions are of foreign birth. There are say eight hundred thousand people in California, of which number say one hundred and fifty thousand are not native to the country—not including in this estimate the Chinese. It requires no other than a statement of these facts to present the case of undue political influence by the foreign-born. The attitude of this class toward the country and its institutions is an insolent one. These people, a majority of whom are ignorant and discontented, crowd together in the towns and cities. Lager breweries and churches are the immediate attractions of the city. The Americans compose a large majority of the agriculturists. This class of town or village mendicants pay but limited taxes. They are ward and court-house politicians. They have but a small knowledge of our institutions. The school-house and the free press have not yet done their work. Yet this class aspire to rule the country, control its parties, and dictate to its native-born. Intelligent and well-disposed foreigners are more modest. It is to the ignorant, discontented, beer-drinking, and bigoted class to which we refer, and no one need criticize this article, or feel hurt by it, who does not confess himself as coming within this category. It is time that resistance should be interposed against the aggressions of this obtrusive class. It is time it should cease to govern Americans, and be governed by them. It is time that public opinion—uniting the native-born American who is intelligent with the foreign-born who is intelligent—should assert itself in vindication of the law and in protecting the rights of property. It is time that the politics of the nation, and of California, and of San Francisco, should be wrested from this class of agitators and political and social malcontents and turned over to the control of the intelligent, law-abiding, and well-disposed.

Just now the leading topic of interest in this State is the adoption or rejection of a proposed Constitution. It is in every intelligent man's mind. It is regarded on every side as the turning point of our history. Public meetings are being held all over the State with reference to this question. It is by all property owners regarded as agrarian. It is the work of a clamorous mob of ignorant foreign miscreants, who desire to destroy government in order that opportunity may be afforded them to plunder. It is an attempt of the propertyless minority to plunder the accumulations of industry. Upon this question the Bulletin is at last getting ready to have an opinion. It is holding itself in abeyance. It expresses no decisive utterance on either side. If it is not waiting for coin, what in the devil is it waiting for? We print its Thursday evening editorial as, next to that of the Call which we gave last week, the best specimen of editorial cowardice and funkyness that we have seen:

PUBLIC SENTIMENT.—The Bulletin is trying to act the part of moderator in the great discussion which is now in progress all over the State on the subject of the new Constitution. It assigns places to the disputants, taking care only that none shall be heard but those who are able to illustrate the questions involved. In the compilation of to-day, in addition to extracts from the press, will be found some general and special views of great importance. The character of these contributions indicates a higher form of thought than has yet been developed. Reading by the light of these criticisms, no citizen of intelligence ought to have much difficulty in determining upon the course which by and by he ought to pursue. The interests likely to be affected are too grave and important to be decided off-hand, either in press or on the stump. It is a matter in which no citizen of intelligence should take opinions at second-hand.

Texas was admitted to the Union in 1845 with a provision in its ordinance that it should be divided into States when it should have acquired sufficient population. Its territory is nearly sixteen times as great as Pennsylvania. Its present population is estimated at one million two hundred and fifty thousand. Northern Texas is one of the most desirable parts of our country, and for climate and agricultural resources is surpassed by none. It is increasing in population faster than any other State. It has incalculable riches in coal, marble, timber, and pasture lands, and has a capacity for the maintenance of a large population. Leading politicians are now agitating the question of dividing Texas into five States. This would give the South a predominating influence in the Senate if Texas, with its ten Senators, should ally itself with the cotton States' interests. We see no reason to fear such a result and no good reason suggests itself to us why it would not be a wise movement to divide and build up five States in this part of our great interior empire.

Paul Neumann says there is much in the proposed Constitution that is both good and new; but that which is good is not new, and that which is new is not good.

AFTERMATH.

At the present writing it would seem that there is to be no organized opposition to the adoption of the new Constitution. The press is divided, and the people seemingly indifferent. The instrument contains some wise provisions of needed reform. It contains other provisions utterly subversive of the rights of property, and if it shall become the organic law will precipitate our community into a sea of confusion and litigation. It evidences the fact that the communistic and agrarian element of the Convention, though in a minority, was of controlling influence, and that the so-called Non-partisan majority was altogether overreached. If in the Constitutional Convention there had been no member ambitious of office, and no demagogue standing in awe of popular opinion, there would have been presented a better result. Personally, we shall vote against its adoption, because we think it assails the rights of property, and is a dangerous innovation in the direction of giving governmental control to the ignorant, the idle, the propertyless, and the irresponsible.

The Honorable John F. Swift did not authorize the ARGONAUT to announce him as the possible candidate of the Kearney party for Governor. We made this announcement in the hope that he would become its candidate; because if he and other men like him should be placed upon the Workingmen's ticket, it would be—in the event of their election—an assurance of good government. We understand that the claims of John F. Swift will be pressed before the Republican Convention, and that it is the serious determination of a very large and respectable part of the Republican party that his claims shall be fairly considered, and that they will make for him both at the primaries and in the State convention an earnest effort. The mistake that the Republican party is apt to make is that its leading men, and those whose influence should control, are indifferent and neglect their duties in primary organization. This indifference and neglect leaves a small band of intriguing and generally worthless ward politicians to conspire and plot for the advancement of themselves and their friends. This is going on just now, and we see the handiwork of some very small politicians in the organization of ward clubs, and in forestalling party opinion at the coming primary elections.

It is proper to say, and to say now, that this sort of thing will divide and destroy the party. It can not, it ought not, and, if we can prevent it, it shall not succeed. A county convention, or a State convention, that is packed in the interest of any individual does not bind the party conscience. It will be well for—we reserve their names for future use—to recall the history of the Republican organization in this State, and ask themselves the reason why it is to-day out of power. How does it happen that there is a Democratic administration of the State and of the city of San Francisco. We have been destroyed by internal dissensions and party divisions. This has been brought about by the determination of a certain clique to rule or ruin. It has ruined because it could not rule. This clique has been destroyed, and it is a vain effort for another to attempt to build upon its ruins.

That mysterious disease, the diphtheria, which has so long baffled medical skill and made a lively trade in short coffins—there is a larger profit on short coffins than long ones—is now in a fair way of being stamped out. A doctor, whose name has unfortunately escaped our memory, writes that he has discovered its cause in a microscopic fungus that grows on the skin of the apple. To escape the diphtheria, you have only to pare your apple, and give the parings to the children.

Henry Ward Beecher is being sued for a breach of contract in having failed to write his Life of Christ for Mr. Wilkinson. "The scandal trial," said Mr. Wilkinson, "knocked the Life of Christ higher than a kite." If there is any impropriety in O'Neill, the actor, taking the part of Christ in the "Passion Play," is it not more absurd and improper for so notorious and objectionable a person as Beecher to write his life?

The Kearney party was loud in demanding free speech when it was threatening to burn our city and was designating by name those whose lives it would destroy. Now this party, drunk with the hope of success, allows no public meeting to be commenced that it does not invade and endeavor to control. It mobs workingmen's meetings called to express dissenting opinions. It seeks by violence to choke off all except affirmative discussion upon the adoption of the Constitution. It will drive its Vice-President, Wellock, from office for expressing the opinion that the Constitution contains dangerous provisions, and ought not to be adopted. This is the kind of free speech which the more ignorant and desperate of our foreign-born citizens are willing to accord to those who are born in the land, and to those foreigners who, having property to protect, are loyal to the law.

"The American Trade Embassy to Mexico appears to have done more harm than good. The petty meanness and ill-breeding of some of its members were quite disgusting to the polite Aztecs, whom we are so accustomed to regard as barbarians. A delegation from California might accomplish more beneficial results."—Chronicle. We do not know how Eastern capitalists and business men generally compare, in point of "manners," with those of California; learning and art are somewhat indebted to them, we believe, for various considerable endowments to colleges, museums, and galleries, whereas the typical Californian capitalist prefers to "make a corner in something" and serve letters by lotteries. In the matter of ill-breeding, we fancy the man who with actually no foundation of truth publishes a gratuitous insult to some thirty odd millions of his countrymen is distinctly ahead in competitive vulgarity. Au reste, only an ignorant boor thinks the modern Mexican an Aztec.

The only class of our fellow citizens interested in having the new Constitution adopted is the lawyers. It will cost $10,000 a line to interpret the curious thing, and will give us at least a hundred new volumes of California Reports.

The Chronicle is now most loudly championing the new Constitution. It is the only one of the leading newspapers in the State that has definitely pronounced opinions in favor of the new experiment. It throws down the gauntlet and challenges the press. It constitutes itself the shield-bearer of Kearney. It is the bold, outspoken champion of the sand-lot, and stakes itself, its reputation, and its influence upon the result. We make an alternative prophecy: 1st, that it will change sides and oppose the adoption of the new Constitution before election day; and, 2d, that if it does not it will be beaten.

We asked Mr. Pickering on Wednesday this direct question, "What attitude will the Call take? Will it favor or oppose the adoption of the Constitution?" "It is waiting for the ARGONAUT," said Mr. Pickering; "it will follow the ARGONAUT." The ARGONAUT opposes the adoption of the Constitution: the Call will follow us. This has always been the policy of the Call.

The Bulletin will oppose the Constitution. The Alta will oppose the Constitution. The Examiner will oppose the Constitution. The Post will oppose the Constitution. Full details of terms and conditions are not yet agreed upon.

Every American jealous of his country's good name abroad will feel something akin to personal pride in the appointment of General L. H. Foote, of this State, as United States Consul to Valparaiso. The rule has been for our Consuls to disgrace us; for the rule has been to appoint the political favorites, henchmen, and relatives of United States Senators, and the average United States Senator is not fastidious in his friendships, scrupulous as to his instruments, nor overrespectable in his family relations. General Foote is a man of clean character, personal dignity, cultivation, and good breeding—in short, a gentleman. So long as he represents us at Valparaiso our commerce need fear no exactions at that port, our patriotism apprehend no dishonor. We hope we are duly grateful for the President's recognition of the qualities required in those who stand in the eyes of foreign nations as exemplars of American character, but at the same time can not refrain from asking why such a man as Mr. Welch is appointed to a Ministry in London, and such a man, as General Foote gets only a Consulship in Valparaiso.

The State Central Committee of the Republican party issued last week, what the Bulletin is pleased to call "a stirring address." Precisely whom this address is intended to stir we do not know unless the committee is bidding for votes among the idiots—whom we have been accustomed to regard as naturally "connubiating" with the other party. From the "stirrer," who compounded the literary with the historical ingredients of this document, we learn that our party has performed a number of "peerless deeds"—and peerless we honestly think them; that it saved "the only Republic on earth" (we are not sure which only one is meant) "with liberty for its dowry;" that it "established an American nationality"—whatever that may mean—"as everlasting as the continent on which it rests"—so far as the committee can see ahead; that it has "elevated all the currencies of the country to one standard"—which certainly means nothing at all; that it has made the nation "feared, respected, and admired throughout the habitable globe"—the exact reverse of this happening, unfortunately, to be the fact, as everybody knows who has traveled in other countries or reads their journals. Moreover, it is the prevalence in our politics of just such stone-blind, impenitent, and twaddling braggarts as the authors of the "stirring address" that disgraces and belittles us in the eyes of all civilization.

The committee also inform us—or whomsoever the "stirring address" is intended to instruct—that "the world has produced no names more illustrious than those of Lincoln and Grant. Call to your recollection if you can," they add as a clincher, "in all the pages of written history, ancient or modern, from the dawn of civilization down to this hour; conjure up the brilliant deeds of heroism and justice that have elevated mankind and made names immortal; and ask yourselves if the record of the men who form and have formed the solid phalanx of the Republican party in this nation has not eclipsed them all." It is right, no doubt, to exalt the late Mr. Lincoln above Moses, Aristotle, Cicero, Marcus Aurelius, Mahomet, Shakspeare, and other illustrious foreigners whose memory some persons hold in high esteem, but we submit that the exigencies of Republican party politics—even in view of the approaching "campaign"—do not demand the disparagement of General Washington for the glorification of General Grant.

The concluding sentence of the address is perhaps as stirring, if not quite as grammatical, as anything in it: "Regeneracy and victory lies in universal action, not in the scattering and waste of moral power." Nothing could be clearer than this definitive statement of what the voter should do in order to regenerate something. He must universally act without scattering and wasting moral power, which, being translated, means vote for the creatures of the convention which is the creature of the creature who wrote the "stirring address."

The writer of the paragraphs immediately foregoing lives in the skin of an American, and hopes to die in that of a Republican, but has not the intelligence to perceive that the leadership of men who in cold blood utter such undomesticated bosh as the "stirring address" is either desirable or endurable. They are low jugglers with words, mountebanks who estimate the people's intelligence by the inadequate and misleading test of its ability to detect their own fantastic tricks and vulgar impostures. These fellows do not perceive that the California of to-day is not the "Injiana" of twenty years ago; that San Francisco is becoming a great city; that the means and methods of backwoods political proselyting—the rhetoric of the "stump" and "impassioned appeals" of the country editor included—are no longer effective in "capturing votes." They disgust oftener, and more men, than they persuade.

"Gambetta," says a writer in another column, "came to demolish Napoleon's throne just at the time when a man of his sort was wanted." He was wanted to pick up and throw away the pieces—a man of Von Moltke's sort had been there before him.

By the way, it is said that in a recent debate in the French Chamber, when that fiery and unsubdued Imperialist, M. Paul de Cassagnac, was under the lash of the great Tribune, he was heard to mutter—he had been reading Shakspeare:

Léon Gambetta,
And damned be he who falls in this vendetta!

It is but justice to Archbishop Alemany and the leading clergy of the Catholic Church to admit that they seem to be doing all in their power to restore the wild extravagances of the more ignorant of their co-religionists. It will be an evil day for the Union when there shall be no restraining influence to control the wild and passionate vagaries of this ignorant alien mob.

At New Brunswick, N. J., Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan do not appear to be regarded by the college students as the great dramatic and musical artists that our playgoing public has indirectly pronounced them. These young gentlemen, the students, recently fired a broadside of superannuated eggs and retired vegetables in her Majesty's ship Pinafore and swept that craft from the seas, as it were. Nor did this satisfy them, although it was enough for the gallant, gallant crew; they followed the actors and actresses to their hotel, sailed in, and renewed the engagement in the office and corridors, to the utter and ignominious defeat and dispersion of the naval heroes and sheroes. It is a kind of dramatic criticism which the establishment of the press has rendered needless, and we are far from commending it; but as a change from the traditional "buttering" of the ambitious journalists who have inscribed their names highest on the free-list its occasional employment (in moderation), to correct some fault of reading or gesture not otherwise reparable, is perhaps less unwelcome to the general reader than to the particular actor. At all events, it compares favorably with the method of Mr. Barnes, of the Call.

Eberhardt Faber, the American representative of the pencil-house of A. W. Faber, and founder of pencil manufacture in this country, has been erased from the roll of the living.

Faber, departing for the unknown shore,
Graphite and cedar to unite no more,
Smiled grimly as he drew his final breath,
To think whose pencils would record his death.

We see it is contemplated to send back to China fifteen lepers. Why not consign them, say, half to Boston, care of the Rev. Joseph Cook, and half to Brooklyn, care of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher? We can supply other pious divines and their congregations with further shipments during the summer months.

The suggested equal partition of these fifteen ailing men and brothers would entail the necessity of splitting at least one of them like a fish. Preferably, we would avoid this cruel discrimination: we would split the whole.

THAT TRAITOR OF MINE.

Positively the Last of the Series.

He was a splendid animal, albeit a biped and therefore uninteresting to lovers of the picturesque. He first saw the light with the initial sunrise of 1850; was early saddled with Ephraim for Christian name, and inherited Jones from rich but respectable ancestors. When he came into my possession he was an amber blonde; six feet, one; careless, gray-blue eyes; teeth white as a puppy's, and etcetera to fill a column, nonpariel. He was what girls call "splendid-looking" and something more. He talked well, danced well—the "dance taboo" rather better than any other; sang a little—French songs chiefly, nice and naughty; read well—knew Moore and Præd and the society poets generally; made verses himself—with a range all the way from Dam and Pope to Jessop and Austin Dobson. In short, he wore the Sunday clothes of "Admirable Crichton."

Do you know Pescadero in early June? It is at its best then. The first and freshest flowers are in the fields, the daintiest and dearest girls are there to pluck them. The pebbles on the spangled beach are brightest in the warm June sunshine, and the comely matrons who group themselves so gracefully along the shore wear eager, expectant smiles, and frown not in malice of more successful searchers as they do later, in dusty August and murky September.

Under the towering redwoods of the Butano the ferns are growing in luxuriant tangles. The "emerald laces" forget their maiden shyness and clamber from every mossy crevice into the sober sunshine of a twilight noon. The Butano is so passing beautiful, so permeated with the "witching loveliness of restful calm," that it is par excellence a lover's glen. It was there I met my traitor. Shall I tell you how?

I nestled at the feet of a great madroño—the very tree under which Bartlett wrote that dainty idyll for the Overland; and I was watching Harry Thompson, Nimrod of fishermen and the best-natured of comrades, whipping the wimpled surface of the noted Butano pool—into whose lap leaps a baby waterfall, struggling to be a noisy, brawling cataract. The trout were jumping savagely, and at intervals of about three minutes Harry would toss a fish into my excited hands, which I would unhook and lay glowering in a mossy hollow—careless of the pain I knew it suffered, selfishly content to watch its changeful beauty. At last Mr. Thompson hooked a big fellow, a half-pounder at least; when, after an exciting struggle, Harry got it into the rifle and drowned it, I insisted on removing the hook which the greedy fish had swallowed at a gulp. After a long effort I removed the hook only to catch it in my thick dress. The more I pulled the more it wouldn't come out. Harry had dropped his pole, and was gathering ferns some distance down the creek. I had no pen-knife, and called to him to bring me his; but the noise of the water drowned my voice and he did not hear. I was about to call again, but was startled into silence by a voice at my elbow, which said: "Mine, at your service, madam." I turned my head, and there stood my traitor—a total stranger then. From looking like a frightened rabbit, I fell to blushing furiously; and as I said nothing he just knelt by my side and cut out the stupid hook more deftly and as neatly as I could have done myself. Of course that was quite enough. I was caught, or rather he was, and I, at least, enjoyed the capture.

The serene Thompson, who doubtless saw it all, came back just in time to introduce us before the situation became positively awkward. From that hour Ephraim Jones was my daily companion. There are many pleasant walks and drives near Pescadero; we learned to know them all. We gathered pebbles on the beach, found mosses at Pigeon Point and Point New Year; made friends with the light-house keeper, and had the light-room all to ourselves many a time; made friends with the whalers, and were in at the death once, and mamma none the wiser; made friends with anybody and everybody who would take our acquaintance—ship at its proper value, and leave us to ourselves. So when mamma fled before the advent of dusty August, my traitor followed us to San Francisco, and six months after we were married, mamma consenting, and his uncle setting him up in trade.

For five brief months I was happy, and then—

In the main, mine is the old, old story, only varying in its climax. For I am not the woman to pine under neglect. Indignity can never harm me, for I always resent the unacted impulse, and "strike back first." If the past was a dream, the present has been an awakening, and I welcome the worst as a revelation.

One morning about a month ago I awoke and found a note telling me that my traitor would not be at breakfast, as he had "an appointment with one of the leading men of the city, on an important matter, which must be settled for the city's good." Now if he had simply written that he could not be at breakfast, I should not have given the subject another thought. But all that stuff about "leading men," and "important matter," and "must be settled," set me to thinking, and when a woman thinks, she thinks.

When he came home to dinner I asked, point blank, what was the "important matter" which took him away from breakfast at such an hour. Instead of telling the shameful truth, like a man, the unfeeling traitor put on one of those wise, far-away expressions, of which men are so fond, and said nothing. That was my first clue to his true false-nature. I repeated my question, and he said, hesitatingly: "It is nothing you would understand, my dear; it's a question touching the public welfare." "Why can't you tend to 'public welfare' at a decent hour," I asked. "Oh! my dear, you know I can't leave business in the day time, and can't think of being away from you evenings, dear."

"Then why don't you wake me up, and take me along?" said I. At this he gave me such a peculiar look, and said quickly: "Oh, that would never do."

I was so angry that I dared not trust myself to say another word, but that moment I silently vowed to find him out, and I did find him out.

My jealousy once aroused, I left no stone unturned. Too late to let him know my purpose until the hour of fell discovery, too politic to trust the servants, I set upon his track the greatest living detective, the only—

Day by day that tireless "sleuth hound of the law" tracked my unsuspecting traitor; day by day the tokens of his perfidy, and the proof-positive of his folly, were strung, bead-like, upon the chain of evidence. At last, one bright morning, I accompanied the faithful—to the rendezvous of the faithless creature I once had loved. Stealthily I crept up the stair. The door was carelessly ajar. Secure in his guilty privacy, regardless of the woman he had wronged, he sat, unblushing, in a cushioned chair—by his side the partner of his folly.

Was this the "leading man" of whom he wrote? Was this the "important matter," or this the way to "settle" it? Shades of the great G. W., his companion was the illustrious Loring Pickering, and they were writing editorials for the Daily Morning Call!

R. S. S.
SAN FRANCISCO, March, 1879.

Bluebeard's Last Wife.

One of our learned professors, says the Cincinnati Saturday Night, who make a business of overthrowing or seriously curtailing the proportions of traditional celebrities, tackled old Bluebeard not long ago, expecting to prove that he was a myth, like William Tell and lots of other fellows, but he didn't succeed. He discovered, however, that Bluebeard's last wife, Fatima, was a very different sort of a woman from what has long been supposed. Instead of being a timid creature, frightened to death every time the man in azure side-whiskers looked at her, and ready to faint at the sound of his voice, she was in reality a regular "rip-snoorter," and led Bluebeard a terrible life from the day they were married. She had heard all about his numerous wives disappearing, and she gave him to understand on the way from the parson's to the castle that he couldn't come any of his games over her. She wouldn't have it. She said if she disappeared it wouldn't cost him a cent. It is not generally known, but Bluebeard's last wife was the original woman's rights woman. She it was who started the movement. She was the first to lecture on woman's rights, and she stumped the country in favor of female suffrage before Susan B. Anthony was ever heard of. Bluebeard used to growl about it, and swear until everything was blue, blue as his beard, but it didn't do any good; he couldn't control that woman anyhow. She attended all the conventions, and brought strong-minded women, and weak-minded men who admired them, home with her, in defiance of old B., and they kept up the clatter on their favorite subject until he sometimes even wished that he were dead. He used to disappear at such times, and no one knew where he went, but it afterward transpired that he secretly repaired to the "bloody closet," where his former wives were hung up to dry, seeking in their tranquil society that repose which was denied him while Fatima was around. Married to a virago, the old loves came back again, as it were.

It was all stuff about Bluebeard pretending to Fatima that he had got to leave home for a few weeks on an excursion to Mexico, or something like that, giving her the keys of the house with an injunction not to open the mysterious closet on pain of death. The truth was, she took the keys away from the old man herself, choking him until he was glad to give them up. Then she dragged him along by the coat collar until she came to the fatal closet, where she opened the door, and, flinging him among his murdered wives, locked him in for a week at a time. He tackled the wrong woman when he got hold of that last wife of his; she had loved before. Fatima was a Chicago woman, and had been married and divorced half a dozen times herself, and what she didn't know about managing a husband wasn't worth knowing. Whenever the old rascal's native meanness showed itself, into the closet he went, and he spent more than half his time there. His wife used to jeer at him through the keyhole, and ask him if he had selected a nail yet for her to hang on. Her sister, who came to visit her, popularly represented as sitting in a tower watching for the arrival of their big brothers, while Bluebeard was in the hall below whetting his scimitar on the banisters, preparatory to chopping off his wife's head, never kept watch for anybody, being as able to take care of herself as Mrs. Bluebeard was; and whenever the big brothers did happen to call at the castle they generally had to interfere to prevent their sisters from killing the old man. They made it so hot for him that he was finally compelled to vamose the ranch. It is not known what became of him, but it is supposed he went to Utah. It affords us pleasure to know that Bluebeard didn't have it his own way all the time, and that in Fatima he met considerably more than his match.

EDITORS OF THE ARGONAUT:—Why don't the Divines instruct those under their "spiritual care" not to patronize the Standard Theatre with its troupe of "model artists," and call upon the Board of Supervisors to prevent a repetition of its performances? Brother Rountree thinks the Passion Play might be "subversive of good morals." What has he to say of many of the plays that are put upon our stage, where all the holiest relations of life are brought into ridicule, and where not only old maids and stepmothers but parents and children are grossly caricatured, till there is nothing sacred left to endow a home or family with? Why not put a stop to all this sacrilege?

But, then, it is only the Church, and not the wicked people, who are to have the protection of the city law. Really, the Church ought to be able to protect itself through its great moral power. It is the God-forsaken heretics who need looking after. Let the strong arms of the Supervisors be thrown about the ungodly to shield and guide them evermore.

VELVET PAW.
VAN NESS AVENUE, March 5, 1879.

What can be more startling than to see a delicate and fascinating young lady with a long train suddenly turn around, without giving the unsuspecting individual behind her any warning whatever, gently stop, reach back with her right foot, and kick desperately? She is going to cross the street, and is merely switching off her train in the new direction.

Sir Charles Dilke is lecturing in England on "Big Gooseberries." Where is the big goose?

LITERARY NOTES.

Every dead man's head is game for the Phrenological Journal. No sooner is the breath out of some notable's body than this enterprising journal is to the fore with a chart of his bumps (taken from life, so to speak) and a biographical sketch in which his actions are made to correspond with his cranium. Many sensitive people really dislike to die.

We wish every musician—particularly those who fancy Dick White has said the last word in disparagement of their science—would read the paper on "Musical Romanticism," by Mr. Vernon Lee, in the current number of Appleton's Journal—from Fraser's Magazine. The writer is a man of ideas (which Mr. Richard Grant White is not), and has an admirable style—another point of difference.

A Southern Woman's Story, by Phoebe Yates Pember (Phoebe! what a name!), again reminds us that we prefer Southern women to their stories.

Mrs. Mary Andrews Denison, who wrote That Husband of Mine, is the author of a new work, Erin go Bragh. May it be read only by her admirers is as severe a malediction as the amenities of criticism permit.

John G. Saxé, who has been in delicate health, and has done no literary work for some time, is now confined to his room in Brooklyn, suffering, it is said, from chronic melancholia. He has been reading some of his own humorous verse, probably.

The Duke of Argyll's work on the Eastern Question, a book of one thousand pages, is described by the London Times as "an exhaustive brief."

Colonel T. W. Higginson's Young Folks' History of the United States has been translated into three foreign languages, and is now printing in raised letters for the blind. No doubt they will see its merit.

Smack your pretty lips, ladies! Madame "Henri Gréville" has written another—Bonne Marie.

Of the five important German works on Bismarck, Dr. Busch's is the only one that has found its way into America.

German books, by the way, have fewer indices than those in any other tongue. It never occurs to a German that he might spare himself the trouble of reading a whole volume every time he wants to find any particular passage in it.

Mr. Hamerton regards Mr. Ruskin as the only artist in words of any conspicuous power who has written much, and with his best force, about painting. How does Mr. Ruskin regard Mr. Hamerton?

The Contemporary Review has a letter from St. Petersburg in the nature of an article giving a sketch of contemporary life and thought in Russia. The writer, "T. S.," talks like a Russian. A long list of scandals and Nihilistic crimes are given for the edification of a public still eager to know all about what is bad in Russian social life.

Mr. J. Payne Collier believes he has found a tragedy by Shakspeare. Indeed, he is confident that he has, or, at least, that it is one in the authorship of which Shakspeare was importantly concerned. "I suspected it," Mr. Collier writes to the Athenæum, "when I was thirty, and now I am ninety I am convinced of it." The title of the tragedy is A Warning for Fair Women. He cites the following passage from the repentance scene as very Shakspearean, the guilty wife being the speaker in the presence of her paramour:

"Ah! bid me feed on poison and be fat,
Or look upon the basilisk and live;
Or surfeit daily and be still in health;
Or leap into the sea and not be drown'd.
All these are even as possible as this,
That I should be comforted by him
That is the author of my whole lament."

This passage, says Mr. Collier, could proceed from no other mind and pen than Shakspeare's. "I stake my reputation on the fact that the above and more was contributed by our great dramatist."

Le Figaro appears to have found still another work of Shakspeare. It announces a matinée internationale at the Gaieté Theatre, at which was to be produced Une Tragédie dans le Yorkshire, a drama, in two acts, by Shakspeare, adapted for the French stage by Jules Guillemot.

In the March International Review Mr. Sidney Lanier has an essay on "A forgotten English poet." As Mr. Lanier would that others should do unto him, even so does he unto them.

Mr. Edmund Yates, having found no word of criticism in the Times (London) of Mr. Bret Harte, nor any announcement of his visit and lecture in that city, writes of "the astounding fatuousness and crass stupidity" with which the leading journal is conducted. Of all American authors (living authors, presumably), Mr. Harte is, he says, "not merely the most original, but, without question, the most popular in England." By way of contrast, Mr. Yates mentions the visit of Dickens to this country. On the occasion of his first public reading, which was given in Boston, the New York Journals "sent the best men they had to 'the Hub,' a distance of several hundred miles, and received from them by telegraph critical reports, several columns in length, which were published the next morning."

The Eastern newspapers are much concerned about our manner of writing literary notes, considering it "startling" and desperately wicked. They miss the immemorial reverence, and tremble for the dignity of letters. Let them be reassured—we respect at least the Eastern newspapers.

INTAGLIOS.

A Day-dream.

I shut my eyes and see it all—
The garden and the wood,
The lilacs and the maples tall,
The grass plat where the apple stood.
Above, the spreading apple trees
Their snowy blossoms shed,
That floating on the morning breeze
Fall gently on her head.
The quaint old house with narrow eaves,
The chimneys broad and low,
The shadows of the waving leaves
That softly come and go.
I hear the sound of many feet
Upon the oaken floor;
I hear young voices glad and sweet
Within the open door.

And now they come, a merry throng,
Fresh as the vernal breeze,
And summons to the garden and song
Who stood beneath the trees.

I see them all together go
Beyond the wooded hill:
Their song sounds far away and low,
It fades and all is still.

'Tis but a dream, for nevermore
To time do they belong.
Their footsteps press no earthly shore,
No mortal hears their song.

But one of all who gathered there Remains the tale to tell:
'Tis she upon whose dark brown hair
The apple blossoms fell.

And once again upon her hair
Is snowy whiteness shed,
But 'tis not apple blossoms fair
That rest upon her head.

Thus, often as night's shadows come,
My eyes are filled with tears,
As visions of that peaceful home
Rise from the vanished years.

—Springfield Republican.

The Cavalier's Song.

A steed! a steed of matchless speed,
A sword of metal keene!
All else to noble heartes is drosse,
All else on earth is meane
The neighing of the war-horse prowde,
The rowling of the drum,
The clangor of the trumpet lowde,
Be soundes from heaven that come:
And oh, the thundering presse of knights,
Whenas their war cries swell,
May tole from heaven an angel bright
And rouse a fiend from hell.
Then mounte! then mounte, brave gallants all,
And don your helmes amaine:
Death's couriers, Fame and Honour, call
Us to the feldge againe.
No shrewish teares shall fill our eye,
When the sword-hilt's in our hand—
Heart-whole we'll part, and no whit sighe
For the fayrest of the land.
Let piping swain and craven wight
Thus weepe and puting crye,
Our business is like me to fight
And hero-like to die.

O Shining Sands!

O shining sands! that echo back
The sounds of feet now still;
O booming waves! that leave no track
For other ships to fill.
The feet that tread the shining sands
Press other shores to-day!
They wander far in other lands,
Where softer breezes play.

The sunlight lingers on the beach,
As in the days long gone;
The booming waves have the same speech,
Still the same full, deep tone,
O wave washed beach! O shining sands!
I see ye not for tears;
The dear feet now press other strands
That walked with me for years.

They walk beside celestial streams,
Where heavenly breezes play,
Upon whose shore the sunlight gleams,
Nor yet alone they stray;
The loved and lost of long ago,
Who crossed the unknown sea,
Have e'er returned, but well I know
They watch and wait for me.

LILLIA N. CUSHMAN.

Horace's Guest (Book I, Ode IX).

Helvellyn's height with snow is white,
The forest branches bow and splinter;
No ripple breaks the snowy lakes—
Then shut my door on cold and winter.
On my hearth-dogs pile up the logs—
Pile high, my boy; and down your throttle
Right freely pour my "thirty-four,"
And never spare the old man's bottle.
Leave all the rest to Him who best
Knows how to still the roar of ocean,
To calm the wind in wildest mind,
And hush the leaflet's lightest motion.
Fear not to stay upon the day,
And count for gain each happy pleasure;
Be not above the game of love,
And feattly tread the Christmas measure.
Let blood run cold when life grows old,
Stick now to skate and tennis-racquet,
Till westward-ho the snn-wheels go,
Then join the sports of frock and jacket.
When bright eyes smile, laugh back the while
And find the nook where beauty lingers;
Steal golden charm from rounded arm,
Half given, half-held, by fairy fingers.

Muzzer's bought a baby,
Little bits of zing;
Zink I moss could put him
Froo my rubber ring.

Aint he awful ugly?
Aint he awful pink?
Jus come down from heaven
Dat's a nub, I zink.

Doctor told auzzer
Great big awful lie;
Noze aint out of joyent,
Dat aint why I cry.

Zink I ought to love him!
No, I won't—so zere!
Nassy, crying baby,
Aint got any hair.

Send me off wiz Biddy
Every single day;
"Be a good boy, Charley,
Run away and play."

Dot all my nice kisses,
Dot my place in bed;
Mean to take my drumstick
And beat him on ze head.

She had advertised for the return of her dog, and it was a long-haired Skye terrier—a regular valuable thoroughbred. The reward was to be ten dollars. A stalwart Celt came timidly forward and asked if that was the dog. Being answered affirmatively and paid the reward, the affection of the lady, who kissed and hugged her "poor, dear, darling little Dandy," attracted his attention, and the following skirmish ensued: "Where did you find the darling?" "Small comfort would it do you, Madame, did I tell you." "But tell me, while I caress the angel." "I can't tell you, because you wouldn't like it." "But dear, darling Dandy—was Dandy cold?" "Shure, Madame, I don't know. I saw your advertisement in the paper, and I recognized him tied to the end of a long stick, and a woman a washin' of winders wid him. I told her she must shop a washin' of winders wid my dog."

Paterfamilias looks up over his glasses, lowers his paper, and testily observes to Maria Clytemnestra: "My daughter, it certainly appears to me that you look in the mirror a great many unnecessary times." "Why, father," returned the young lady, "haven't you counseled me over and over again to pause and reflect?"

An English barber has a sign in his window which reads: "Haircutting on Phrenological and Physiognomical principles."

PRESIDENT COFFEE, PURE MOCHA COFFEE, PURE JAVA COFFEE,

Ground to order at

LORING'S

Dealer in choice

JAPAN AND BLACK

TEAS

922 Market St.,

Between Stockton and Powell Streets, near the Baldwin.

RARE ENGRAVINGS, MODERN ETCHINGS.

VISITORS WILL BE ALWAYS
welcome to inspect collection.
W. K. VICKERY,
22 Montgomery Street, opposite the Lick House.

JENNINGS S. COX.....OLIVER TEALL.

COX, TEALL & CO.,

REAL ESTATE AGENTS AND
AUCTIONEERS, 303 Montgomery Street, under
the Nevada Bank, San Francisco.

Auction Salesroom, H. M. NEWHALL & CO., 309, 311
and 313 Sansome Street.

J. O. ELDRIDGE, Auctioneer.
ANDREW ONDERDONK, Civil Engineer.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.
(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),
PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office
and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11
A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

DR. JAS. M. HUTCHINS,
DENTIST, REMOVED TO 737 MARket Street, opposite Dupont.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST,
removed to 200 STOCKTON ST., cor. Geary, S. F.

ELECTRIC BELTS,

A sure cure for nervous debility, premature decay, exhaustion, etc. The only reliable cure. Circulars mailed
free. Address J. K. REEVES, 43 Chatham Street, N. Y.

DOMESTIC SERVANTS.

JAPANESE and CHINESE Servants of all kinds will
be speedily furnished by the undersigned, who, having had seven years' experience, feel confident of being able to give satisfaction in all cases. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to call and leave orders. PIERCE & SON, 609 Sacramento Street, up stairs, San Francisco.

MULLER'S OPTOMETER!

The only reliable instrument for Testing
Defective Vision.

135 Montgomery Street,

Near Bush, opposite the Occidental Hotel.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS, REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 510 SACRAMENTO STREET.

NOOK FARM.

THIS PLEASANT COUNTRY

HOME is now open for the reception of visitors.
Important additions and improvements have been made since last season, which add greatly to the comfort and pleasure of guests. The same good cheer and home surroundings will be found in the future as in the past.

Remember that the pleasantest part of the year in the country is the spring and early summer.

For particulars, address E. B. SMITH,
Rutherford, Napa County.

CALABASAS LAND AND MINING COMPANY.

DIRECTORS.

JOHN P. JONES,
JOHN CURREY,
EUGENE L. SULLIVAN,
GEORGE C. PERKINS,
CHARLES P. SYKES.

THE CALABASAS LAND AND

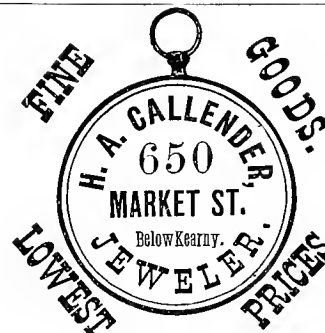

Mining Company are now prepared to offer special inducements to capitalists or actual settlers for a profitable investment in their attractive town site and mine, situated in the Santa Cruz Valley, in that portion of Southern Arizona acknowledged by all sanitary and descriptive writers to be the ITALY OF AMERICA.

For full particulars and description, send for Prospectus,
or apply at the Company's office, 32 Merchants' Exchange,
San Francisco

LITTLE BELMONT FOR SALE.

THIS BEAUTIFUL SUBURBAN

property, situated contiguous to the Belmont Mansion, twenty-seven miles from San Francisco, on the San Jose Railroad, is offered for rent or sale at reasonable terms.
The property is located in a beautiful valley, with a glimpse view of the Bay; contains thirty acres of land, highly improved, with fruit and ornamental trees. The residence is new, spacious, and elegant, with all modern improvements.
It has a detached cottage for servants, with laundry room
and offices; a stable with six stalls, carriage house, cow houses for thoroughbred stock, chicken house, grounds un-derlaid with water-pipe; outhouses provided with gas; gas
and water furnished from the works of larger Belmont;
water free. The residence and cottage are furnished with all fixed articles, such as book cases, armchairs, billiard table,
range, kitchen and dining-room furniture, floors carpeted,
rooms filled with attractive engravings, all of which will be disposed of with the property and at a low price. A bargain is offered in this property, and if not sold will be rented at a moderate figure for a summer residence. For particulars, inquiry may be made at the ARGONAUT office, No. 522 California Street.

REDINGTON'S FLAVORING EXTRACTS ARE THE PERFECTLY PURE and highly concentrated Extracts of FRESH FRUITS

Prepared with great care. They are put up in superior style, in a bottle holding twice as much as ordinary brands of Extracts.

Comparing quality and contents, none other are nearly so cheap.
Wherever tested on THEIR MERITS, they have been admitted in preference to all others, and now are the

STANDARD FLAVORING EXTRACTS

Of the Pacific coast. Dealers will find them to give better satisfaction to the consumers than any other kind and are respectfully requested to give them a trial.

REDINGTON & CO.
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

ALBERT BELANGER, plaintiff, vs. MARV BELAN-
GER, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to MARV BELANGER, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service), after the service on you of this summons; or, if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days;
otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of divorce dissolving the bonds of matrimony now and heretofore existing between the plaintiff and defendant, on the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is specially made, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and
answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded therein.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court
of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this ninth day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

By JNO. H. MOTT, Deputy Clerk.

JNO. J. COFFEY, Attorney for Plaintiff, 605 Clay Street.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California,
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

THOMAS O'SULLIVAN, plaintiff, vs. JOHN LI-
CENS, in signature and acknowledgment JOHN LINUS.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to
JOHN LICENS, in signature and acknowledgment JOHN
LINUS, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons; or, if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days;
otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court, adjudging that a certain deed executed by defendant to plaintiff, on March 4th, 1858, be reformed and amended in the description of certain real property particularly described in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby expressly made, and for costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and
answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded therein.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 22d
day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.

JOHN J. COFFEY, Attorney for Plaintiff.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California
in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARY A. WOOTEEN, plaintiff, vs. JOHN WOOTEEN,
defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to John Wooteen, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District
Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco,
and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons; or if served within this county; or if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days;
otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds
set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby made, and for costs of this suit, counsel fees, and alimony; also for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and
answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court
of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 15th day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

By W. STEVENSON, Deputy.

R. THOMPSON, Plaintiff's Attorney.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Standard Consolidated Mining Company, San Francisco, Cal., March 7, 1879.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, Dividend No. 1, of fifty cents (50c) per share, was declared, payable on Wednesday, March 13th, 1879, at the office in San Francisco, in New York. Transfer books closed on Saturday, March 8, 1879, at 12 o'clock.

WM. WILLIS, Secretary.

Office, Room 29 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, third floor, San Francisco, Cal.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.—NOTICE

is hereby given by the undersigned, Administrator
with the will annexed of the Estate of JOHN BLISS,
deceased, to the creditors of, and all persons having claims against, the said decedent, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator, at his place of business, Room 12, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, in the City and County of San Francisco.

Dated February 13th, 1879.

WILLIAM DOOLAN,

Administrator with the will annexed of the Estate of John

Bliss, deceased.

PHELPS & ELLS, 66 Nevada Block, Attorneys for Estate.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.—NOTICE

is hereby given by the undersigned, Administrator of the Estate of JOHN A. MAY, deceased, to the creditors of, and all persons having claims against, the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administrator, at 42 Montgomery Street, 1st floor, the same being her place for the transaction of the business of the said estate in the City and County of San Francisco.

MAGDALENE M. MAY,

Administratrix of the Estate of John A. May, deceased.

Dated at San Francisco, March 13th,

PAUL NEUMANN, Attorney for Adm.

INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 14, 1879.

DEAR MADGE:—The moths and butterflies and irreligious pleasure-seekers might as well keep Lent as not, since they maintain an involuntary abstinence from pleasure, whether or no. Into what a dull, dead, monotonous level are amusements permitted to sink when fashion and religion begin to keep themselves indoors. Last Monday evening there was absolutely nothing to tempt one out of doors, although there is a wild, absurd rumor afloat that an immense number of married men had important business engagements down town that night, which consumed the hours between eight and eleven. I know they could not have gone to see Mother and Son, for, although it has pursued the even tenor of its way with fairly good luck, there has been no extraordinary influx of unaccompanied Benedicks in the auditorium. The rain storm unfortunately gave the new people a bad start, and that is something not easy to get over in this capricious burg. But they are an acceptable little band, and every one returns from the theatre well pleased. Of course people have stopped crowding the Bush Street Theatre long ago. They run so entirely in one groove, and that not a deep one, that it is apt to become a little wearisome. Their sole idea is the "play within the play." How strange that actors should always think it so excessively funny to play that they are players. This was all very well while it was comparatively original, especially with the brilliant Voxes family to carry out the idea; yet, after all, even they were far better in Fun in a Fog than in the Belles of the Kitchen. For all this growl I can not very well see what Mr. Nat Goodwin would do with himself in any other class of entertainment in which he is to be the bright, particular star. As an imitator he is perhaps unrivaled, but as he neither sings nor dances extraordinarily well there is nothing really left for him to do but invest a little money in a better play of the same sort. Hobbies is beneath criticism, and Rambles, as a play, is an insult to an undeveloped intellect. The Passion Play, what with much advertising in the shape of pronounced opposition, was doing not badly. But every body had seen everything, when that brave "Lass o' Lowrie's" came to the rescue in the nick of time.

It is a bold experiment to dramatize a tale like this, in which the interest lies in the revelations of deeper nature rather than in wealth of incident. Also, the abundance of dialect is a drawback to it for stage purposes, as it is to the book itself to a large class of readers. Dear Madge, I will engage you read it as you did the Mill on the Floss, and skipped as much of its queer, harsh, but expressive jargon as you did of the domestic discourses of those admirable British matrons, Mrs. Tulliver and clique.

You should have heard the bewildering variety of accents at the Baldwin the other night. The majority of them fell back on broad Scotch, as being most familiar, while others garnished their speech here and there with a good round brogue. Yet I doubt if there are many companies who could have filled difficult parts so acceptably. As for Rose Eytinge herself, I think that with all her artificiality she had come to understand something of the deep-souled Joan Lowrie. She looks picturesque enough as she stood "outside the gate" bowing her acknowledgments under a most suspicious rain of flowers. I shall tell you what she wore, for it is not easy for a pit-girl to look picturesque, if one may judge by the others, who were fac-similes of the châtelines of Tar Flat taking observations on the sidewalk. Imprimis, a "two-orphan" skirt, drab, striped with black velvet, a loose black bodice confined with a broad black leather belt, a red neckerchief, and a big black "Miss" sombrero. Add to this as neat a foot, bien chaussé, as ever peeped beneath a petticoat, and behold Joan Lowrie. So far as the actual playing of the part is concerned, one would not ask better. It is not full of great dramatic possibilities at best. It is rather the suggestion of a rich nature in reserve, and this conception Miss Eytinge hit upon most happily. Her dialect is well enough in an emergency. The veriest tyro would recognize that it was not the genuine article, but then we of California need not be so particular about these things as our English cousins, whose ears are attuned by familiarity to every shading of accent. Miss Eytinge's much-trilled r's came into play quite appropriately this time. I am quite sure that when this lady pronounces murder or kindred words her tongue rolls up like a manuscript. It was really not her fault that some of the very best situations went off with unwarrantable tameness. Perhaps it was due to the decision of Mr. Salmi Morse, who interfered with rehearsals because he would not permit the Passion Play to go on without James O'Neill.

Perhaps the dialect added every one's wits, so that even the scene-shifters could not take their cues promptly. At all events there was no dash, no clan, no go to anything, and, notwithstanding some really admirable acting, everything dragged.

Old "Sam Craddock," "Dan Lowrie," and little "Judson Bates" were there in such fashion that Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett herself would have recognized them. I was really delighted with Mollie Ravel, whose queer little face seemed to belong to "Jud." Odd that this really accomplished little woman has been playing nothing but minor maid parts for so long, for she does not deserve credit for a good dialect only. There was more than dialect to her "Maggie" in Engaged. She comprehended the Gilbert wit which the Londoners think too deep for us dull Americans.

"Jud" and his dog, a pale blonde terrier (who made a very successful début, by the way), are not the least interesting elements in the Miner's Daughter, as they call the play, with that singular fatuity they have at the Baldwin for changing names for the worse. As for "Dan Lowrie," it is a most thankless part, but perfectly played by Mr. Herne; while Mr. Jennings, who is always an artist, played old "Sam Craddock," the satisfied owner of fractional property and the bitter enemy of "Cannibals." All this was well, was it not? Then, James O'Neill played "Fergus Derrick." That should have added more to the strength of the cast than it did, for he was not at his very best. Perhaps he had not yet freed himself from the stalling influence of the past ten days, and found himself somewhat adrift in the new, old atmosphere. But he has the advantage, whatever he plays, of being or appearing to be very much in earnest. An audience acknowledges this as one does a bit of genuine politeness. It compares so pleasantly with the magnificent indifference of lesser actors.

I observe that they gave to Olive West the quite important part of "Anice Barholme." This is promotion, indeed, for her début does not date back so many weeks. The little girl really does wonderfully well. She has not exactly the common fault of the amateur, of not knowing what to do with her hands, but she has the other fault of doing too much with them. Of course, being a little woman, she is rather Macbethian. By some strange inverse law of dramatic ambition, when a woman weighs twelve stone or more she wants to be an ingénue. When she weighs less than a witch, the Duchess of Malhi herself seems rather a frisky and frolicsome person to her. Nevertheless, Miss Olive West, in a most ill-proportioned coiffure, played "Anice Barholme" very well.

Yet, with all this good cast, with numerous recalls, with all the prestige of the book itself, I doubt if the Miner's Daughter will be a popular play. The scenery is nothing to speak of, and there is but one good mechanical effect. There is a superabundance of dialect and a monotony of dialogue. All of which, perhaps, matters not, as they announce a reproduction of the Passion Play, which will leave the lass lamenting.

I believe we are to have the beautiful Danicheffs at the California next week, with the new Union Square Company. I fancy we shall like it, even without the great Ossip, even without the ugly-pretty Maude Harrison; for we have still the stately and indomitable "Countess," who is the leading spirit of this strange story. I can not exactly foresee the cast. Lilian Cleaves Clarke is an eminently pretty and well-dressed young woman, but not at all emotional or intense; therefore, what can she do with "Anna?" While Rose Osborne, who is both of these, will doubtless, as leading lady, be relegated to the part of "Princess Lydia."

How admirably the ripe charms of Ada Vernon fitted the crafty "Princess." What a proud, well-poised head she carried on what a beautiful pillar throat, and what a bewildering dress she wore! The Danicheffs, as we had it, was a picture, a poem, a something beautiful to be remembered. There was but one flaw, and we will manage to get through the performance this time without much weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth for "Vladimir Roche." The manifesto has not yet been issued as to who shall be "Vladimir," but it does not matter a whit.

The Mother's Secret, another of the Union Square plays, is to follow; and after that—O tempora! O mores!—"Buffalo Bill." Perhaps this announcement is only a bit of pleasantry on the part of the management, who may find in guying the public something to enliven the dole of the luckless Lenten season. Perhaps, stranger yet, they regard him as an actor. However, sufficient unto the day, Madge. But you were looking so confidently to the future since the Union Square engagement was announced that I did not like to wait and let the shock come upon you all at once.

Meantime, at the Bush Street Theatre we are to have the Hyer Sisters. It strikes me that Afric's burning sands are contributing quite as liberally lately to amusements as Ireland to the population. The children of Ham are transformed into a vast band of peripatetic music-makers. The Hyer Sisters are said to be very talented. I gather that they are not unaccompanied, from the embellishments of the dead-walls, whence the picture of a gentleman with an abnormal labial development stares us in the face whenever we walk abroad, with no other explanation than a line which he who runs may read to the effect that he is an eccentric comedian, a term as broad as charity. BETSY B.

In the contest now pending before the Supreme Court to determine who is rightfully entitled to the Harbor Commission, Mr. Aaron M. Burns occupies this peculiar position: He thought there was a vacancy. He solicited the Governor that he might be his own successor. His friends, at his suggestion, petitioned for his reappointment. The Governor thought there was a vacancy, and chose Mr. Frank McCoppin to fill it, whereupon Mr. Burns is suddenly convinced that there is no vacancy, and appeals to the Courts to enable him to hold on. This may be good politics, but it is bad morals.

At a meeting of a number of gentlemen interested in archery, held in Oakland last week, it was resolved to invite the various archery clubs in the State to compete for prizes at a grand tournament to be held some time in May. Mr. Frank Havens was elected president, and Mr. Daniel O'Connell secretary. The latter gentleman will receive and answer all communications on the subject from the archers of the State, connected with the clubs or otherwise, and will furnish all information as to the progress of the arrangements, ranges to be shot at, prizes, and general regulations of the shooting.

If the "English" art critic "from Australia," who kindly sent us an anonymous article devoted chiefly to the praise of Mr. Julian Rix, and the frank though reluctant confession that Mr. Tavernier and Mr. Hill are perhaps the peers of that artist, will forward his name and address we shall know how to superscribe our letter of thanks. If Mr. Rix had fewer admirers he would probably not have so many injudicious friends.

THE IRISH "BROGUE."

The only letters which the Irish really mispronounce are the "ea." The Irishman says "mate" for "meat," "say" for "sea," "tay" for "tea;" but he does not say "praste" for "priest," or "kape" for "keep." He prolongs the double "e" instead of shortening. He would not say St. Pater, but St. Peether. The Know-Nothing agitation once broke out in the Scottish town of Dunfermline, and it was decided to expel all the Irish laborers. The difficulty was how to ascertain who were and who were not Irish with absolute certainty. It was decided to ask every suspected man to pronounce the word "peas," and if he pronounced it "pays" out he went. If they had been asked to pronounce the test words of the stage Irishman one-half of them would have escaped detection. The Irish pronunciation of the "ea" is not without warrant. The Irishman pronounces it in all words as we do in "break," "great," and "steak," and he does so because during the period when English was introduced into Ireland such was the ordinary pronunciation of "ea." An imported language does not change as quickly abroad as at home, and words which are now considered Irish vulgarisms were pure English in the reign of James I. The pronunciation of English has altered within the last few hundred years more than the language itself, and the actors of Shakspeare's day would not be understood were they to attempt the performance of Hamlet to-day on the boards of the California Theatre. The Irishman's difficulty with the "ea" resembles that of the cockney with the "h," with this difference: The cockney doesn't know where to put the "h" in and leave it out, and his mistakes arise from that fact. The Irishman's mistake arises from a tendency to make sounds hard and full which the Englishman has a tendency to make narrow and thin. No excuse for this is afforded though by the "e" or "ie," and no man ever heard the genuine Irishman pronounce "she" "shay," even though he does pronounce "tea" "tay." Since the death of poor Collins, the Irish-American actor, the only genuine Irish "brogue" I have heard on the stage was that of Boucicault; and outside of the works of Charles Lever I have never met a "brogue" racy of the soil in print. Among English authors, Thackeray has been the most successful in wrestling with the Irish dialect; but he forgot that there were four different "brogues" in Ireland just as there are four provinces. Captain Costigan, his best Irishman, at one time speaks as if he came from Munster and the next moment as if he came from Leinster. The habit of making Irishmen say "loike" for "like" and "foine" for "fine," is equally without warrant. Neither is the attempt to give the vulgar pronunciation of the word "sir" by spelling it "sor" accurate. It is impossible to convey the exact sound of this word as it drops from the soft tongue of the Gael. CORNELIUS A. MAHONY.

"The New Golden Age," in the January number of the Edinburgh Review, republished by the Leonard Scott Publishing Company, 41 Barclay Street, New York, records the opinions and anticipations current in the first years of the gold discoveries in California and Australia, describes the early history of gold-finding, the effect of the new mines on the value of money, and the influences which have produced the fall in the value of silver in relation to gold. In "The True Tale of the Cenci," the lovely Beatrice is shown in an unamiable and unromantic light, a very vulgar criminal indeed. Moreover, the famous picture by Guido is proved to be that of another woman. The other articles are "Mental Physiology," "Memoirs of Mrs. Jameson," "The Road to India," "Campanella and Modern Italian Thought," "Walpole's England in the Nineteenth Century," "Discoveries at Olympia," and "The Government and the Opposition."

City and County Attorney Burnett has instructed the Supervisors that their proposed ordinance against the "Passion Play" is legal, and encouraged by his opinion they have another in hand forbidding all stage representation tending to disparage "religion." Whose religion? If they do not mean religion in the abstract, they must mean the Christian religion; which, obviously, is just what they do mean. We are clearly of the opinion—if we may venture to differ, with all deference and regret, from Mr. Burnett—that American republican institutions and the organic law of the nation are based partly on the theory that all religions are entitled to equal protection, and each can better be left to the protection of public opinion than given that of the law. Would the Supervisors stop a play that ridiculed the worship of a Chinese Joss?

"The most difficult thing for an American to understand," said a writer in these columns, December 28, "is that in a war between a half-civilized European or Asian power and a civilized one the armies of the former are not commanded by an American. We would have it that Osman Pasha was an American; we will have it that the commander of the Ameer's forces is an American. Why we should always claim kinship with the under dog remains to be explained by some theory of canine sympathies not yet formulated." Now mark this from the Chronicle of March 11: "The strange report comes from London that the Zulus are commanded by experienced American officers. The English are indignant. So were we, during the civil war, at quite a number of similar circumstances."

There was a black fog in London one morning a fortnight ago. About half-past ten o'clock a remarkable wave of darkness suddenly spread over the city, and for twenty minutes it was as dark as on a moonless night. The features of persons standing close to one another could not be distinguished. But this is no worse than some of the gray fogs of San Francisco, which are so dense that it is frequently impossible to tell an eminent member of the Workingman's party from a vulgar blackguard, a Democratic ward politician from a man who ought to be in the penitentiary, or a Republican ditto from one who probably has been.

The Boston Pilot tells Mr. Blaine that though he should advocate a thousand anti-Chinese bills he can't be next President. We hope he will advocate all that are introduced, just the same. If he is willing to sacrifice the Presidency for our good, we shall not be behind him in self-abnegation: we will cheerfully sacrifice him for the good of the country.

LA CRÈME DES CHRONIQUES.

What the Alleged Wits of Paris Find to Say in the New York "World."

There are times when even the timid and inoffensive hare may prove a dangerous foe. For instance, when you have eaten too much of him.

Just as the horse was about to run over the lady, its driver, with a superhuman effort, reined the animal in, checking it so sharply that it reared upon its haunches.

"Bravo, coachee! Nobly done," exclaimed a spectator.

"I wouldn't have killed her for the world," replied the coachman; "she would have been my thirteenth this month, and thirteen is always an unlucky number."

The president of the club, at which gambling for high stakes is the rule, says courteously to a player with bushy black whiskers and a square foot of diamond breast-pin:

"I beg your pardon, sir, but it seems to me that you turn jacks from the bottom of the pack."

"It's lucky," urbanely replies the player addressed, "for I have found that when I neglected to do so I always lost."

The president, who believes in signs and omens, bows and begs him to continue.

Model newspaper prospectus, from a play at the Palais-Royal:

"The Windmill (Ind.) bears a name which is sufficient guarantee of its principles.

"Faithful to the opinions which we believe we should defend, we will only oppose those to which we are loyally hostile.

"Falseness is but a coming truth: Truth sometimes is but a late lie.

"Each number of our paper will indicate our opinion for that day.

"Shame be to those who desert the flag they bear, for it would be a comparatively easy matter for them to lay down the flag before deserting it.

"With one eye fixed on the past and the other on the present, we shall regard the future with vigilance and serenity.

"Such briefly is our programme. We make no promises—we shall keep them."

The natives of New Caledonia are confirmed polygamists, and treat women as laborers or pack-horses. It is but rarely that the worthy missionaries succeed in inducing them to embrace the Christian faith and monogamy.

One day, however, a native presented himself as a candidate for baptism. He had two wives.

"My son," said the missionary, "if you really want to be an angel and with the angels stand it is absolutely necessary that you should renounce the devil and all his works. I mean one of your wives."

The candidate went away very sorrowfully, but the good missionary's words had sunk deep into his heart, and a few days later he returned joyfully.

"I have only one wife now," said the convert, "baptize me."

"Only one wife," exclaimed the missionary; "where's the other? You had two."

"I've killed her; and if you don't believe me I have her head here to prove it," cried the convert, producing in evidence his late spouse's head tied up in a bunch of banana leaves; "and now go on with the ceremony."

A paragraph is going the rounds to the effect that longevity prevails among the members of the Society of Friends to a remarkable degree, and that the average life of a Quaker must be set down as at least ten years longer than the average life of say the ordinary American. Undoubtedly, Quakers are a peculiar people, and for two hundred years have been a distinct race. They intermarry as much as the Jews, and, like them also, they make no converts; and for these, and perhaps other reasons, the fact of their living to a ripe old age has begotten a theory that possibly the duration of life might be extended almost infinitely. Now, it is generally received among naturalists that of all the various races of animals, by far the longest-lived is the tortoise. No other animal, says Mr. Darwin, travels so methodically along well-chosen tracks. Nothing disturbs them in the smooth and even tenor of their way; they never seem to die of old age; accident alone carries them off. It is believed that some of them have attained the wonderful age of four hundred years. "It is not to be for a moment supposed," says Mr. Darwin, "that the tortoises of ancient days possessed the gravity or lived to the length of years of their remote descendants. This amazing slowness, and the no less amazing longevity, have been gained by the slow process of evolution." Hence it is held by some people that, should the rate of progression which has prevailed during seven or eight generations remain the same, in about two hundred and twenty more generations, or say seven thousand years, the average Quaker will live about as long as the tortoises of Galapagos. Unhappily, just as this startling result has been attained, the illusion which such theories are likely to create must be destroyed. Although it may seem to some that Quakers never die, to most of us it is apparent that Quakerism itself is dying out. Some are leaving the sect, others are throwing off their drab and enlarging their garments. They have given up the slow and stolid, and talk of February, and not the second month. They will keep up their sobering practice until the world has swallowed them up, and their peculiar ways will be lost for ever.

A favorite trick adopted at Lima, Peru, in carnival time, for frightening people as they pass along the streets, is the following: A sack, filled with fragments of broken glass and porcelain, is fastened to the balcony by a strong rope, of such length that when suspended from the window the sack is about seven feet above the street. The apparatus being ready, a mischievous nigger and her amita (young mistress) watch the passers-by until they select one for their victim. The sack is then thrown over the front of the balcony and a deafening crash ensues, though the rope prevents its contents from hurting any one. It is well known that in almost every street in Lima there is at least one balcony ready prepared for the performance of this trick; yet the suddenness of the crash always proves a shock, even to the strongest nerves. People start and run to the other side of the street, and are sometimes so terrified that they drop down—then loud laughter and jeering remarks are heard in the balcony. Every year this trick is prohibited by the police, but the prohibition is treated with contempt.

The cathedral, or Stewart Memorial Church, at Garden City, Long Island, will be completed early next year. The New York correspondent of The American Architect predicts that instead of being the ornament of an unpicturesque Long Island hamlet, the cathedral, with its crypt, the finest in America, will become a work of art known through two continents. The architect, H. G. Harrison, is carrying his plans into execution in an old-fashioned, painstaking way, designing everything by his own hand. One corner of his atelier has the look of a pottery, in its mass of wet modeling clay, where busy artists build up gargoyles and groups of foliage, finials and bosses. Already several cart-loads of models tell of his diligence; but in the free luxuriance of Gothic forms there are thousands of opportunities for the modeler's skill and taste. When $75,000 can be spent on a single room in material and labor, some notion may be formed of the character of the work on the building as a whole. The pavement of the church is to be of polished marble, principally of imported varieties, while the slender metal columns are soon to have their casing of real bronze, inlaid or pointed with gold, thus making certainly a unique and brilliant finish, and securing to every worshiper on the floor a view of the altar. The capitals are to be of bronze, as well. The work about the chancel is to be of the richest. There will be sixteen sedilia or seats about the chancel, while out in the choir will be additional accommodation, giving the cathedral, if need be, the opportunity for the most sumptuous ecclesiastical displays.

General Chanzy has succeeded at St. Petersburg as French Ambassador General Le Flo. Of the retiring Minister there is a good anecdote to be told that he was new to American readers. Le Flo and Cavaignac were colonels in Africa together, and though warm friends a quarrel broke out between them during an expedition on which they both served—a quarrel so violent that they agreed to settle it by a duel as soon as the campaign was over. It ended in due course, but in it Cavaignac won the epaulettes of a general, and the code did not permit his inferior to challenge him. In 1848, however, Le Flo's promotion came, and he hurried to demand the satisfaction long delayed, but at the same moment Cavaignac became Minister of War, and again his superior. Cavaignac, however, conceived the happy idea of obtaining the Russian mission for Le Flo, so that he could return an ambassador and an equal; but Le Flo's wrath was not proof against so amiable an adversary. They were reconciled, and the duel never came off.

One of the three United States Senators who habitually wear swallow-tail coats said to a correspondent the other day: "I wear this kind of a coat because I always did, and there was a time when a man would not more think of taking a seat in the Senate without a coat of this kind than he would think of going in his dressing gown." "When was this, Senator?" "Well, that was over thirty years ago. When I first went into the Senate frock coats were just beginning to appear there. A short time previous to that not a frock or a sack coat was to be seen in the Senate chamber."

An elegant assortment of gold watches and chains at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

The photographs of Messrs. Bradley & Rulofson have taken the highest prizes wherever they have been exhibited in competition with the work of Eastern and European artists. We note a tendency to ascribe their excellence to climate—the purity of our atmosphere, etc. Nothing could be more misleading. In the first place, the notion of the exceptional purity of our atmosphere is the fond delusion of local pride, and a similar one is indulged by the inhabitants of every other locality the world over—even in London. Secondly, Bradley & Rulofson's pictures are as famous at home as abroad. The trouble is, they know how to make them.

Wanted, a copy of the ARGONAUT of November 3, 1877 (Vol. I, No. 33).

Dr. E. O. Cochrane, Dentist, No. 850 Market Street, corner of Stockton (over drug store), San Francisco. Office hours, from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M.

We stated last week that Mr. T. H. Boyd, the photographer (Yosemite Art Gallery, 26 Montgomery street), was an artist, but did not expect to have our judgment so strikingly confirmed as it has been by his large water-color portrait of a lady well known in society, which hangs on the walls of the Art Association. The popularity of his photographic establishment is explained: to a man who can paint like that, the production of artistic photographs must present very few difficulties indeed. On the other hand, it is doubtful if any man can do the best photographic work who has not the practical and technical skill of a portrait painter.

CONSUMPTION CURED.—An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for consumption, bronchitis, catarrh, asthma, and all throat and lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for nervous debility and all nervous complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it this recipe, with full directions for preparing and using, in German, French, or English. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. SHERAR, 149 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y..

Artistic novelties, manufactured from California quartz, at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

STERLING SILVERWARE.—A large assortment of elegant designs at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

Modern Artists' Etchings, 22 Montgomery Street.

BUTTERICK'S
PATTERNS—SPRING STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

STANDARD THEATRE.

Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.

M. E. LEAVITT.....MANAGER.

MATINEE TO DAY AT 2 P. M.

This (Saturday) evening, March 15th, and every evening until further notice, the

GENUINE PARISIAN CAN-CAN,
A truthful representation of the Jardin Mabille, superior to anything of the kind ever seen in this city.

Last three performances of the great French comedy of
OUR INNOCENT PASTOR.

Living Art Pictures. The Loveliest Formed Woman in the World, introducing the Beautiful Living Alceh, in addition to the dashing blondes and brunettes,

MME. RENTZ MINSTRELS

—AND—
MABEL SANTLEY'S

ENGLISH BURLESQUE COMBINATION.

Seats at the box office one week in advance; also by speaking telephone at the principal telegraph stations throughout the city at theatre rates.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

COMMENCING MONDAY, MARCH 17TH, FOR A SHORT SEASON.

The manager takes pleasure in announcing an engagement, through the Redpath Lyceum Bureau of Boston, of the world renowned

HYER SISTERS COMBINATION,

The only Colored Operatic Singers in the world, in their Musical Drama,

OUT OF BONDAGE,

Or FROM THE COTTON FIELD TO THE OPERA.

Written expressly for them, illustrating the progression of the race from slavery to freedom.

MATINEES WEDNESDAY AND SATURDAY.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.

BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

Announcement Extraordinary.—The Gifted Artist, Miss JEFFREYS LEWIS,

For one week only, in conjunction with the

UNION SQUARE COMBINATION

MISS MARIE WILKINS,
MISS ROSE OSBORNE,
MISS LILIAN CLEEVES CLARKE,
MR. C. H. BRADSHAW.

REPERTOIRE OF EXTRAORDINARY ATTRACTIVENESS.

Monday and Tuesday, March 17th and 18th, Sardou's powerful drama,

FERNANDE.

Wednesday and Thursday, March 19th and 20th, the thrilling play,

FROU-FROU.

Friday and Saturday, March 21st and 22d, and at Saturday

Matinee, Sardou's great success,
THE MOTHER'S SECRET.

Seats at the Box Office.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.

F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.

CHAS. H. GOODWIN.....TREASURER.

ENORMOUS SUCCESS OF

ROSE EYTINGE.

This (Saturday) afternoon and evening, March 15, and Sunday, March 16,

THE MINER'S DAUGHTER,

A dramatization from the novel, "That Lass o' Lowrie's," expressly written for Rose Eytinge, by Charles Reade, Esq. JOAN LOWRIE.....ROSE EYTINGE.

In the Black Country.—At the Pit Mouth.—The Cross Roads.—In the Bowels of the Earth.—Light and Life Extinguished Both.—A Brave Loss.

St. Patrick's Day, Benefit of

MR. LEWIS MORRISON.

THE HUNCHBACK and the Irish patriotic drama of ROBERT EMMETT, with unparalleled star casts.

INDEPENDENT LINE

—FOR—

ASTORIA AND PORTLAND, OREGON.

The Sple Low-pressure, Side Wheel American Steamship

GREAT REPUBLIC,

3882 TONS,

JAMES CARROLL.....Commander

Will sail from Spear Street wharf, for the above ports, On SATURDAY, March 29, at 10 A. M.

Steerage Passage.....$2 00

Cabin Passage.....7 00

In Bridal Rooms.....10 00

Freight.....at Lowest Rates

FREIGHT RECEIVED DAILY.

For freight or passage apply at the office on Spear Street wharf. Tickets also for sale at No. 3 New Montgomery Street, under Grand Hotel.

P. B. CORNWALL.

VITAL HUMAN MAGNETISM

Nature's Chief Restorer of Impaired Vital Energy.

BY THIS MYSTERIOUS GIFT OF GOD TO MAN, THE MOST SHATTERED CONSTITUTION CAN BE BUILT UP IN THREE WEEKS; ACUTE CASES CURED IN A FEW MINUTES. ALL PAINS AND PAINS INSTANTLY DISAPPEARING, AND HEALTH RESTORED.

PARALYSIS CURED.

To whom it may concern.—This is to certify, that on the 15th of April, 1878, I had a stroke of paralysis of my left side, extending from my shoulder down to my hip. I found no help until I came to Mr. McLennan, 220 Stockton Street, who gave me instant relief, and saved my life. His power as a healer is wonderful. (Signed)

J. L. WILBERT, Dentist,

18 Third St., S. F.

Besides the above, I can refer with pleasure to the following prominent gentlemen that have been under my treatment: Gov. A. K. P. Safford, of Arizona; Judge S. P. Hall, of San Francisco; Judge L. E. Pratt, San Francisco; Judge Curry, San Francisco; Rev. John Tyerman, Australia; and one thousand and six hundred others, besides very many ladies and physicians of high standing whose names I am not at liberty to publish.

J. D. MCLENNAN,

Vital Magnetic Healer,

No. 220 Stockton St.

NEW BOOKS

Gleanings of Past Years. Win. E. Gladstone. 2 vols. $2 00
Notes of a Naturalist on the "Challenger." H. N. Mosely. 7 50
The Reign of the Stoics. Frederic May Holland. 1 25
Age of Antonius. Epuls of Ancient History Series 1 00
Origin and Growth of Religion. F. Max Muller. 2 50
Lord Strahan. A novel. Mrs. Wildrick Hamerton. 1 25
Life of J. W. M. Turner. Philip Gilbert Hamerton. 2 50
Records of a Girlhood. Fanny Kemble. 2 50
As It May Happen. An American novel. By Trebor 1 50
Famous Stories. George MacDonald. Paper. 4 50
American Authors—Washington Irving. By Prof. David J. Hill. 1 00
Within the Precincts. Mrs. Oliphant. Franklin Square Night Side of City Life. T. DeWitt Talmadge. Paper. 50
Foes of Society. T. DeWitt Talmadge. Paper. 50

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,

NOS. 3 AND 5 MONTGOMERY STREET.

OPEN EVENINGS.

EDUCATIONAL.

AN EXPERIENCED TEACHER, recently from Southern California, would like to obtain a class of pupils in this city. A specialty made of preparing children for examination who, through sickness or other causes, have fallen behind their grade in the public schools. Adults whose education is deficient may also obtain private and thorough instruction in the different English branches. Address MRS. E. E., this office.

WANTED,

BY A YOUNG LADY, A POSITION as Governess or Companion. Can teach Piano Music, French, and English. Highest testimonials given. Moderate compensation. City or country. Address MISS M. JAY, this office.

ELOCUTION, ORATORY, AND THE DRAMA.

MARY F. BRADLEY, 510 ELLIS Street. Ladies and gentlemen fitted for the Platform, Stage, or Teaching.

C. O. DEAN, D.D.S.....F. M. HACKETT.

HACKETT & DEAN,

DENTISTS, Latham's Building, 126

Kearny Street, San Francisco.

Office hours from 8 A. M. until 5 P. M.

The Best and Cheapest Advertising Medium.

THE NAPA

DAILY & WEEKLY REGISTER

NAPA, CALIFORNIA.

FRANCIS & SPALDING, Publishers and Proprietors.

THE REGISTER—Daily and Weekly—

is unsurpassed as a Local and County Newspaper, both in the quantity and quality of reading matter, and in value as an advertising medium. The REGISTER is the only daily paper published in Napa, and both Daily and Weekly have a large circulation.

Daily $6, and Weekly $3.
G. M. FRANCIS.....

JAPANESE FABLES FOR LITTLE FOLKS.

Translated for the Argonaut by T. E. Hallifax.

VII.—THE SPARROW'S WEDDING.*

In a certain forest in the province of Suruga, by the side of a path, once lived a well-to-do sparrow called Chiyosuke, whose son Chiyotaro was in love with the daughter of Suzuyemon, who likewise was well off in worldly goods. Now, Chiyosuke had for years looked about for a suitable wife for his son, but had not as yet met with any to suit his ideas of what his daughter-in-law and her family should be. Therefore, Chiyotaro was free to choose—a very unusual position for well-to-do young men in this country. His father could not raise any valid objection to his son's choice, but regretted he had not made a better match. The father and mother of Chiyotaro then, according to custom, got a female friend, who was also a friend of the young lady's family, to be hashi-watashi (go-between), and she went to Suzuyemon's house, and, after beating about the bush, as we say, for some time, at last came to the point and asked if his musume (daughter) Osuzu was promised or betrothed to any one yet. Being told that she was still free, the hashi-watashi proposed that she should be allowed to try and bring about a marriage with the rich Chiyosuke's handsome son, and, after considerable dallying, gained her point. The friends of both parties made the usual inquiries as to the character and temper of the young people, all of which proved mutually satisfactory. As the young people had often met, the usual formality of "seeing the maiden's face" was dispensed with, and the calendar searched for a lucky day on which the bride was to be sent to her new home. The nakodo (mediator) was then chosen—a married couple known by both families. The bridegroom sent his clerk with the bridal gifts: an obi (belt of silk, satin, or velvet), or the price of one; shiraga (a bundle of white fibre, alluding to the bride's living till her head is gray); katsuo ibushi (fish, dried and smoked); sake (liquor fermented from rice), and other things.

Osuzu's family sent her wedding outfit, and also in return the usual man's dress, sake, etc., to the bridegroom's house on the day of the wedding. The friends of Chiyotaro's family lit their lanterns and went out to meet Osuzu, and it was the grandest wedding that had taken place in the forest for many years. When the chair containing Osuzu arrived at Chiyotaro's house, she was lifted out and conducted to the guests' room, first stopping to pray at the family altar, still veiling over her beautiful white silk dress and the floss silk veil over her face. After both had tasted the cup of sake that made them man and wife, Osuzu was led to another room, and her white dress being changed for a beautiful one of chirimen (crêpe), with a cloth-of-gold girdle, she returned to the feast.

Leaving the happy couple among their friends we take a leap of several months and find that the young people are now papa and mamma, to the great delight of the four old grandparents. Our sparrows had a numerous and happy family, and the old people lived contented to a great age. So ends our story of the sparrow's wedding.

VIII.—RAIKO AND THE ONI.

A long time ago, during the great war between the Genji and the Heikei, a great number of people were killed; and strong men did as they pleased. One of the great warriors of that time, belonging to the Genji, named Raiko, not finding any one valiant enough to come forward and fight him, went in search of oni (demons) to slay. At the Ra-sho-mon (one of the palace gates) in Kiyoto there dwelt a fierce oni whom he desired to kill, and he accordingly sent his retainer Watanabe Tsuna to slay him. Tsuna was the strongest man, next to his master, in the whole country, and did not fear to attack an oni. On arriving at the palace gate the oni caught him by the helmet, but Tsuna seized the oni's arm with his left hand, and drawing his sword, cut off the limb, which so frightened the demon that he took to flight.

Tsuna, very proud of his achievement, kept the arm carefully packed in a handsome box. One day an old lady called to visit him, and saying that she had heard he had cut off the oni's arm, expressed a desire to be shown the wonderful trophy. Tsuna, being good natured to old people and good little children, and only fierce with wicked men and oni, opened the box to show the hand to his visitor; but the deceitful old thing snatched it up, and flew away with it through the skylight in the roof, and as she went she changed into her true form of a hideous oni. At this time Raiko was sick; and Mitzume Kozo (three-eyed ghou) came to torment him, thinking he was too weak to retaliate; but Raiko drew his sword, and wounding the oni badly, forced him to beat a retreat. Raiko and his retainer then followed the tracks of the blood a great distance, till they came to a large cave, in which they found an enormous spider, which Raiko attacked, and, after a desperate fight, killed.

The next oni they went in search of was Shi-ten-o. Raiko went boldly to his cave, and, asking for a night's lodging, was admitted to a chamber where was a big red man drinking strong wine out of an enormous bowl that would hold several tubfuls. By and by the giant had drunk so much that he fell asleep, and Raiko, seizing the favorable opportunity, cut off his head, and called to Tsuni to help him to carry it, when it suddenly grew larger till it was bigger and more frightful than the great shishi no kubi (lion's head) of Kanda Miyo-jin.

These brave men killed all the wicked things in Japan long ago, so that good people can now go to sleep, and not be afraid of oni coming to take them from their fathers and mothers.

* This merely is a good description of a Japanese wedding. There is no religious ceremony—merely a social contract. If the marriage turns out unhappy a mutual separation can be arranged, and the parties are free to marry again elsewhere.—T. E. H.

The latest work of Mrs. Vinnie Ream Hoxie, the sculptress, is a Cupid. The conventional bow and arrow and wings are omitted. In accordance with modern custom, the image is tinted in pink. Those who have seen it say it is the best work that artist has ever accomplished. It weighed 150 lbs. when first placed on exhibition. It weighs

OUR BOOK OF WORTHIES.

People Whom One Does not Meet.

Mrs. Abraham Lincoln still resides in France.

Madame Grévy is an invalid and lives in seclusion.

Mr. Herbert Spencer is spending the winter in the south of France.

Garibaldi's daughter-in-law is acting in pantomime in a London theatre.

Senator Jones of Nevada pays $17,000 rent for his Washington residence.

Father Abram Ryan, the poet priest of the South, is ill in Mobile with partial paralysis of the throat.

At skating carnivals in Vienna, the Princess Metternich is a prominent figure, and the fashionable beverage is mixed rum and tea.

Mrs. Thomas Hicks-Lord will shortly sail for Europe, where she will permanently reside, for men attain a greater age in Europe than in America.

Nicolini, Patti's "young man," is not an Italian: he was born at Nantes, where his father, M. Nicolas, is a well-to-do hotel-keeper, very much ashamed of his son.

Gladstone's admirers propose to build a hospital to his memory that will cost $110,000. It will be a comfortable retreat for Lord Beaconsfield when broken down by cares of State.

The widow of Bayard Taylor is said to be so poor as to be unable to pay the rent of her house in Berlin, the physicians who attended her husband, or even his funeral expenses.

The Empress Eugenie spends her mornings, it is said, in prayer, driving, and embroidery. In the evening she plays whist. Her locks are still golden, and are in charming contrast with her black robes.

The last official act of Marshal MacMahon was an exchange of presents with the Crown Prince of Sweden. He presented him with a magnificent Sevres vase, and was presented in his turn with a splendid rifle.

Field Marshal Von Roon, who died last Sunday, was one of the most eminent military men of Europe, and inaugurated the present military system of Germany. He received the decoration of the black eagle for his service at Koënnigraz.

Ralph Disraeli, brother of Lord Beaconsfield, is an old man, living in obscurity. He strolls about old gardens with a book in his hand. He goes into no society, and is never among the list of guests at Beaconsfield's house. He has a small public office, but will give no information about himself or his marriage.

Mr. Edison is quoted by a correspondent of the Indianapolis Journal as saying that the electric light "is just as certain as sunrise. They must give me time for it," he added, "and if they don't, I shall take time. I have never said I would have it done in a week."

The Emperor of Brazil keeps up a regular correspondence with the savants, artists, and literary men of the principal European centres. He compliments any notable work by asking for a copy of it, and in this way he has secured at Rio quite a collection of books and pictures, compensating the donors, in return, with jewels and orders.

Mr. Ralph Waldo Emerson's lawn at Concord is said to be the favorite gathering place of the young people and children of that pleasant town. Every year he invites them to a picnic at his home, and himself enters into their games with great enjoyment. He talks to them, not didactically, but with simple interest, of their plays and aims and duties.

"My recollection of Bismarck," says an English writer, "when I used to see a good deal of him at Frankfort, before he was a great man, is that he was a very gross feeder; indeed, I once saw him devour a fish that smelt so high that it almost made every one else in the room sick. And then his hands were always filthy, and he used to paddle them in his plate in a most unpleasant manner. Except for these peculiarities, he was a very agreeable man, talking, it is true, thirteen to the dozen, but with a sort of clever, reckless, dare-devil air."

Louis Schneider, the late amanuensis of the German Emperor, was a man of odd notions. The pillow on which his head rested in his coffin was the work of his own hands, and he had been engaged in making it for thirty years. It was stuffed with his own hair, which he had preserved from the clippings of his lifetime. In color, it varied from the light brown of youth to the snowy white of age. In his will, Schneider described in detail the way in which he wished to be buried, and wrote out the epitaph that he desired to have placed upon his tombstone.

President Grévy, when he was elected, was one of the few men in France who did not belong to the Legion of Honor, and as it would have been anomalous for the President as Grand Master of the order to be undecorated, the Council and Chancellor met and invested him with the Grand Cross. This was not strictly legal, but it was in pursuance of the precedent in the case of M. Thiers. When, in 1872, the re-constituted army was reviewed at Longchamps, the Cabinet resolved that the President could not fitly hold the review without the Grand Ribbon, and accordingly bestowed it upon him. M. Thiers buttoned his overcoat over the decoration and held the review in peace.

CLEOPATRA'S SOLILOQUY.

By Mary Bayard Clark.

[In compliance with requests from many readers we reprint from our own columns the following poem, which appeared in that eminently respectable magazine, the late Galaxy. What it lacks in poetry it makes up in love—which is perhaps better, certainly more generally preferred.]

What care I for the tempest? What care I for the rain?
If it beat upon my bosom, would it cool its burning pain—
This pain that ne'er has left me since on his heart I lay,
And sobbed my grief at parting as I'd sob my soul away?
O Antony! Antony! Antony! when in thy circling arms
Shall I sacrifice to Eros my glorious woman's charms,
And burn life's sweetest incense before his sacred shrine
With the living fire that flashes from thine eyes into mine?
Oh, when shall I feel thy kisses rain down upon my face,
As a queen of love and beauty, I lie in thine embrace,
Melting—melting—melting, as a woman only can
When she a willing captive in the conquering arms of man,
As he towers a god above her, and to yield is not defeat,
For love can own no victor if love with love shall meet?
I still have regal splendor, I still have queenly power,
And—more than all—unfaded is woman's glorious dower.
But what care I for pleasure? What's beauty to me now,
Since Love no longer places his crown upon my brow?
I have tasted its elixir, its fire has through me flashed,
But when the wine glowed brightest from my eager lips 'twas dashed.
And I would give all Egypt but once to feel the bliss
Which thrills through all my being whenever I meet his kiss.
The tempest wildly rages, my hair is wet with rain,
But it does not still my longing, nor cool my burning pain.
For Nature's storms are nothing to the raging of my soul
When it burns with jealous frenzy beyond a queen's control.
I fear not pale Octavia—that haughty Roman dame
My lion of the desert, my Antony, can tame.
I fear no Persian beauty, I fear no Grecian maid;
The world holds not the woman of whom I am afraid.
But I'm jealous of the rapture I tasted in his kiss,
And I would not that another should share with me that bliss.
No joy would I deny him, let him cull it where he will,
So mistress of his bosom is Cleopatra still;
So that he feels forever, when he Love's nectar sips,
'Twas sweeter—sweeter—sweeter when tasted on my lips;
So that all other kisses, since he has drawn in mine,
Shall be unto my loved as "water after wine."
Awhile let Cæsar fancy Octavia's pallid charms
Can hold Rome's proudest consul a captive in her arms.
Her cold embrace but brightens the memory of mine,
And for my warm caresses he in her arms shall pine.
'Twas not for love he sought her, but for her princely dower;
She brought him Cæsar's friendship, she brought him kingly power.
I should have bid him take her, had he my counsel sought.
I've but to smile upon him, and all her charms are nought;
For I would scorn to hold him by but a single hair.
Save his own longing for me when I'm no longer there;
And I will show you, Roman, that for one kiss from me,
Wife, fame, and even honor, to him shall nothing be!

Throw wide the window, Isis; fling perfumes o'er me now,
And bind the lotus blossoms again upon my brow.
The rain has ceased its weeping, the driving storm is past,
And calm are Nature's pulses that lately beat so fast.
Gone is my jealous frenzy, and Eros reigns serene,
The only god e'er worshiped by Egypt's haughty queen.
With Antony, my loved, I'll kneel before his shrine
Till the loves of Mars and Venus are nought to his and mine;
And down through coming ages, in every land and tongue,
With them shall Cleopatra and Antony be sung.
Burn sandal-wood and cassia; let the vapor round me wreath,
And mingle with the incense the lotus blossoms breathe;
Let India's spicy odors and Persia's perfumes rare
Be wafted on the pinions of Egypt's fragrant air;
With the sighing of the night breeze, the river's rippling flow,
Let me hear the notes of music in cadence soft and low;
Draw round my couch its curtains—'I'd bathe my soul in sleep:
I feel its gentle languor upon me slowly creep.
Oh, let me cheat my senses with dreams of future bliss,
In fancy feel his presence, in fancy taste his kiss,
In fancy nestle closely against his throbbing heart,
And throw my arms around him, no more, no more to part.
Hush! hush! His spirit's pinions are rustling in my ears;
He comes upon the tempest to calm my jealous fears;
He comes upon the tempest in answer to my call—
Wife, fame, and even honor, for me he leaves them all;
And royally I'll welcome my lover to my side.
I have won him—I have won him from Cæsar and his bride.

A writer in the Boston Courier takes the following cheerful view of the loves of Goethe: For a woman to love him was not merely a homage to his loveableness, a tribute to his vanity, a delight to his senses—it also caused him the most profound æsthetic pleasure, such pleasure as the noblest music produces upon the most musically gifted souls. It is possible, of course, that other men have made themselves loved by an equal number of lovely and of brilliant women; but no other ever went through such experiences with an arrière pensée, and wrote down the outcome in books. In one way, moreover, aside from the far finer quality of his genius, Goethe shines by contrast with all others who have thus analyzed and described their loves. He studied women as Mr. Darwin studies pigeons, but he was ever a gentleman. He delighted in sensuous impressions, but he was not a sensualist. Rousseau was a beast who could talk; Goethe was the ideal of the man of culture; a man, that is, in whom the finest instincts, the widest reading, the most thorough study, do not dwarf or stifle the physical side of his nature, but refine, and heighten, and ennoble its delights. All that Goethe wanted was gettable without sacrificing any woman's honor; and we assume that, except in the case of his wife, nothing of the kind occurred. It remains true, that, as a previous writer has said, "from his earliest youth, Goethe was intent on amassing that treasury of ideas, emotions, and observations to which he was to have recourse in all his subsequent life. Every one of the love-passages in his life may be regarded as an experiment on some female heart, on his own, and on life. He followed it out till he had extracted from it not only present enjoyment, but poetical inspiration. When this object was accomplished, he quitted the being who had excited in him and revealed to him so many of the phases of passion, and gave himself up to attractions of a new order, to another set of emotions and observations." Goethe was of course fully aware of what he did, but he treated complaints with that—one might almost say, impudent—consciousness of genius. "If you could but know what Werther is to many hearts," he wrote to Kestner, "you would not reckon what it has cost you."

The heathen Begum of Bhopal is a model for some Christian monarchs. She has built the best hospital in India, outside of Calcutta; has made excellent roads throughout her kingdom, and is about to build a railroad.

COMMERCIAL
INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALIF.,
FIRE AND MARINE.
Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.
JOHN H. WISE, President.
CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT
— AND —
INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE
CASH ASSETS.....$450,000
Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco
OFFICERS:
A. J. BRYANT, President,
RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President,
CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary,
H. H. WATSON, Marine Surveyor

ALASKA
COMMERCIAL CO.
No. 310 SANSOME STREET,
WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.
SHIPPING
— AND —
COMMISSION MERCHANTS,
Agents for the
SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET
LINES.
204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST. - - San Francisco.

MILLER & RICHARD,
SOLE MAKERS OF EXTRA-HARD METAL
SCOTCH TYPE.
SPECIAL AGENTS FOR
THE CAMPBELL, HOE, AND PEERLESS PRESSES.

No. 529 COMMERCIAL STREET.
nd 205 Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

A CARD TO THE LADIES.
The success and intrinsic merit of an article are best indicated by the amount of abuse it receives from proprietors of similar articles. For some time past CAMELINE has been the object of malicious attacks under the head of "Cameline vs. Creme de Lis." The proprietor or agents of "Creme de Lis," with the intention of deceiving the public, have attempted, in these advertisements, to confound CAMELINE with an obscure and rare chemical substance of somewhat similar name, in no way connected with or entering into its composition, and the name of this chemical has in these advertisements been distorted for the purpose of increasing the deception. We have nothing to say in this connection in regard to the comparative merits of CAMELINE and Creme de Lis, concerning which ladies are best competent to judge, but for the purpose of sustaining our assertion that CAMELINE is perfectly free from objectionable or deleterious substances, we herewith append the opinion of a number of prominent physicians of this city.

H. P. WAKELEE & CO.
SAN FRANCISCO, February 1, 1879.
The undersigned, physicians of San Francisco, are familiar with the composition of the principal articles used for the complexion, and freely certify that WAKELEE'S CAMELINE is free from all poisonous or injurious substances:

L. C. Lane, M.D., Wm. Hammond, M.D.,
H. H. Toland, M.D., W. F. McNutt, M.D., R. A. McLean, M.D., A. J. Bowie, M.D.,
Chas. B. Brigham, M.D., J. C. Shorb, M.D.,
Benj. D. Dean, M.D., F. A. Holman, M.D.,
Henry Gibbons, Jr., M.D., Jas. Rosenstem, M.D.,
T. J. Clarke, M.D., L. D. Whitney, M.D.,
W. H. Bruner, M.D., Thomas Boyson, M.D.,
A. M. Loryea, M.D., C. G. Kenyon, M.D.,
Cephas L. Bard, M.D., Isaac S. Titus, M.D.,
Chas. C. Keeney, M.D., Harry L. Sims, M.D.,
A. M. Wilder, M.D., J. H. Stallard, M.D.,
Geo. M. Powers, M.D., Chas. McQuesten, M.D.,
Benj. E. Swan, M.D., James O. Shaffer, M.D., L. L. Dorr, M.D., Wm. Carman, M.D.,
Jas. W. Keeney, M.D., Washington Ayer, M.D.,
Gustav Holland, M.D., J. L. Meares, M.D.,
Geo. F. Cooper, M.D., Thomas Price, M.D.,
Samuel W. Dennis, M.D., H. Gibbons, M.D., J. M. McNulty, M.D., Thomas Bennett, M.D.

FRANK KENNEDY,
ATTORNEY AT LAW, 604 MERCHANT STREET, Room 16. Probate divorce, bankruptcy, and all other cases attended to.

COMMENCING MONDAY, NOV. 18, 1878.
Passenger trains will leave San Francisco, from Passenger Depot on Townsend Street, between Third and Fourth, as follows:
8.30 A. M. DAILY for San Jose, Gilroy, Hollister, Tres Pinos, Pajaro, Salinas, Soledad, and all Way Stations. At PAJARO, the Santa Cruz R. R. connects with this train for Aptos and Santa Cruz. At SALINAS the M. & S. V. R. R. connects with this train for Monterey. STAGE connections made with this train.

10.40 A. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.
3.30 P. M. DAILY (Sundays excepted) for Gilroy, and Way Stations.

4.40 P. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.
6.30 P. M. DAILY for Menlo Park and Way Stations.

The extra Sunday train to San Jose and Way Stations is discontinued for the winter season.

EXCURSION TICKETS to San Jose and intermediate points, and return sold on Saturdays and Sunday mornings. Good for return until following Monday, inclusive.
A. C. BASSETT, H. R. JUDAH,
Superintendent. Asst. Pass. & Tkt. Agt.

SOUTHERN DIVISIONS.
Passengers for points on the Southern Divisions of the road will take the cars of the Central Pacific Railroad via OAKLAND, leaving SAN FRANCISCO via Ferry Landing, Market Street, at 4.00 P. M. daily (Arizona Express Train), and making close connection at GOSHEN for SUMMER, MOHAVE, LOS ANGELES, WILMINGTON, ANAHEIM, COLTON, COLORADO RIVER, YUMA, and STANWIC (85 miles east from Yuma).

SAN FRANCISCO AND NORTH PACIFIC R. R.

Commencing Monday, November 11, 1878, and until further notice, Boats and Trains will leave San Francisco: (Ticket Office, Washington Street Wharf.)

3.00 P. M., DAILY, Sundays included, Steamer "James M. Donahue" (Washington Street Wharf), connecting with Mail and Express Train at Donahue for Petaluma, Santa Rosa, Healdsburg, Cloverdale, and way stations. Making stage connection at Lakeville for Sonoma; at Geyersville for Skaggs Springs; at Cloverdale for Ukiah, Lakeport, Mendocino City, and the GEYSERS.

Connections made at Fulton on the following morning for Korbel's, Guerneville, and the Redwoods (Sundays excepted). (Arrive at San Francisco 10.30 A. M.)

Freight received from 7 A. M. to 2.30 P. M. daily (except Sunday).

TICKET OFFICE, WASHINGTON STREET WHARF.
ARTHUR HUGHES, Gen. Manager. A. A. BEAN, Sup't.
P. E. DOUGHERTY, Gen. Pass. and Tkt. Agent.

OCCIDENTAL AND ORIENTAL STEAMSHIP COMPANY
— FOR —
JAPAN AND CHINA,

Leave Wharf, Cor. First and Brannan Streets, at noon, for YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG.

Connecting at Yokohama with steamers for Shanghai.

GAELIC, OCEANIC, BELGIC.

May16 March22 April16
June15 July15 October15
August15 September15
November15 December16

Cabin plans on exhibition and Passenger Tickets for sale at No. 2 Montgomery Street.

For freight apply to GEO. H. RICE, Freight Agent, at the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's Wharf, or No. 218 California Street.

T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Passenger Agent.
LELAND STANFORD, President.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP CO.

First-class steamers with unequalled accommodations for passengers will leave San Francisco:

FOR YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG, On the 1st of every month.

FOR SYDNEY AND AUCKLAND, via HONOLULU, January 20, February 17, March 17, April 14, May 12, June 9, July 7, August 4, September 1, September 29, October 27, November 24, December 22, and every fourth week thereafter.

FOR NEW YORK, via PANAMA, CENTRAL AMERICAN, MEXICAN, and SOUTH AMERICAN PORTS, HAVANA, and all WEST INDIA PORTS, on the 5th and 20th of each month.

FOR VICTORIA, B. C., PUGET SOUND PORTS, and PORTLAND, Oregon, on the 10th, 20th, and 30th of each month.

WILLIAMS, BLANCHARD & CO., Agents, Corner First and Brannan Streets.

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Steamers of this Company will sail from Broadway wharf for PORTLAND (Oregon), every five days, direct, and for LOS ANGELES, SANTA BARBARA, SANTA CRUZ, SAN DIEGO, SAN LUIS OBISPO, and other Northern and Southern Coast Ports, leaving San Francisco about every third day.

For day and hour of sailing, see the Company's advertisement in the San Francisco daily papers.

TICKET OFFICE, No. 214 MONTGOMERY ST., NEAR PINE.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO., Agents, No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco.

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,
Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco

C. P. R. R.

Overland Ticket Office, Oakland Ferry, foot of Market St.

COMMENCING MONDAY, MARCH

3d, 1879, and until further notice.

TRAINS AND BOATS will leave SAN FRANCISCO:

7.00 A. M., DAILY, VALLEJO Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with the trains for Napa (Stages for Sonoma), Calistoga (The Geysers), and Sacramento. Connecting at Davis (Sundays excepted) for Woodland and Knight's Landing, and at Woodland for Williams and Willows.

(Arrive San Francisco 8.10 P. M.)

7.00 A. M., DAILY, LOCAL Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and via Livermore), arriving at Tracy at 11.30 A. M., and connecting with Atlantic Express. Connects at Niles with train arriving at San Jose at 10.15 A. M. (Returning, train from Tracy arrives at 6.05 P. M.)

8.00 A. M., DAILY, ATLANTIC Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.) for Sacramento, Marysville, Redding (Portland, Or.) Colfax, Reno (Virginia City), Falls Lake (Eureka), Ogden, and Omaha. Connects at Galt with train arriving at Lone at 3.40 P. M.

(Arrive San Francisco 5.15 P. M.)

SUNDAY EXCURSION TICKETS TO SAN PABLO AND MARTINEZ AT REDUCED RATES.

10.00 A. M., DAILY, (VIA OAKLAND Ferry), Local Passenger Train to Haywards and Niles. (Arrive San Francisco 4.05 P. M.)

3.00 P. M., DAILY, SAN JOSE Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and Niles), stopping at all way stations. Arrive at San Jose 5.20 P. M. (Arrive San Francisco at 9.35 A. M.)

3.00 P. M., DAILY, NORTHERN Railway Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry) to San Pablo, Martinez, and Antioch. (Arrive San Francisco 9.35 A. M.)

4.00 P. M., DAILY, ARIZONA Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.) for Lathrop (and Stockton), Merced, Madera, Visalia, Sumner, Mojave, Newhall (San Buenaventura and Santa Barbara), LOS ANGELES, Santa Monica, Wilmington, Santa Ana (San Diego), Colton, and Yuma (Stages for Prescott and Colorado River Steamers), connecting direct with daily trains of the Southern Pacific Railroad of Arizona for Stanwic (85 miles east from Yuma) and end of track. Daily Stages for Maricopa, Phoenix, Florence, and Tucson. Sleeping cars between Oakland, Los Angeles, and Yuma.

(Arrive San Francisco at 12.35 P. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED, Vallejo Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with trains for Calistoga (The Geysers), Woodland, Knight's Landing, and Sacramento, and at Sacramento with passenger train, leaving at 9.35 P. M., for Truckee, Reno, Carson, and Virginia. Sleeping cars between Vallejo and Carson. (Arrive San Francisco 11.10 A. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED, Sacramento Steamer (from Washington Street Wharf) for Benicia and Landings on the Sacramento River. (Arrive San Francisco 8.00 P. M.)

4.00 P. M., DAILY, THROUGH Third Class and Accommodation Train, via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R., connecting at Lathrop with train arriving at Los Angeles on second day at 11.55 A. M. (Arrive San Francisco 9.05 A. M.)

4.30 P. M., DAILY, LOCAL Passenger train (via Oakland Ferry) to Haywards, Niles, and Livermore. (Arrive San Francisco 8.35 P. M.)

5.00 P. M., DAILY, OVERLAND Emigrant Train (via Oakland Ferry and Northern Railway), to Ogden, Omaha, and East. Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Seminary Park Station."

FERRIES AND LOCAL TRAINS.

FROM SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

connecting at Lathrop with train arriving at Los Angeles or second day at 11.55 A. M. (Arrive San Francisco 9.05 A. M.)

4.30 P. M., DAILY, LOCAL PAS.
Senger train (via Oakland Ferry) to Haywards
Niles, and Livermore. (Arrive San Francisco 8.35 P. M.)

5.00 P. M., DAILY, OVERLAND
Emigrant Train (via Oakland Ferry and Northern Railway), to Ogden, Omaha, and East.

Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains. Sundays excepted, at "Seminary Park Station."

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

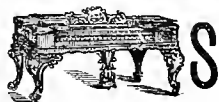

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.
WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

SPRING STYLES

ALL IN NOW!

Send for Illustrated Catalogue.

REMOVAL.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO.

MUSICAL BOX DEPOSITORY AND
WORK SHOP has been removed from No. 120
Sutter Street to

No. 31 Post St., San Francisco.

GOULD & CURRY SILVER MINING
Company.—Location of principal place of business,
San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the eleventh day of March, 1879, an assessment (No. 35) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 69, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid
on the sixteenth day of April, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the seventh day of May, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with cost of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.
ALFRED K. DUKBROW, Secretary.
Office—Room 69, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street,
San Francisco, California.

HALL & NORCROSS SILVER MINing Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the twelfth (12th) day of March, 1879, an assessment (No. 61) of one ($1) dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 58, Nevada Block, northwest corner
Pine and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the sixteenth (16th) day of April, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on THURSDAY, the eighth (8th) day of May, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JOEL F. LIGHTNER, Secretary.
Office—Room 58, Nevada Block, northwest corner Pine and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California.

LEE D. CRAIG,

Notary Public and Commissioner
of Deeds.

TAKING OF DEPOSITIONS, Searching of Records, Conveyancing, and the incorporating
of Companies, specialties.
MONTGOMERY STREET, N. E. CORNER OF CLAY,
SAN FRANCISCO.
J. F. V. Studder.

THE Automatic SEWING MACHINE STANDS PRE-EMINENT.

A machine that delicate ladies can run as well as the strong. So simple in construction that no experience is required to operate it perfectly. Makes the strongest seam, there being three threads in every stitch. A machine that will sew leather or lace, woolen, or cotton goods without any change. POSITIVELY NO TENSION. The only machine in the world based on AUTOMATIC principles. Thousands now in use, giving the most entire satisfaction.

WILLCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.
C. L. HOVEY, AGENT,

124 POST STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, AND 361 TWELFTH STREET, OAKLAND.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

NICOLL THE TAILOR

BRANCH OF NEW YORK,

Begs to inform his numerous patrons (and their name is Legion), that he employs only WHITE LABOR, and that the reason he is able to sell cheaper than any other Tailor is that, having Sixty Stores all over the United States, and a London House, he is able to buy and import in immense quantities direct from the Mills at home and abroad, thereby saving all the intermediate profits which other Tailors have to pay.

Gentlemen, before ordering elsewhere, will do well to call and inspect my immense stock at any of my branch stores, and their daily arrivals of New York and Paris fashions. Also, of French and English Goods from my London House.

Pants in Six Hours. Suits to order in One Day, if required.

TO ORDER:

Pants, - - - $4
Suits, - - - 15
Overcoats, - - 15
Dress Coats, - 20

Genuine 6 X

By Appointment to the Tailors

TO ORDER

Black Doeskin
Pants, - - - $7
White Vests, fm 3
Fancy Vests, - - 6
Beaver Suits, $55.

The Trade and Public supplied with Cloth and Trimmings at Wholesale Prices.

Any length cut, and all kinds of Cloth kept in Stock. Samples, with Instructions for Self-measurement, sent free.

A small stock of uncalled-for Goods to be sold at a great reduction.

CLOTH AND WOOLEN BROKER.

FINEST STOCK OF WOOLENS IN THE WORLD.

NICOLL THE TAILOR'S GRAND TAILORING EMPORIUM,

727 Market Street, 505 Montgomery Street, 18 Kearny Street,
And 853 Broadway, Oakland.

PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE,
320 POST STREET
San Francisco.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,
FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.
QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE
for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. 237 Entrance
south side of Court. A. D. SHARON.

GRAY'S MUSIC STORE

AGENCY FOR

PIANOS

SUPERIOR QUALITIES OF

Tone, Touch, and General Finish.

PRICES VERY MODERATE.

HOME SCHOOL, Oakland, Jan. 29, 1879.
M. GRAY—Dear Sir: In reply to yours of this date, I purchased one Kranich and Bach Piano, No. 4,432, of you in 1874. In 1876 I purchased another of the same make
No. 6,080. Both have been in use ten months a year since, and on an average ten hours a day. They have required tuning three or four times a year, have had no repairing, and are now in good condition. All the anticipations at the time of purchase have been realized.
Yours truly, H. N. FIELD.

M. GRAY—Dear Sir: In reply to your note asking if the Kranich and Bach Piano purchased from you in 1875 has given satisfaction, I am pleased to inform you that it has proved to be all that was represented at the time of purchase. I will also add that a piano subjected to four years use in our club, where there are upward of five hundred members, is as severe a test as an instrument can be put to.
The Kranich has stood the test, and at present writing is in first class condition—in fact as good as new.
Respectfully, W. S. LAWTON,
Superintendent of the Olympic Club.

ST. MARY'S COLLEGE, San Francisco.
MR. M. GRAY—In answer to your inquiry I would state that the Piano purchased from you in 1872, made by Kranich and Bach, came fully up to our expectations. We regard it as a fine instrument.
Yours truly, BRO. JUSTIN, President.

KRANICH & BACH PIANOS ARE IN USE AT

The Mills Institute, Alameda Co.
Washington College, Alameda Co.
Sisters of Charity, Petaluma.
St. Vincent's School, Santa Barbara.
Protestant Orphan Asylum, S. F.
R. C. Orphan Asylum, S. F.
St. Peter's School, S. F.
J. D. Smith's College, Livermore.
Blind Asylum, Berkeley.
St. Mary's College, Benicia.
Temperance Legion, S. F.
Christian College, Santa Rosa.

Send for Catalogue.

GRAY'S MUSIC STORE,
117 POST STREET.

MARBLEIZED IRON MANTELS.

IN ELEGANCE OF DESIGN, QUALity of finish, and durability of polish, they are every way superior to slate or marble. In point of economy, also, they cost very much less, are stronger, and certainly far more durable than either.

ALL SIZES AND STYLES

ENAMELED GRATES.

FRENCH-COOKING

RANGES

All sizes, suitable for Hotels, Restaurants, Families, and Boarding-Houses.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, & 120 BATTERY ST.

The Argonaut.

VOL. IV. NO. 12.

SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 22, 1879.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

AFTERMATH.

"The wonder of newspaper making." This is the heading of one of those marvelous editorials of the Call. The article treats of the mechanical department, its wonderful press, and the large circulation the Call has attained. All this is not half so wonderful to us as the editorials of Mr. Pickering. The judicial fairness with which he takes all sides of all questions, and the absolute impartiality displayed by him in avoiding an expression of opinion upon any subject that has two sides, are truly miraculous. Another wonder occurs to us in connection with the Call, and that is that so wise, so prudent, and so successful a business man as is our friend Pickering should give daily columns of his paper to record the doings of the sand-lot and its itinerant telephone. However, miracles are funny things any way. When Christ cast out devils, they went into a drove of swine, and the hogs ran into the sea and drowned themselves. We sincerely hope that Nathan the Essenian is right, and that the age of miracles is coming again. We hope to live to see the day when all those San Francisco dailies now pandering to the sand-lot mob, and catering to the prejudices of a lot of ignorant foreigners, shall fill the bellies of swine, and the swine be bounced into the bay.

We miss the Central Pacific Railroad advertisements from the columns of the Chronicle, and we are informed that that corporation, and all coöperating with it, embracing the Southern and other railroad companies, the steam lines, and ferry companies, have withdrawn their business from that journal. The reasons that have induced this movement are, because the Chronicle continually abuses its president, directors, and officers by name, and persistently misrepresents the enterprises in which they are engaged. Such being the case, the officials and managing directors of the companies are unwilling to contribute to the support of a newspaper whose chief aim seems to be their personal abuse. "To assault Governor Stanford while ill, and to endeavor to injure the credit of the corporation in the money marts of the world, and to attempt to hinder and delay them in extending their roads, is a kind of journalism for which they think they ought not to pay. Perhaps they are right.

We wonder if there is not just a little gush over the suicide of Hood Alston, who "died that others might live;" over whom in his last moments came "thoughts of home and the loved ones as white-capped breakers over a barren coast," and who, dying, "went back to nature, to the God whose hand gave him to the universe;" who went to sleep "under the cedar," with his morphine bottle beside him. "Poor Hood Alston," says Postmaster Avery, "with his tired heart, his secret, his weary soul, his struggle to keep up in the world." All this sounds exceedingly pretty, if we can forget his wicked life, his abandonment of wife and children, his robbery, his gambling, his lies, his flight, his cool and premeditated and cowardly death—shirking all the duties, all the troubles, and all the responsibilities of life. He may have been all that is now claimed for him—"a person of fine sensibilities, generous heart, loving nature, and large capacity." More principle and less whisky would have compensated for all the fine qualities, and he might have dared to live and perform the duties he assumed in taking upon himself the responsibilities of a husband and a father.

Cremation has for the fifth time been performed in Gotha, the Protestant clergy approving. On previous occasions they had taken a part in the fiery rite. There is, then, nothing offensive to the Church in cremation—except, may be, the odor—and the late lamented may roll themselves together as a scroll, and melt with fervent heat, without incurring the maledictions of the priesthood. And really there is an admirable reason why the parsons should encourage the practice. On the principle that "a burnt child dreads the fire," the children of darkness who have been so "prepared" will feel a new terror on approaching their unblest abode in the next world. That this uneasiness will come too late for a reformatory purpose is no objection. Anything to worry the wicked.

It was an ingenious plea, that of the counsel of Passanante, the gentleman who felt it his duty to attempt to assassinate King Umberto, of Italy, and his misfortune that he did not succeed. "The prisoner," said his counsel, "is the victim of a corrupt state of society," though what would have been the relation of the king to a corrupt state of society had the victim succeeded, he did not point out. "If," the learned counsel continued, "Passanante were given time to recognize his error, he would be the first to cry, 'Viva il Re!'" But if Signor Passanante were given time to be the first, what assurance would he give that il Re himself would have time accorded him to be the second? The victims of a corrupt state of society—our own illustrious Passanante of the sand-lots included—should have the forethought to repent of their errors before committing them.

A corrupt state of society appears to prevail in Burmah, too, and has claimed a victim in the reigning sovereign, who has had the misfortune to put to death all his male relations. A plea for time to recognize his error would, in his case, receive powerful support from the circumstance that if he is now executed for it there will be no legally qualified person to succeed him; and in a corrupt state of society questions of disputed succession are dangerous to aspirants.

The remarkable and sudden decrease in the crime of garroting during the past week is explained. On Sunday last the daily papers foreshadowed the opening of a new route to Yosemite Valley and the Big Trees, and the garroters left town in a body to establish hotels and stations along the line.

"Prince Leopold, Queen Victoria's youngest son, has been making a speech in London," says a contemporary, "and is mentioned as showing many of the best qualities of a real orator." In England the best quality of a real orator is rank. Having that, he can charm and persuade the most critical audience with his brains in his belly, his tongue in his button-hole, his hands in his mouth, and his legs in his pocket.

It is now held that the reason the Chinaman wears five buttons on his coat is that he is thus reminded of the five principal moral virtues—the Chinese names for which we have unfortunately lost, and the contemplation of the virtues in ourselves does not suggest them. This fact is valuable to the ethnologist, as showing how identical customs may have different origins: Dennis Kearney has also five buttons to his coat, but the devil a bit cares he for the virtues. He wears the buttons in order to conceal Deacon Fitch's cast-off shirt, and Mr. Charles de Young's discarded vest.

A propos of spring, we learn from a San Rafael journal that "the hills thrill with responsive efforts, and myriads of flowers bespangle their smiling sides." It is worth while to observe that a San Rafael hill differs in important respects from a San Rafael woman: it can thrill only with an effort, and it smiles with its sides.

Contrary to the opinion of the gallant British officer whose guns are now defending our countrymen in Alaska, the editors in New York consider the danger "greatly exaggerated." The reports are certainly rather highly colored if it is asserted that they are in peril.

By the way, there is a singular likeness between the superb tranquillity of these Eastern people when the Alaska savage paints his body sea-green and brandishes his scalp-ing tool, and their unruffled composure when steamship after steamship utters its multitudinous coolie upon the San Francisco wharf. As much as the blind, unreasoning prejudices begotten of our peculiar geographical position will permit, we and our handful of countrymen in Sitka admire, and venture to envy, the imperturbable coolness of our Eastern brethren in seasons of danger.

A woman was recently arrested at the instance of Mr. Mark McDonald, the tall stockbroker, on a charge of battery, but escaped punishment through a "technicality," the evidence developing the most extraordinary and unprecedented state of facts that ever beat a court of justice in this or any country. The prisoner was accused of having committed her battery by throwing something. The testimony of several spectators showed beyond a doubt that what she threw was an egg; but the prosecuting witness was quite as positive that what hit him was a chicken. Now, the prisoner's counsel argued (very justly, it seems to us) that as the egg which the lady threw did not hit Mr. McDonald, and the chicken which hit Mr. McDonald the woman did not throw, she could not be held to have committed any assault whatever, and should be discharged. The court eventually took that view of the matter, and ordered that the irons be struck from the prisoner's shapely limbs, while the towering complainant walked thoughtfully away, wondering whether there wouldn't have been a bona fide assault if his head and the sun had not happened to be in conjunction.

If the foregoing narrative is in any respect inaccurate we must beg the reader to remember that reporting trials is by no means the sphere of usefulness in which this journal most aspires to shine. Our account is at least as true as the story of Icarus and his waxen wings, and that has been told, now, for some thousands of years, and never twice alike; but the highest honors for variation must be accorded to the genius who recently hit upon the happy expedient of spelling the fellow's name Ikaros. Icarus, we need not remind the sapient generation of schoolboys, flew so near the sun that the wax holding together the feathers of his artificial pinions melted, and he broke his precious neck—not by any means the last terrible example that has been made of an aspiring quill-driver, as Mr. Hector Stuart can feelingly aver. Well, the sun-heat that can melt wax can hatch an egg, though it does not follow that the hen-heat that can hatch an egg can melt wax. Indeed, it certainly can not—as was amply proved on the memorable occasion of Mr. Pickering's famous al fresco forty winks near a henney.

A wicked boy, it will be remembered, laid a trail of wheat from the henney to, and into, the sleeping journalist's wig, and in a few minutes the feathered creatures were following it up like fire along a slow-match. Arrived at the terminus, the old rooster jumped into the wig, and with a few vigorous scratches detached and sent it flying like a pigeon. A matronly hen at once mounted the naked head, either to hatch it or lay another like it, it is uncertain which. At any rate, a half-hour session failed to even warm the wax in the uppermost ear. But it gave to politics one of the most far-sighted editorials that ever attested the lofty outlook of a superior intelligence; for the great editor, dreaming, naturally, that he had his head in a bag, was afterward moved, by the memory of that exceptional opportunity, to give his views of the political horizon.

It is of considerable importance to know that Senator Sharon has been placed on the Committee on Epidemic Diseases. We look for nothing less from the indefatigable worker than that he will make epidemics so deathly unwell that they will not know what is the matter with them. Indeed, we should not be surprised if he were to bounce them all out of the country, and the historical painter of the future should adorn a panel in the Capitol with a lively representation of "Sharon Shaking the Ague." As a subject for a spirited picture this would be in some respects superior to the hackneyed Homeric theme of "A Jackass Defying the Lightning."

Our Bohemians are playing a good joke on the good and pious people of the East, and from which we hope they may reap a harvest of coin. Hansbro, of the Chronicle, has found an English-talking heathen, converted by the Reverend Otis Gibson, and presumably the husband of one of his reclaimed Asiatic maidens. Hull, of the Chronicle, and the one who wrote Kearney's early speeches, writes a lecture for the biased barbarian. The very godly, very unctuous, and very Reverend Otis Gibson sends off Hansbro and Chan Tak Kwai with his blessing and a letter of introduction to the Methodist brethren of the East. These twin apostles have taken neither scrip nor purse, but have gone out with staff and cheek to preach the gospel of Confucius to all the Christian heathen throughout the eastern world, and may the blessing of Buddha go with them.

For unblushing cheek and broad cosmopolitan insolence we commend the following action of the German club of San Francisco as the most colossal instance of monumental impudence that alien vagabonds ever perpetrated upon American good nature:

"SAN FRANCISCO, March 20, 1879.
"DENIS KEARNEY:—Having just received a telegraphic account of the abuse you received in Santa Ana, we hereby request you to telegraph immediately for the military forces of W. P. C. to protect you from further injury as an American citizen and agitator for the benefit of the people.
ANTONI FLORES."

We could never have believed that sauerkraut, a late of fermentation could have smelled so loud!

BILL CALLOWAY'S POST-MORTEM.

By James H. Lawrence.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST NUMBER.]

In the crowded marts of great cities the death of a man, even a distinguished resident, hardly causes a ripple on the surface of society. We read it in the papers. There's a funeral, and somebody attends; but outside the small factor of the community who may be the relatives or very intimate friends of the deceased, nobody feels it. The gorgeous hearse with its nodding plumes, the processions in regalia, the long line of carriages, are every day sights. They turn a corner, and are forgotten. There's a circus-band wagon coming down the street, an organ-grinder across the way, the milk-peddler and water-sprinkler struggling for precedence, the itinerant with "things to mend" and the fellow with "wild game" screaming in concert, a jam of street-cars and hackmen, the bustle and jostle of pedestrians. Everybody is in a hurry—no time to waste on dead men. In the country, when death strikes its victim, the blow is felt in every household.

The village went into full mourning. The flags were at half-mast, crape was hung on the doors of the court-house, the citizens looked grave and serious. The sexton, a melancholy man, in a sombre garb of gray, plodded along, with pick and shovel, by the short cut to the burying-ground. All day long, and until late at night, there was a painfully suggestive rap-tap-tapping in the shop of the grim and solemn old carpenter, who fabricated most soul-appalling and uniformly dismal black coffins for the town funerals. Notices, with a black border, were posted in conspicuous localities announcing that the deceased would be buried on the following day at a stated hour, services at the cemetery.

Another day dawned. The storm was over, but the roads in bad condition. Every available vehicle and all the saddle-horses in the town and suburban precincts were mustered into service, and a majority of the population moved in small detachments toward the Forked Lightning Ranch. About noon the head of the procession came in sight. An express wagon did duty as hearse, a neat barouche bore the widow and children; then followed a long line of miscellaneous vehicles, and a respectable cavalcade of mounted men; and as they slowly wended their way along the principal street, and filed out on the road leading to the cemetery, the remnant of the population fell in and brought up the rear afoot. It was an imposing pageant, for a small town.

The ceremonies at the grave were impressive. The preacher, who was of the Methodist (South) school, was not a profoundly learned man, but he was earnest, sincere, practical—a man with a large heart in him. At revivals, and when he had "the power on him," he could dish up an article of hell-fire for obdurate sinners that would mark 400 deg. in the shade; but he had the good sense to leave it at home when he officiated at the funeral of an old forty-niner. His memories of Bill Calloway were pleasant. Many a time had he thrown a ten-dollar piece into the hat at a camp meeting, and when the gamblers took up a collection to build the first church in the place, Bill, who had been engaged in a little game of "draw," stood in with the knights of the green cloth, and contributed liberally. Hence he skipped the rough places, and meandered about in the cheerful walks of everyday life. He spoke of the deceased as "a good neighbor, generous, obliging, self-sacrificing, ever ready to respond with hand and purse to relieve the distressed, a kind husband and father, a man of good impulses, brave and chivalrous, one who observed the golden rule, 'Do unto others as ye would that others should do unto you,' he leaves a vacant place in this community." He remarked in conclusion, "And we who are assembled as friends to pay our last tribute to his mortal remains will cherish his memory as that of a man of sterling worth. Let us pray."

The prayer was simple, earnest, and impassioned; and when he feelingly alluded to the widow and children, his fervent appeal touched the hearts of his auditors. The "amen" was said. The sobs of the bereaved wife, the whispered words of condolence from sympathetic neighbors, the sighing of the wind through the branches of the pines, blended in harmony with the solemnity of the scene. Tears glistened in the eyes of men unused to weeping. "Earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust." The clouds fell with a doleful rattle upon the coffin, and the crowd sorrowfully dispersed.

All that evening men were gathered in little groups talking it over. Some stood at the street corners, here and there, under the awnings of stores, at the express and post offices, and in front of the hotel. The pall-bearers, by common consent, had drifted into the Arcade Saloon, and thither the most intimate friends of the deceased appeared to gravitate. It was a favorite resort of "the boys," an institution born in the flush times of the town. It had held out for a year or two against the pressure of hard times, and maintained the standard price of whisky at "two bits" a glass. The place had a history, and had seen marvels in the way of excitement. It had now been closed since noon, and in its reopening there was a quiet, subdued air, in harmony with the general tone of the occasion. Those who came in on business drank decorously, and their glasses were set out and removed without any extra flourish or dexterous tricks of legerdemain gratuitously thrown in by the expert manipulator of cocktails. The general topic under discussion was of Bill Calloway. "Uncle Gid," whose grief, though mitigated to some extent by the discourse of the parson, was still profound, was rehearsing to a man from Tuolumne some of the salient points in Bill's career.

"I've known Bill longer and better than anybody," he said. "More than twenty years ago, I reckon, since I mined along side of him on Buckeye. He had a constitution like a mule, and I am just keen to swear that he was the stoutest man for his weight and inches that ever marked the yearth. Boys, you know I was no slouch at a lift in them days; but I've seen him pick up a boulder that I had been tugging to roll out of the way, lift it breast high, and pitch it over the bank, just easy. I used to tell him to save his strength. 'Go slow, youngster,' says I; 'light lifts make strong old men.' Bill would laugh. 'Call that lifting?' says he; 'why, that's only a pebble, a mere finger-stone. Just holler when you get stalled again; I'll help you out, Uncle Gid; I'm strong with strength.' And Bill was as active as a cat-amount. I've seen him stand flat-footed and clatter seven feet in a standing jump, without weights. Boys, he was a good one."

"Yes, indeed," chimed in the man who lived out at the Oak Springs and raised fighting chickens; "and a game one. It took a rough customer to get away with him in any sort of a tussle."

"They say Big Jake Mowry came mighty nigh walking his log once," drawlingly remarked Lazy Jo.

"Hello! who stuffed you full of that nonsense and then pried yer mouth open to let it out?" responded the Oak Springs man. "I happened to see that fight. Why, bless your innocent heart, Bill knocked him plumb from taw quicker'n you could say 'scat.' He let him get up and come again, and give it to him in the same place. Then when Jake run in for a clinch, that was into Bill's hand. He raised him in the air and beat the ground with him like he was a wet moccasin. Big Jake might do for a small tea-party or a corn shuckin', in quiet times, among pious people, but he didn't carry guns enough for Bill Calloway."

Jo slunk away, humbled and abashed. His place in the circle was immediately filled by Pete Lannigan, a veteran whose crippled leg and scarred visage told tales of many a hard fought battle. Pete had been loitering outside, but the mention of "fight" had drawn him into the ring.

"It's the truth yer spakin'—devil the word of lie in it. Wasn't I there, meself? Oh, by the howl in me coat! it was the purtiest taste of a fight ye ever seen. I mind that same year I had a howldt wid Bill at collar an' ilbow—just fur a friendly fall, ye know. It was the day I had a little divarshun wid Phil Donahue—him that give me this bit of a cut over the eye wid a shovel, and I welted him dacently wid a little kippeen of a shtick. I had a snifter or two in me skin and felt me kapin'. That was afore I got hurted, an' I was on me two pins an' was handy wid them both. 'Shtep out here now, Billy, me b'y, an' we'll have a taste of the hand an' fut.' 'All right,' says he. 'First fall for the dhinks,' says I. 'First fall goes,' says he. We tuk a howldt. Be the mortal! I jist raised me fut from the ground, whin I felt meself sailin' through the air, an' thin I landed on the broad of me back. Sure the stars was out in the sky an' the breath clane out of me body. O man! O man! it was the purtiest fall I ever had. I was on me trotters in a minute. 'Dacintly done,' says I; 'will ye take a dhrink?' 'Wud a fish swim?' says he. Oh, Bill was a dacint young fellow. Wirra, wirra! what made ye die?"

"Speaking of drinking," said Bob Atwell (one of "the boys"—aged a little over seventy), "Bill could wag off with a load of it. I think he could carry it more gracefully than any man I ever met. Whisky seemed to take no effect on him. One-ten of what he could get away with in a day would make me staving blind drunk." The old man heaved a deep sigh of regret at his want of capacity to hold it in unlimited quantities.

By this time the outsiders had begun to drop in by twos and threes, till the Arcade was numerously thronged. The judiciary was represented by the district and county judges and a couple of justices of the peace. The legal profession had a delegate or two. A majority of the county officials had put in an appearance. A resident physician was there; and progress and education were typified in the personal presence of the editor of the village newspaper and the pale, delicate schoolmaster from Pea Ridge. From the personal prowess and individual character of Calloway the conversation drifted into the subject of providing for the family. What had been done was duly canvassed, and it was found, upon comparing notes, that their immediate necessities were not urgent, and that, as for the future, there is a Providence which provides for the widows and orphans. And it was further resolved, in a sort of informal manner, that this community should hold itself organized as a special committee in the hands of Providence to do the practical work.

"By the way," queried the man from Tuolumne, who in early times had known the deceased, "what was the matter with Bill? He was well enough when I saw him last—splendid health, fine constitution; ought to have lived a hundred years. Was he sick a long time?"

"Well, no," responded Uncle Gid; "it isn't more than a week since he took his bed; but I tell you confidentially" (here he dropped his voice to a husky stage-whisper, that a man with good ears can hear double the distance of the ordinary tone of voice), "Bill had softening of the brain."

"Softening of the brain!" echoed a dozen voices at once, a majority of them in most unmistakable derision.

"That's what I said," replied Uncle Gid; "and if you fellows will just listen to me I'll tell you why I think it. Bill has been complaining for some time. He had a misery in his stomach; I wasn't scared about that; but long before this he told me he had queer feelings in his head. First time I noticed it was when I was out thar—let me see; it's three months ago—time I built that little addition to his woodshed. Bill was moping about—didn't appear nat'ral; sometimes he'd sit in a brown study for ten minutes at a time. I seen he was blue; so, of an evening, I'd get out the old fiddle and I'd play the old favorite tunes—such as he'd ask me to play at old man Brewer's and Lu Bales's, ten or fifteen year ago. I've seen the day when, if I struck up the 'Arkansas Traveler,' 'Gal on a Log,' 'Gray Eagle,' or 'Sally Lick the Ladle,' Bill would jump like a quarter horse. But this time, do you think he'd move a peg? Nary foot. Finally, one night I was just tuning her up, and had drawn the bow a time or two, when Bill he says, right earnest and pitiful like: 'Uncle Gid, I wish to God you'd let up on that d-d old fiddle.' I know'd then thar was something wrong, and that his head was giving way. He'd lost his grip. It's what the doctors call softening of the brain."

Uncle Gid turned away and walked toward the door. He wept. Old Bob Atwell beckoned him to the bar. They smiled.

Then an old prospector, Sweetwater Charley, ventured the opinion that it was inflammation of the bowels. He remarked: "It must have been something that took hold of him right sudden. I was out at Forked Lightning three weeks ago last Saturday. Stopped there as I was on my way to Hite's Cove. Bill was all right then. I played seven-up with him. I reckon we drank twenty times together."

"Possibly," said the County Judge; "possibly this excessive indulgence in drink may have had some influence upon the health of our friend."

There was a chorus of indignant rejoinders and abrupt responses in denial of the insinuation.

Jo Decker took it to heart dreadfully. "Why, Judge, as long as you've lived here, and as many years as you've known Bill Calloway, to think that, now he's dead and gone, you'd cast a reflection upon him by so much as hinting that he ever got out of the way by liquor! Who is there in this crowd, I'd like to know—if there's a man let him speak—who ever seen Bill Calloway drunk?"

There was a dead silence. The Judge apologetically explained to Jo that he intended not to intimate that their mutual friend was drunk, but thought it possible that he might, in his prolonged sitting with the convivial Charley, have taken into his stomach a quantity in excess of the usual amount. "Any beverage," continued the Judge, as he took the arm of Jo and promenaded across the room—"any beverage, be it pure and clear as the dew from heaven, may be taken into the system in quantities capable of producing deleterious effects. Serious results have often followed the imbibing of copious draughts of cold water."

The clink of glasses, and the free and easy manner with which Jo tapped the shoulder of the Judge, announced the reestablishment of friendly relations.

The District Attorney—a sour, bilious-looking man—said "liver complaint." He was hissed down.

Jo Decker, who was with him in his last moments, gave it as his deliberate opinion that his death was caused by jaundice. "Didn't you notice his color? Why, he was yellow as gold. Even the whites of his eyes were colored. But you can bet yer sweet life his brain wasn't off color. His head was clear as any man's in this house ten minutes before he winked out."

Lazarus Perkins, who had sat up with him three or four nights before his death, and who cherished the memory of a grandmother who died at the advanced age of ninety-five, of dropsy, drew a parallel case with that of Bill's, and demonstrated that he died of heart disease.

The pale, delicate schoolmaster from Pea Ridge pronounced in favor of "Bright's disease of the kidneys."

The editor of the village newspaper, on being appealed to for an opinion, replied that he had one, but proposed keeping it to himself. "Is thy servant a doctor, that he should do this thing? Excuse me, gentleman, a country editor has to make himself generally useful; but," he continued, "I have never attempted to practice medicine nor made a post-mortem examination. Here's the doctor who attended on him, why not ask his opinion?"

"The point is well taken," remarked the Judge, "and only that our lack of courtesy to the sole representative of the medical profession now present has been the means of airing so many and diverse nonprofessional opinions, I would most certainly insist that we all individually apologize for the affront. Doctor," he resumed, addressing the man of medicine, who stood by the corner of the bar, and had been dividing his time between conversing with the portly proprietor and listening to the discussion, "we are unable to agree as to the cause of the death of our mutual friend, Calloway. As his attending physician, and knowing as we do your uniform good judgment and standing in the profession, we would like to hear your views on what, from the information at hand, appears to be a most extraordinarily complicated case. Doctor Burnam, your decision is a finality."

There were two physicians in the town, and up to a recent date public opinion had been pretty evenly divided as to their relative skill, till a year or so prior to the event herein narrated, when a little incident tipped the beam in favor of Burnam. Smith, his rival, had been doctoring a grass widow who lived in a lonely sort of way with some distant relatives near French Gulch. The widow was "fat, fair, and forty"—perhaps nearer fifty. The malady was currently reported as "dropsy." Burnam was called in during the absence of Smith, and his diagnosis of the case evolved a revelation which created the greatest sensation of the season. When subsequent events proved the Burnam theory to be correct, and the mother and twins were pronounced "doing as well as could be expected," then it was that the star of Smith descended with the velocity of a stick from an exploded rocket, while that of Burnam shone with the blazing effulgence of a locomotive headlight.

Nothing loth to promulgate his professional knowledge, and rather flattered by the affable manner of the Judge, the Doctor removed the cigar from his mouth, blew a column of smoke in graduated rings toward the ceiling, laid his hat on the counter, and responded:

"Boys—excuse me for using the term 'boys'—I have known you all a long time, and when I look into your faces I feel that I am among friends."

"That's all right, Doc," said old Bob Atwell.

"You have asked me a plain, straight-forward question, and I am going to give you a plain, blunt answer."

"Spit it out, Doc;" "Show your hand;" "No foolishness now;" "Tell it all." These and a dozen other brief adjurations came from as many different voices.

"Uncle Gid," he continued, "was correct—"

"Thar, what did I tell you?" interrupted the veteran violinist, exultantly.

"—correct as far as he went; but that wasn't all of it. There was an element of truth in each and every one of your expressed opinions. Bill Calloway's liver was affected. He had inflammation of the stomach, jaundice, dropsy, kidney disease, softening of the brain—in fact, a complication of diseases. None of his vital organs performed their proper functions. There have been several cases in this vicinity of a similar nature; but I think Calloway's was the worst I ever saw within the range of my practice. The cause of all these ailments—the germ of this fearful combination of disorders, which culminated in this funeral which we all attended to-day—may be spoken in a word. It is WHISKY!"

His voice sank to a husky whisper, and a visible shudder ran through the circle of which the speaker was the centre.

"Yes, this strong man—this robust, vigorous, healthful man—who physically was a giant, a Samson among his fellows, became the total wreck he was from whisky. This man, who 'never was known to be the worse for liquor,' as one of his best friends defiantly asserted, died miserably, thirty years before his time. Whisky killed him. He isn't the first victim. Call the roll of the best men who lived, and moved, and held places of prominence and trust in this town and county twenty years ago. Members of the learned professions, leading business men, county officials—noble fellows most of them, 'on whom each God did seem to set his seal, to give the world assurance of a man.' Call to mind the names of those whom you knew best in early days. You look in vain for their faces. They have been swept from the face of the earth; their bones are in our burying ground. With rare exceptions, whisky did it. Am I not right, my friends?"

There was a general murmur of assent. Then the best memories in the crowd were levied upon for names. The list was appalling. There were two district judges, a half-dozen members of the bar, a couple of newspaper editors, nine or ten doctors, several county officials, and many adventurers, who had, in their better days, been leaders among men, and who, in intelligent and moral worth, were the peers of the best among their fellows, save for the curse of strong drink.

Jo Decker agreed that most of those mentioned had "been pretty heavy on the drink; but, Doc, there's been men named who, to my certain knowledge, had their chunks knocked out in another sort of fashion. Powder, lead, and cold steel don't count on the whisky list, Doc."

"Yes, in most cases, such as you allude to, whisky plays its part. Nine times out of ten, when you go to the bottom facts in these deadly encounters, you'll find whisky cuts a figure there in some shape. At some stage in the difficulty there's somebody drunk. I appeal to you, Judge, to you, Uncle Gid, and Bob, who have lived here since the first white settlement, to you, editor of our newspaper, whose business it is to take note of passing events, and to whom a homicide is sometimes a godsend as a news item."

There ensued a brief conference among the referees designated, in which several outsiders joined. The blood-stained pages of homicidal history were briefly scanned. Two or three instances appeared, of memorable record, where the man who did the slaying was duly sober, but in these isolated tragedies it appeared that "the other fellow" had his skin full, incidentally, or with malice aforethought and intent to bolster up his nerve for the fray. Uncle Gid thought he had struck it, when, in prospecting the old tailings along the sluice-boxes of his memory, he unearthed, as he expressed it, "a clean, cold-water killing." It was when the disturber of domestic felicity was shot by an injured husband who had deliberated over the matter for about five years. Amended by the editor, who was present and heard the testimony at the Corner's inquest. The evidence of the nearest saloon-keeper, where the shooter laid for his game, was to the effect that just before he grabbed for his gun and went for his man he swallowed the biggest drink of whisky the witness ever saw, or words of similar import.

"Doctor, how is it that so many of your profession, knowing as they do the precise effect of alcohol, become addicted to its inordinate use and fall victims to the pernicious habit?" queried the Judge.

"I see what you are driving at, Judge," he resumed; "that's a home-thrust. I take no offense; we all need these rebukes. It would be better for us all could we 'see ourself's as others see us.' I will answer your question directly—but one word about these good fellows that are gone. We can't bring them back. The best use we can make of them is to hold their failures, their weaknesses, up as a warning to our living friends, and ourselves as well. There is this to be said of most of them: They had no wives to bear the burden of their shame, no children to inherit the vices of the fathers. I see around me now several gentlemen who occupy the position of husband and father, and I am sorry to remark that some of them are addicted to drink like the balance of us. It's a habit that grows on us. We doctors who are exposed to contagious diseases, broken of our rest, likely to be called up at any hour of the night, find it necessary to take something by way of a diffusive stimulant. We need it in our business frequently. As a medicine it is valuable; so is calomel, arsenic—even prussic acid. It is not its use when required for any good there is in it that swells the list of its victims—that makes our cemetery a mausoleum to the votaries of drink. It is not the natural appetite for stimulant which fills the graveyards with drunkards and the living world with crushed and weeping widows and pale, half-starved, and morally-deformed children. The appetite comes, though, after a while. It is created by what it morbidly craves. It sometimes takes years of training and careful, attentive nursing to build up a craving for liquor. I have seen old staggers who had been without it for a few weeks—sworn off, perhaps, after a prolonged spree—get wild, crazy, for a drink. I've been there, boys; it's hell! This isn't natural—it's a diseased condition engendered by a pernicious habit, and this habit or second nature is the result of this infernal, devilish custom of social drinking. Were it not for this wretched sociable practice Bill Calloway and half a hundred other noble specimens of manhood now resting in the graveyard would be living to-day. They yielded to a custom—drifted with the popular tide till they were drawn within the whirling maelstrom of intemperance and sank down, down, till they were lost forever. Boys, we are nearly all in the same current—drifting the same way. We think we can land our boats; so we imagine we are masters of the situation. Don't you know we are all in danger?"

The Doctor struck the counter with his clenched fist, and the glasses bounced. Lazy Jo, who had fallen asleep in a chair in a far corner of the room, awoke with a spasmodic bound. Uncle Gid's eyes almost started from their sockets. The District Attorney threw out an overgrown quid of tobacco. The Judge took a fresh chew of fine cut. Pete Lanagan, who had stuck close to the side of the Doctor during his entire discourse, settled down on his shortened leg. A stuttering man from Hornitos, who had hitherto kept silence, but withal had been a most attentive listener, spoke:

"D-d-d-doctor, w-w-wh-at you g-g-going t-t-t-to d-d-d-d-do about it?"

"Do—about—it?" That is a poser. It's what's been bothering the brains of temperance reformers for years. I'd like to wipe the last whisky mill off the face of the earth. I say, legislate them out of existence. But you can't point me to a politician, be he candidate for office, newspaper man, or office-holder, who dares openly avow this sentiment. Look at the votes he'd lose. He'd be bounced by the Irish, mobbed by the Dutch, and lampooned without mercy by the scattering native American population. Something has to be done, though; for I need not tell you that this curse is spreading. The disease has become contagious, and chronic as well. It is being transmitted to the coming generation, and, unless checked, its hereditary result will be a race of lunatics, idiots, and imbeciles. I would strike a blow at the sociable phase of the habit. Make it unpopular, unfashionable, aye, disgraceful! to drink in public. Starve out the saloons; and instead of sneering at and ridiculing men who avoid these places, honor them for their resolution, and applaud them when they manfully and firmly respond 'No' to this sham courtesy couched in the miserable phrase, 'Take a drink!'

Before he could finish Pete slapped him on the shoulder: "Is that an angel's voice I hear? Bedad, I don't care if I do wet me neck."

The thoughtful shadows which had settled on the faces of the Doctor's audience flitted away like a summer cloud before Pete's sun-burst. There was a general and hearty laugh. The Doctor wiped the perspiration from his brow and replaced his hat. The Judge was the first to speak.

"I was about to remark that the profession of medicine might afford to lose a skillful practitioner, so that the temperance reform gained an able and eloquent advocate. At the same time it appeared to me that this thing was getting monotonous, and Pete's interruption is in order. Doctor, will you?"

"Boys, it's been dry talking. The Judge is right; Pete was right; we're all right, or will be in less than a hundred years. There was something else I intended to say, but never mind. All of you take a drink at my expense. Come up, everybody!"

The proprietor of the Arcade and his associate, who had preserved a serene composure during all this time, gracefully slung the glasses along the polished surface of the counter. The word was "fire and fall back" till the glasses were all filled. It was numerically a healthy crowd; there must have been nearly, or quite, forty, all told. The Doctor, the Judge, the District Attorney, an ex-Senator and Assemblyman, the editor, and most of the "old timers" took whisky straight. There was a toddy or two called for, and the man from Tuolumne said "brandy." The little, pale, delicate schoolmaster from Pea Ridge took lemonade, but after a sip a two poured half of it out, and allowed the barkeeper to "put a stick in it." The Doctor took three-fourths of a glassful. He was "weary and thirsty," he remarked. Pete, whose neck was "dhry as a powder-horn wid walkin' and waitin'," filled his to the brim. "I'm loser on that transaction," pleasantly remarked the proprietor.

"How's that, now?" said Pete.

"That glass of whisky cost half a dollar at wholesale."

"Did it? Be gob, it's worth ivery cint of it."

"Are you all ready?" asked the Doctor.

"Ready," was the response.

"Then here goes—and may the Lord take a liking to us."

"Amen," responded Pete. "It's a poor parish that can't afford a clerk."

The Doctor never concluded his lecture. Its statistics are matters of record. The place is going to decay, and, like all old mining towns, its old settlers have emigrated—most of them to the burying-ground. Their surviving companions are scattered far and wide. Occasionally they jostle against each other, and then they sit down and have a quiet talk of old times, and of those glorious old "boys" whose lives shone with the light of noble deeds, and went out in the vigor of manhood; who scorned meanness, who dispensed wealth with a liberal hand, who shrunk from no peril in championing the right; but—well—they would "take a drink."

SAN GORGONIO PASS, February, 1879.

Everybody knows how actresses and singers are occasionally beset by some moon-calf, who takes the same seat every night, buys flowers, sends billets doux, waits at the stage door, and advertises himself openly to the world as an infatuated noodle or a crazy wretch, unfit to be at large. There was a fellow, it will be remembered, who followed Christine Nilsson about when she was in this country, annoyed her by staring ferociously at her from a private box every night, threw himself in her way when she left the opera house, and finally broke into her room one day, and declared he would shoot himself if she did not marry him. Lydia Thompson was beset for a year by a lunatic, who followed her from city to city, wrote wild rhapsodies in obscure papers, and sent them to her by the hundred, marked with red chalk, and planted himself every night in front of her audience to attract attention by his disgraceful show of familiarity. Even the staid Clara Louise Kellogg has not escaped this kind of persecution. A few years ago a woman fell in love with her, followed her about from city to city, made her acquaintance, and having some literary ability, succeeded in getting published a number of the most extravagant and fulsome articles about the distinguished singer. The infatuation was so complete in this case that the lunatic made her pursuit of Miss Kellogg the one business of her life, and almost succeeded in making the prima donna's existence a burden to herself. Miss Maud Harrison, the estimable young actress at the Union Square, has been, it seems, subjected to the same kind of persecution by a mild lunatic, much to her annoyance and to the discomfort of her managers. The monomaniac in this case is a middle-aged, bald-headed person of clerical appearance, who plants himself in a front seat, and as soon as Miss Harrison appears, looks round at the audience with a most absurd air of proprietorship and triumph, and applauds vociferously and continuously.

A writer in Truth gives the following amusing account of an incident illustrating the melancholy snobbery of the English social character, and the sacrifices of self-respect that are cheerfully made for social favor: I was once an attaché at an embassy, and there was to be a ball. With that distant, reverential love of which Burke speaks I adored a lady. She was on the outskirts of society, and she had not been asked to the ball. How she did tease me to get her an invitation, and how I did tease the Ambassador's wife to give her one. But in vain; "it would offend so many people whom I really can not ask," etc. At last we hit upon the following expedient. She was sent an invitation to dinner, on the distinct understanding that she was not to accept it. Of course she put the invitation card in a very prominent place in her drawing-room. Then when her friends came to see her, and kindly observed: "I did not see you, dear, at the Embassy ball," she was able to reply: "No, dear, I was so sorry not to be able to go, nor to dinner before, for I was not very well." And the card was on the table to show that she was not lying.

OUR OWN POETS.

Her Eyes.

Like timid maids from out a bed of rose,
Two misty stars crept from the sunset skies
And fled in frolic to the earth's fair shore;
There—weary, lost—they sought and found repose
Beneath the lids of my dear lady's eyes,
Which, closing, shut them in for evermore.

But oft they watched their distant sisters rise,
Oft wearied sore to gain their home so bright,
Where ceaseless vigils keep the Pleiads seven.
This is the cause that in my sweetheart's eyes
There rests a misty cloud of yearning light,
And this the reason why she looks to heaven.

SAN FRANCISCO, March, 1879.

SIGNA.

Mignonette.

The darling of the summer time,
The sweet-breathed mignonette,
Comes from a loving hand to mine,
Reminding me of girlhood's prime,
The days in sunshine set.

Gently across my winter day
This breath of summer floats;
It bears my tired soul far away
Unto some calm and blessed bay
Known but to these frail boats.

The drifting clouds are mirrored there;
The slowly moving leaves,
There lie at rest the lilies fair—
No sound disturbs, nor thought nor care;
There nothing speaks or grieves.

And there the wild bee, all untold,
Hushes his breezy tune,
In sweet content his wings to fold
Within the lily's heart of gold,
Breathing the breath of June.

Within my airy barque I lie,
Of Nature's self a part;
Across, beneath, a placid sky,
A cloudless incense floating by
Out of the summer's heart.

CALISTOGA, February, 1879.

JULIA H. S. BUGEIA.

Cui Bono?

Who finds himself belated, and still follows
The windings of the wood, and hopes to see—
When he's beyond the dense and tangled hollows—
The dying sun illumine the open lea,

But meets instead thick brake and growing shadows,
Then sinks upon the damp and trackless clay,
And weary dreams of level fragrant meadows,
And wakes, and sleeps, and longs, and moans for day,

Is he who, proud of stored and earnest learning,
Would solve the mystery that wraps him round,
And dreams that science, cold, unswayed, discerning,
Can pass beyond its clay-encircled bound.

He sees the stars, he measures every distance
That lies between each planet and the earth;
The globe itself can offer no resistance,
But yields to him its story from the birth.

But when he struggles with his own soul's mystery,
A wall unyielding casts its bulk between;
All else surrenders long restrained history,
This only stands a grim, impervious screen.

We live, we die—so much, no more, is given;
From dust we spring, return again to dust.
And ties are made, and dearer ties are given,
And trust is true, and oft betrayed is trust.

What good, I ask you, is this vain undoing?
What good this fruitless measurement of years?
The old beliefs may perish—the pursuing
Can only find its goal in nameless fears

That we may perish with the tree and blossom,
And be no more in any time or place,
But form one atom of earth's mighty bosom,
One particle upon the parent's face.

What good? Ah me, who cares for the hereafter,
If only here we taste the hour's delight?
The world is full of song, and wine, and laughter;
The day is ours—be happy until night.

OAKLAND, March, 1879.

DANIEL O'CONNELL.

Outside.

Within the gate it is passing fair—
A fringe of flowers and a plat of grass,
And men and women and children are there,
I hear their voices, I see them pass;
But I am not of them, and wince to feel
The cruel cold of the latticed steel.

"Kismet?" No, it is merely Chance.
"Work?" I have worked—it is something more.
I do not envy their reckless dance,
Or their damask ease on the marble floor;
I do not envy them ever, and yet
I gaze till my eyes are dazed and wet.

"Why?" Do you care for the why? I turn
To the cool green hills which climb to the cloud;
But no ambitions within me burn,
For Fancy's dead, and Despair's the shroud.
So, idle and wicked and weak, I choose
To sigh for the good which the gods refuse.

SAN FRANCISCO, March, 1879.

R. S. S.

Tired.

Palm unto palm to lie
In purest calm of sky,
And be a child again,
Where shadows cross above,
And bird-songs weave their love
On floors of shining grain.

To hide in grass, a child,
By winds that pass me wiled
From every thought of pain;
Till earth should grow too fair
For the child-heart to bear
Without sweet tears, a rain.

NILES, February, 1879.

CH. 31.

SUBURBAN SAUCE.

Served from the Witch of Endor's Ladie.

MY DEAR JUANITA:—You read the "Maid of Athens?" letter last week, and can therefore imagine my feelings. Just to think of it, when I hunted Damon and Pythias, and Castor and Pollux, out of the manual, and got French phrases for her—to think of that antiquated old "maid" who has to put carboline on her eyebrows to keep them from falling out, and talks so affectingly about "we girls"—just to think of her reproaching me with youthfulness! Age a delicate subject to me? Nothing of the sort. Don't believe it. She had to write something, and as age gives her so much trouble it is natural that she should attack me at the other extreme. But it ill becomes me to enter the lists against one who has had so long an experience on the track, and who carries besides the "extra weight"—of years. But forgive me for encroaching on your time with my private grievances. You want news, I know. Since my last you have come near to losing your little "witch," and thusly do I tell it. At lunch the other day (I told you where it was) I was suddenly taken ill and had to leave. At home I thought I should die. I supposed that I had been suspected of telling on people, betraying their confidences and so on, and that they had inveigled me into that lonely spot to dispose of me. Two days after, however, I found that the other seven were just as bad as myself. I can't believe that any one could have been so atrociously cruel as to have poisoned the whole company with the salad. A good thing happened the other evening which I now feel at liberty to inform you of. The occasion was the celebration of a silver wedding. The evening came, and also the guests anxious to congratulate the entertainers. The family bible was brought out, and the date, with names of officiating minister, witnesses, and contracting parties, were read by the proud and happy father. He then turned to the births, where some wag had altered the date of the eldest child's birth, but this the old man did not notice. And so it came about that the astounded company were informed of a child's being born five years before the parents had met. You can understand how the joke was appreciated. We immediately had supper. We have now a genuine sensation, and one that was especially enjoyable, for it was such news. It seems that a year ago a young couple quietly determined to take upon themselves the responsibilities of wedded life, so they quietly marched to the city, were married, and came home, but on account of some queer, romantic idea or other, they failed to inform their parents of their new relations, and so the revelation became daily harder to make. At length, just at about the time when their wedding was generally supposed to be about to take place, the marriage certificate was discovered by the little bride's mother, and they stood confessed. The beauty of it was that we had all along expected a wedding, and so society is disappointed. But we are to have a reception at any rate. I hope this will set the fashion, for I know a big wedding would frighten me to death or into a fainting fit. Last Friday night, Mr. Lunt's dancing class having fallen off in attendance, he had announced for the evening's entertainment a fancy-dress surprise party. We had no time for elaborate preparation, but mostly appeared in made-up costumes, as appropriate as one day's notice would allow of. The first prize was given to the most original character, a clever representation of the slang expression, "It blew in." Honorable mention was made of our hardware merchant as "a beardless boy." He threw an innocence into the characterization, and looked and acted truly artless. That, they say, is the highest form of art. His brother, the banker, personated a local "detective," and was mistaken for him. Mrs. F. appeared as the traditionally much-abused "mother-in-law." It was a very happy selection, especially in view of late events. Lawyer C. imagined himself as "Disappointment." I had to be told what he was trying to represent, and I do not believe more than a dozen people knew what he was aiming at. He should have carried a placard bearing the device, "This is disappointment." However, I suppose he looked rather to effects than causes. Mr. R. F. was "Silenus, a rural deity"—so I was told afterward. I thought him the "marble faun," from his statuesque assumption of the character. He should have "hopped" about livelier. Going home I glanced at my "Mythology," and found, what perhaps he was not aware of, that "Silenus" was an attendant on Bacchus, but I did not see his friend with him. Mr. T., in a gorgeous tie, was "Narcissus, the Grand." Mr. K., as proprietor of an itinerant circus, "One dollar admission, gentlemen." Miss R. displayed a remarkably beautiful costume as "Iris, goddess of the rainbow." Oh, if I could describe that dress to you! Pure white of some soft material (Chinese crêpe, I think) that draped beautifully, and just covered with the most exquisite hand embroidery—flowers and vines clambering around and over her. Mrs. R., in red turban, was a "Vivandière," but when Col. F. appeared with a yellow kerchief wrapped around his head, the couple was immediately dubbed as Bluebeard and Fatima. Miss L. as "Patience" was remarkably quiet. Indeed, her subdued activity suited the character admirably. Do you ever attend egg-nog parties? I thought they were intended for gentlemen only, but the refining influence of our sex hereafter will permeate the atmosphere of all their social pleasures—and why not? I believe in extending our sphere—as you see by the contents of this letter. Mrs. P. gave us good "egg-nog," but, thank goodness, something else besides. Who were there? The whole happy family; they were happier before they left. When the evening was nearly over, one young society belle (of the male gender, however) was presented to a lady who always avoids the subject of age. In the course of conversation she happened to remark that her father was something like a quarter of a century her senior. Very innocently and ingenuously he inquired: "Has he been dead very long?" Can you figure the freezing glance he received? It was terrible. The men have inaugurated an entertainment as an offset to the ladies' lunches; no mingling of the sexes, no mixing of anything but their liquors. I do so hope they will all suffer with headaches—as they probably will. They call these new entertainments communiones, and appoint an arbitrator bibendi in true classic style by shaking dice, and so the entertainment lasts just as long as the assembly. Saturday night has been very agreeably set apart for this heathenish custom—Sunday morning to sleep. Sunday afternoon they all walk out ten or fifteen miles in the hills and back again. Monday all are bright and fresh for business. Cards are out for Miss L.'s "kettledrum" next Saturday. It is to be a very grand affair, and very extensive preparations are being made to receive the hundred or more lucky enough to get an invitation. It is not to be confined, as usual, to conversation, but we are to have music and dancing. I understand the ladies will appear in demi-toilet. They have not made Russian tea fashionable over here yet; what a pity! It always makes a company so jolly. The same day the students of the Senior Class celebrate "Charter Day" at Berkeley. This is an honored and honorable custom. The University boys are very popular, and I notice all their entertainments are well attended and exceedingly enjoyable. Have you heard of the new diamond mine on Jackson Street. There is great fear among all possessed of gems here, lest the market be flooded and the value of their rarities depreciate, but I can not believe there is ground for fear. This was found on an ordinary blue grass lawn, and was quickly disposed of. Singular how things will turn up, is it not? The decorative art as applied to ceramics and exemplified by B. has naturally led us on to the more beautiful and artistic (speaking artistically) work of painting on glass and china. Last week we all went to painting class as usual (only ladies), each with her plate and design. Just before the lesson commenced we were having great fun in caricaturing such of our gentlemen friends as have vulnerable points in the armor of their daily habits. The best one in point of likeness and recognizableness was a cleverly executed sketch, in black with a fine pencil, of a certain well known gentleman standing in front of an inn and supporting a lamp-post. The clock showed the hour of "3 A. M." It happened to be recognized by all, but to make assurance doubly sure, his name and the circumstances were neatly set forth, and it was passed around to be admired. Just then in came our teacher. Instead of erasing the ridiculous thing the artist proceeded to paint over it in a monotone, and very deftly utilized some of the black strokes underneath as outlines and shadings. The lamp-post was transformed into a flower-stem and two blossoms, one was the light and the other the young hero's countenance, in a quiet drab. However, the painting was finished, sent to the furnace, and from there to the identical young man for a birthday present. But horror of horrors! opening the package he beheld an indelible likeness of himself in a most laughable position. The whole thing had been caused by using fleeting colors prepared from volatile substances, which had been dissipated by the heat of the furnace and left the original "Pasquin" beneath. The point to the joke was, that the night before he had gone around in a carriage to his friends' houses drumming up recruits to a temperance meeting. The plate now adorns the mantelpiece in the Occidental Club. The last thing of any interest at all that I can tell you now is of the skating carnival. I did not attend, as I did not get my invitation until too late, but Harry says that I missed several good things. Mr. S. led the grand march with a delicate fairy in blue. Messrs. T. and C. received permission from their friends in the gallery and joined the gay throng at a very late hour in Dominos (Pink). Mr. T. evidently in his excitement forgot the necessity of a disguise, for he went dashing around the room at a great pace minus both hood and mask. But this nonsense must have an end. Just wait till I meet that "maid." Pythias says that if she is a man he will challenge her, and if she is a woman I will—do worse than fight; I'll tell everybody how she makes up. And now, my Juana, farewell for ever.

Your own,

WITCH OF ENDOR.

The Oakland Gossiping Club.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—Just a word to inform you of the organization here of a Gossiping Club, an institution of which we have long been in extreme need. Its membership is composed exclusively of the gentler sex. None but just the right kind have so far been admitted, and the greatest freedom of discussion is allowed except in the presence of the subject. You can at once see the propriety of this exception. Some people will be sensitive in spite of all reason, and, besides, one can't express herself with as much frankness if she is afraid of wounding the feelings of a friend. But don't imagine that we see and dwell upon only the reverse side of human nature. Compared with other cities on the Continent, we are conceited enough to think that ours possesses as many good traits as any of them. We have our parvenus and ignoramuses, it is true; our well-to-do people whose self-esteem is out of all proportion to what they actually possess in the way of desirable qualities; and our blue-bloods who manifest an awkward eagerness to pay obeisance to strange lions; our pretty, smirking, ignorant misses, and our newly-fledged society chickens of the male persuasion, whose knowledge of history is confined to their own experiences, and who date the world from the time they dropped their pinafores. These we consider legitimate prey in our splenetic moods. But one tires of a single diet, and often resorts from choice as well as necessity to the discussion of her intelligent, modest, well-bred neighbors, whose presence in our midst is only negatively detected—that is, by an entire absence of the trumpeting and tinsel which characterize the period. So you see, we have our good people, and we talk about them, too. Gossiping is not necessarily bad, as men insist upon believing. In discussing others' frailties we are merely sounding human nature in search of shoals and reefs that we may avoid them with greater certainty. But enough of the Gossiping Club. I merely mention it as one of the institutions now beneath the shade of the oaks, and would recommend its introduction in your wind-swept metropolis. Our sisters on your side of the bay would at once recognize the advantages it affords for the dissemination of matters of interest. The season of indoor gaiety is rapidly waning, and the scent of acacias in full blossom, with the spring freshness of a few days past, inspires a longing for the open air. The rink will soon be closed, and before many days the slippery foot will have glided its last at the dancing-school. We anticipate many a pleasant trip in the near future to the Alameda beach, for you must know we have organized a bathing club. There is also much talk in "our set" of forming an archery club. Some of our gentlemen already profess much skill in that direction, and we have material to form a whole Robin Hood band—Littlejohn (Mac) and Friar Tuck included. The elder and younger brothers would make a powerful team, while the grace of the petites Misses L. and T. and the winning manners of Mrs. L. would inspire all our braves to render valorous service in their behalf. Of course you have heard of the archery tournament. It is much talked of here, and several clubs from different parts of the State have announced their intention to participate, ladies included. All Oakland will no doubt turn out for the two days, and with gay equipages and well filled hampers add quite a feature to the canopied field. We count largely upon the H. brothers and the artist to maintain the glory of Athens. By the way, they say the studio in Cameron Block is a charming spot, with its draperies, Japanese screens, and growing flowers; and now since Mr. T. Hill has taken up his abode with us, we number quite a strong team artistically. There were many topics under discussion at our last session which I had intended to impart to you, but there are obstacles yet to their publicity which I can not, or dare not, overcome. W. A.

Sam Davis's connection with the scheme of sending a "Christian Chinaman" East to lecture on "The Chinese Question from a Chinese standpoint" recalls to one of our correspondents an exaggerated newspaper hoax perpetrated by Sam on the Vallejo public. It was at the time of the great race in 1874. Sam had a detail to report the race for one of the city papers. At the race-track he met a reporter on the Vallejo Chronicle, who was bawling the loss of his credentials, without which he could not gain admission to the reporter's stand. Sam, seeing an opportunity for a hoax, at once offered his services, and the Vallejo scribe, after giving Sam an order on the telegraph operator to "forward anything written by the bearer," started off to see the town. Davis took advantage of his opportunity by writing the following dispatches, which were duly forwarded to the Vallejo Chronicle:

"GRAND STAND, Nov. 13, 1 P. M.—At least 100,000 people on the ground. The Masonic Cemetery overlooking the track crowded with people. Eligible tombstones are selling at $5 a piece for reserved seats."

"1.30 P. M.—Horses ready to start. 'Thad Stevens' has the pole."

"2 P. M.—Tremendous shock of earthquake has just demolished grand stand. People, horses, etc., flying in wild confusion; will send list of killed and wounded in half an hour."

"2.15 P. M.—The dead have been cleared away, and it has been decided to run the heat. 'Thad' favorite in pools."

"2.30 P. M.—'Thad' won the first heat."

"2.45 P. M.—Another shock of earthquake has leveled everything. Several thousand people swallowed up. Get out an extra. My life is in danger. I must go."

Sam signed the initials of the accredited reporter, to all these dispatches, and on the suggestion of the last dispatch the Chronicle did get out an extra.

Vallejo was wild with excitement when the startling news contained in the extra became circulated. The next boat to San Francisco was crowded with friends of possible "killed or wounded," and all this time the unfortunate Vallejo reporter was getting himself blissfully full of beer.

As though all this was not injury enough, Davis sent the following letter to the proprietor of the Vallejo Chronicle the next day:

"Inclosed you will please find bill for services rendered at the great race on Saturday. You will observe that I succeeded in getting an exclusive account of the earthquake to you, thereby beating every other paper on the coast. I only succeeded in this sublime piece of journalistic enterprise by the sleepless vigilance which is the invariable price of good items. Immediately after sending your dispatches I hired a small boy to cut the wires, thereby preventing the San Francisco Chronicle from sending similar ones, and the Post and Alto from stealing them. Any further orders for exclusive items will be filled on application at the shortest notice. Yours fraternally, SAM DAVIS."

For earthquake item—two shocks at $5 per shock. $10 00
Paid boy to cut wire. 2 50

Received payment. $12 50

Somehow it seems to us that some of the marriage presents to the royal Duke of Connaught and his bride of the imperial house of Germany are just the least bit skimpy. We can not quite reconcile ourselves to the fact that the young man did not jump aboard the steamer and go over to the girl's home and marry her there, instead of allowing her to come over to England and marry him. Mr. and Mrs. Leopold, of Belgium, cousins-german through the Saxon family, gave a set of laces from the Brussels factories. The Princess of Wales gave a ring set with a stone known as "cat's eye;" we hope she gave it to the bride, that she may keep it on her husband when he thinks he is in the dark. The Princess knows how it is herself. The Prince gave a silver punch bowl—not genuine bullion, but only silver gilt. The Crown Princess of Germany—poor girl!—had no pocket money, so, in the kindness of her heart, she painted some fruit and flowers; it is not recorded whether she sent them framed or not. The Princess Beatrice sent a Japanese lacquered lamp; the Duchess of Cambridge, six silver spoons; the Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg Strelitz, a silver fish knife and fork; the hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburg Strelitz, a glass claret jug; Prince Christian, a pair of modern English candlesticks; Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne, two second-hand silver candlesticks, bought at a pawnbroker's; the Duke of York, an ormolu clock; the Maharaja Dhulap Sing, a silver gilt tea service; Lord Beaconsfield, a silver gilt plate with a sea horse; Lord and Lady Bredalbane, an album with a monogram on the cover. A great many other presents were received which the recording Jenkins did not think worth mentioning. Now, if this royal English Duke with an Irish title had come over to San Francisco and picked out one of our millionaire princesses, we would have given them presents worth having. No plated ware nor silver gilt should have been imposed upon them.

We are informed by a gentleman from the Southern country that all the accounts of large meetings, enthusiastic receptions, ovations, etc., given to Kearney are either imaginary or altogether misrepresented by the Chronicle and Call. We are informed that Carl Browne—Kearney's private secretary—is the Call correspondent; that the whole thing is a gross exaggeration, growing out of the disgraceful rivalry of the two sand-lot organs.

"Relief from Pain" is the way the Bulletin heads the account of a suicide at a hotel. The landlord says that's about the correct idea, but avows his intention of becoming dum-busted if that's the way to spell "paying."

STUDIES IN TONE AND COLOR.

If our California landscape is not overfruitful of useful material for the painter's art—and this must be admitted by every one who has studied it with special regard to the picturesque (rather non-picturesque) side of it—our human surroundings are still less inspiring. I fear it will have to be concluded that we are not a picturesque people; we do not group well nor fall into pleasant lines; we are not suggestive of pictorial possibilities. We are, thank heaven, reasonably useful in certain other directions, but we do not make good material for pictures. Nor will we—the few of us who might serve—willingly lend ourselves as models to those who could make such use of us. It would not be quite easy to say why this is so, nor, indeed, would it be likely to serve any good purpose. That it is so is enough; our painters who desire to study and paint figures are driven from home for material, and, if they are lucky, stay away. If they come back to us they are compelled to paint from studies made elsewhere—where material and models are attainable—and consequently have nothing to give us but scenes with which we are unfamiliar and not in full sympathy. And then we howl for "familiar" subjects, and straightway begin to prate about "California art," what it ought to be, will be, must be, and what not else of it. There has been a deal of this sort of stuff to be heard since the opening of this present exhibition, most of it apropos of Mr. Rosenthal and Mr. Virgil Williams, who both paint foreign subjects, and it is—to put it mildly—arrant nonsense. We may ask for Californian views from our landscape painters, for it is here that they make their studies. But as we have no pictorial figure material in our surroundings, we must expect figure painters to seek for it where they can find it; we must wait for our home subjects until we ripen into picturesqueness ourselves, and for our "California art" until we have learned to care for pictures for their own sake, and to value art for what of good and beauty there is to be found in it, instead of for the pride that we may have in the possession of it. So long as our ambition is for a distinctively Californian school of art we shall have none, nor do we deserve to have any. Let us do some respectable work first; the rest will take care of itself.

If we agree with Taine that "the end of a work of art is to manifest some salient or essential character, consequently some important idea, clearer and more completely than is attainable from real objects," it seems to me that we can claim to have but very little genuine art work in our exhibitions. Of this, the serious, earnest work, in which character and thought is endeavored to be worthily represented; in which the painter, having something to say, strives with all the power that is in him, and with all the knowledge and experience that he has been able to acquire, to express this something; in which we recognize an ambition beyond and above that to produce a mere prettiness or a "salable" picture; of this work that is, after all, the only kind worth serious consideration or a man's doing, the specimens are not frequent. Of some of the few I spoke last week. There are still others, however; foremost among them Mr. Rosenthal's thoughtful and earnest work, No. 57, which is entitled "Forbidden Longing." I am not going to question the methods of a painter of Mr. Rosenthal's great knowledge, simply because I feel throughout his work a thoughtful, studious quality that convinces me that his method is the result of an earnest and deep conviction; yet I can not avoid the conclusion that this picture suffers somewhat from the over-elaboration that is one of the besetting sins of the modern German school, and that in the extremely careful manipulation of the minor details there has been lost out of it somewhat of the poetic aroma that evidently existed in the artist's first conception. It is extremely difficult to work up a picture to the last degree of finish and either keep the poetry in it or not attract the attention of the beholder away from the theme—the matter—to the cleverness of the handling—the manner—or the success with which some unimportant difficulty has been overcome. Another objection to this over-attention to finish I find in its tendency to harden the quality of the work; and still another—the most serious—is in the loss of the suggestive quality that is one of the great charms of a freer style of handling. But, apart from the question of method, of which after all every man who is competent to do the work must be his own best judge, Mr. Rosenthal's picture is a thoroughly delightful as well as earnest and serious effort; it is a picture with a soul in it; a poem that, over and above the admirable technique with which it is constructed, is full of the genuine essence of poetry. His unfinished portrait (small room, No. 119) is evidently designed to be in a freer style, and, even in its present condition, is full of lovely color and a beautiful, life-like expression. It has all the air of being painted con amore, which, considering the attractiveness of the subject, is not very remarkable either. Mr. Williams has several canvases, of which No. 15, "Peasant Pilgrims to St. Peter's," is the most ambitious, and I think, one of the most successful things he has done. It is in a low key, and consists of a group of Italian peasants who are marching on through the twilight toward the eternal city—just visible in the horizon—and a weary goatherd sitting by the roadside, attended by his dog. In spite of the action of the moving peasants, which is admirably given, the picture is full of repose, and has all the tranquil sentiment of a beautiful sunset. The parts are nicely balanced and the composition quite masterly. Of his "Bit of Capri," No. 34, I have already spoken; it is an exquisite bit of pearly color, and rings out from its corner like a clear A major chord among a mass of discordant harmonies. No. 137 (small room) is also a happy bit; it is called "Feeding Chickens," and is one of the best genre pictures in the gallery.

Mr. E. W. Perry contributes a portrait, No. 9, with one of his harmoniously arranged and rich-toned interiors, and a larger picture, "Sweet Corn," No. 59, in which he has painted a very plain young woman, who has the air of having just been rubbed down with a coarse crash towel; but she looks nice and clean. Mr. Tojetti's "Ophelia," No. 21, is a replika of the larger picture exhibited some weeks since, and Mr. Narjot's 41 and 46, repetitions of that gentleman's faults, without any redeeming qualities. Mr. Woodman also shows a sickly sentimental bit, "Evening Chimes," No. 7, which is to be wondered at, since his portrait, No. 10, is bright, healthy, and life-like—one of the best in the exhibition. Another good portrait is No. 19, by Miss Rockwell—a right manly head; and that by Mr. Farnam, No. 18, has some good points. Mr. Bonny's "Tartuffe," No. 39, is clever and animated, without being very well drawn or colored, while Mr. Wyttenbach's No. 50 is bad in everything that I can see.

Mr. Oscar Kunath, most of whose work is to be seen in the small room, has, in his "Old Man of Letters," No. 48, a fine example of powerful drawing and thoroughly conscientious treatment. His picture is at once striking and full of genuine force. His heads, in the smaller gallery, are all well drawn, especially No. 147, which is very refined and delicate; and his frame of sketches from nature, No. 112, is filled with delightful bits of study. Two sketches, by Mr. Voegtlin, are also pleasant in color. Mr. Irwin has an excellent portrait, No. 143, and Mr. Dickinson a picturesque little head, No. 76, which, along with his No. 89, a twilight sky, with nice color in it, sums up his good works.

There can be no doubt that the worst work in the exhibition—I mean that with the least of honest effort, and in which the evident tendency is the very reverse of what one would hope to see—is that of our young people, from whom I, at least, had expected the best. Mr. Strong—one of our youngsters who has studied abroad—sends a theatrical and affected bit of heroics in No. 4; an attitudinizing frontiersman perched upon a fairly well-drawn horse, who is poised upon the grass—standing on the very points of the blades of it—and relieved against an impossible sky in an improbable and certainly not artistic manner. Miss Strong, who has given evidence of undoubted talent, and some of whose efforts were very promising, exhibits a couple of over-ambitious pieces, evidently painted with one eye—if not both—on a possible buyer who is to swallow their crudities for boldness and their ignorance for freedom of handling. Miss Isabel Osborne, who has also studied abroad, makes her début with a "study of a child," No. 157, that is not a study of anything, excepting perhaps of how to cover a 10 by 12 canvas with very little pains and a sham display of chic. It is inconceivable how a young lady of talent can find it in herself firstly to paint, and secondly to exhibit such a picture. Miss Nellie Hopps shows nothing betokening progress in a healthy direction.

Of utterly atrocious daubs, we have a landscape by Mr. Biesta, some horses by Dahlgren, a view in Napa by Mrs. Kate Boyd—who also sends a "Little Bopeep" copied line for line from Walter Crane without credit—some particularly bad work from Mr. Norton Bush, etc., etc.

One of the features of the small room is to be found in some painted tiles by Emily H. Ryder and Mrs. Boyd. As the latter lady copies without giving credit I do not feel safe in further referring to her work, since she is not to be considered responsible for either its merits or defects. Miss Ryder, however, has also several little pictures that have nice qualities—notably her "Idle Moments," No. 156, which is well composed and very harmonious—and is evidently an artist. I do not think that her work on porcelain entitles her to much credit, or that the purpose of an art exhibition is served in the hanging of such bad drawing as is to be seen in some of her figures. A design in the conventional style need not necessarily be carelessly or badly drawn, nor, indeed, are all of Miss Ryder's; her birds and flowers are very pretty and well done. But most of her figures are neither one nor the other. A group of "Roses" by Miss Dugan, No. 154, seems to me to be the best flower piece of this year; it is warm and rich in color, well drawn, and has a genuine artistic raison d'être. A cat and kittens (No. 138) by Mrs. Tichenor, has also many pleasant qualities, and is evidently the result of careful study. Miss Williams has several portraits, of which No. 115 has a delightful baby in it, and is a good piece of work; and Mr. Fred. Yates exhibits a pen and ink portrait, No. 64, a perfect marvel of patient labor, in which the details are beautifully worked up, and everything exquisitely elaborated without the sacrifice of any of the force or life of the picture.

The Quintet Soirée of last Tuesday evening—third of the series—brought a somewhat lighter programme than usual, Senor Espinosa, who undertook the piano-forte portion of it (in place of Miss Schmidt, who has been quite ill), not having time to prepare any larger piece of chamber music, and selecting for his solo the Lucia Fantaisie of Liszt. This extremely difficult composition he played with great accuracy and precision and a refined, musical touch, but somewhat en miniature. The Rossignol of the same composer—given as an encore—is more in his genre; it calls for the delicacy and lightness of style which he has in a high degree, and as a consequence was beautifully played. The vocalist of the evening was Mrs. H. E. Cadman, whose first appearance in this city may be called a decided success, and who, I think, now that the nervousness of a début has been overcome, is destined to be a favorite. The lady has a rich and powerful mezzo-soprano voice—the quality rather than of a contralto—a sympathetic style, and musical intelligence, and ought to sing ballads delightfully. Mr. Clifford Schmidt seemed far from his best in the Andante and Rondo of David, which he played coarsely and with frequently inaccurate intonation, while Mr. Ernest made the most of a pretty, sentimental Andante of Lindner, and a not-pretty Tarantelle by Davidoff. I am not of those who find an ideal grace in the dancing of a bear or the prouetting of an elephant; a Tarantella on the violoncello is not unlike either of these. Of the ensembles the best performance was undoubtedly the Meditation on Faust by Gounod. This was given with much beauty of color and a captivating verve and elan. The quartets were only passably well played; that of Bazzini best—it gave Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., an opportunity to display a lovely quality of tone—but the one of Mozart without the evenness or warmth which would make it enjoyable, and the Scherzo of Cherubini with an exaggeration of "points" (especially in the first violin) that had all the appearance of hasty preparation rather than a careful, exhaustive study of the composition. This Scherzo is entirely too beautiful a piece of music to deserve such treatment.

S. E.

EDITORIAL NOTE AND COMMENT.

Savings banks are very generally notifying their customers that they will call in their old loans and make no new ones until they know the result of the election of the seventh of May.

The merchants of San Francisco are withholding credits and accommodations from the interior merchants until it is ascertained whether those credits are to be the subject of taxation.

Irrigating canals throughout the State are at a stand-still until it is known whether the men and capitalists who build them shall have authority to fix the price they will charge for the use of water.

F. A. Birdsall, contractor, declines to complete the works supplying Auburn with water, because if the new Constitution is adopted it empowers the purchasers of water to fix the price they shall pay for it.

If the new Constitution is a good one, how does it happen that all the idle vagrants and propertyless bums of the State favor it, and nearly all of the intelligent, industrious, and provident business men oppose it?

What was the necessity of striking out the old clause of the Constitution that taxation should be equal and uniform, unless it was the intention to follow it up by legislation that should make taxation unequal and not uniform? Does not this squint at graduated taxes?

"Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war." The press, that great engine of liberty—the Chronicle—has driven the alien Wellock from his secondary position in the W. P. C., and Clitus Barbour—"secondary Clitus"—takes his place. Another triumph of the "live daily" over the Bulletin and Call.

The Constitution must be adopted as a whole. If, therefore, it is positively bad and wholly unjust to any one interest, it ought to be defeated. In the case of water companies, it authorizes the consumers of a commodity to fix the price they will pay for it. No honest man who is not an idiot can justify such a law.

In taxing credits, and allowing real estate to be credited with the amount of mortgage upon it, simply authorizes the money lender to add the tax he must pay to the rate of interest he will accept. A usury law declaring contracts in violation of it void would have attained the object sought. In the absence of a usury clause, the proposed relief is not afforded.

At Santa Barbara "Mr." Kearney assailed Sheriff Covarrubias. The Sheriff was absent. Kearney either knew that fact or did not know the material of which this particular Sheriff was made. His—Kearney's—friends, recognizing the importance of preserving his valuable life, obtained from him a retraction and apology in writing, and upon the return of the Sheriff his first information of the insult was in the written apology made for it. Next, gentlemen.

It is desirable to defeat the new Constitution upon the single consideration that its adoption is going to bring about some years of hard times. The loaning of money and the establishment of new enterprises will be arrested till the Constitution is interpreted. All laborers, borrowers, and owners of small city properties, all mechanics and manufacturers should vote "no" upon the proposition.

In the case of railroads and transportation companies, it allows freights and fares to be fixed by a political commission. Control by the sovereign or political power should go to the extent of declaring that no passenger should be charged more than another passenger for the same distance and accommodation, and no discrimination should be made in charges for the same kind of freight transported under similar conditions. It would be just as honest and just as politic to allow a commission to fix the cost of advertising in the ARGONAUT and the price of its annual subscription.

Kearney has been walloped. Not by the bloated monopolies, nor by the "lecherous bond-holders," but by a working-man of his own party and his own nationality. Not in the interest of the stock thieves, or the water rats, or the railroad robbers, but by the employes of one McFadden, an Irishman, because Kearney lied about him. McFadden is a shipbuilder, and Rule, the gentleman who has the honor of having walloped "Mr." Kearney, was his workman. Kearney said at Los Angeles: "When any one disturbs our meetings in San Francisco we break their heads." So the Arab chickens have only come home to roost. Mr. Kearney has now for a year past been sowing the whirlwind, and he has caught the first patter of the storm he has himself raised. He goes to San Mateo and charges a Supervisor with stealing a yoke of oxen; to Santa Clara, and fixes upon Mr. Murphy, a gentleman of prominence and unimpeachable character, the nasty sobriquet of "Stud-horse," and "Poodle-dog Murphy;" to Monterey, and Mr. Jackson, one of its oldest and best esteemed citizens, is assailed as a thief; to Salinas, and its county officials are charged with larceny. And thus from town to town this traveling vagabond assaults men by name, and charges them with felonious crimes. He is walloped. It is only surprising that he has not been walloped before. And now we ask the sand-lot "What—is—it—going—to—do—about—it? Is this to be the baptism of blood? Are village bells to be rung and the country aroused for an armed resentment? Are the "military forces of the W. P. C." to be called out by Antone Fischer, of the German Club, and the soil drenched in blood in vindication of this "great and good" blackguard of the sand-lot? This is an internecine war in which Americans seem to have but little interest. The young Democracy thrash the old bums at Platt's Hall. Rule, a workingman, thrashes Kearney. The Chronicle thrashes Wellock. We don't see that America is doing to do in the premises, except to look calmly on and play—as did the wife when her husband for

WINIFRED'S STORY.

They first saw each other at my house, so I suppose I was in one way responsible for the whole matter; but, bless you, nothing was further from my thoughts on that July evening when we sat together in the little front porch. Winifred Reid was a cousin, on my father's side, and Geoffrey Arnold on my mother's, so, although they were not connected with each other, they were both related to me, and that was the way they happened to meet there. Winifred was an orphan and lived with her father's relatives, but every little while she would run down to spend a few days with me and enjoy the country air and the quiet life until some gay event would be coming off in the city, and they would send for her to go home. She called it home, but she used to say that there was not a place in the world that really seemed as much like home to her as my little cottage. She never sent me word when she was coming—she knew there was always a welcome for her—and I was better pleased to have it so, for then I could look forward to her visits without having to set any definite time for them. The day before, she had walked in just as I was sitting down to my solitary supper, and had announced that this time she meant to stay a good long while. I never made any difference in my simple habits for the little lady, so our day together had been spent in the usual quiet way, and we had just come out to enjoy the sunset when the latch of the garden gate clicked, and who should come walking up the path but Geoffrey Arnold.

I was surprised to see him, for his visits were usually like those of angels, at least in respect of being "few and far between;" but he was none the less welcome on that account, and I hurried into the house to have supper prepared for him, leaving Winifred to entertain him in the porch. There were few girls who liked Geoffrey, and, as a rule, he scarcely spoke with ladies; but when I returned I found her chatting to him as freely as she would have done to me, and he actually look interested, although he evidently regarded her much as he would have done a small humming bird. The table was set in the broad hall so that he could enjoy the sunset and the cool evening breeze at the same time that he partook of the less ethereal raspberries and cream and bread and butter, and as I sat by him to pour his tea and see that he was supplied with the more substantial viands, which I was sure he must need after his journey, Winifred was left alone in the porch, so she presently came and seated herself in the doorway. I can see just how she looked as she sat there in the glow of the sunset light, in her white dress with its knots of violet ribbons, and her golden hair fastened with a violet bow. I could not keep my eyes off her, and Geoffrey looked at her several times, which was remarkable in him, for he usually cared no more for a pretty face than if he had been a hundred years old instead of thirty; but even then no thought of the possible consequences that might ensue from their meeting occurred to me, which will prove conclusively to you that although I was forty years old and unmarried I was not that most odious thing—a match-maker. I might not have felt so secure if Geoffrey had been a different man, but I had long ago made up my mind that he would never marry. He was entirely engrossed with his studies, and I do not believe he had ever had one of those dreams of wife and children that come to most young men. He had warm feelings for the few he had loved from childhood, but I used to fancy that during all these years his head had been cultivated at the expense of his heart, until that had gradually become encrusted, so that now, although underneath it was still warm and fresh, on the surface it had grown too hardened to receive any new or lasting impressions. I used to tell him that if he spent a little less time in studying the events of past centuries and a little more in contemplating what was going on in the present he would be a more agreeable companion; but for all that I was very fond of him and very proud of the name he had won for himself in the world of science.

Everything that happened during that week is as fresh in my mind as if it had transpired only yesterday, but the idea of their liking each other in anything more than a friendly way did not once occur to me until the last evening had come which Geoffrey was to spend with us. Winifred was very quiet, so he and I had the conversation to ourselves; but by and by he proposed that they should walk down to the gate to see the moon rise, and then, as I watched them going together down the path, it suddenly occurred to me that perhaps this week might result in their being more than friends to each other. I do not know whether I was most glad or sorry. I loved them both, but I was not quite prepared to have them love each other. My eyes being thus opened, I reviewed the events of the week, and I felt that they grown to like each other and enjoy each other's society, but whether anything more would come of it I could not tell. They stood at the gate a long while, where I could just see the outline of the two figures, and then they sauntered slowly up to the house again; but by that time it was so late that—although they remonstrated—I would not let them stay out any longer, so we went in and soon the cottage was quiet for the night. But long after they were asleep I sat pondering over their future and wondering if they would be happy together should their lives ever be joined.

Geoffrey went away the next morning, but although Winifred stayed with me a fortnight longer, I could arrive at no definite conclusion as to her opinion of him; but soon after she went home he visited her, and his visits after that were so frequent that I was fully prepared for the news that came to me during the winter that they were engaged. During her engagement Winifred was too much occupied to make me a single visit, so I had not seen either of them since the previous summer until I went to the city to attend their wedding, which was to take place early in May. Their letters had been full of love and happiness, so my old fears had all vanished, and when I saw them together I was satisfied. Geoffrey had no romance in his nature and never could have, but I felt that he really loved Winifred, and she was amply able to supply all the romance and sentiment necessary for the occasion, and her pride in him and her evident love and admiration were pretty things to see. Only once did the least doubt cross my mind, and that was on the wedding morning when I went into the library and found him reading an essay on the refutation of the Darwinian

Now, I was ready to make every due allowance for interest in a wedding which is innate in every feminine heart, but I do say that he ought to show a due amount of excitement on his own wedding day, and I have my opinion of the man who can be interested in the Darwinian theory at such a time. I went up to him and took the book out of his hand.

"Geoffrey Arnold," said I, "are you glad you are going to be married?"

"Why, of course," he replied; "what a ridiculous question! Pauline, what is the matter with you?"

"Nothing; but I thought there must be something the matter with you when I saw you sitting there so calmly reading," and then suddenly changing my tone, I took hold of his hands and looked steadily at him. "Geoffrey," said I, earnestly, "are you sure that you can make Winifred happy?"

The color flashed suddenly into his brown face as he answered: "Pauline, I love her."

"I know you do," I said; "but love before marriage and afterward is such a different thing. You have really seen but little of each other, but from this time you must live together all your lives, and you have been so long wrapped up in your books that I am afraid you might sometimes forget that you have anything else to live for, and be tempted to go your own way, while she goes hers; but Geoffrey, you must never do that, or you will break her heart. You do not know her as well as I do, and I tell you that she will never be satisfied with less than your whole love. Forgive me, but that child is the dearest thing in the world to me."

"So she is to me, Pauline," he said gravely, "and I will love her and cherish her in a way that will satisfy even you."

So my fears were lulled to rest, and it was with a light heart that I saw them married. Geoffrey had lately been called to a professorship in A—, and it chanced that Winifred owned a house there; so while they were away I went and made it ready for them, and was there to welcome them on their home-coming, but I did not stay long after that, much as they urged my doing so, for I have a theory that during the first year of married life the fewer people they have about them the better it is for a young couple, and they seemed so happy and contented that I left them feeling well satisfied as to their future.

The next year Winifred came to me as usual, but Geoffrey was too busy to leave home; so we had a quiet visit that seemed like old times, and yet even that year of married life had changed her, and I was surprised to see how much her character had gained in strength and purpose, and was glad at the change, not only for her own sake, but also because I felt that her husband's love would be strengthened and deepened as she became more and more of a companion for him. The following year I did not see her, and about that time I first learned to notice a change in her letters; they were more formal and constrained, and did not sound in the least like herself; but I tried to account for it by thinking that she was maturing rapidly in the life she led with Geoffrey, and that I could not expect her to be as frank and confiding as she had been before her marriage, but at the same time my own excuses did not more than half satisfy me, and I had an undefined feeling of uneasiness, which I could not reason away. What troubled me most of all was the cold way in which she wrote me. Her letters came seldom, and in answer to my repeated invitations for her to come to me she would give me evasive excuses that I could not understand, for I did not think it possible that she had changed so utterly as to have lost all her love for me; but she certainly did not show any desire to see me, and I noticed that she never asked me to visit them, although at first such invitations had been frequent. I suppose you think that at forty years old I should have had more sense, but the trouble is that as our sense increases our sensitiveness usually keeps pace with it, and when you, in all the freshness and beauty of your girlhood, look down with mighty condescension on some poor spinster, you little know how you wound her, or imagine that she is feeling the difference between you much more keenly than you are capable of doing. I am an old maid, and I am not ashamed to acknowledge the fact, but I must confess that I think in general society we, as a rule, have a hard time. I am not so foolish as to imagine myself either pretty or attractive, but I should like, once in a while, to have a gentleman under seventy talk to me without discovering the mortifying fact that as I am making a desperate attempt to be agreeable his eyes are wandering off to a far corner of the room, where some girl of sixteen is receiving the homage of a throng of admirers. Bless you! we have hearts if we have not husbands, and we feel these things as much as you would if we could exchange our plain black silks for your fluttering muslins, and with them give you our wrinkles and gray hairs, while you bestow upon us your sparkling eyes and all your other manifold attractions.

So Winifred's conduct wounded me deeply, and when the third year of their married life closed I made a sudden resolve, and packing my trunk, started for A— without notifying any one of my intention, and arrived there in the twilight of a May evening, and proceeded at once to the house without giving myself time to think of the many misgivings that had oppressed me on my journey. "Mrs. Arnold was at home," the servant said, and showed me into the drawing room. The windows were open, and the cool evening breeze stole gently into the room, while the violets and hyacinths, blooming in the jardinières, filled the air with their spring-like odors. I stood by the window, absently watching some boys playing ball in the opposite square, but I had not long to wait before Winifred entered the room. She came in with the pretty, hesitating way I knew so well, but that vanished when she saw me, and as she threw herself into my arms, and as I held her close to my heart. I knew that whatever had changed her she was still my Winifred. I did not see Geoffrey that evening; he had gone to attend some meeting, his wife said, and I was tired with my journey, so I retired early; but the next morning he greeted me so cordially that I said to myself: "Pauline, you are alone so much that if you get an idea into your head it takes complete possession of you, but I hope now that you see how foolish you have been; this will be a lesson to you in the future."

Alas! before I had been a week in the house I discovered that there was a change in Winifred, and found that all my old instinctive fears had been realized. Her trouble was not as great as many women have to bear, but that did not comfort me, as I saw how she faded in the life she was leading.

I believe that Geoffrey loved her, but why he had married her was a question that would have arisen in the mind of any one who had seen them together at this time, for she certainly was not necessary to his happiness, and he treated her in a way that was almost worse than positive unkindness, for then there would have been something tangible; now it was a simply a complete ignoring of her. I believe he never said a word to her that might not have been uttered in a room full of people, and she had evidently grown half afraid of him, and was so constrained and altogether unlike herself in his presence that I could scarcely believe that the demure little lady who presided at the table with so much dignity was my light-hearted girl. This state of things grieved me inexpressibly; but she never alluded to it, so I only learned what I could not help seeing in company with the rest of the household. I knew then why Winifred had not made her visits to me; she had as proud a heart as ever throbbed, and she was afraid to trust herself with me for fear she should betray her unhappiness. She was thoroughly miserable; and, at first, my being with her seemed to give her more pain than pleasure, for she was evidently in constant fear lest I should say something about her trouble; but she gradually lost this feeling, and then I saw that I could be of some comfort to her, and she sorely needed help and comfort, poor child! Geoffrey, too, urged my remaining, so I finally decided to spend the summer with them. My being in the house did not make any difference to him, for we seldom saw him except at meal-time. I soon discovered that Winifred had very few friends, and could not help expressing my surprise, for she was such a sociable little creature as a girl that she had been intimate at half the houses in town.

"Well, you see, Pauline," she replied in answer to my remark, "they were all very kind to me when I first came here, and I exchange calls now with the professors' wives and a number of others; but I can not have any intimate friends, and as I did not respond to their advances they soon ceased to make them."

"Are you never invited anywhere?"

"Yes, occasionally; but Geoffrey never can go with me, and I can not go alone, so I have never been to a party here; and I can not invite any one because he does not enjoy it."

"I should think you could occasionally have a little, informal company; but since I have been here you have not even had a friend to lunch."

"I never ask any one in that way," she replied with slightly heightened color. "I tried it once soon after we were married, when two ladies happened to come in at lunch-time; but it annoyed Geoffrey, so I never did it again; and then, besides, I never know when he may bring home some one with him. One day, not long ago, he came just at lunch-time with half a dozen professors."

"How did you manage?"

"I have learned to be prepared for such emergencies, but I had some funny experiences at first."

She laughed in her old, joyous way as she said this, but I could not join in her merriment, for it hurt me so that she, who seemed specially fitted to be the centre of a happy home, should miss so much of the joy which I felt to be her due. Even her little housekeeping experiences seemed sad, for, instead of there being two to be amused and interested in them, she was as much alone to all intents and purposes as if she had set up an establishment for herself and had had no husband. He gave her the most absolute freedom in everything; her large fortune was settled upon herself, and she spent her income as she chose; and he would no more have thought of questioning her about it than of inquiring how she passed her time. As to that, I suppose if he ever gave it a thought, he concluded that she did whatever other ladies were in the habit of doing, and he certainly never suspected that her whole aim was his comfort and happiness. Anything that could help him in his work she would do to no matter what sacrifice of time or trouble; but it was so quietly done that I had been in the family some time before I discovered how everything was arranged with reference to him, with never a thought of herself. She was naturally the most unselfish person I ever saw, and the discipline of her married life had tended to the growth of this spirit in her, for Geoffrey certainly would have been a discipline to any woman. Yet I honestly believed that he was a good man, and I thought he loved his wife, but he did not show his love, and he accepted everything from her while he gave her nothing. It seemed as if there must be a veil before his eyes that prevented his seeing things in their true light, and I was strongly tempted to tear this aside and show him himself as he appeared to others, but I could not yet see my way clear to do so. I wanted to be sure that I should do more good than harm, for to interfere at all between husband and wife is a delicate matter; but I could not bear to see those two going through life and missing the happiness which they might have had together. One trial Winifred had so far been spared: through it all and in spite of everything she still loved her husband; had that been otherwise, I believe she could not have borne it; but with that she was willing to live for the sake of sacrificing herself to him. Winifred and I lived as quiet a life as we had done in the days when she used to visit me; and seeing how she clung to me, never wanting me out of sight for a moment, I understood how lonely those three years must have been for her. Geoffrey had a great deal of company, but unless they were there to lunch or dinner we never saw them, as his time when in the house was spent in the library, where we never intruded. One evening, however, about a month after my arrival, we were sitting in the parlor, when the door opened and he entered, followed by a man whom he introduced as Mr. Lewis.

"I have a meeting in my study," he said to his wife, "but I shall be at leisure in half an hour, so I wish you would entertain Mr. Lewis till then."

Winifred started to ring for lights, but the stranger said: "Please do not on my account, I like to sit in the twilight." So she resumed her seat in the window, where the sunset light seemed to form a halo around her fair head. Then they chatted idly, as people do who have no subjects in common, but Winifred's manners were so lovely that no one could help feeling at ease with her—that is, when she was away from her husband; if he had remained in the room she would have been stiff and constrained; but as it was, the conversation grew more animated all the time, I meanwhile busying myself with my knitting, and only speaking occasionally. Presently Mr. Lewis said:

"Were you at the Scientific Convention this morning?"

"No," she replied, "I did not know that ladies were admitted."

"O yes, there were quite a number there; and you should have heard your husband's opening address. It was one of the finest ever delivered before the association."

"I thought that was to have been given last evening."

"That was the original plan; but so many of the delegates had not arrived that it was thought best to postpone it until this morning."

I wondered if it struck Mr. Lewis as forcibly as it did me how strange it was for him to be explaining Professor Arnold's actions to his own wife. If so, he gave no sign, but went on answering Winifred's eager questions which showed most plainly that she did not know the fact of which evidently every one else was aware: that Geoffrey was the leading spirit of the convention. I was so glad to see her enjoying the conversation, for although, except that one time, she had never spoken of her lack of society, yet I knew that, constituted as she was, it must have been a sore trial to her. The next morning she said to me, half hesitatingly:

"Pauline, would you have any objections to going to the convention?"

"Of course not," I answered briskly; "I could enjoy it very much, although I do not suppose I can understand more than half they are talking about."

I must confess that there was a good deal that was like Greek to me, but I noticed, to my surprise, that when it was the most unintelligible to me then Winifred seemed the most interested, and when our visitor of the preceding evening rose and read a long paper, I could do nothing but look at her as she sat there with flushed face and flashing eyes. When the meeting adjourned, as we were going out, we met Mr. Lewis at the door. He shook hands with us, and we stood for a moment chatting, when I saw an almost imperceptible cloud creep over Winifred's face, and immediately afterward Geoffrey came up, but he did not notice us at all.

"Ah, Lewis," he exclaimed, "I am glad I found you; I wanted to discuss that subject a little further, and I was afraid you had gone."

"I hurried out to speak to your wife."

Geoffrey then for the first time became aware of her presence. "Winifred, are you here?" he said, and at the tone more than the words her eyes filled with tears; but he did not notice them, nor indeed did he pay any more attention to her, but plunged at once into an eager discussion with Mr. Lewis, while we walked silently along until we reached the house. Then he stopped abruptly:

"I am sorry I can not go in with you, but I have an engagement. However, you must not let that interfere with your lunch. Mrs. Arnold will take good care of you, and I will call as I return."

Mr. Lewis glanced at Winifred, and she timidly seconded her husband's invitation. So he went in with us, and we were presently seated at a dainty little lunch. "How did you enjoy the meeting," he asked, as he slowly drank his chocolate.

"Very much," she answered, and then they drifted into a discussion of the different papers, and finally touched upon the one he had read, when, to my surprise, Winifred attacked one of his statements, and advanced an entirely different theory, proceeding to give her authorities, and then her own opinions, unassumingly, but in a way that showed conclusively that she had thought and read much on the subject. He argued well, but one after another of his arguments were disproved, until he laughingly owned himself vanquished.

"What an able assistant your husband must have in you," he exclaimed. "I will tell him how completely you came off conqueror."

"Oh, please do not say anything about it to him," she said hastily, and then evidently thinking that she had spoken too earnestly, she added: "My husband's time is so fully occupied that I never speak to him of my studies, and besides I know how trivial they would seem to him."

"They could hardly be that to any one," he replied courteously, "but of course I will not refer to the subject again if you do not desire it; but, Mrs. Arnold, may I ask how you happen to be so well informed on the matter? It is not one usually considered interesting to ladies."

When I was first married, and heard the conversation at my table of my husband's friends, I discovered that I was woefully ignorant on all scientific topics; so, for the last three years, I have devoted at least half my time to improving my knowledge of them."

"You are an exception to most ladies in society, that you can find time for such pursuits."

"I suppose I can scarcely be called in society," Winifred answered, simply, "for I go out very little and have no company at home; so, if I had not my studies, I should be very lonely."

Mr. Lewis evidently regarded her as a phenomenon among women; and I soon found out what she thought of him, for when Geoffrey had come, and they two had gone off together, she said:

"Pauline, you do not know what a treat it is for me to meet a gentleman who talks to me in a rational way, for Geoffrey's friends usually regard me as a mere nonentity, and never speak to me except perhaps to make some insane remark on the weather."

"I was proud of you, my dear, but I was as surprised as Mr. Lewis to see how much information you have picked up since you were married."

"It has not been picked up at all," she answered, laughing; "for I have gained it by hard study. I have had regular hours for it, and this time since you have been here is the first vacation I have given myself."

I could not tell Winifred that the reason why Geoffrey's friends treated her in the way to which she objected was because she did not give them any opportunity of finding out her real character; for I knew that she, poor child! was not to blame when she sat at the head of the table without speaking, for Geoffrey treated her in such a way that she could not help being constrained in his presence.

Three months passed away, and still I lingered, not seeing how I could leave Winifred, for she daily seemed to cling more closely to me. In all that time I had seen Geoffrey so little that I really had had no chance of expressing my opinion to him, and I was not quite ready to make an opportunity. One morning, at breakfast, he announced that he was going to a reception that evening, and asked Winifred if she would like to go with him. Her eyes danced with delight, she had so little pleasure in her life, though she only answered "yes," demurely; but when the time came, she looked so lovely that even her husband noticed her appearance, and a compliment from him was so unusual a thing that her cheeks flushed until they rivaled the hue of the wild roses she wore in her hair. Late in the evening Mr. Lewis came in, and, wishing to see Geoffrey, sat down with me to wait for their return. After a while we heard the carriage drive up, and I opened the front door so that the gas light streamed down the steps. I saw Geoffrey alight and heard him say "Winifred," but she did not move. Then Philip Lewis rushed past me and down the steps, and was back again before I could realize what was the matter, carrying her in his arms. He laid her gently down on a sofa in the drawing-room.

"Do not be frightened," he said to me, "she has only fainted." But as the restoratives I was using began to take effect, I heard him say to her husband, "I suppose you do not know when it happened;" and the tone was so much more reproachful than the words that Geoffrey answered, meekly:

"No; I was busy thinking about something, and we did not speak after we left the house."

As I went with Winifred to her room she begged me so earnestly not to leave her, that I could not resist her entreaties, so I went down again to tell Geoffrey.

"Certainly, you must stay with her," he said. He was pacing up and down the long drawing-room, but he stopped suddenly. "Do you remember the conversation we had on our wedding morning?"

Before I could do more than nod an assent, he went on, hurriedly: "Pauline, I did love Winifred, as I do now, and I honestly thought that I could make her happy, but I see that I have failed utterly."

"But she loves you yet."

"It can not be possible. I have treated her so that I should think her love would be turned to hatred. But I will not keep you from her. Good night;" and though my voice was so choked that I could scarcely speak, I went up-stairs with a lighter heart than I had carried for a long time.

At breakfast-time the next morning I found that Geoffrey had gone out, as he was in the habit of doing, for a horse-back ride; so I was just sitting down by myself, for although Winifred declared she felt perfectly well, I had insisted on having her breakfast sent up to her, when a servant entered with a note which she handed me. I opened it carelessly, wondering from whom it could have come; but before I had read six lines my whole attention was absorbed, for it was as follows:

"MY DEAR MISS ELLETT:—I am writing to you to say what I have not courage to say to any one else, that I am going away never to come back, and that the reason is because—I love Mrs. Arnold. Do not condemn me before you hear me plead my cause. I had been away from civilized society so long, and she was the first lady whom I saw on my return, and you, who know so well her loveliness, will perhaps find in that fact some excuse for me. Then another reason that drew me to her was the way in which her husband treated her, to which I venture now to allude, because I hope that from something which he said to me last night his eyes have been opened, and he will endeavor to make amends for the past. I felt so sorry for her, and pity is so nearly akin to love, that I scarcely know when it changed into a deeper feeling. I have never loved a woman before, I shall never love another, but until last night I thought I was strong enough to hide my feeling; but when I held her for one moment in my arms, it swept over me with such terrible force that now I am afraid to trust myself, so I am going away to see what change of scene will do for me; it can not cure me, but I may at least conquer my love so that my life shall not be ruined simply because it is unhappy. You can tell as much of this as you please to Prof. Arnold, for before it reaches you I shall be gone. PHILIP LEWIS."

A sudden fear crept into my heart as I went back to Winifred, and I determined to find out immediately whether it was groundless.

"Winifred," I said, "I have just had a note from Mr. Lewis telling me that he was going away."

"Gone away without seeing me! Show me the note."

"I can not," I answered, trembling as I saw her excitement.

"You must; I will see it!"

Something moved me to grant her request, and I gave it to her. She read it through without a comment, but the light slowly faded from her eyes, and when she had finished she laid herself down wearily, saying:

"Oh, Pauline, I love him!"

"Love Philip Lewis! Winifred Arnold, think of your husband."

"Why should I think of him?" she answered, starting up in her excitement. "He never thinks of me, and how could I help loving Philip? Pauline, since you have been in this house you have seen the way in which Geoffrey treats me. I have not been happy for three years except since Mr. Lewis has been here."

"You certainly have not been happy lately," I answered, speaking as coldly as possible, and not showing the pity I felt for her. "If, as you say, you loved this man, you must have known what a sin you were committing." And then I went and brought the prayer-book, and read to her the whole marriage service, although she quailed and begged me to stop, but I went on pitilessly. When I had finished she lay quiet for a long time, and then she said, softly:

"Pauline, go away now, please, and leave me alone. I have a hard battle to fight, and I would be by myself."

So I left her, and did not see her all day. At lunch-time Geoffrey inquired anxiously for her.

"She is not sick," I answered, "but, Geoffrey, she is in a great deal of trouble, and when she tells you about it, will you be kind to her, and not judge her too harshly?"

"I am in too much need of forgiveness myself," he said, gravely, "to be in danger of passing a harsh judgment upon any one—least of all upon her."

That was the strangest day I ever spent, and yet, anxious as I was for Winifred, I knew that she would bear her trouble in the right way; and just at twilight she came to my room, and nestling down in my arms as she used to do when a child, she asked me what she should do next.

"Go to your husband," I answered, promptly, "and tell him the whole story."

She hesitated a moment, then slid from my grasp and went down to the library. After a long time they came up stairs together, and I saw that whatever Geoffrey thought of her confession, he loved her none the less for it, and so then I had no fears for the future. I knew they had troubles times to go through, but I felt sure that in the end it would all be right. I soon brought my visit to a close, for I thought there would be more chance of a reconciliation if they were by themselves—though, after all, reconciliation is hardly the word to use where there had been no quarrel. It was touching to see them together; my confidence in the strength of Winifred's character had not been unfounded; she did struggle bravely, although at first it seemed as if, having once permitted herself to blame her husband, every little slight that at the time had been scarcely noticed came back with redoubled force; and yet he was so patient, so tender with her, that I felt convinced that the idle passing fancy which had been so brief would give way before this strong love.

The evening before I left them I had a long talk with Geoffrey, and, much as I blamed him, I did then feel very sorry for him; but I tried my best to comfort him, and said what I firmly believed, that in the end it would all be for the best. Since that first day Winifred and I had not talked much about it, but that night she came to my room to see that all my preparations were completed, and as she bade me "good night" she exclaimed, suddenly:

"Pauline, why are our lives such mistakes?"

"Child," I answered reverently, "God arranged our lives, and He makes no mistakes."

"No, but He lets us make them."

"Then they are not mistakes. All you have to do is to live your life doing your daily duty, and leave the result with Him."

She sighed wearily, but said no more.

After that Winifred made regular yearly visits to me. The first time she came she seemed happier, although not much inclined to talk about herself; but the second summer I knew the first moment I looked at her sweet face that all was well with her. That year she brought with her a new little Winifred, whose innocent baby face was a miniature likeness of its mother; and the next morning, as we sat together on the porch in our old way, with the exception of this new claimant upon our time and attention, she told me the whole story, and I will give it as nearly as possible in her own words.

"For a long time I was very unhappy, and Geoffrey's kindness and thoughtfulness pained rather than comforted me; but if I ever said so to him, he was always replying that he could never do enough to atone for his neglect of me during those three years. At last, insensibly, I began to lean upon him, and even to enjoy his society; and after a long time I found out that my passing fancy had vanished, and that my love for my husband had come back, with tenfold its old strength; but, Pauline, I could not make him understand this. I would not tell him, and I could not make him see it, though I tried by every means in my power. When my baby came, I thought she would draw us together; but Geoffrey seemed to feel as if I needed her entirely for my comfort, and if he petted her, he would do it in a deprecating way, almost as if he were asking my permission. You know when baby was three months old, she was very sick, so that for twenty-four hours I sat with her in my arms, expecting every moment would be the last. Although Geoffrey was so kind, and although I knew that if she was taken from us he would feel it as deeply as I, yet he did not seem to consider his own grief at all, but only thought of mine. When she was better, I left her, for the first time, to take some rest; and after I had been sleeping a little while, I awakened to find him standing by me. I sprang up in alarm, but he said:

"Baby is sleeping nicely, so I came to see if her mother was doing the same."

"O, Geoffrey," I cried, "I am so thankful and happy."

"And so am I for you," he said, earnestly.

"But your sorrow would have been as great as mine, and you do not seem to consider that at all."

"I should still have had you left me, and you have nothing but baby."

"Then I sprang up, determined to make him understand: 'Geoffrey, would I not have had you?'"

"He seemed for the first time to see my meaning, and such an illumination came into his face. O Pauline, I never realized before how much he loved me; but now nothing can ever come between us."

Tears were rolling down my face, but Winifred's was a picture of joy, as she stopped a moment to caress the baby, and then went on:

"We have been so happy since then, and I think the proudest moment of my life was when I found that I could really help him. His eyes had been troubling him, and finally the doctor forbade him using them at night. The first evening he was very low spirited, and finally I asked him if he specially wanted to do anything."

"Yes. I promised an article for the Review, and if I do not write it this evening I can not do it at all. It is on an astronomical subject, and the calculations are all sketched out, so I could easily write it in three or four hours."

"Do you think I could help you?" I asked, timidly.

"I am afraid not, for you do not understand the subject."

"I know a little about it," I answered, "and perhaps you can explain it to me."

"He looked doubtful, but brought his papers, and after fifteen minutes' explanation of them I began to work, and before I went to sleep that night the paper was finished to his entire satisfaction, and he said—but that was too foolish to repeat."

Winifred blushed at the recollection of her husband's praise; and as I looked at her sitting there—a picture of smiling content, with her baby in her arms—I was more thankful for her happiness than for anything else in the world.

—LESLIE TYRRELL.

DETROIT, MICH., March, 1879.

A well known actor of this city was recently traveling in Nevada, when the coach was halted by "road agents," and the passengers were all plundered. While our hero was standing with his hands in the air, and a masked highwayman was benevolently relieving his almost destitute pockets, he was recognized by another of the gang, who had probably witnessed his artistic performance of the beam villain in Virginia City. "Hello, old Let-us-dissemble," said the knight of the double-barreled shotgun, "don't you know this is only a stage robbery."

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 35 cents per 4 weeks. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1879.

We met at San Rafael, on Sunday last, five French gentlemen, all naturalized American citizens. They had read the ARGONAUT, and fully indorsed all it said in reference to the insolent efforts of a low and ignorant class of foreigners who attempt to control American politics. They said it would afford them pleasure to cast their votes with an American party, that should embrace the intelligence and respectability of the American people. They fully appreciated the right of the native-born to direct political affairs, and considered it as insolent and meddlesome for adopted citizens to thrust themselves forward as party leaders. We should consider ourselves as entirely misunderstood if any one thinks that it is our intention or desire to revive the Know-Nothing party. We would not question any one's religious belief, nor interfere with the conscientious discharge of his religious duties. We would not, for the purpose of party organization, question any man's birth-place. We can anticipate no political crisis that would justify us in placing none but Americans on guard.

Ours is an American party that shall invite the coöperation of all disinterested, respectable, intelligent, property-accumulating, foreign-born gentlemen, and exclude every ignorant, scheming, worthless foreigner or American who makes politics a business. We have many German, Irish, and Jewish friends—men whom we esteem and whose good opinion we regard; they must not misunderstand our position when we say that we are impatient at the arrogance and insolence of their ignorant, criminal, and dangerous fellow-countrymen, and that to the extent of our influence, and in the exercise of a clear right, we will endeavor to drive these men out of politics. The "German vote," the "Irish vote," the "Jewish vote," are all expressions of a thing we despise. It is the "American vote" that represents to us a national idea. Saint Patrick parades; German, Prussian, French, or Irish military companies; foreign flags borne in processions; foreign languages taught in free common schools; newspapers printed in a foreign tongue; and all associations—except social and charitable ones—other than American we would discourage and destroy. If these foreign people will not themselves forget their nationalities in the discharge of their political duties, they must not be surprised that we as Americans assert ours.

We commend this reflection to our foreign-born citizens, and suggest to them to consider for a moment this idea. Let us suppose that in Berlin, Dublin, London, Paris, Rome, Copenhagen, Stockholm, Amsterdam, St. Petersburg, Madrid, or Vienna, there was a large immigration of Americans, made citizens by law, and in all political positions the equal of the native-born; that there were grievances, not peculiar to themselves, and not directed against them—burdens, and wrongs even—but which were alike upon themselves and upon the native-born population of those countries. Then let us imagine that of this American colony many had attained the very highest political honors, had accumulated vast fortunes, and that both rich and poor had enjoyed and were still in the enjoyment of all the privileges incident to the government. Then, that out of many hundreds of thousands of prosperous and contented Americans, there had immigrated a small percentage of the vicious, the criminal, and the idle classes; that in process of time, say a hundred years, there were found in any one of these cities as many Americans as native-born, and of these let us suppose that one-fifth part had been unfortunate, unthrifty, because of their idle, dissipated, and criminal habits; that this band of Americans, uniting under the leadership of an unprincipled American agitator, should organize to overturn existing laws and set up other laws in their place; that they should threaten to burn and destroy the city, and to hang and murder leading people, and conspire together by violence to binder and retard in legal residence in the country—people not so favored, not made citizens, not recognized socially, only filling positions of menial service—and whose further immigration everybody, both native-born and American, were endeavoring to prevent; but this band of low Americans, impatient at the laws' delay, should endeavor to usurp the prerogative of government and drive this people out of the country by violence. And to make this statement more emphatic, let us suppose that the highest legislative body of the nation—Parliament, Chamber of Deputies, Reichstag, or whatever named—should have passed an act preventing this class of undesirable immigrants from coming, but which the President, or King, or Emperor, or whatever might be the designation of the highest executive officer of the government, should, in kindly words and with expressions of sympathy with the Americans and all other protesting classes, say it could not become a law until he had entered into a formal diplomatic correspondence with the country with whom he was under the obligation of a treaty. Then suppose this mob of ignorant Americans should denounce this Emperor, King, or President, denounce all parties differing upon the question, and be guilty of uttering the absurd threat of destroying the government of which they had become citizens, by a civil insurrection, and withdrawing from the rest of the nation and set up for itself an independent government within the jurisdiction and upon the soil to which they had been invited. All this being considered, we ask our intelligent foreign citizen if he was back in his native land witnessing such a spectacle, what would he think of it? Would he be indignant toward that little squalid band of worthless Yankees? Would he not feel disposed to unite with the intelligent, property-holding gentlemen of that country to put down and crush out those offending American vagabonds? Would he not be willing to enroll himself and join a political organization of the native-born, property-owning, intelligent, and better social class in opposition to the unreflecting and criminal mob of agitators? This is the alliance we would bring about in California; this the political party we would desire to see organized. Intelligence against ignorance, honesty against crime, industry against idleness, economy against profligacy, sobriety against drunkenness, property against criminal poverty, order against chaos, and good government against a political and social earthquake. To the consideration of these things we invite the thinking men of foreign birth who have sought asylum and opportunity in our American land.

Then let us suppose that there was another class of men who by a mistaken policy had also obtained

The Nation is not a very able journal, nor is it always just, nor always honest. Its editor is an English person by the name of Godkind. An English person can not in the right spirit, and with impartial fairness, discuss political questions in the United States. If Mr. Godkind was an able and an impartial writer he would, in an audience of forty million of people, secure more than seven thousand and six hundred readers. This is his own published circulation. The ARGONAUT, not yet two years old, and published in a State that has less than a million of white people, has a larger issue than the Nation. But then the ARGONAUT is not edited by an Englishman, and is always just, and always honest. To illustrate our meaning, and in demonstration of the fact that the Nation is not always just nor always honest, it speaks of our Chinese problem as follows: "The President has vetoed the Chinese bill on grounds to which the 'hoodlums' of California can take no exception." By this statement this English person means to declare that the opposition to Chinese immigration is confined to that class which he pleases to call "hoodlums." Now the truth is—and Mr. Godkind, if he wishes to state the situation honestly, should admit it—that there is an almost unanimous opinion among our most intelligent classes that this immigration ought to be restricted. There are different opinions entertained here we admit, but that those opposing this immigration of Chinese are highly respectable, intelligent, humane and honest minded we assert. They are not "hoodlums." There is an argument in opposition to our views that is plausible. There are considerations in opposition to the passage of the Chinese bill that may well be entertained by honest men. But the Nation not only does not state them, but grossly misrepresents our people, their acts, and their opinions.

An Associated Press dispatch came over the wires on Monday, which indicates to us the inauguration of a Presidential campaign of misrepresentation and lies. It reads as follows:

"The following significant expression of Southern Democratic sentiment, printed in the Okolona (Miss.) Statesman of March 12th has just been received, and attracts much attention here: 'Thank God, we have captured the Capitol, and in 1880 our man will walk up the White House steps and take his seat in the Presidential chair. Then will our glorious triumph be complete. Then will we proceed to tear our amendments from the Constitution and trample them in the mire. Then will we break the shackles you have forged for the free, sovereign, and independent commonwealths of the Union. Then will we recognize the right of secession—a right that is not dead, but sleeping. Then will we decorate the Capitol with pictures of Davis, Lee, and Stuart, and all the glorious leaders of a cause that is not lost, but living still. Yes, thank God, we have captured the Capitol, and from that coigne of vantage we propose to rule the Republic in a way that will make your radical leaders forever odious in America.'

We hardly believe there is any such place in Mississippi as "Okolona," or that it has any newspaper called the Statesman, or that there has been printed in any Southern journal so foolish and absurd an item as the one above. We believe it is a Republican lie, made out of whole cloth, telegraphed across the wires to produce political results in our three Western States; that it is paid for from a party fund. We believe it is the first gun of a sulphurous campaign of fraud and misstatement. If we can not elect a Republican President without lying about the South, and without dragging from its sepulchre the skeleton of the civil war, without exciting sectional jealousies, and stirring the angry passions of another internecine strife, we had better suffer defeat. This journal intends to support a Republican candidate for President. We hope to take an active part in an honorable campaign. We shall be glad to discuss national questions in a dignified and honorable way; but we give notice now, early in the contest, before our battle-blood is warmed by the excitement of the strife, that we hope our party headquarters at Washington will send us no stink-pots, for we will not help to explode them. No bloody shirt for this side of the continent. No negro persecution stories for us. Of this kind of politics, we are altogether disgusted.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—The test that will be submitted at the coming primary will be as recommended by you in your last issue, "Will you vote the Republican ticket." The reasons are valid, and you clearly state the principal one. We do not propose to make the Republican party a close corporation, and by making a test which shall read, "Did you," etc., drive from our primary the intelligent and respectable Democrats who intend to work with us. The County Committee intend to make this coming primary as fair and pure as possible, placing about it all the safeguards that party usage and the State law will allow, so that any man can cast his vote with the assurance that it will be protected. Of course Mr. J. J. Green is opposed to this test, hence the Conference Committee of five from each district, from the Young Men's and Occidental clubs, which are to wait upon the County Committee and dictate to them what is best for the party.

UP AND UP.

It is a cheering sign that there is an organization of respectable young gentlemen in the Republican party who are willing to measure wits with the old gang of party wire-pullers who have so long and so disastrously manipulated political affairs. These young men are in earnest and honest. They mean to have a primary that shall not be packed by Mr. Jim Green in the interest of Mr. Evans, or Mr. Perkins, or Mr. anybody else. A Republican State Convention, honestly constituted, fairly representing the party as a deliberative assembly, can nominate a successful ticket. Any other kind of Convention-work will meet a divided party and defeat. There are fifty respectable gentlemen in the Republican party who have the right to have their names considered in connection with the office of Governor of California, any one of whom we will gladly support. No man can be dishonestly nominated whom we, and thousands of others, will not oppose. When the time comes we will expose the conspiracy that is now forming to steal the Convention, and give the names of the conspirators and their motives.

There is no class so much interested in defeating the new Constitution as poor men. Men of small business, and men who are the owners of small properties, are deeply interested in cheap money and its free circulation. Money is a coward. It is quick to scent danger and quick to hide itself. Money never circulated in times of commotion. Money never takes any chances. Its empire is peace. In times of political agitation money withdraws itself. In periods of excitement it hurries to its hiding place. Money can afford to lie idle. Real estate can not remain long unoccupied, because it earns nothing. Labor can not remain unemployed, because the laborer must eat. Money should never be compelled to dodge the tax collector. Give it free circulation, tempt it abroad, and it will venture into all sorts of enterprises. When it is circulating freely everybody has a chance to get some of it.

If the Constitution is adopted foreign corporations will be driven out of the country; foreign banks and insurance companies must quit business. Rates of interest will thus necessarily advance. Rates of insurance will also advance, money be scarce, rents low, industries discouraged, and a general period of stagnation follow until affairs can be adjusted on the new basis. We have had good rains, promising abundant crops, money is abundant at easy rates, and everything gave indications of a prosperous year until this unfortunate political agitation occurred. If the Constitution is beaten, business will return to its normal condition, and California will enter upon a prosperous period.

"I will just state," said Kearney, at his Los Angeles meeting, "that when a man attempts to break up a workingman's meeting in San Francisco, he gets his head broke." That is true. It is also true that there is an organized gang of Kearney's followers, about three hundred strong, who attend all other public meetings for the purpose of disturbing them. At the Democratic anti-Chinese meeting, at Platt's Hall, Kearney's band got badly thrashed. There is a counter organization forming to resist the insolence of this band of rioters. It is composed of young Irishmen and Americans, and Mr. Kearney's coyotes, whose bravery consists in howling, will be compelled to confront the sheep of the Democratic fold in a square fight from this time forward. This fight will be from the shoulder, or the hip, just as the coyotes may choose. We prophesy that the last Democratic meeting has been disturbed.

AN INCENDIARY SERMON.

The Mule's Address to Themasses of the Sand-Lot.

My fellow-asses: Owing to the absence of your long-eared and brazen-lunged leader and orator, who is now traveling through the State in the kindly endeavor to teach the American people the sort of laws they ought to adopt, and the kind of men they ought to elect to administer them, I have been induced to fill his pulpit for a Sabbath-day's discourse. If I do not blaspheme God, nor abuse the Constitution, nor denounce as "hell-born and hell-bound" the "bloated aristocrats and lecherous bondholders," nor sympathize with him or you in his and your cowardly threats toward that class of foreigners whom you Irish and Germans have undertaken to drive out of the country, in violation of laws made before your arrival and international treaties entered into before you came to the country, you must excuse me. Being of American birth, I can not be expected to fully enter into prejudices that result from institutions with which I am not familiar.

Being well born and educated, having served my country as an army mule, and bearing upon my shoulders the brand "U. S." well burned in, you will excuse me if I entertain prejudices which you asses from Germany and Ireland do not entirely sympathize with, and entertain opinions which in your ignorance you can not fully understand. While I intend to be entirely courteous, and to avoid the vile and ribald language which you are accustomed to hear, I shall indulge myself in the use of plain talk within the comprehension of the most stupid donkey of you all, and perhaps endeavor to stir your thoughts with some sharp cuts of Saxon speech, which if you will carefully consider will do you no end of good.

And now, my dear adopted fellow-citizens, let us drop the simile of the ass. Let me, for the purpose of this discourse, forget that you are unreasonable, inconsistent, thistle-eating donkeys, led by one of your own kind; but treat you as American citizens, upon whom—unexpectedly to you—has fallen the duties and responsibilities of government, through the exercise of privileges denied you in the countries of your birth, and unwisely accorded you by ours. What is it of which you complain? What have we as American citizens done to you that we ought not to have done? What act toward you have we left undone that we ought to have done? How is it that you, citizens by adoption, clothed with all the prerogatives of American nationality, have arrayed yourselves in opposition to our country and its laws? Why is it that every Sabbath-day now for more than a year, in rain and sunshine, in heat and cold, you have come here to the sand-lot to hear American-born citizens and American institutions abused, vilified, denounced, and threatened? How is it that you, the meanest and most ignorant part of our foreign population, have organized yourselves into a distinct political party, threatening to burn property and destroy lives, to carry out your peculiar ideas? Do you remember the conditions from which you fled in your native lands? Do you forget that in Prussia or Ireland for the utterance of your incendiary language you would be punished by imprisonment and fine? Do you recognize that while this is a land of freedom and free speech it is still a land of law?

If you had stayed at home, you Germans would have been compelled in the interests of the German Empire to have served in the army. Do you Irishmen understand that if you had stayed in your native land you would have enjoyed no right to make laws, and no right to break them except at the penalty of the tread mill? And all of you foreigners, of whatever European nationality you may be, have you forgotten that in your own country you were but peasants, compelled to labor for inadequate wages, and only permitted to denounce authority at the peril of your lives and liberties?

Here you are freemen, sovereigns, clothed with political power, and in your ignorance and base ingratitude you are shamefully betraying the confidence that has been placed in you, and returning with most vile and unprincipled and evil acts, the kind things that have been done you. You were starving upon inadequate wages in your native lands, and we have given you such compensation as no other country has paid to laborers. You were ignorant, and our common schools were thrown freely open to you and your children, and in our night schools we teach your adults; and our schools from the primaries to our highest universities of learning are open to your children. If you profess religion, we ask of you no questions concerning it. You may worship as you please Christ the God, the sun, the oaks, the Pope, the tablets of your ancestors, the white bull, Buddha, Mahomet, or the devil, and we seek to put no constraints upon your conscience. We give you equal protection of our laws; we defend you in our courts. If sick, we take you to our free asylums; if criminal, we welcome you to our prisons. We have no property entailed from your acquisition. We have no laws of primogeniture; no laws that place traps and spring-guns if you poach for game or fish. We have millions of free acres of government domain which we invite you to occupy without payment. Our mines are open to your labor. Every vocation is open to you. The highest political honors are within your reach. When you die you may transmit your accumulations to alien heirs. In a word, we make you citizens, and place you on the same plane with ourselves. All professions, all civic honors, all military achievements, all arts, industries, and employments are offered to your competition. If there are any wrongs in the enactment or execution of the laws, we offer you the electoral urn, and give you equal voice with the native-born to correct and remedy them.

That all this is true you know. Look about you in our community. First, you Catholics. Look to your clergy, your churches, their millions of accumulated wealth. Look to the Jesuit College on Market Street, and the other palace of learning and religious worship now being erected on Van Ness Avenue. You Irish and Germans, look to your savings banks with nearly $30,000,000 of deposits; to the bankers, bonanza kings, millionaires, Senators, Governors, State officials, leading merchants, prominent business men, honored and honorable citizens, who, under our laws and the generous hospitality of our political and social system, have attained wealth, honor, and honorable positions. How does it happen that there are to-day in San Francisco fifty thousand prosperous, wealthy, honorable, and respectable citizens of foreign birth in the enjoyment of their homes, their churches, their clubs, and their innocent recreations at rural picnics, and you two, or three, or four thousand discontented, grumbling, impecunious, political malcontents are down here among the fleas upon the sand-lot, cursing God, the Constitution, and the American people that you have had bad luck? I will answer you, and you may kick back with all the malevolence of your ignorant heads and your malicious heels.

You are an idle, drunken, worthless, vagabond lot. You drink too much beer. You hang about corner groceries, and you play "pitch seven up" for whisky. You are worthless ward politicians. You waste your lives pursuing demagogues who are more worthless than yourselves, more idle, more ignorant, more selfish, and more criminal. If you would go to work, there is plenty of work to do. If you will stop drinking whisky, give up Chinese cigars, save your money, follow your wives' advice, stay at home nights, and go to church on Sundays, you can save money, buy a homestead, become independent, educate your children, and by sobriety, industry, and economy, become honored and respectable American citizens, instead of remaining what you are—a discontented, worthless set of ignorant foreigners. You ought to be ashamed of yourselves. There is not a millionaire, nor prosperous business man in California, that has not had his days of adversity—his days of trial, poverty, and hard labor. Those who came to California in the early time endured its hardships. Some fell under the burden, and filled early graves; some prospered, all toiled, all struggled; and now you—most of you either late comers or men of unthrift, idle, and dissolute habits—what do you demand? That we divide with you?

Not much! We will see you collectively and individually damned first. You must work as we did, and if you won't work, you shall have no beer, nor whisky, nor "pitch," nor "seven-up." You shall not help yourselves by threats, nor by violence. You shall not bring about agrarianism, and division of property, by politics or Constitutional tricks. We are not afraid of you as a political party, nor of your shillalabs. The time has not come in California for Nihilism, nor Socialism, nor Communism; and if your leaders—your Kearney, your Beerstecher, your Citrus Barbour, your Freud, your Vacquerel, your Bonnet, your Larkin, your Tinnin, your Howard, your Terry, and all the other demagogues who deceive and mislead you; all the draymen, corset-makers, cooks, hair-dressers, lawyers, and demagogues whom you have set up as political oracles—would tell you the truth, they would tell you that you enjoy to-day all the political privileges for which Nihilists contend in Russia, Socialists in Germany, or Communists in France.

You have every political privilege in this State for which revolutions have been stirred and dynasties overthrown. There is not a principle for which martyrs ever died or heroes contended that you do not enjoy. You are free in your conscience, free in your persons, free of speech, with perfect freedom of action within the law. You are not serfs to lords, nor vassals to the soil. You owe no military service to feudal chieftain, nor are you drafted to the armies of the State. You are not subject to exactions by taxation. You are in every sense freemen and citizens of a free republic.

If you can not prosper in this country, it must be for one of two causes: either God has given you no sense or it is because you are idle and unenterprising. If God has not given you the proper modicum of brains, it is His fault, and not the fault of the American nation or its laws. If you are idle and unenterprising, it is your own fault. We did not create you, and we can not recreate you.

If you do not like this country, then, in the name of heaven, why don't you go back to that you came from? If wages are inadequate here, return to your peasant homes in Germany, where women are yoked with steers to plow; go back to Belgium, where women drag carts with dogs; go back to Ireland, to France, to Scandinavia; to the plains of Lombardy, where women wield the mattock; to Portugal, where women hold wooden plows, and where you are liable to do military duty. Go back and tell your countrymen and countrywomen that in a land of inexhaustible fertility, where farms were free, where religion was honored, where education was within the reach of all, where mines, and forests, and fisheries were open to the world, where the law protected all, and where you were clothed with the sovereignty of citizenship—that you could not make a living. Go back and starve, and die, and rot. Be cremated, be damned, be anything, and give us a rest from this insufferable, never-ending din of beer-drinking, whisky-guzzling, pitch-seven-up foreign-born politicians.

As Americans, we are sick and tired of it. We are angry at the insolence of your demands. You are accustomed to the argument of kings, and in your ignorance you are unfit to be freemen. Therefore, we ask the respectable, the prosperous, the contented, the reasonable of your own countrymen to unite with us, in order that we may silence your clamor, and relegate you to your proper positions. You, an ignorant mob of unwashed foreigners, would teach Americans their political duties. You, a propertyless mass of unskilled laborers, who are too idle and too vicious to earn your beer and whisky—you demand of us a division of our earnings, and call it Communism. You would overthrow our laws, and style it Nihilism. You would level all barriers of society, break down all distinctions of class, and this is the sand-lot's idea of Socialism. You would steal the money you have not earned, and call it Agrarianism.

Now, my dear adopted German and Irish fellow-citizens of the sand-lot, let us again take up the simile of the ass. You are the asses, and I am the speaking one that Balaam bestrode. Let us discuss the Chinese question, remembering all the time that I am a mule and that you are donkeys.

Have we—imported jackasses that we are—have we any right, or does it become us, to dictate to the American people what other animals they may import. We are natives of Central Asia. Some naturalists think our wild ancestors belonged to Africa. So, then, we are no better than Africans or Chinamen; and being foreigners ourselves, coming to the country by the invitation of Americans, with what sort of reason, propriety, or decency, shall we set ourselves up to say that Africans and Chinese shall not come to the country because they are more patient, will stand harder knocks, work more hours, bear heavier burdens, and live upon meager food than we?

Remember, I am not addressing you now as Germans or Irishmen, but as jackasses. I am not comparing you, my dearly adopted fellow-citizens, to these unfortunate animals; I am only using the simile to illustrate how utterly absurd and inconsistent it is for one kind of wild animal to kick another out of the pasture to which all have been admitted by the same kind of invitation.

And now—again dropping the simile—let me ask you, German and Irish workmen, if the American citizens of California are not doing all they can to rid the State of the Chinese, and to prevent more from coming? Are they not doing it in your interest, and for your benefit? Have not both political parties, all the Christian churches, all the respectable clergymen, the entire press, the Chamber of Commerce, delegates in both houses of Congress, the Senate and Legislature of California, the Mechanics' Institute, State and county conventions, the people in public meetings, the Governor of the State, the Mayor of the city, the Board of Supervisors, the Health Office, the Police Department, men of eminence, everybody, everywhere, under all circumstances, at all times when opportunity presented, have they not honestly worked to solve this Chinese problem?

You know they have, and you know they have made great progress. And you know that your insane threats, your violent and illegal conduct, have injured and retarded this business. You have placed difficulties in the way of legislation. The brutal and cowardly motto that the "Chinese must go" is a piece of absurd demagogism. The Chinese that are here are here under the invitation of an American treaty, and while it is well and desirable to prevent any more Chinese from coming, there is no more right, nor sense, nor justice, nor humanity in driving Chinese away than there would be in driving away Germans or Irishmen. You know this, and you know that the threat is a contemptible and cowardly one. You do not intend to carry it out, and, what is more, you dare not attempt it.

You claim to want labor. The sand-lot is not the place to find it. You have the sense to know, and if not the sense, you have had the experience to demonstrate, that your present mode of angry agitation is making labor less, and is reducing wages. Capital and labor are mutually dependent upon each other. If you intimidate capital, it is timid and hides itself. While it is in hiding you are starving. It never comes forth at threats. It never circulates in times of violence and danger. Before this agitation commenced you were prosperous. The Real Estate Associates built hundreds of houses in a year. Since this agitation times have been hard. Real estate values have depreciated, enterprise is arrested, and you are the first to feel the blow. If there are no bricks laid, there is no money for carrying the hod. As soon as you cease agitating, confidence will be restored. Money was never more abundant. New enterprises will be inaugurated, new industries stimulated. Money will again circulate freely, and you will get some.

It is your own fault that this period of stagnation has come. Ten years ago this was the happiest, most hopeful, and most independent community in the world. Everybody was elastic and buoyant; everybody was industrious and economical and nearly all had their own homes. You gambled in stocks, went into politics, lost your grip, gave way to the Chinese, began to drink whisky and beer, and to play "pitch" and "seven up" at the corner groceries. Your bad example made hoodlums of your children, and now you meet on the sand-lot, blaspheme God, and denounce the laws of the American Republic because you have reaped the consequences of your own crimes and follies and because you have been the contrivers of your own ruin.

Now, take the advice of a sober-minded mule—one who came early to the country, worked hard, and ate thistles. Abandon the leadership of the good-for-nothing, long-eared, leather-lunged, asioine brayers who have undertaken to set themselves up as teachers of political economy. Abandon politics and go back to honest labor. Stop drinking beer and whisky. Give the corner groggery, "pitch" and "seven up," "cinch," "blue Peter," "old sledge," and stocks a wide berth. Give ear again to the sermons of your priests, the advice of your wives, and the prayers of your children. Leave "lecherous bondholders" and "hell-born and hell-bound" rich men alone till you can change places with them. Do not attempt, through the organization of a Workingmen's party, to secure for yourselves the places of thieving, dishonest, devilish politicians, lest you should be tempted, and, like them, fall. Let Americans, assisted by foreigners of intelligence, wealth, and common sense, govern the country of your adoption; and, for God's sake, desist from howling about the Chinese—whom many honest people, who are not asses, think a more desirable class of citizens than the ignorant, idle, political, discontented, ever agitating, insolent set of foreign-born brutes they think you to be.

ADDENDUM.

At the conclusion of this address the owner of the animal came forward and apologized for the rude manner and harsh expressions used by his mule toward the very large and respectable audience of adopted fellow-citizens—both ladies and gentlemen. He thanked them on behalf of his long-eared property for their indulgence of his plain talk, reminding them that freedom of speech within the bounds of license was one of the bulwarks of American liberty. He also advised the audience that the mule did not comprehend within the criticism any order-loving and law-abiding citizen, of either foreign or native birth, and did not exempt from caustic denunciation any idle, good-for-nothing, worthless human ass, whether native or foreign born; that his mule, having retired from politics, did not desire their votes, nor require any of their small advertisements for his support.

The new real estate house of Cox, Teall & Co.—J. O. Eldridge, auctioneer—have an auction sale of lots on Tuesday next at Newhall & Co.'s salesrooms, corner Sansome and Halleck Streets. We hope with this sale to see a new departure in real properties. The house of Manrice Dore & Co. advertise a sale in the Alta California that nobody ever sees, rings a bell that nobody ever hears, sells lots that nobody ever buys, and the report goes out that real estate has no value; all the old real estate dealers look blue, talk despondent, and act as though the bottom had fallen out of San Francisco. By-bidders are fixed for the different auction sales, and men are advertised as purchasers who have not money enough to pay for a burial lot in a second-class cemetery. Thus the market is imposed upon and the property scandalized. There is no better investment to-day in America than unimproved lots in San Francisco. They are selling for less than half their value as compared with any other prosperous American city. Our debt is nominal. Our taxes are not high, when we consider that we are paying as we go and building for the future. We are not issuing bonds. San Francisco is rapidly increasing in population and in wealth; is improving, and its inevitable destiny is to be one of the greatest cities—we think the second—of the continent. When we get tiff with stock gambling, and have secured laws preventing the too great immigration of Chinese, our growth and development will be a marvelous one. We shall be glad when all the old 49ers die or retire from business on ample fortunes. We need young men, new blood, fresh enthusiasm, more heart, more courage, more confidence, and more enterprise. When the city gets rid of all of us old fossils, it will take a new start and emerge from its present condition; the grub will take wings, and a country village be transformed into a commercial metropolis.

The young Democracy of San Francisco have volunteered for a forlorn hope. For the first time in twenty years they smell the flesh-pots of the national soup kitchen. Their mouths fairly water with the smell of succulent repast. The campaign is to be positive and aggressive. They are determined to carry the war into Africa. If they do get fairly into the Dark Continent we suggest for a slogan "On, Stanley, on!" We would also suggest they carry the war into China and Ireland, and thus invade Europe, Asia, and Africa. As a specimen sabre-cut of these bold young statesmen, upon whom depends the safety of the American Republic, we quote the following audacious lie from their address: "The Republican party, from its fraudulent President down to its most bigoted, puritanical Congressman, has with deliberation placed itself upon record as the champion of Mongolian slavery." This is certainly "positive and aggressive," and for force of argument beats Tom Pepper all hollow. Everybody knows that Tom was kicked out of hell for.

OUR BOOK OF WORTHIES.

People Whom One Does Not Meet.

Emperor William still carries his wounded arm in a sling.

Secretary Evarts's two sons, Messrs. Prescott and Sherman Evarts, are the editors of the literary magazines of Harvard and Yale.

The Czar of Russia went on the stage at St. Petersburg, after the second act of Faust, to compliment Mme. Albani. Such an honor as this, it is said, is without parallel in the Italian operatic history of Russia.

In the library of M. Dufaure, in his villa at Cozes, there hangs on a piece of white vellum, handsomely framed and covered with glass, a small sprig with some dry leaves, under which is written: "From Washington's grave."

President Grévy is reported to carry himself very much like an American President. Visitors easily get speech of him, finding him in his office in a loose coat and slippers, pacing the floor, and in the full enjoyment of a cigar.

Sims Reeves, the famous English tenor, has a second son who is said to be a dramatic tenor of great promise. Joachim and Sterndale Bennett were his godfathers, and his full name is Herbert Sterndale Joachim Sims Reeves. A grave responsibility rests on a youth who starts in life with such a name.

M. Gambetta, as President of the Chambers, makes a very powerful and imposing figure. He shows great ease of manner and is quiet and self-restrained. He manages the Royalists and Bonapartists with the bell, and calms the restlessness of the Republicans with a slight motion of his small left hand.

Madame Blanc, the widow and heir of the owner of the gambling-house at Monaco, began her career by sweeping out the Kursaal gambling-rooms. Her property is managed by a company. One of her daughters married a Polish prince. The income of Madame varies from $2,000,000 to $3,000,000 a year.

Mr. George Augustus Sala held fifty-four tickets in the French lottery, all of which proved blanks. He now says: "I lack words wherewith to express my indignation at such an immoral encouragement of public gambling having been sanctioned by the French Government. Public lotteries are public scandals and nuisances, and direct incentives to fraud."

Senator Hannibal Hamlin, it is said, is popularly supposed, in Maine, to be immortal; he has been a veteran politician so long that hardly anybody can remember when he began his public life. The farmers like his homely ways and his devotion to agriculture. In the time when he was Vice-President he is described as walking through Bangor business streets, when at home, in blue "overalls" and muddy boots, bearing under one arm a gift of a yellow squash for some friendly Bangor householder.

Mary Clemmer accuses Senator Burnside of being chiefly devoted to his clothes, and says that as a reward he is pictured in the tailors' fashion plates. "He is the most luxurious moving object visible in the Senate, as he 'spreads' about with broad, branching side-whiskers, a chinchilla cap to cover his shining head, and the gayest of flowering cashmere waistcoats. And he is one of the most 'nobby' objects on the avenue, in the eyes of admiring belles, as he dashes through it in his dog-cart, beside some happy young lady, with a decorated 'tiger' clinging close behind."

The Chinese Chargé d'Affaires, in his national dress, is a conspicuous person at the Court entertainments in Berlin. He is said to be far less arrogant than his predecessor, Lin-Ta-jün, who, in his boundless pride, overstepped all limits. Instigated by a keen dislike to foreigners, he neglected no opportunity to denote his aversion publicly. One day he appeared at Court with a numerous suite, including even his cooks and other menials. A traveler famous for his explorations in China, detecting by their garb the low social rank of the respective persons, drew the attention of the High Chamberlain, whereupon the Minister was sharply reprimanded for his insolence.

Republican simplicity, as understood by M. Gambetta, is not quite what it was in the days of the Athenians. Since the 4th of September not one of the Presidents of the Chamber, M. Buffet, M. d'Audiffret-Pasquier, nor M. Grévy, had ventured to inhabit the princely apartments of the Présidence du Corps Législatif, which had remained, so to say, sacred to the memory of the hospital Duc de Morny. M. Gambetta, however, likes grandeur, and has lost no time in taking up his abode in the Palace. To prepare his Spartan broth, he has engaged the chef of the Duc de Noailles, and three aides de cuisine. This is indeed a change from the days of the Café Procope, and it is scarcely astonishing that some persons look forward to revolutions as the only way of giving every one a chance.

General Chanzy's selection for the post of French Ambassador at St. Petersburg completes the series of military diplomatists who have been sent there from Paris for the last ten years. General Fleury opened the march; and the celebrated letter of his attaché, M. de Verlière, will be remembered as one of the most curious papiers des Tuileries, in which the favor of the Ambassador with the Czar was gauged by the fact that he had been riding for a whole day with his Majesty in his single-seated sledge. The letter went even so far as to mention in what an uncomfortable position General Fleury took the drive; a piece of information which had undoubtedly a not inconsiderable share in the declaration of war with Germany, as Napoleon III was forth convinced that he could rely on Russian neu-

JAPANESE FABLES FOR LITTLE FOLKS.

Translated for the Argonaut by T. E. Hallifax.

IX.—THE RATS AND THE TRAP.

Once upon a time a man set a trap to catch the rats that overran his house, and went to bed, hoping soon to hear the noise of the trap falling and the squeak of the rat.

When the rats saw the trap, they consulted together, and determined to play a joke on the man of the house. So they prowled about till they found the safe, and, after a sumptuous meal, returned and pushed the trap over; after which they ran away to their holes, where they remained peeping out to enjoy the man's disappointment when he heard the trap fall and found no prisoner in it.

The master of the house, hearing the trap fall, ran gleefully to get the rat he was certain would be under it, and awoke the household to come and see; but they found nothing there but the empty trap. He again set the trap, wondering how it could have fallen without catching a rat, and returned to bed. In a few minutes the trap again fell, and he again got out of bed, only to be disappointed and laughed at by the jokers. In the morning he found they had eaten up what he had intended for his breakfast, and was in consequence very angry.

The next night the trap was set; and his wife, bearing a noise as of the trap falling, woke him, and told him the trap must have fallen, and that he ought to go and see. "Oh, no," said he; "it's of no use. I am sure it has not fallen, for I nailed it up so securely I am positive it could not be pulled down, and therefore could not have made a noise."

X.—THE CATS AND THE FISH.

A man was once cutting up a poisonous fish to make some dainty dish, when a hungry, homeless cat snatched up a piece and scampered off with it. The man followed, and saw puss in an inaccessibly narrow space between two houses gloating over the stolen morsel. When he saw the cat eating the fish he said to himself: "If these cunning animals eat it, surely I can eat it without fear," and he returned home. Meantime the cat had waited, having its suspicions as to the wholesomeness of the fish, but when she saw the people eating it, she also fell to eating it. Other cats came, and a quarrel ensued over the morsel, but they were seized with a fatal sickness, as also were the people, so that all who had partaken of it died.

MORAL.—Cunning persons are often outwitted in the end.

XI.—PUSSY'S RUNAWAY LOVE-MATCH.

Once upon a time a teacher of the guitar owned a pet tom cat, whom he called Gon. Gon was a fine, handsome fellow, and all the young lady cats of the neighborhood vied with each other in winning his affections. His heart was, however, given to a sleek little pussy called Koma, owned by a young lady next door, who, finding her pet so deeply in love with the music teacher's Gon, endeavored to purchase him, so that her favorite might be happy. On the other hand, the music teacher wished to obtain Koma in order to marry her to Gon.

As their owners could not come to terms, the lovers agreed to run away together; and one day off they started, but on the road a wicked dog ran after them. Koma climbed a cherry tree, but Gon, trying to attract the dog's attention, kept along the road, and would have been killed in sight of the crying and frightened Koma, had not the messenger of a mansion beaten the dog away and saved Gon's life. Gon was taken home to the mansion, and he lost sight of Koma. Now, in this mansion there was a lovely lady, a princess, who every day walked in a beautiful garden; but in this garden was a great ugly snake who was madly in love with her. The princess was very much frightened at the snake, who often came to make love to her. Gon, on seeing this, one day watched in the garden, and, spying the snake crawling toward the room where the princess was singing and accompanying herself on the harp, jumped on the reptile, and, biting its neck, soon killed it. The noise of the scuffle attracted the attention of the princess, and when she saw her troublesome lover dead she was very glad, and, sending for Gon's owner, she persuaded him to let her keep Gon altogether, and fed him on nice things.

But Gon wanted to find Koma, whom all this time he had not once forgotten, and for whose safety he felt the greatest anxiety, and whenever he could steal away searched diligently. One day he heard a cry of distress, and going toward the spot from which the noise appeared to come, saw a naughty, thieving cat cruelly ill using a beautiful young lady pussy cat, who was crying piteously. Gon immediately attacked the scoundrel, and gave him a severe beating; then, turning to the pretty lady cat, told her to dry her eyes, that her persecutor was driven off, when what was Gon's surprise to find that his pretty protégée was his long-lost Koma. Indeed, she scarcely recognized him, he had so improved. So tenderly embracing her, and vowing never to part from her again, he led her to his mistress, and she, understanding how matters stood, sent to Koma's mistress and bought her; so both Gon and Koma became her very great pets, and were very happy.

By and by the princess was married to a great daimio (noble), and Gon and Koma accompanied her in great state to her new home, where they were happy ever after, and had numerous little Gons and Komas, who used to amuse the princess' pretty baby. The princess told her lord about Gon's killing the snake, and he was very kind to Gon and Koma, and their family.

It is hard for professional pride to remain silent when a good old tradition of the craft is outraged. The other night when The New Babylon was produced at the Duke's Theatre in Holborn, the gallery was crowded, and the gods were pleased to approve of the piece generally until the burglary scene. But when the burglar was seen "doing" the place with all the blinds up, so that he could be seen "at work" from the street, an expert present could bear it no longer, but yelled out, "Why don't you pull your blinds down?"—The World.

The man who sighed for the wings of a bird did not, apparently, know that the legs were much nicer eating.

THE WOMEN.

Young married ladies have gone into society in Charleston during the past winter, contrary to the custom of that city since the war.

Neither women nor wind instruments will be permitted after June 1st in the choirs of the churches in the Catholic diocese of Montreal.

Mrs. Alfred Tennyson Dickens, daughter-in-law of the late Charles Dickens, was recently killed by a runaway horse in Australia, together with her child.

"We are going out with the tied," said a young man to a friend, as he filed down the aisle after a wedding. "In that case," said a lady in front, "you can afford to get off my train." And he did.

Mrs. Stackpole, of South Chelmsford, Massachusetts, recently celebrated her one-hundredth birthday, and her friends from Lowell and elsewhere got up a grand supper at her residence in honor of the event.

As they parted at the railroad station—"Do not forget me, nor cease to love me," murmured the husband. "Never, never!" sobbed the wife, and she pulled out a handkerchief and tied a knot in it, that she might remember.

Lord Blank married a charming woman. She died, and he married a lady with a temper. Some one called on him the other day, and said: "Where is your wife?" He answered: "She is in heaven; Lady Blank is in the drawing-room."

The death is announced of Mrs. Cohen, mother of Baroness Meyer de Rothschild, and consequently grandmother of the Countess of Rosebery. By this event a further sum of a quarter of a million falls to the share of the Countess of Rosebery.

The marriage of Jules Simon's son to Sarah Sonneis, a Jewess, at Paris, was a most brilliant affair. All the prominent men and women of the day were present; and it was especially noticed that the bride, who is immensely rich, did not wear a single jewel.

In a breach of promise lawsuit in Marshalltown, Iowa, the plaintiff swore that he broke the engagement with the defendant because, when he slipped and fell on the ice, she laughed unfeelingly. She swore that she laughed because he would not have fallen if he had not bowed with superfluous politeness to a young woman.

A lovely young lady in Glasgow was talking with a gentleman from a distance about that city and its gayeties. The conversation turned upon balls and the attendance of them, when the gentleman laughingly asked the question: "Have you many beauties in Glasgow, Miss —?" On which the young lady naively replied: "Oh, yes, sir; there are five of us!"

A fashion which has spread rapidly in France is that of paying calls and taking afternoon tea in bonnet and gloves, without any cloak or jacket. Parisian ladies can not any longer endure the temporary sacrifice of outline which an outdoor garment entails. The visitor therefore drops her wrap in the hall or anteroom; so that un cachemire, which was thirty years ago the one joy in life of a Parisienne, is likely to become so again.

Further proceedings are about to be commenced in the French courts, with a view to enable the Marquis de Caux to annul her marriage. In French law divorce is not recognized under any circumstances; but a marriage may be declared null and void, if any irregularity can be proved in the manner in which the marriage was celebrated. I hear that several such irregularities will be sought to be proved in the case of Madame Patti; and although no single one of them by itself might be of sufficient weight, yet several flaws taken together might have the necessary weight with the French courts.

The Parisiennes (says a writer in a London journal) are wild about what they call the English fashion of wearing living jewelry. The fashion is, in fact, not English, but American; it was set by a fair American, once an ornament of the Court of St. Petersburg, whose Mexican beetle caused some sensation in London lately. Her beetle, however, was too rare a creature ever to become a fashion. The British Museum possesses a dead specimen, but there is, as far as I know, only this one alive in England; so that if the mode become established, I supposed that humbler members of the family will be pressed into service. The glossy black of the common cockroach, relieved with gold harness of exquisite workmanship, would really be more effective than the dull brown and black of the Mexican beetle. I strongly recommend the plentiful and unpretentious cockroach to the blonde beauty, while the brunette might make something of the cricket of the hearth.

A picturesque story is told of Madame Grévy in the early days of her husband's elevation. She drove in a hired carriage one morning to the door of Laferrière, the famous dress-maker, and entered, dragging after her a huge bundle containing an old velvet gown. She was received with much condescension, and was told to wait, inasmuch as the great milliner was then engaged with a customer—no other, in fact, than an actress of the Comédie Française. Madame Grévy sat down humbly with her bundle in her arms until the great artist chose to interview her, when she explained that she wished to have her dress "done up" and improved. "Oh," said the great one, "we don't do up dresses here; sometimes for our own customers we do such a thing to oblige them; but we do not know Madame." "I am Madame Grévy," was the reply, "and I thought I could have this dress arranged for the reception at the Elysée." Thereupon the whole establishment fell at her feet and implored pardon, and it is probable that the velvet dress will still rejoice the hearts of ambassadors.

INTAGLIOS.

A Love Song.

Oh, yes, I knew you loved me,
Long since I divined it well;
But when to myself you owned it,
Great fear upon me fell.

Away I rushed to the mountains,
I shouted and sang for glee;
I went to the beach and wept there,
Till the sun went down in the sea.

My heart, it is even as the sun is,
All aflame to the gazer's sight;
And it sets in a sea of love, too,
Majestic and bright.

HEINE.

Leviathan.

Midway between the lone rock and the shore
A fountain fair sprang skyward suddenly,
And sudden fell, and yet again once more
The column rose and sank into the sea.

Silent, ethereal, mystic, delicate,
Flushed with delicious glow of fading rose,
It grew and vanished, like some genie great,
Some wild thin phantom, woven of winter snows.

CELIA THAXTER.

A Tournament.

Queen of the tourney was I set,
And watched the harnessd spearman dash
Athwart the mellow, and the flash
Of helmets, as the fair knights met
And the spear shivered in the crash.

Full many a deed of arms was done,
And many a mighty man that day
Rode, meteor-like, through the array;
But over all the mellow shone
One knight's white plumes; and through the fray

Rose Lautrec's war-cry, as he clave
The throng of riders, and the sweep
Of his broad falchion did reap
The mail-clad knights, as some stout knave
Shears through the corn sheaves tall and deep.

JOHN PAYNE.

The Stab.

"Of sudden stabs in groves forlorn."—HOOE.

On the road—the lonely road,
Under the cold, white moon,
Under the ragged trees he strode;
He whistled, and shifted his weary load,
Whistled a foolish tune.

There was a step, timed with his own,
A figure that stooped and bowed,
A broad, white knife, that gleamed and shone
Like a splinter of daylight, downward thrown,
And the moon went under a cloud.

But the moon came out so broad and good
That the barn fowl woke and crowed;
Then roughed his feathers in drowsy mood,
And the brown owl called to his mate in the wood
That a man lay dead in the road.

WILL WALLACE HARNEY.

Theology.

If sheep and swine, and lions strong, and all the bovine crew,
Could paint with cunning hands, and do what clever mortals do,

Depend upon it, every pig, with snout so broad and blunt,
Would make a jove that, like himself, would thunder with a grunt;
And every lion's god would roar, and every bull's would bellow.

And every sheep's would baa, and every beast his worshiped fellow
Would find in some immortal form, and naught exist divine
But had the gait of lion, sheep, or ox, or grunting swine.

ZENOPHANES.

Three Kisses.

Three, only three, my darling,
Separate, solemn, slow;
Not like the swift and joyous ones
We used to know,
When we kissed because we loved each other
Simply to taste love's sweets,
And lavished our kisses as summer
Lavishes heat;
But as they kiss whose hearts are wrung
When hope and fear are spent,
And nothing is left to give, except—
A sacrament!

SAXE HOLME.

The Troll of the Deacon.

Die I must, but let me die drinking in an inn.
Hold the beer-can to my lips, frothing to the brim!
So when the angels flutter down to take me from my sin,
"Ah, God, have mercy on the sot," the cherubs will begin.

WALTER DE MAR.

Arte O'Neal.

Sweet Arte O'Neal, with your heart of steel,
Ye're driving me mad with your cruel eyes.
There never was yet such a rare coquette,
Ye pout at my smiles and laugh at my sighs.

Ye swear that ye love by the One above,
Yet never a kiss will ye let me take;
But ye dress so neat and ye look so sweet,
Oh, Arte O'Neal, it's my heart ye'll break.

Faith, have ye forgot that horrible spot
Where I pulled ye in from the river's brink?
'Twas an awful sight, with your face so white—
Ye'll remember the time if ye only think.

Oh, they thought ye dead, for your hands, like lead,
Fell down on the grass by your breathless form;
But ye sipped poteen from my old canteen,
And I held your hands till your blood grew warm;

And the roses came like a holy flame,
And frightened the chill from your cheek so pale;
And ye swore to me, on your bended knee,
Ye would love me till your life should fail.

But ye pout and fret in a foolish pet,
Ye think me coarse with my awkward ways,
And ye'd rather wed to a man well read,
Instead of a lad whom none can praise.

Good-bye! I will go. Nobody shall know
The maddening, maddening grief I feel.
In the course of years—what! Arte in tears!
Now come to my bosom, sweet Arte O'Neal.

EDWARD FRANCIS CHASE.

Instruction.

Dear love, thine eyes are like an open book,
With noble poems on its perfect page.
Dear love, when in thy dreaming eyes I look
I methinks I am at last a mighty sage.
So many words have I read therein,
So many secrets learned, that none can know
Save I who love thee. I would fain begin Anew my lessons, nor from study go
Till stealthy hand of Death shall touch my heart
And still its beating. Why may I not learn,
By gazing in thine eyes, some magic art
To make the flame of love burn
But if I die before thee, thou wilt seal
The book, nor any of its lore reveal.

EDWARD KING.

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS—SPRING STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

EDUCATIONAL.

AN EXPERIENCED TEACHER.

recently from Southern California, would like to obtain a class of pupils in this city. A specialty made of preparing children for examination who, through sickness or other causes, have fallen behind their grade in the public schools. Adults whose education is deficient may also obtain private and thorough instruction in the different English branches. Address MRS. E. E., this office.

WANTED,

BY A YOUNG LADY, A POSITION

as Governess or Companion. Can teach Piano Music, French, and English. Highest testimonials given. Moderate compensation. City or country. Address MISS M. JAY, this office.

ELOCUTION, ORATORY, AND

THE DRAMA.

MARY J. BRADLEY, 510 ELLIS

Street. Ladies and gentlemen fitted for the Platform, Stage, or Teaching.

C. O. DEAN, D.D.S. F. M. HACKETT.

HACKETT & DEAN,

DENTISTS, Latham's Building, 126

Kearny Street, San Francisco.
Office hours from 8 A. M. until 5 P. M.

PRESIDENT COFFEE,

PURE MOOCHA COFFEE,

PURE JAVA COFFEE,

Ground to order at

LORING'S

Dealer in choice

JAPAN AND BLACK

TEAS

922 Market St.,

Between Stockton and Powell Streets, near the Baldwin.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS,

REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 510 SACRAMENTO STREET.

JENNINGS S. COX.....OLIVER TEALL.

COX, TEALL & CO.,

REAL ESTATE AGENTS AND

AUCTIONEERS, 303 Montgomery Street, under the Nevada Bank, San Francisco.

Auction Salesroom, H. M. NEWHALL & CO., 309, 311 and 313 Sansome Street.

J. O. ELDRIDGE, Auctioneer.

ANDREW ONDERDONK, Civil Engineer.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office

and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11 A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

DR. JAS. M. HUTCHINS,

DENTIST, REMOVED TO 737 MARKET STREET, OPPOSITE DUPONT.

ELECTRIC BELTS,

A sure cure for nervous debility, premature decay, exhaustion, etc. The only reliable cure. Circulars mailed free. Address J. K. REEVES, 43 Chatham Street, N. Y.

DOMESTIC SERVANTS.

JAPANESE and CHINESE Servants of all kinds will be speedily furnished by the undersigned, who, having had seven years' experience, feel confident of being able to give satisfaction in all cases. Ladies and gentlemen are respectfully invited to call and leave orders. PIERCE & SON, 609 Sacramento Street, up stairs, San Francisco.

ASSESSOR'S OFFICE.

NOTICE TO TAXPAYERS,

1879-80.

ALL PERSONS, COMPANIES, AS-

sociations, or firms, in the City and County of San Francisco are requested, either in person or by their proper representatives, to deliver at the Assessor's Office, New City Hall, in said City and County, before the SECOND MONDAY IN APRIL, 1879, a statement under oath of all the property, both Personal and Real, owned or claimed by him or them, or which is in his or their possession, or which is held or controlled by any other person in trust for or for the benefit of him or them. See Political Code, Sections 363—3648.

All persons owning Real Estate that has heretofore been assessed in the wrong name, or misspelled, or otherwise misdescribed in last year's Real Estate Assessment Roll, or who have purchased Real Estate within the last year, are requested to appear personally, or send their Deeds to the Assessor's office, and have the proper changes made for the Real Estate Roll for the fiscal year 1879-80. Immediate attention is necessary, as work on the Roll will commence in a few days, after which it will be too late for any alterations.

POLL TAX,

TWO DOLLARS, NOW DUE AT THIS OFFICE, or to a Deputy. Will be THREE DOLLARS when delinquent, and constitute a lien upon other property.

ALEXANDER BADLAM,
City and County Assessor.

March 1, 1879.

NOTICE.

The public are hereby notified that the Field Deputies of this office will commence assessing property MONDAY, March 3, 1879.

The duties assigned to those Deputies are too well known to the community to require explanation, and while I have been careful in making my selections to fill the positions by men favorably known in the community for their competency and integrity, and am confident that the duties will be discharged by them to the satisfaction of all concerned, I urgently request Taxpayers to report to this office any dereliction of duty by any of my Deputies, and assure them that any complaints will receive immediate attention.

ALEXANDER BADLAM,
City and County Assessor.

March 1, 1879.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST,

removed to 200 STOCKTON ST., COR. GEARY, S. F.

RARE ENGRAVINGS,

MODERN ETCHINGS.

VISITORS WILL BE ALWAYS
welcome to inspect collection.

W. K. VICKERY,
22 Montgomery Street, opposite the Lick House.

MULLER'S
OPTOMETER!
The only reliable instrument for Testing
Defective Vision.

135 Montgomery Street,

Near Bush, opposite the Occidental Hotel.

NOOK FARM.

THIS PLEASANT COUNTRY

HOME is now open for the reception of visitors. Important additions and improvements have been made since last season, which add greatly to the comfort and pleasure of guests. The same good cheer and home surroundings will be found in the future as in the past.

Remember that the pleasantest part of the year in the country is the spring and early summer.
For particulars, address E. B. SMITH,
Rutherford, Napa County.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

THOMAS O'SULLIVAN, plaintiff, vs. JOHN LICENS, in signature and acknowledgment JOHN LINUS.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JOHN LICENS, in signature and acknowledgment JOHN LINUS, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court, adjudging that certain debt, executed by defendant to plaintiff, on March 4th, 1878, be reformed and amended in the description of certain real property particularly described in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby expressly made, and for costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded. (Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 22d day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.)

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.

JOHN J. COFFEY, Attorney for Plaintiff.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARY A. WOOTEN, plaintiff, vs. JOHN WOOTEN, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to John Wooten, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby made, and for costs of this suit, counsel fees, and alimony; also for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

(Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 15th day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.)

[SEAL.] THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By W. STEVENSON, Deputy.

R. THOMPSON, Plaintiff's Attorney.

GOULD & CURRY SILVER MINING

Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the eleventh day of March, 1879, an assessment (No. 35) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 69, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the sixteenth day of April, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on THURSDAY, the seventh day of May, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with cost of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

ALFRED K. DUKEROW, Secretary.
Office—Room 69, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

HALE & NORCROSS SILVER MIN

ing Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the twelfth (12th) day of March, 1879, an assessment (No. 61) of one ($1) dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 58, Nevada Block, northwest corner Pine and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the sixteenth (16th) day of April, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on THURSDAY, the eighth (8th) day of May, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JOEL F. LIGHTNER, Secretary.
Office—Room 58, Nevada Block, northwest corner Pine and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Eureka Consolidated Mining Company, Nevada Block, Room 27, San Francisco, March 15, 1879.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, a dividend (No. 41) of two dollars per share was declared, payable on THURSDAY, March 20th, 1879. Transfer books closed until 21st inst.

W. W. TRAYLOR, Secretary.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Standard Consolidated Mining Company, San Francisco, Cal., March 7, 1879.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, Dividend No. 1, of fifty cents ($0.50) per share, was declared, payable on Wednesday, March 13th, 1879, at the office in this city, or at the Agency of the Nevada Bank of San Francisco, in New York. Transfer books closed on Saturday, March 8, 1879, at 12 o'clock.

WM. WILLIS, Secretary.

Office, Room 29 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, third floor, San Francisco, Cal.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.—NOTICE

is hereby given by the undersigned, Administratrix of the Estate of JOHN A. MAY, deceased, to the creditors of, and all persons having claims against, the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administratrix, at 432 Montgomery Street, Room 3, the same being her place for the transaction of business of the said estate in the City and County of San Francisco.

MAGDALENE

Administratrix of the Estate of John A. May.
Dated at San Francisco, March 1st, 1879.
PAUL NEUMANN, Attorney for Ad.

INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 21, 1879

MY DEAR MADGE:—We had no Danicheffs after all. On dit that at the last moment Geo. Clarke refused to place himself in direct contrast with Charles Thorne by accepting the part of "Ossip." In this particular instance he was wise. I am treasonable enough to think that he may frequently be quite as acceptable as that much-lauded New York god in other parts, but it would indeed be a bold experiment to face a strongly pre-judiced public as "Ossip." Suppose if Geo. Clarke should have been seized with a spell of his mannerisms and bounced through the part! Ah, fate is propitious. The happy result of the change of bill was to bring the "Zicka" of the ill-starred Diplomacy party out of her retirement, last week, to infuse the Union Square Company with just that fire and verve which they lacked, for, truth to tell, interesting as Miss Rose Osborne is, and pretty and well dressed as Miss Clarke may be, they are both a trifle lackadaisical. They may do the pearly grays and soft tones, but for a genuine dash of strong color give me Jeffreys-Lewis. As "Mlle. Clothilde de Roreraire" in Fernande she is the counterpart in amiability, sweetness, softness, etc., of fiery "Zicka," and as the attending situations are not entirely unlike, I could really have almost fancied myself set back again to that fateful time when Diplomacy became memorable.

Do you remember Fernande? I suppose not, for it is so long since it was played here that it has had time to be forgotten, and yet it is odd that it is such a comparative stranger to the boards, for it has some charming parts. It contains no less than two jealous women, and actresses love to play jealousy as children love to play lady. The jealousy in Fernande is of two vastly different qualities, and the quality of jealousy, as we know, dear Madge, is not strained, neither does it drop like the gentle dew from heaven, but bubbles up like a big geyser from the other place, and what under heaven the horrible thing is good for excepting as dramatic material I know not. Miss Lilian Cleaves Clarke—what a choking, spluttering sort of a name that is!—played the jealous young wife, whose husband being a lawyer naturally has many queer papers about the place. I have a suspicion that the young lady has eyes on Madge when her histrionic future shall have unrolled itself. At all events, she has such an iron-bound, copper-bottomed, triple-plated sort of style and dignity that I was quite amazed when she positively relaxed into humor and made us laugh as merrily as might be. Perhaps undeveloped tragedy is the crudest of all crudeness on the stage, but she has an innate strength which reveals itself even in trivial comedy. She has an exquisite taste in toilets, Madge, not as a dressmaker's advertiser, but that greater refinement of dressing in which the taste and design of the wearer is displayed. I especially admired a white valenciennes over a pink slip, which looked better than it reads, and a curiously contorted leghorn hat.

Jeffreys-Lewis flashed upon us in vivid yellow, set off here and there with a blood-red rose. How is that for a contrast? She had on her most tigerish mood as well, and her stage stride was at its longest. I feared at one critical moment, when she got under full headway, that she would not stop short of San Bruno, but she veered as sharply as a weathercock, and was safely at the right centre, in a telling attitude, by the time I got my breath. You know, Jeffreys-Lewis always does over-play just a little; but then she always gets such a volcanic part that it is perhaps impossible to resist the temptation. One thing is certain, she always gets the sympathy, however naughty a girl she may have been. You must know, Madge, that however French the argument, you must never use a worse word than naughty in the American adaptation. It is not a Cazauresque word, but it conveys the idea so far as they will permit us to get it. Now "Fernande" herself is presented to us almost as a living child of light, and we are only left to guess darkly at the cause of all her abject humiliation and shame.

Miss Rose Osborne is a charming "Fernande" through three acts. In the last, to put the case in Jack's lingo, "she falls down." I can not understand her complete lack of force in the scene of her confession to "André," her husband. She is so thoroughly satisfactory at first, and does not seem to be consuming her entire strength either, that when it fails her at this trying time, and she is simply a weeping baby, it is a disappointment; and one does so resent a disappointment on the stage.

I think I preferred Geo. Clarke's Marquis in Fernande to his Baron in Mother and Son, because he is more essentially a comedian than a melodramatist; but even in Fernande he was a trifle too insouciant in his understanding with "Clothilde." I should not think that even in France a man should be absent-minded while breaking off a connection of years' standing. However, men are queer everywhere, and perhaps this is a bit of nature. But it is just this lack of interest which makes this actor's acting so palpable.

Poor Mrs. Wilkins! She was not allowed one line of comedy. Of course one involuntarily feels duty bound to laugh when she is on, and the effect of this admirable comedienne in a lachrymal monologue was very odd. In fact, as "Mrs. Gibber," would say, we were quite bouleversee. Mr. Bradshaw, the other Union Squarer (they do say he was never on the boards of the Union Square in his life), made up admirably as "Commander Jarbi," the South American, who, so far as I can see, is only introduced for sake of this make-up, and as a matter of detail in the gambling-room. It is a very light comedy part, but it sat heavily on Mr. Bradshaw. We quite missed Fanny Morant, but there was no place for her any more than there was for Mrs. Wilkins, for Mrs. Wilkins, as "Madame Senechal," impressed the fact that she was married at sixteen and had a daughter of twenty. Of course any such statement brings about a little mental arithmetic, and there she sat with her hair as white as winter snows and sixty-five if a day. However, such little things are easily overlooked, and it is a long, long time since we have had anything at the California so enjoyable as Fernande.

And now, Madge, think, oh, think! of dropping from an alleged Union Square Company, from Jeffreys-Lewis, from Sardou, to "Buffalo Bill" and May Cody! Two weeks of the "Histrionic Government Scout and Military Guide." Ach! Claptrapery!

Yet there are those who will enjoy it, and they do say that for their benefit Voegtlin has wrought marvels of woodland beauty and prairie space on canvas; while the realistic effects are to include such small affairs as live horses and mules and yokes of oxen. And then, again, "how sweet are the uses of adversity," those of the company who are unfitted for Sardou will find their true sphere in supporting "Buffalo Bill." Good luck to the season, at all events, for we shall better appreciate what comes after.

At the Baldwin they have been giving the time-worn, beautiful Hunchback; but it is not a drawing play, excepting for a benefit, although with the two Roses it should be attractive.

At the Bush Street Theatre the Hyer Sisters—two young colored girls—are giving a musical entertainment called Out of Bondage. Plot there is none, dialogue there is none. It introduces a family of negroes in the days "befo' de war." They are in the old cabin home, and they sing their sweet, rude, characteristic music in their own peculiar way. How kindred must all primitive music be. We laugh at the queerly interpolated a's in negro music, as in "Rock-a my soul," or "No man can-a hinder me." Yet in our own England did not the balladist write:

"Although I am a country lass,
A lofty mind I bear-a;
I think myself as good as those
That gay apparel wear-a.
My coat is made of comely gray,
Yet is my skin as soft-a
As those that with the choicest wines
Do bathe their bodies oft-a."

And a hundred more of the same sort. Sambo sings, "Didn't my Lord Diver Daniel?" while the basso growls, "Yes, He did; indeed, He did," and so on. Can not you imagine some of our sweet-voiced ancestors "bearing the burden," as they called what the country singing master calls "taking the air." And as the sweet-voiced ancestor sung, some burly, bluff, red-faced, deep-voiced fellow roared the "Hey no nonny," the "Hey down derry," or the "Tol de rol de riddle tol de rol de ri do," which, in the days of ancient music, was the accompaniment to the melody, and not, as now, the chorus.

The Hyer Sisters' entertainment is, as I take it, simply to show the advance of the negro in the science of music. For, at the second stage, they abandon the music of their people and take up the songs of the Christy Minstrels—an artificial growth, sweet in themselves, but spurious melody. Lastly, as a matter of course, they take to drawing-room ballads, to ambitious quartets, to opera, and in opera, of course, to nothing less exacting than the Miserere.

"Of all the operas that Verdi wrote
The best to my taste is Il Trovatore.
And Mario could soothe with a tenor note
The souls in Purgatory."

It would be rather extreme to say that of Wallace King, the tenor of the Hyer troupe; but he really has a pure tenor voice, of which he has no command, for, while some of his notes are of inexpressible sweetness, others rasp like a sile. However, it sounds well in the choruses. Of the Hyer sisters themselves, one has a very sweet and not badly-trained soprano voice, together with the most amusingly affected manner and speech that ever you saw or heard. The girl has evidently taken some stage model, and the result is funny. The other Hyer is tall and good looking—in fact, they are both very pretty—and at first seemed to be rather a clever comedienne, but she lost her sparkle when she put on fine clothes and tried the fine lady, too. She has a nice contralto voice, but they were all, unfortunately, as hoarse as crows.

The feature of the company is Billy Kersands, a natural comic actor. He is of the purest negro type, though not very black, and, strange to say, has a wealth of facial expression. He is simply, naturally, and exuberantly funny. He is a graceful tambourine player, an excellent dancer, and has a perfectly bewildering number of steps. Poor fellow, the moment he got "out of bondage" he got out of business. He was lost in a drawing-room and a dress coat. There was nothing for him to do but sit around and be miserable. In point of fact, he was a "lost Pleiad," and the circumstance would almost seem to point a moral to the race. You see, dear Madge, I end my story according to the obsolete rule of composition with a moral, and as far-fetched a one, I painfully acknowledge, as I ever saw in an old-time story-book. Adieu, dear girl, and think of

Yours ever,

BETSY B.

Next Sunday evening, Julius Kahn, a pupil of Annette Ince, makes his début as "Shylock" in the Merchant of Venice, with Baldwin's Company in the cast. Superior dramatic talent is claimed for Mr. Kahn by his friends, and the general public are invited to a judgment.

There is a pocket telephone stretched across from the house of a young man in Oakland to the window of his sweetheart just opposite. They are to be married soon, and it is a touching sight to watch the little sparrows perch on the string and peck at the taffy as it slides along between their toes.

A recent issue of the Quitman (Ga.) Free Press contains this remarkable obituary: "Died in Quitman, on the 22d inst., a colored man, name unknown. His death was caused by eating poisoned cabbages taken from the garden of the editor of this paper. Requiescat in pace."

THE LATEST PARISIAN BONBONS.

Jenkins is very hard to suit in the matter of restaurants. The other day, after he had finished his dinner at one he had never been in before, he sent for the proprietor.

"Ah, sir! will you permit me to embrace you, and take a heartfelt farewell?"

"Why so, my dear sir?"

"Why so? you miserable old hash-chopper; do you dare ask me why? Because you will never see me again, that's why."

And so saying, he embraced the restaurant man, and walked away with great dignity.

A widow refuses a foppish bore; she is not ready to be married yet, she says.

"Madame, I am your servant. I can wait."

"Oh, well; you look as though you did. At what restaurant, pray?"

There is a good deal of talk about the floods now. The Mayor of one of the districts was asked by a sub-prefect if he had taken all necessary precautions against the rising water in his district.

"Yes," said the Mayor, with a conscientious air of having done his whole duty, showing the other official a row of little tin boxes, all new.

"And what are those for?"

"Oh, those are for collecting the relief for the drowned-out folks."

Here is a profession not included in the industrial statistics. I met Johnson, a very intelligent young fellow, but who hasn't succeeded in making his fortune exactly.

"Where are you going?" said I. "You act as if you were very busy."

"Oh, I'm going to a general meeting of stockholders."

"How is that? You got to be a capitalist?"

"O, not quite that. I've got a first-rate situation. I'm hired to go around and make sham attacks on the directors of different companies, and then they come out with flying colors by answering me so easily."

Scene: A compartment on a railroad train. On one side, M. Grévy, President of the French Republic, is seated in a chair all by himself, a cigar in his hand and his hat on his knee.

Opposite him, on a bench, is M. Gambetta, a traveling robe on his knees, his traveling bag by his side. The scene is entitled "On the express train," and the following dialogue ensues:

Gambetta—"Are you comfortably fixed, my dear Grévy?"

Grévy—"Oh, very comfortably, thank you."

Gambetta—"Nobody crowding you?"

Grévy—"Not the least in the world."

Gambetta—"Then it's a very good place?"

Grévy—"Excellent."

Gambetta—"All right. We'll change places at the next station."

At the lottery. Agent to a woman who persists:

"But, madam, I tell you that you have won nothing."

"Has there not been a change of government? With that we should all have new numbers. Everything ought to commence over again."

"I can understand very well," said Barrien to Marger, "why you do not work after breakfast. You want to digest your food; but why do you not work when you get up?"

"I want to digest my sleep."

We commend to amateur actors, troubled with bad memories, the happy idea of our friend C. Though still a young man, he was to play the father, and the daughter chanced to be a very handsome woman. So when he forgot his part, he could think of nothing better than while holding his "child" to say:

"Kiss your father."

And each time when he felt that his memory was about to fail, he would save himself by crying out:

"Come to my arms, my child."

The husband of the daughter was heard to say that he thought "the author repeated himself very often."

A great French landowner gave an entertainment to his tenantry. The purveying was intrusted to the principal confectioner of the neighboring city. At the conclusion, Mr. X. expressed a hope that everything had been arranged to his lordship's satisfaction.

"Well, Mr. X., it seemed to me that there was a deficiency in the way of sweets—hardly enough tarts and cheese-cakes."

"You know, my lord, all the light things were put on the tables, and I could not foresee that the farmers would eat them with their salmon," replied the confectioner.

A woman cured her husband of staying out late at night by going to the door when he came home and whispering through the keyhole, "Is that you, Willie?" Her husband's name is John, and he stays at home every night now, and sleeps with one eye open and a revolver under his pillow.

Extraordinary, bearing in mind the general depression of business and tendency to economy, has been the sale in England of Mr. Stanley's Through the Dark Continent, issued at the price of two guineas—ten dollars. The book, it is true, is still in its first edition, but this consisted of six thousand copies. The whole of the six thousand copies have been sold by the publishers, Messrs. Sampson Low & Co., and a second edition of one thousand is now being "subscribed"—that is, sent round among the booksellers, each of whom puts down against his name the number of copies he will take. All such copies are taken "firm," to use a financial word. The booksellers in England, whatever they may be elsewhere, are not agents of the publishers, but do business at their own risk. If they can dispose of their purchases to the public, well and good. If not, they must bear the loss.

THRENODY.

I've a letter from thy sire,
Mary Ann, Mary Ann;
And he's just as mad as fire,
Mary Ann, Mary Ann!
And he says if I come higher,
That he'll raise me ten times higher
Than the German Methodist spire,
Mary Ann, Mary Ann!
If to win thee I aspire,
Mary Ann!

Oh, I dread to see his fa-hace,
Mary Ann, Mary Ann;
For I know he'll give me cha-hase,
Mary Ann, Mary Ann!
He will waltz me round the room,
He will fan me with the broom,
Yes, I safely may assume,
Mary Ann, Mary Ann!
That he'll fire me out the roo-hoom,
Mary Ann

I'm so scared I can not sleep,
Mary Ann, Mary Ann;
For I'm struck all of a hee-heap,
Mary Ann, Mary Ann!
He is coming after me!
Blood in both his eyes I see,
Oh, wherever shall I flee-hee?
Mary Ann, Mary Ann!
He will make hot for me-he,
Mary Ann!

—Burlington Hawkeye.

The strange happenings of this eventful week have been numerous. Detroit has had a variation of the common foreign count matrimonial episode—the husband running away with the bride's money and jewelry, but proving, after all, to be a real count. A young woman engaged a section in a sleeping-car at Pittsburg, blithely explaining that she would be joined by a husband at Harrisburg. When the train arrived at Harrisburg a young man got aboard with a clergyman, who married him to the purchaser of the section, and the honeymoon tour was at once commenced. A rustic couple dashed into a Washington oyster saloon, and implored the proprietor to get them married as soon as possible. They had eloped, and parents were on their track. The oyster-man not only summoned a Justice to tie the knot, but provided stew for the party after the ceremony. Miss Locke married Mr. Aiken in Denver, Col., upon the assurance that he was, as she phrases it, "a wealthy Christian gentleman;" but within four days she learned that he was a professional horse-thief, and parted from him. Miss Ruggan's wedding day was appointed in Clerburne, Texas, and she made herself ready; but in the morning she received a note from her faithless lover, inviting her to come and see his marriage to another girl. She committed suicide.

Nearly sixty years since, Delabarre, the noted French dentist and writer on dental topics, believed it possible to extract an unhealthy tooth, remove the unsound part, and put it back in the socket, and that it would grow into its place. Experiment after experiment proved him to be right. Since then the matter has received very little attention, and, in truth, seemed forgotten, despite its importance, until Magitot, another Paris physician, has lately taken it up. He has made a long and serious study of it, and divides the grafting of the dental organs into extracting teeth and putting them back after a certain time, and drawing teeth from one person and placing them in the mouth of another. Toothache arises from abscess at the root, decay of the bone, inflammation of the surrounding membrane, disease of the gums, or other causes. Magitot has repeatedly done what Delabarre had done before. Out of sixty-two operations, he has succeeded completely in fifty-seven—a proportion of about ninety-two per cent. While reintegration is going on some local reaction is caused, but not enough to affect to any degree the general system. Small boils or abscesses form on the gums, and when they have run their course leave the healing and restoring process complete within a week or a fortnight. If the attempt fail, inflammation ejects the tooth in a day or two. The age of the patient is said to have no effect on the result, and teeth of every kind may be drawn and replaced.

The firm of Carter & Cavin, sugar refiners in Osceola, Kentucky, was dissolved by mutual consent. The partner's had disagreed in consequence of Carter's wife quitting him and marrying Cavin, and the work of settling up their accounts was accomplished with difficulty. "Is everything satisfactory?" Cavin asked, when the books had been closed. "Yes, all that relates to the business," Carter answered; "but there is an account still to be balanced. You've got my wife, and I'll take your life in payment," and he shot Carter dead.

An old man in far off Montana,
Who tried to gulp down a banana;
But it stuck in his throat,
And he straightway did float
To the land where they holler Hosanna!

A Vermont woman sold her two-year old daughter for $25. A high price, considering that daughters of eighteen years and upward are given away. And a bachelor, who lately died in Manchester, England, left his property to the thirty women who had refused his matrimonial offers. He said in his will that to their refusals he owed the peace he had enjoyed during life, and that he felt himself their debtor. And the old duffer was right.

When George Washington was six years old, his father made him a present of a little hatchet, et cetera. "George," said his father, "who has destroyed this cherry tree?" "Father," said the noble lad, "I can not tell a lie; the hired man saw me do it." "Come—" etc.

A kind word is asked for the Lancaster (Penn.) Weekly Bean, a little paper established for the benefit of the soup-house in that city, and that, in its thirteen weeks of existence, has netted a considerable sum to the fund. It already has a large number of brown-bread subscribers.

A Nevada girl wrote to her lover: "Dear Jimmy: Its all up. We ain't going to get married. Ma says you're too rough, and I guess she's right. I'm so sorry. But can't you go to Europe and get filed down?" Jimmy filed down and out.

The owner of a Chicago peanut stand has formally gone into bankruptcy.

A row recently occurred in an Episcopal theological seminary in which young men are trained for the ministry, near Poughkeepsie, New York. Some of them went on a sleighing party and afterward had a supper, at which several got drunk. Subsequently, another student, through whom the affair reached the knowledge of the Faculty, was put under a pump. Then there was a "free fight," in which chairs were used; then there was a secession of a large number because others were not expelled, in spite of the advice of the Faculty to forget the past and apply themselves to their studies with renewed vigor. When one considers that these gentlemen are actually preparing to be teachers of religion, and are presumably of tolerably mature age, the willingness of the Faculty to do another day's work on them strikes one as rather odd. It is difficult to believe that any body of professors, however able, could truly prepare them for orders within any reasonable period.

An obliging spirit prompted the Jersey farmer who put a two-pound whetstone in every turkey he sent to the New York market. He knew the buyers would find the stones indispensable when it came to carving the fowls.

Mary Clemmer says that in a certain circle of Washington society the cry is, "The White House is too stupid for me. Wait till the Grante come back. Then we shall see elegance."

A woman in New York says that when her husband is a little drunk he kicks her, and that when he is very drunk she kicks him; and she adds that she does most of the kicking.

The Detroit Free Press is of the opinion that a life of Beecher, written by himself, would be a "naughty biography."

O God, show compassion on the wicked. The virtuous have already been blessed by Thee in being virtuous.

An elegant assortment of gold watches and chains at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

Wanted, a copy of the ARGONAUT of November 3, 1877 (Vol. I, No. 33).

Dr. E. O. Cochrane, Dentist, No. 850 Market Street, corner of Stockton (over drug store), San Francisco. Office hours, from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M.

Artistic novelties, manufactured from California quartz, at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

STERLING SILVERWARE.—A large assortment of elegant designs at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

Modern Artists' Etchings, 22 Montgomery Street.

FITCH vs. INGERSOLL!

The eloquent Honorable Tom Fitch will answer Bob Ingersoll, in the Metropolitan Temple, next Tuesday evening, March 25th. This is a lawyer's and worldling's answer to the talented and audacious skeptic, and is most magnificently done. It is Greek meeting Greek. It is Ingersoll, as it were, "hoist by his own petard." It will be the greatest treat of the kind ever enjoyed in this city. Admission, 25 cents; reserved seats, 25 cents extra. For sale at the Temple and Kohler & Chase's music store, 137 Post Street.

WM. H. RULOFSON

The only Photographer of the Name,

FOR MANY YEARS WITH BRADLEY & RULOFSON (previous to Mr. Bradley's retirement and Mr. Rulofson's decease), desires to state that having become interested in the popular

Elite

STUDIO,

838 Market Street,

He is prepared to make for his friends and patrons the

VERY FINEST

PHOTOGRAPHS

Ever made in San Francisco,

AT ONE-THIRD LESS PRICE THAN CHARGED BY OTHER FIRST-CLASS GALLERIES.

STANDARD THEATRE.

Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.

M. B. LEAVITT.....MANAGER.

MATINEE TO DAY AT 2 P. M.

This (Saturday) evening, March 22d, and every evening until further notice, the

GENUINE PARISIAN CAN-CAN,
A truthful representation of the Jardin Mabille, superior to anything of the kind ever seen in this city.

Last three performances of the great French comedy of
OUR INNOCENT PASTOR.

Living Art Pictures. The Loveliest Formed Woman in the World, introducing the beautiful Living Almeh, in addition to the dashing blondes and brunettes,

MME. RENTZ MINSTRELS

—AND—

MABEL SANTLEY'S

ENGLISH BURLESQUE COMBINATION.

Monday even'g, March 24, the greatest bill yet offered. The FEMALE BATHERS, the spicy comedy of FORBIDDEN PLEASURES, and last week of the Can-can.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

Monday, March 24, and every evening including Sunday, and Wednesday and Saturday Matinees.

MATINEE TO-DAY AT 2 P. M.

A Decided Success.—Notable Musical Event.—Only Colored Operatic Singers in the World, the talented and accomplished

HYERS SISTERS COMBINATION

In their novel Musical Drama, entitled

OUT OF BONDAGE,

Or FROM THE COTTON FIELD TO THE OPERA,
From Slavery to Freedom!

Fourteen Artists, with the Prince of Ethiopian Comedians,

BILLY KERSANDS,

And the great Female Impersonator,

WILLIE LYLE.

Seats at the Box Office.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER,
F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER,
CHAS. H. GOODWIN.....TREASURER

ENORMOUS SUCCESS OF
ROSE EYTINGE.

This (Saturday) matinee,

THE HUNCHBACK.

This (Saturday) evening, March 22,

OLIVER TWIST.

Monday, March 24th, third week of the engagement of

ROSE EYTINGE,

In her new play written expressly for her by Charles Reade and H. J. Byron,

A WOMAN'S LIFE.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLER.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

Commencing Monday, March 24, Engagement for a limited season of the illustrious Government Scout and popular Military Guide,

BUFFALO BILL

(HON. W. F. CODY),

In his new and refined sensational drama, written expressly for him by Major A. S. Burt, U. S. A., entitled

MAY CODY, OR LOST AND WON

The Western Scouts and United States Indian Interpreters, the BURGESS BROTHERS, PACHA-RISK-Y, the White Boy-chief of the Pawnees, the youngest chief of which any record is given among the entire Indian Nations.

MR. C. A. BURGESS, Sioux and Pawnee Interpreter, who recently accompanied a noted Indian chief Joseph to Washington in his council with President Hayes and Cabinet.

During the encampment scene, BUFFALO BILL will give an exhibition of Fancy Rifle Shooting, in which he is acknowledged pre-eminent and unrivaled, and the Interpreters will execute a number of War Dances, Songs, etc. Only MAY CODY Matinee Saturday.

In preparation, KNIGHT OF THE PLAINS.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER,
F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.

ANNOUNCEMENT EXTRAORDINARY.

Sunday evening, March 23d, for this night only, Debut of

MASTER JULIUS KAHN,

(Eighteen years of age), pupil of Miss ANNETTE INCE, when he will appear as

SHYLOCK

In Shakspeare's beautiful play entitled

THE MERCHANT OF VENICE,

Supported by the full strength of the Baldwin legitimate company.

Box Office now open.

NEW BOOKS

Notes of a Naturalist on the "Challenger." H. N. Mosley.....$7 50
Speeches and Reports on Finance and Taxation. John Sherman.....2 50
Boston Monday Lectures. Heredity. Jos. Cook.....1 50
Education as a Science. Alexander Bain.....1 75
Mrs. Browning's Poems. Red Line Series. New.....1 25
Englishmen of Letters. Deloe.....75
American Authors. Washington Irving.....1 00
The New Puritan—New England 200 Years Ago.....1 00
James S. Pike.....1 00
Poems of Places. Edited by Longfellow. Middle States.....1 00
Railway Laws by Railway Men. C. L. Bunney.....50
Cleanings of Past Years. Wm. E. Chubstone. 2 vols. 2 00
Sir Gibbie. George MacDonald. Paper.....75
Thomas Carlyle. His Life, His Books, His Theories. 30
Fairy Tales. Their Origin and Meaning.....25
John, or Our Chinese Relations. Thos. W. Knox. 20
Harper's Half Hour Series.....20
Goldsmith's Plays. Harper's Half Hour Series.....25
Modern France. Harper's Half Hour Series.....20
Journal of the Plague in London. Daniel Defoe.....10
Franklin Square.....75
All or Nothing. Franklin Square.....15
QUEEN ANNE BOOK CASES FOR SALE.

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,

NOS. 3 AND 5 MONTGOMERY STREET.

FAMILIES

LEAVING THE CITY.

FURNITURE, TRUNKS, PIANOS,

Pictures, Carpets, etc., stored and taken care of (not necessary to pack them). Parlor Sets, Carpets, and Blankets aired once a month. Trunks stored separate, for parties to have free access to them. We have the best facilities for storage, having built our warehouses expressly for it. Don't pay rent or interest, and can afford to store goods low. Advances made, insurance effected, and reference given. Please send postal card, and we will call and give estimate for storage, etc.
H. WINDEL & CO.,
Principal Office, 310 Stockton St., bet. Post and Sutter,
Corner Stockton Place, San Francisco.

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD

Tourist Season, 1879.

Excursions to Mount Shasta and Cloud River.

GENERAL PASSENGER AND TICKET DEPT.,
San Francisco, March 13, 1879.

FOR THE SPECIAL ACCOMMODATION of Tourists and Sportsmen, special arrangements have been made with the C. & O. C. L. Stage Company, whereby we will be able to place on sale during the season, commencing May 1st (near), at our offices in San Francisco and Sacramento, SPECIAL EXCURSION TICKETS—contract limited to thirty (30) days from day of sale, at the following rates for the round trip:

Miles from Reading.	To Station named and Return.	From S. F.	From Sacramento
22	U. S. Fishery—Allen's.....	$24.50	$19.50
44	Slate Creek.....	28.50	23.50
54	Southern's.....	30.80	25.80
64	Lower Soda Springs.....	32.80	27.80
65	Castle Rock.....	33.00	28.00
69	Upper Soda Springs.....	33.80	28.80
77	Strawberry Valley—Sisson's.....	35.40	30.40

NOTES.—The U. S. Fishery is on the Cloud River, at the only point where that stream is touched by the stage road, and is two miles below the hotel at Allen's Station.

Slate Creek, Southern's, Lower Soda Springs, Castle Rock, and Upper Soda Springs are on the Sacramento River.

Strawberry Valley (Sisson's) is at the base of Mt. Shasta. At Sisson's Upper and Lower Soda Springs, guides and horses are provided for Excursions to the summit of Mt. Shasta, and to the Salmon and Trout Fishing Stations and Deer Licks on the headwaters of the Cloud River.

T. H. GOODMAN,

General Passenger and Ticket Agent.

WM. F. SMITH, M. D.,
OCULIST, 313 BUSH STREET.
Office hours, from 12 M. to 3 P. M.

922 POST STREET.

MME. B. ZEITSKA'S FRENCH,

German, and English Institute for Young Ladies—

with

KINDERGARTEN

For children from three to six years of age.
The next term of this well known Institute (established since 1873) will commence on MONDAY, March 24th, 1879. For catalogue and particulars, address
MME. B. ZEITSKA, Principal.

B. F. STERETT, PRINTER
532 CLAY ST. SAN FRANCISCO

WILLIAM M. PIERSON,

ATTORNEY AT LAW.
Mento Street.

POUR LES DAMES.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—The women are always divided at this particular season between two rival interests: what to make and how to make it. There is such a delightful variety of new materials, and such a corresponding choice in novel styles this year, that the task is positively bewildering. In heavier fabrics, such as are always possible for wear in this climate, brocaded silks, especially in combination with satin, will be exceedingly popular. Cheviots and mohairs, for more ordinary wear, will be found very useful, as well as capable of charming combinations with lighter and darker shades, and fine pipings of silk and satin. In silks for summer wear expressly, the foulards, in flower sprig designs, promise to become fashionable, more particularly the darker shades, French gray, wood brown, bronze and greens, and navy blues. The Panama tweed is something new. It is a light, loosely woven woolen goods, made in checks of three or four threads each way, and comes in tan, beige, and gray and white. The cheviot striped goods have two shades of the same color, and twilled. Zephyr armures, resembling crape, are also serviceable and pretty. Many of these light woolens are shown in the new shade known as gendarme blue, a rather light tone, though, for street use; darker shades always being preferable for this purpose. Among other novelties may be mentioned the Chuddah cloths, in camel's hair, which are so very much sought after in blacks, the Chuddah stripe being the fine, herring-bone line that is seen in so many variety of fabrics this year. Light shades of cashmeres, marked with bands of satin moiré, make up beautifully in the long sacques called matinées, that are almost entirely superseding the old style morning wrappers. The chintz satteens and foulards, in similar designs, are used for these matinées as well, the trimming most used for the cashmeres being plaitings of Boston lace. A propos of this favorite garniture, the imitation, in which the darning is done by machinery so perfectly as to make the deception almost impossible of detection, and the similarity in color and irregularity of mesh equally excellent, is being largely introduced. The demand for both real and imitation is so great that the supply is said to be frequently entirely exhausted before a fresh lot can be manufactured. This is the cause of the fluctuation in the price which sometimes perplexes shoppers. Among the new flannel-finished fabrics is one called beige de sauté, a sleazy goods in single color, most often the popular tan shade or French gray, sometimes in the invisible check pattern. It will take the place of the buntings worn for the three past seasons, and will be better liked, as it is much less stiff and wiry. The Louisien silks are loosely woven and very soft in texture. The colors are bright, and the designs the rococo patterns of the Pompadour school, stripes of colors on cream, gray, or white grounds, alternate ones being repped and dotted with rosebuds, while the intermediate ones have a satin-like lustre. The Bandana plaids are reproduced in these silks with excellent effect, the plaids being small but very bright, two shades of blue, with olive and old gold, or green, garnet, and white being favorite combinations. Invisible checks, too, are much liked, and will be largely used for street suits this spring. As to the style for making up, the "Tailleur" suit, hardly more than introduced last season, is destined to be very popular; and where this rather severe style is not adopted, the other extreme of increased fullness about the hips and a tendency to the bouffant fashion that reigned not long ago, is plainly perceptible. Street skirts are still worn short—very short, indeed; and, while the overskirt has many friends, a more convenient model is the plain skirt trimmed to simulate an overdress. With a polonaise the "bee's wing" drapery is frequently added in the back, or the front and side gores are so plaited as to resemble panniers, which are slightly stiffened by crinoline lining. For the heavier cloths, that are used for early spring suits, it is a pretty style to have the underskirt trimmed with flat plaits—when not made perfectly plain—and the overskirt looped up on the hips with straps drawn through handsome buckles. A basque and vest is the proper waist to go with this jaunty costume. Vests are especially pretty this spring, the newest fancy being to fasten the basque over them just at the waist line by two or three buttons, the upper and lower portion of the latter garment being cut away en revers, above and below, to show the vest, which is invariably made to button the whole length. A colored skirt or Balmoral has become almost an indispensable of a lady's toilet, and very pretty ones can be made at a very slight expense by a combination of gray mohair and black velvet ribbon. The trimmings consist of one or two plaited flounces of the material headed by a band of the ribbon. The skirt must be cut very short and narrow.

New bonnets are, in some respects, revivals of old shapes, verifying the saying that "there is nothing new under the sun." Grandmamma's poke is the model, and the more dressed one is the bigger and pokier must the bonnet be, the brim not only reaching forward but upward, and having a facing of shirred silk or satin or plaiting of India muslin, all of which must be so laid on as to begin an inch at least from the edge of the brim, which is never wired. Light-colored satins, as cream and tea rose, are much used for these face linings, though to many complexions the darker colors are more becoming, Prince of Wales red, garnet, bottle-green, and gendarme blue being special favorites. Bows of large loops are fastened low down at the back of the crown, and from the centre spring two or three long ostrich feathers, that curl up over the side and encircle the front. The close cottage bonnet has the same facings, and full wreaths of flowers are placed around the crown, or the three-cluster feathers, known as the "Prince of Wales," are used, with the addition of loosely knotted loops of satin ribbon. Straw beads, strung in fringes or made into garlands, as well as tinsel garlands, dusted with silver or gold, are among the newest ornaments. White crystal, for light or white bonnets, and jet for black, seem to be the most popular so far of those styles of trimming. The latter are made of the plain Brussels net, laid smoothly over the frame, and the most distingué models show jet ornaments, black feathers, and black Breton lace as the sole trimmings. When colors are used, however, they are tea, old gold, or Prince of Wales red. For evenings and receptions, young ladies wear small turbans or toques of fancy color silk, with soft crowns and scarfs twisted round them, usually finishing them with a cluster of ostrich tips or a marabout pompon.

The hideous turban that Madame de Staël made the fashion is increasing in favor as a house cap, silk handkerchiefs or Algerian scarfs making the prettiest. Very good matches for any material and color can now be found in the great variety of these handkerchiefs now in the market. Even very young ladies wear breakfast caps, if only in the form of an Alsatian bow on top of the head. For morning wear are also the Chuddah shawls; the most desirable having gray, red, or cream-colored centres. The colored Chuddahs are always relatively better than the black ones. New Hamburg embroideries show novel designs, among them the Gothic points, that have a vine up each point, which is made to lap over so as to form the top of each plait, and is used for trimming sacques and wrappers. Greek patterns, arabesques, etc., on open squares, are the corresponding novelties in insertions. Breton lace and India muslin form the staple attractions in neck wear. The Louis Quatorze jabots are very dressy, and are made up in Maltese, Valenciennes, and Breton laces. Very handsome Breton scarfs can be made by sewing two pieces of broad lace together on the plain edges. A plaiting of the same finishes the ends. The new linen collars are of the English shape, with turnover collars and long chemisette fronts. The edges are bound with strips of satteen half an inch wide on each side, and the same extends down the front of the chemisette, which is fastened at the throat by a single gold button. The cuffs to match are square cornered. White linen vests are something very fresh and pretty. They are made of fine linen, embroidered and finished with plaited frills of lace. Cuffs come to match, and the whole set is intended to wear with black silk dresses or summer costumes. White waists are made shirred and plaited; in the latter style, a fichu is formed of plaiting and laid from shoulder to waist.

LILIAS DUBOIS.

No man, says the Westminster Review, ever earned for himself by means of the pen a more sinister reputation than Niccolò Machiavelli. It requires a good deal of villainy to secure a man an immortality of obloquy, but that Machiavelli achieved. His name has passed into many languages as a term of reproach. It has been said that we ourselves have derived a familiar name for the devil from his Christian name, and an epithet for a false and faithless schemer from his surname. No man ever did so much for the vocabulary of abuse. But all this was done by the little Florentine with the "gentle disposition," by means of his pen. His works have produced profound sensation in high quarters. They have been condemned by a pope, interdicted by a council of the church, and refuted by a king. They have come under the gifted hands of great critics and the foul fingers of the common hangman. Never did a few reams of paper, and a few volumes of lucid prose, make such a stir in the over-righteous world. Never were such heaps of abuse piled upon the memory of a mere writer as those which have monumented the infamy of this useful servant of the republic of Florence, who wrote The Prince. * * * We find that Machiavelli, while he was not illustrious among his contemporaries, was yet respected and trusted by them, and that he has only been condemned by posterity, that his cross-grained performances in literature caused no very particular sensation in his own days and in his own country, but that they have been loathed and abhorred by succeeding generations and distant nations. Another thing is certain, and that is, that Machiavelli is not the man to be dismissed from notice with a puff of scorn, as some critics have supposed. He has not been relegated to obscurity by the papal interdict. The refutation which Frederick the Great gave to the world, as antidote to that bane, The Prince, when he was about to wield a sceptre instead of a pen, got little credit for its author, and added nothing to the discredit of its subject. Even now Machiavelli attracts the interest and curiosity of many, and well deserves the careful and useful study even of our own days. * * * It was when fortune turned her back upon Machiavelli that he began to write those enduring works, those heinous books, which have been such a puzzle to posterity, and which have earned for Machiavelli two reputations. For he is not only blamed as one of the worst men of a bad time, but is praised as one of the best and ablest which the prolific and redundant age of the Renaissance produced. It was in this time of obscurity that Machiavelli wrote The Prince, which is in itself one of the prime curiosities of literature. How Machiavelli, who was a friend of liberty, should write a work with the view of teaching that principalities are to be governed and maintained by mendacity and fraud, that morality is a consideration altogether apart from statecraft, and that the worst rule is justified by the success of its sway and excused by the treachery of the mob, is a question which has been asked ever since criticism came to be more than a pope's bull or the interdict of a council. It is a question which will trouble candid people centuries hence.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—The writer was much impressed with the ARGONAUT of the sentiment contained in Mr. Pickering's editorial which was copied in your paper lately. She has tried to make up a little verse to express the same idea, but is not sure about the feet (don't you call them?), and would you please be so kind, if the lines are not too awfully bad, to print them in your next number? I want my little boy to learn them, but he doesn't read writing yet (he's only four years old, but a very clever child for his age), and your types are so nice and plain, like the print of the family Bible that Willie is so fond of. No doubt there are a great many other mothers that would like to teach it to their children (that is, if you think it will do—I mean the way I have written it). This is the little editorial, and the little verse comes after it:

"WE DO NOT PREJUDGE.—We shall not prejudice the new Constitution in advance. The people must read it carefully, and then they will be able to determine what will be best. This is the policy which the Call intends to pursue. That course which the best interests of the people require is what should be done."

Prejudge not, in advance,
The course that should be done;
That which is best (perchance)
To do, that (may be) is the one,

MARY.

John Chinaman's remark to Brother Jonathan at this time is: "Why this coldness on your partee; alle same, me coolie, too."

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAVORITES.

The Dance of the Dead.

The sexton looked forth, at the mid hour of night,
O'er the tombs where the dead were reclining;
The moon, at its full, gave a great, ghostly light,
And the churchyard as day was shining.
First one, then another—oh, terrible sight!
Each grave opened wide, and, in gowns long and white,
The dead all arose from their sleeping.
Round the tombs grimly dancing and leaping.

In a skeleton ring, then, together they hung,
While they danced as the waves of the ocean—
The poor and the rich, and the old and the young—
But their grave clothes hindered their motion;
And, as here no modesty held its broad sway,
They all shook them off, and around them there lay
Their winding-sheets, here and there scattered,
And they naked—but that little mattered.

In a frenzy of joy then they swung their long shanks,
Their long fingers in unison snapping,
And they clicked and they clacked as they played their wild pranks,
As though timber on timber were clapping.
Then the sexton laughed loudly again and again,
And mischief gave slyly the thought to his brain:
"Now quickly—'tis joking, not thieving—Steal a winding-sheet! None are perceiving."

It was done; and then swiftly he fled in affright
Behind the great door of the tower,
While the dance still continued, the moonbeams bright
O'er the weird scene still holding their power.
At last it was o'er, and the skeleton crowd,
One after another, each slipped on its shroud;
Then into their cold graves they glided,
And silence once more presided.

But one—'tis the last—trips and stumbles along,
And eager each tombstone it scratches;
But none of its comrades have done it this wrong.
For the scent in the air now it catches.
The church gate it rattled, but backward was pressed;
To the joy of the sexton, the door had been blessed—
With crosses of iron 'twas covered,
And angels' wings over it hovered.

Its shroud it must have, else it rests not again,
For soon its last hour will be chiming!
The columns it grasps the high tow'r to attain,
From summit to summit still climbing,
Oh, sad for the sexton, for swifter it glides,
And onward it rushes in wonderful strides!
O mischief! 'tis thou hast undone him;
Heaven help him! 'tis almost upon him.

The sexton grew pale, in his horror he shook,
And the shroud would have yielded with gladness;
Near, nearer it came, then its last leap it took
In a frenzy of rage and of madness.
For an instant the moon no longer shone;
"One!" thundered the clock in a terrible tone;
Its limbs through the air wildly dashing,
Down—down—fell the skeleton, crashing!

—From the German of Goethe.

The Poet-Laureate.

It is not a hundred years (says a writer in Truth) since a well-dressed gentleman rode up to the gate of a pleasant-looking residence in the Isle of Wight. "Is Mr. Tennyson at home?" he demanded of the Buttons who answered the bell. "I'll see, sir, if you'll give me your card," replied the boy. "Never mind my card," replied the gentleman; "I am the Prince of Wales." "Oh, I dare say!" was the youth's irreverent rejoinder. But it proved to be the Heir-Apparent, and no doubt Buttons spent a bad quarter of an hour that day. The poor boy, however, was not so much to blame, for a smart Yankee reporter would scarcely have hesitated to assume the most august of pseudonyms in order to interview the greatest of English poets, and Mr. Tennyson's orders in reference to the admission of visitors are of the strictest kind. He has more than Wordsworth's horror of tourists, and is equally inaccessible to neighbors. The fact is, like other mortal men, he prefers to choose his own company, though a letter of introduction will always insure the most courteous of receptions. But Mr. Tennyson can be much more than courteous with a sympathetic person; he can be the most charming of companions. Lounging in a comfortable arm-chair and smoking his pipe—he is a great smoker—the Laureate will talk on any and every subject, and equally well on all. Though perfectly unaffected, he can not help revealing the poet every now and then by some remark which is of almost puzzling originality, and—must one add?—impracticability.

In politics Mr. Tennyson is a Liberal; in religion he may be described as a Broad Churchman—very broad—but with the keenest sense of the beauty of what our German cousins would call the Christian Mythos. In literature his tastes are far more correct than those of many famous poets. He sincerely loves the great masters, Shakespeare, Milton, Scott. Among Greek poets, one gathers that Homer is his favorite; among Roman, Lucretius. For his poem on the latter in Macmillan he received a guinea a line, or some three hundred in all—not a bit too much. Albeit, Dryden was paid but £250 for 10,000 lines.

Genus irritabile vatum. The Laureate's irritability, however, is generally of the right kind—a noble rage, because the right thing is not being done or said. He is no respecter of persons. A lady of very high rank indeed (almost the highest) was once reading "Locksley Hall" aloud in the presence of the author, who suddenly jumped up impatiently and snatched the book out of her hand, saying: "That's not the way to read it." He then declaimed the verses himself. "I call that shouting it," was the lady's comment.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, March 23, 1879.

Potato Soup.
Boiled Salmon, Sauce Poquette (see Vol. III, No. 9).
Breaded Lamb Chops, Tomato Sauce.
Green Peas. Sweet Potatoes.
Roast Veal, with new Potatoes baked in gravy.
Cress Salad.
Omelette with Preserves.
Orange Cake.
Fruit-bowl of Oranges, Bananas, Nuts, and Raisins.

TO MAKE OMELETTE WITH PRESERVES.—Beat into a basin eight eggs, with three desertsful of powdered sugar. Beat well. Melt three ounces of butter in a frying-pan; add the eggs and cook as you would an ordinary omelette. When it is set, fill the inside with four spoonfuls of currant jelly, fold in, turn into a dish, shaping nicely. Sprinkle with sugar, glaze with a hot iron, and serve quickly.

COMMERCIAL
INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALIF.,
FIRE AND MARINE.
Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.
JOHN H. WISE, President.
CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT
— AND —
INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE
CASH ASSETS.....$450,000
Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco
OFFICERS:
A. J. BRYANT, President,
RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President,
CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary,
H. H. WATSON, Marine Surveyor

ALASKA COMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 SANSOME STREET,
WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.
J. C. MERRILL & CO.
SHIPPING
— AND —
COMMISSION MERCHANTS,
Agents for the
SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET
LINES.
204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST. - - San Francisco.

CALABASAS LAND AND MINING COMPANY.

DIRECTORS.
JOHN P. JONES,
JOHN CURREY,
EUGENE L. SULLIVAN,
GEORGE C. PERKINS,
CHARLES P. SYKES.
THE CALABASAS LAND AND
Mining Company are now prepared to offer special inducements to capitalists or actual settlers for a profitable investment in their attractive town site and mine, situated in the Santa Cruz Valley, in that portion of Southern Arizona acknowledged by all sanitary and descriptive writers to be the ITALY OF AMERICA.
For full particulars and description, send for Prospectus,
or apply at the Company's office, 32 Merchants' Exchange,
San Francisco

LITTLE BELMONT FOR SALE.

THIS BEAUTIFUL SUBURBAN
property, situated contiguous to the Belmont Mansion, twenty-seven miles from San Francisco, on the San Jose Railroad, is offered for rent or sale at reasonable terms.
The property is located in a beautiful valley, with a gl' mpe view of the Bay; contains thirty acres of land, highly improved, with fruit and ornamental trees. The residence is new, spacious, and elegant, with all modern improvements.
It has a detached cottage for servants, with laundry room
and offices; a stable with six stalls, carriage house, cow houses for thoroughbred stock, chicken house, grounds un-derlaid with water-pipe; outhouses provided with gas; gas
and water furnished from the works of larger Belmont;
water free. The residence and cottage are furnished with all fixed articles, such as book cases, armchairs, billiard table,
range, kitchen and dining-room furniture, floors carpeted,
rooms filled with attractive engravings, all of which will be disposed of with the property and at a low price. A bargain is offered in this property, and if not sold will be rented at a moderate figure for a summer residence. For particulars, inquiry may be made at the ARGONAUT office, No. 522 California Street.

R. P. & H. N. CLEMENT,
ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,
Nos. 2, 3 and 4, SHERMAN'S BUILDING,
Montgomery Street, N. E. corner of Clay, San Francisco
(P. O. Box 770)

COMMENCING MONDAY, NOV. 18, 1878.
Passenger trains will leave San Francisco, from Passenger Depot on Townsend Street, between Third and Fourth, as follows:
8.30 A. M. DAILY for San Jose, Gilroy, Hollister,
Tres Pinos, Pajaro, Salinas, Soledad, and all Way
Stations. At Pajaro, the Santa Cruz R. R. connects with this train for Aptos and Santa Cruz. At Salinas the
M. & S. V. R. connects with this train for Monterey.
STAGE connections made with this train.

10.40 A. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.
3.30 P. M. DAILY (Sundays excepted) for Gilroy, and
Way Stations.
4.40 P. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.
6.30 P. M. DAILY for Menlo Park and Way Stations.

The extra Sunday train to San Jose and Way Stations is discontinued for the Winter season.
EXCURSION TICKETS to San Jose and intermediate points and return sold on Saturdays and Sunday mornings.
Good for return until following MONDAY, inclusive.
A. C. BASSETT, H. R. JUDAH,
Superintendent. Asst. Pass. & Tkt. Agt.

SOUTHERN DIVISIONS.
Passengers for points on the Southern Divisions of the road will take the cars of the Central Pacific Railroad
via OAKLAND, leaving SAN FRANCISCO via Ferry Landing, Market Street, at 4.00 P. M. daily (Arizona Express Train), and making close connection at GOSHEN for Sumner, Mohave, LOS ANGELES, Wilmington, Anaheim, Colton, Colorado River, YUMA, and Stanwi- (85 miles east from Yuma).

SAN FRANCISCO AND NORTH PACIFIC R. R.
Commencing Monday, November 11, 1878, and until further notice, Boats and Trains will leave San Francisco:
(Ticket Office, Washington Street Wharf.)
3.00 P. M., DAILY, Sundays included,
Steamer "James M. Donahue" (Washington Street Wharf), connecting with Mail and Express Train at Donahue for Delahue, Santa Rosa, Healdsburg, Cloverdale, and way stations. Making stage connection at Lakeville for Sonoma; at Geyserville for Skaggs Springs, at Cloverdale for Ukiah, Lakeport, Mendocino City, and the GEYSERS.
Connections made at Fulton on the following morning for Korb's, Guerneville, and the Redwoods (Sundays excepted).
(Arrive at San Francisco 10.30 A. M.)
Freight received from 7 A. M. to 2.30 P. M. daily (except Sunday).
TICKET OFFICE, WASHINGTON STREET WHARF.
ARTHUR HUGHES, Gen. Manager. A. A. BEAN, Sup't.
P. E. DOUGHERTY, Gen. Pass. and Tkt. Agent.

OCCIDENTAL AND ORIENTAL STEAMSHIP COMPANY
— FOR —
JAPAN AND CHINA,
Leave Wharf, Cor. First and Brannan Streets, at noon, for
YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG.
Connecting at Yokohama with steamers for Shanghai,
GAELIC, OCEANIC, BELGIO.
March.....22 April.....16
May.....16 June.....17 July.....15
August.....13 September.....16 October.....15
November.....13 December.....16
Cabin plans on exhibition and Passenger Tickets for sale at No. 2 Montgomery Street.
For freight apply to Geo. H. Rice, Freight Agent, at the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's Wharf, or No. 218
California Street.
T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Passenger Agent.
LELAND STANFORD, President.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP CO.
First-class steamers with unequaled accommodations for passengers will leave San Francisco:
FOR YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG,
On the 1st of every month.
FOR SYDNEY AND AUCKLAND, via HONOLULU,
January 20, February 17, March 17, April 14, May 12, June 9, July 7, August 4, September 1,
September 29, October 27, November 24, December 22, and every fourth week
thereafter.

FOR NEW YORK, via PANAMA, CENTRAL AMER-ICAN, MEXICAN, and SOUTH AMERICAN
PORTS, HAVANA, and all WEST IN-DIA PORTS, on the 5th and 20th of each month.
FOR VICTORIA, B. C., PUGET SOUND PORTS,
and PORTLAND, OREGON, on the 10th,
20th, and 30th of each month.
WILLIAMS, BLANCHARD & CO., Agents,
Corner First and Brannan Streets.

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.
Steamers of this Company will sail from Broadway wharf
for PORTLAND (Oregon), every five days, direct, and for
LOS ANGELES, SANTA BARBARA, SANTA CRUZ,
SAN DIEGO, SAN LUIS OBISPO, and other Northern and Southern Coast Ports, leaving San Francisco about every third day.
For day and hour of sailing, see the Company's advertisement in the San Francisco daily papers.
TICKET OFFICE, No. 214 MONTGOMERY ST., NEAR PINE.
GOODALL, PERKINS & CO., Agents,
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento,
J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco
W. W. DODGE & CO.,
WHOLESALE GROCERS,
Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco

C. P. R. R.

Overland Ticket Office, Oakland Ferry, foot of Market St.
COMMENCING MONDAY, MARCH
3d, 1879, and until further notice.
TRAINS AND BOATS will leave SAN FRANCISCO:
7.00 A. M., DAILY, VALLEJO
Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with the trains for Napa (Stages for Sonoma), Calis-taga (The Geysers), and Sacramento. Connecting at Davis (Sundays excepted) for Woodland and Knight's Landing, and at Woodland for Williams and Willows.
(Arrive San Francisco 8.10 P. M.)

7.00 A. M., DAILY, LOCAL PASsenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and via Livermore), arriving at Tracy at 11.30 A. M., and connecting with Atlantic Express. Connects at Niles with train arriving at San Jose at 10.15 A. M. (Returning, train from Tracy arrives at 6.05 P. M.)

8.00 A. M., DAILY, ATLANTIC
Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern
Ry. and S. P. & T. R. R.) for Sacramento, Marysville, Redding (Portland, Or.) Colfax, Reno (Virginia City), Pala-side (Eureka), Ogden, and Omaha. Connects at Galt with train arriving at 4.40 P. M.

SUNDAY EXCURSION TICKETS TO SAN PABLO AND MAR-
TINEZ AT REDUCED RATES.

10.00 A. M., DAILY, (VIA OAKland Ferry), Local Passenger Train to Haywards and Niles.
(Arrive San Francisco 4.05 P. M.)

3.00 P. M., DAILY, SAN JOSE
Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and Niles), stopping at all way stations. Arrive at San Jose at
5.20 P. M. (Arrive San Francisco at 9.35 A. M.)

3.00 P. M., DAILY, NORTHERN Railway Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry)
to San Pablo, Martinez, and Antioch.
(Arrive San Francisco 9.35 A. M.)

4.00 P. M., DAILY, ARIZONA
Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.), for Lathrop (and Stockton),
Merced, Madera, Visalia, Sumner, Mojave, Newhall
(San Buenaventura and Santa Barbara), Los Angeles,
Santa Monica, Wilmington, Santa Ana (San Diego), Colton, and Yuma. (Stages for Prescott and Colorado River Steamers). Connecting direct with daily trains of the Southern Pacific Railroad of Arizona for Stanwix (85 miles east from Yuma) and end of track. Daily Stages for Maricopa, Phoenix, Florence, and Tucson. Sleeping cars between Oakland, Los Angeles, and Yuma.
(Arrive San Francisco at 12.35 P. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED,
Vallejo Steamer (from Market Street Landing),
connecting with trains for Calistoga (The Geysers), Woodland, Knight's Landing, and Sacramento, and at Sacramento with passenger train, leaving at 9.35 P. M., for Truckee, Reno, Carson, and Virginia. Sleeping cars between Vallejo and Carson. (Arrive San Francisco 11.10 A. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED,
Sacramento Steamer (from Washington Street
Wharf) for Benicia and Landings on the Sacramento River.
(Arrive San Francisco 8.00 P. M.)

4.00 P. M., DAILY, THROUGH
Third Class and Accommodation Train, via
Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. and T. R. R., connecting at Lathrop with train arriving at Los Angeles on second day at 11.55 A. M. (Arrive San Francisco 9.05 A. M.)

4.30 P. M., DAILY, LOCAL PASsenger train (via Oakland Ferry) to Haywards,
Niles, and Livermore. (Arrive San Francisco 8.35 P. M.)

5.00 P. M., DAILY, OVERLAND
Emigrant Train (via Oakland Ferry and Northern Railway), to Ogden, Omaha, and East.
Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Seminary Park Station."

FERRIES AND LOCAL TRAINS.
FROM SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

To	To Alameda.	To Fremont.	To East.	To Niles.	To Berkeley.	To
Oakland.	Alameda.	Fremont.	East.	Niles.	Berkeley.	Daly City.
A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.
8.10	12.30	7.00	8.10	8.10	7.00	8.10
7.00	1.00	8.00	9.10	7.30	10.00	8.30
7.30	1.30	9.00	10.00	8.30	11.30	9.00
8.00	2.00	10.00	11.00	9.30	12.00	10.00
8.30	3.00	11.00	12.00	10.30	1.00	11.00
9.00	3.30	12.00	1.00	11.30	1.30	12.00
9.30	4.00	P. M.	1.30	To San Jose.	1.00	3.30
10.00	4.30	1.30	2.00	12.30	4.00	4.30
10.30	5.00	2.00	2.30	1.00	4.30	5.00
11.00	5.30	3.00	3.00	1.30	5.00	5.30
11.30	6.00	4.00	4.00	2.00	5.30	6.00
12.00	6.30	5.00	5.00	3.00	6.00	6.30
.....	7.00	6.00	6.00	4.00	6.30
.....	8.10	7.00	7.00	5.00
.....	9.20	8.10	8.10	6.00
.....	10.30	9.20	9.20	7.00
.....	11.45	10.30	10.30	8.00
.....	11.45	11.45	9.00

TO SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

From	From	From	From	From	From	From
Daly City.	Berkeley.	Niles.	East.	Fremont.	Alameda.	Oakland.
A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	P. M.
8.10	8.10	7.00	8.10	8.10	8.10	12.20
8.30	8.30	8.00	9.10	9.10	9.10	12.50
9.00	9.00	9.00	10.00	10.00	10.00	1.20
10.00	9.30	2.20	7.40	P. M.	7.00	7.20
12.00	8.30	4.30	8.40	8.00	8.03	7.50
P. M.	10.30	9.40	9.00	8.25	3.20
1.30	11.30	10.40	10.30	9.30	3.50
3.30	P. M.	11.40	11.03	9.20	4.20
4.30	1.00	P. M.	12.00	9.50	4.50
5.30	3.00	12.40	1.00	10.20	5.20
6.30	4.00	1.25	1.00	10.50	5.50
.....	5.00	2.40	3.00	11.20	6.25
.....	6.00	4.40	3.20	11.50	6.50
.....	5.40	4.00	7.00
.....	6.40	5.00	8.00
Change cars	A. M.	7.50	6.05	10.20
at West	7.10	9.00	7.20
Oakland.	P. M.	10.10	8.30
.....	1.20	10.00

* Sundays excepted.

NO TEAM THOROUGHFARE.
The Long (Oakland) Wharf from and after Dec. 2, 1878, will be closed to Teams, Stage, & CREEK ROUTE.

FROM SAN FRANCISCO—Daily—8.00—9.20—10.15—11.15 A. M. 12.15—1.15—2.25—3.15—4.15—5.15—
6.15 P. M.
FROM OAKLAND—Daily—8.45—7.10—8.05—9.05—10.05—
11.05 A. M. 12.05—1.05—2.15—3.05—4.05—5.05—6.05
P. M. * Sundays excepted.
"Official Schedule Time" furnished by Anderson & Randolph, Jewelers, 101 and 103 Montgomery Street.
A. N. TOWNE, T. H. GOODMAN,
General Sup't. Gen. Pass. and Ticket Ag't.

THE NEVADA BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA
Paid up Capital.....$10,000,000 Gold Reserve (U. S. Bonds).....3,500,000 "
DIRECTORS:
LOUIS McLANE, President. J. C. FLOOD, Vice-President.
JOHN W. MACKAY, J. L. FLOOD, JAMES G. FAIR.
Cashier.....H. W. GLENNY.
Agent at Virginia, Nev.....GEO. A. KING
Agents at New York.....C. T. CHRISTENSEN
(62 Wall Street.) (GEO. L. BRANDER.

Issues Commercial and Travelers' Credits, available in any part of the world. Makes Transfers by Telegraph and Cable, and draws Exchange at customary usances. This Bank has special facilities for dealing in bullion.

EXCHANGE
On the principal Cities throughout the United States,
Europe, Japan, China, and the East Indies, the Australian Colonies, and New Zealand, and on Honolulu, Hawaii.
NEW YORK BANKERS.....The Bank of New York, N. B. A.
Amer. Exchange Nat. Bank.
LONDON BANKERS.....Messrs. Smith, Payne & Smiths
The Union Bank of London.

THE BANK OF CALIFORNIA, SAN FRANCISCO

Capital.....$5,000,000
D. O. MILLS.....President.
WILLIAM ALVORD.....Vice-President.
THOMAS BROWN.....Cashier.

AGENTS—New York. Agency of the Bank of California; Boston, Tremont National Bank; Chicago, Union National Bank; St. Louis, Boatmen's Savings Bank; New Zealand, the Bank of New Zealand; London, China, Japan
India, and Australia, the Oriental Bank Corporation.

The Bank has Agencies at Virginia City and Gold Hill, and Correspondents in all the principal mining districts and interior towns of the Pacific Coast.
Letters of Credit issued available in all parts of the world.
Draw direct on London, Dublin, Paris, Berlin, Bremen, Hamburg, Frankfurt-on-Main, Antwerp, Amsterdam, St.
Petersburg, Copenhagen, Stockholm, Christiana, Locarno,
St. Louis, Sydney, Auckland, Hongkong, Shanghai, Yokohama.

THE ANGLO-CALIFORNIAN BANK (Limited.)

No. 422 CALIFORNIA STREET, SAN FRANCISCO.
London Office.....3 Angel Court
New York Agents.....J. & W. Seligman & Co

Authorized Capital Stock.....$6,000,000
Surplus Earnings.....150,000

Will receive Deposits, open Accounts, make Collections, buy and sell Exchange and Bullion, loan Money, and issue
Letters of Credit available throughout the world.

FRED'K F. LOW, } Managers.
IGN. STEINHART, }
P. N. LILIENTHAL, Cashier.

HIBERNIA SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY.

President.....M. D. SWEENEY.
Vice-President.....C. D. O'SULLIVAN.

TRUSTEES.
M. D. Sweeney, M. J. O'Connor,
C. D. O'Sullivan, P. McArran,
John Sullivan, Gust. Touchard,
R. J. Tobin, Peter Donahue,
Joseph A. Donahue.
Treasurer.....EDWARD MARTIN
Attorney.....RICHARD TOLIN.

Office, Northeast corner of Market and Montgomery Streets

REMITTANCES FROM THE INTERIOR.
Remittances from the country may be sent through Wel-s, Fargo & Co.'s Express Office or any reliable banking house, but the Society will not be responsible for their safe delivery.
The signature of the depositor should accompany his first deposit.

A proper pass-book will be delivered to the agent by whom the deposit is made.
Deposits received from $2.50 upward. Office hours from 9 A. M. to 3 P. M.

THE VERTICAL FEED.

THE ONLY POSITIVE SUCCESS IN

all departments of sewing. Lightest running shuttle machine in the market. The NEW DAVID VERTICAL FEED SEWING MACHINE, 130 Post Street.
MARK SHELTON.
P. S.—Howe, Florence, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover &
Baker, Domestic, Weed, Willcox & Gibbs, for sale at $10 each.

MILLER & RICHARD, SOLE MAKERS OF

EXTRA-HARD METAL

SCOTCH TYPE.

SPECIAL AGENTS FOR

THE CAMPBELL, HOE, AND PEERLESS PRESSES.

No. 529 COMMERCIAL S
And 205 Leidesdorff Street,

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

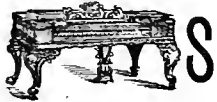

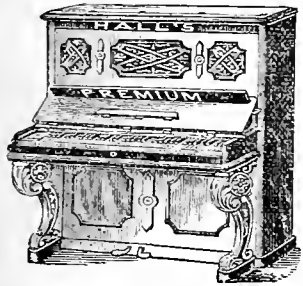

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.
WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

PIANOS

NO. 12 TYLER STREET, S. F.

These Pianos are all three-stringed, with ivory keys, not imitation.

SPRING STYLES

ALL IN NOW!

Send for Illustrated Catalogue.

STOVES

FOR PARLORS, OFFICES, HALLS
BED-ROOMS, CHURCHES, STORES, ETC., ETC.THE LARGEST STOCK AND
the greatest variety on the Pacific Coast.

500

DIFFERENT SIZES, STYLES, AND PATTERNS to select from.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, & 120 BATTERY ST.

REMOVAL.

M. J. PAILLARD & CO.

MUSICAL BOX DEPOSITORY AND
WORK SHOP has been removed from No. 120
Battery Street to

No. 31 Post St., San Francisco.

THE Automatic
SEWING MACHINE STANDS PRE-EMINENT.

A machine that delicate ladies can run as well as the strong. So simple in construction that no experience is required to operate it perfectly. Makes the strongest seam, there being three threads in every stitch. A machine that will sew leather or lace, woolen, or cotton goods without any change. POSITIVELY NO TENSION. The only machine in the world based on AUTOMATIC principles. Thousands now in use, giving the most entire satisfaction.

WILLCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.
C. L. HOVEY, AGENT,

124 POST STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, AND 361 TWELFTH STREET, OAKLAND.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

NICOLL THE TAILOR

BRANCH OF NEW YORK,

Begg to inform his numerous patrons (and their name is Legion), that he employs only WHITE LABOR, and that the reason he is able to sell cheaper than any other Tailor is that, having Sixty Stores all over the United States, and a London House, he is able to buy and import in immense quantities direct from the Mills at home and abroad, thereby saving all the intermediate profits which other Tailors have to pay.

Gentlemen, before ordering elsewhere, will do well to call and inspect my immense stock at any of my branch stores, and their daily arrivals of New York and Paris fashions. Also, of French and English Goods from my London House.

Pants in Six Hours. Snits to order in One Day, if required.

TO ORDER:

Pants, - - -	$4
Suits, - - -	15
Overcoats, -	15
Dress Coats, -	20

Genuine 6 X

TO ORDER

Black Doeskin
Pants, - - -	$7
White Vests, fm	3
Fancy Vests, - -	6
Beaver Suits, $55.

The Trade and Public supplied with Cloth and Trimmings at Wholesale Prices.

Any length cut, and all kinds of Cloth kept in Stock. Samples, with Instructions for Self-measurement, sent free.

A small stock of uncalled-for Goods to be sold at a great reduction.

CLOTH AND WOOLEN BROKER.

FINEST STOCK OF WOOLENS IN THE WORLD.

NICOLL THE TAILOR'S GRAND TAILORING EMPORIUM,

121 Market Street, 505 Montgomery Street, 18 Kearny Street,
And 853 Broadway, Oakland.PACIFIC BUSINESS COLLEGE,
320 POST STREET
San Francisco.PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,
FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE
for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. 23 Entrance
south side of Court. A. D. SHARON.

NEW STORE

McDONALD

& WILLIAMS

MERCHANT

TAILORS.

We have recently opened the fine large store at No. 14 MONTGOMERY STREET, opposite the Lick House, with a large stock of the most fashionable English, French, and Domestic Cassimeres, Cloths, Worsteds, Beavers, Doeskins, Piqués, Ouatines, Meltons, Kerseys; in fact, full lines of all the materials necessary to conduct a first class tailoring establishment, which we propose offering to the public at the following low prices:

Pants, from	$5
Suits, from	20
Overcoats, from	15
Usters, from	15
Dress Coats, from	20
White Vests, from	3
Silk and Wool Vests, from	6

Uniforms of All Kinds Made.

Boys' and Children's Clothing.

Money returned if goods prove not satisfactory. Work made on the premises by White Labor.

Short Time Orders Carefully Attended to.

PUNCTUALITY GUARANTEED.

Samples and Self-measurement
Rules sent postage paid.

Measures for future reference cheerfully taken

SUSPENDERS ON WHEELS

ARCOSY.

The Bachelor's Blessing.
No Pulling Off Buttons.
No Rubber or Elastic.
The Most Durable.
The Most Comfortable.
For Sale Everywhere.

THE TRADE SUPPLIED AT

223 Sacramento St

SAN FRANCISCO

INDEPENDENT LINE

—FOR—

ASTORIA AND PORTLAND, OREGON.
The Low-pressure, Side Wheel American SteamshipGREAT REPUBLIC,
382 TONS.

JAMES CARROLL Commander

Will sail from Spear Street wharf, for the above ports,
On SATURDAY, March 29, at 10 A. M.

Steorage Passage $2 00

Cabin Passage 7 00

In Bridal Rooms 10 00

Freight at Lowest Rates

FREIGHT RECEIVED DAILY.

For freight or passage apply at the office on Spear Street wharf. Tickets also for sale at No. 3 New Montgomery Street, under Grand Hotel.

P. B. CORNWALL.

The Argonaut.

VOL. IV. NO. 13.

SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 29, 1879.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

SHALL WE ADOPT THE NEW CONSTITUTION?

As a citizen of the State of California, I protest against the adoption of the proposed new Constitution for the following reasons:

I.—IT IS A DANGEROUS TIME TO CHANGE THE FUNDAMENTAL LAW.

The whole civilized world is groaning under the burden of a business depression. The sad cry of "hard times" is heard not alone in California, but is echoed from ocean to ocean, from continent to continent, and from mountain to valley, river, and sea throughout every habitable country of the globe. The rich are troubled and the poor are turbulent. Society is feverish and unsettled. The luckless toilers of this State who have for the first time keenly felt the pressure of poverty blindly attribute it to some imperfection in our system of local laws, instead of tracing it to the wide sympathy which modern commerce has created between all the civilized nations of the earth. The oft-repeated saying of Edmund Burke, that "people never give up their liberties but under some delusion," applies with peculiar force to the poor people of this State, who vainly hope to cure the ills of poverty by adopting the new Constitution. It is for just such feverish, turbulent times as these that fundamental laws are adopted. Let us, therefore, beware how we depart from the ancient landmarks until society has returned to its normal condition, and deliberation shall at least moderate our counsels.

II.—IT IS THE WORK OF AN ILL-CHOSEN BODY.

The sudden and unexpected organization into a political party of the restless, unemployed "workingmen" of this State resulted in sending to the Convention a controlling majority of delegates in no sense fitted by education, interest, or residence, to draft an acceptable, well considered organic law. Indeed, the very existence of such a party assuming to call itself a "laboring-men's party," in a community where there is no distinctive class of "gentlemen," is a fact so exceptional and so revolutionary even as to excite deep feeling and alarm. Whether it is the angry uprising of the poor who have been wronged by the exactions of the rich, or whether it is the natural expression of discontent existing on account of the general depression, it is equally unsafe as a deliberative body intrusted with the power to dictate an organic law. Any instrument drafted by such a body of men, and under such circumstances, ought to receive the most suspicious and critical examination, if for no other reason than that it was not framed by those who would ordinarily have been chosen to perform so delicate and difficult a task. I protest against any man assuming to make laws for me because he belongs to a so-called "gentleman's party," or a so-called "rich man's party," or a so-called "workingman's party."

III.—A CONSTITUTION SHOULD BE FAULTLESS.

It is the province of a Constitution to adhere closely to the great fundamental principles of right about which none of us differ; leaving all details to be regulated by legislation, by custom, and by the decision of the courts. It is fatal to a Constitution if there are errors in it. It should be absolutely faultless. It is not enough that some of its provisions are good. None of them should be bad. Citizens of California: Have you ever thought of what is involved in the adoption of a fundamental error? It means that your Legislature shall pass laws inherently unjust in order to conform to it, and that your courts shall construe laws against equity and right in order to enforce it. Can we build a just system of laws upon the basis of an unjust Constitution? Can we expect an honest judiciary to uphold and defend a bad system of laws? Can our courts enforce the rules of right in construing laws based upon fundamental wrongs? Let us remember that this is no mere legislative enactment, that may be repealed at our pleasure. It is the solemn organic law of this land. What must be the disgrace to us as a State if we incorporate into this fundamental law provisions which are inherently wrong? If we must have errors let them be errors of omission, as in our present Constitution, and not errors of commission, as in the proposed new. Errors of omission may be supplied by appropriate legislation, or by sound judicial construction, but errors of commission can not be cured.

IV.—IT PROPOSES AN UNEQUAL, UNJUST, AND INEQUITOUS SYSTEM OF TAXATION.

It was among the fundamental principles of our Government that taxation, to be just, should be equal. The new Constitution, almost avowedly, makes it unequal. We are, therefore, to have a system of taxation confessedly unjust, because admittedly unequal. This is not mere assertion. The new Constitution conspicuously, and of course purposely, omits that provision of our present Constitution which guarantees that taxation shall be "equal and uniform," thus leaving us to infer that equality and uniformity are not to be elements in the proposed new system of taxation. This inference is resolved into certainty when we examine this proposed new system.

The New System.—Our present Constitution tersely declares that all "property" shall be taxed in proportion to its value, but does not define what the term property shall include. The new Constitution defines the term "property" to include "moneys, credits, bonds, stocks, dues, franchises, and all other matters and things, real, personal, and mixed, capable of private ownership." Now, the term "property," as used in its general sense in our present Constitution, has been interpreted by our Supreme Court to include only tangible and real things. The new Constitution, however, reverses the opinion of the Supreme Court and specifically "declares" that the term "property" shall include all intangible, artificial, and representative things of value, such as "credits," "bonds," "dues," etc. Thus it is plainly seen that the new Constitution proposes to sweep away our present system of taxation, based upon the tangible and certain, for the purpose of inaugurating a new system based upon the intangible and uncertain. Now, I can conceive of no more monstrous, and at the same time stupid, proposition than that the Constitution of a great State shall gravely and solemnly "declare" that certain things shall be called "property," which are perfectly well known not to be property, simply for the purpose of taxing them! (As if any mere constitutional enactment, or even a divine command, could transform a manifest falsehood into an accepted truth.) For who is there so bold as to claim that the representative of a thing is a thing?—that a promise to pay money is money?—that a deed to land is land?—that a bill of sale of a horse is a horse?—or that a certificate of stock in a corporation is the corporate property? And yet these absurd things are gravely "declared" to be true in the new Constitution; and we are all asked to ratify and confirm this constitutional "declaration," which we all know to be a lie, in order that it may be made the fundamental lie of this State. Now, if the mere theory of calling the representative of a thing a thing is so absurd, what must the practice be? Let us take the item "credits" as an example:

Credits.—The term "credits" includes "bonds," "dues," and all the other intangible "matters and things" above enumerated, except "stocks" (which I will speak of hereafter.) We are all of us aware of the numerous vain attempts that have been made under our present Constitution to tax "credits" under the name of "solvent debts," and of the decision of our Supreme Court that a "solvent debt" was not "property," but simply a debt that had to be paid out of somebody's property, and that to tax the debt and then tax the property that pays the debt would be to tax the identical thing twice. To illustrate: I owe Jones $100, and I own a horse worth $100. Under this new Constitution Jones will be taxed on the $100 note which he holds against me (providing the assessor can find it), while I am taxed on my $100 horse. In order to pay Jones the note I give him the horse, whereupon he gives me back my note and I destroy it. Here the horse was the "property" represented by my promise to pay the $100, and was the identical thing with which I did pay the $100 note; and yet the note and the horse are both taxed. Now I am willing to admit that to tax a thing twice is not necessarily unfair, if everything is actually taxed twice; but if we tax all the tangible property once, and then attempt to find the intangible property, consisting of "credits," "bonds," "dues," etc., but only succeed in finding a small fraction of it in the hands of a few men who are honest and truthful enough to disclose it, while the great bulk of these "credits," "bonds," "dues," etc., are locked up in the safes or carried in the pockets of dishonest and untruthful men and perjurers, we simply inaugurate a system of taxation that is infamous. So far from being a wise and meritorious attempt to reach a class of dishonest capitalists who escape the burdens of taxation under our present Constitution, it will constitute a standing premium to dishonesty and perjury. Dishonest men who can hide their "property" in their pockets in the form of "credits," promissory notes or bonds, and escape the burdens of taxation by the simple act of lying will lie and escape, while honest men, who conscientiously tell the truth, will be punished for the crime of honesty, by being required to pay not only their own just proportion of the taxes, but the taxes of the rogues and scoundrels who have thereby escaped by the easy crime of perjury. Thus California will become the rogues' paradise, where the honest and good men of the State will be absolutely forced to turn liars and resort to sneaking evasions or bear all the burdens of taxation. I can readily understand why so eminent a scholar and jurist as Thomas M. Cooley should, in his great work on Taxation, condemn such a system "as holding out a strong temptation to false swearing." Men of California, do we need any new incentives to moral turpitude? Have we not enough false swearing already? Do we want to offer a permanent constitutional premium to perjury? But this is not all. The system of taxing "credits" has the rare merits of being both infamous and stupid. No man has the boldness to assert that the assessors can find one-tenth of the "credits," "bonds," and "dues" that are hidden away in the vaults of this State. If so, then the system is uncertain. If uncertain, it is unequal. If unequal, it is unfair and unjust. To make the matter still worse, it is unfair and unjust to precisely that class of honest and good men who above all others ought to be protected. Uncertainty is as bad for the finances of a community as an unenforced criminal code is for its morals. The potency of a criminal code consists in the certainty more than in the severity of its punishment. So the wisdom of any system of taxation consists in its simplicity more than in its complexity. In attempting to enlarge the area of taxation by including artificial, uncertain, and intangible things, we decrease the revenue in still greater proportion. This fact has been distinctly recognized by the eminent writers on political economy. John Stuart Mill, in his Political Economy (Vol. II., p. 295), quotes and adopts the following language from Adam Smith: "The certainty of what each individual ought to pay is, in taxation, a matter of so great importance, that a very considerable degree of inequality, it appears from the experience of nations, is not near so great an evil as a very small degree of uncertainty."

To-day there may be millions of dollars of "credits" in existence. To-morrow they may be paid off and destroyed. To-day the capitalists of California may hold bonds and stocks innumerable. To-morrow, when they learn of the coming of the assessor, they may conveniently exchange them with foreign bankers or capitalists for government non-taxable bonds, until the assessment day is over. The most remarkable thing in connection with all this is that the very men who favor the adoption of this infamous system of taxation fully admit the truth of these facts, and yet blindly persist in the hope that some good may possibly come of it.

"Stocks."—The new Constitution "declares" that "stocks" shall, for the purposes of taxation, be regarded as "property." The term "stocks" applies alone to that species of property represented by certificates in corporations. The taxing of "credits," absurd and wrong as it is, is profound wisdom compared with the taxing of "stocks," for, as we have seen, the taxing of "credits" may at least be plausibly defended; but the taxing of "stocks" is simply and purely a bold and audacious attempt to fix double taxation on corporations, which is legalized robbery. If I hold a certificate in the Pioneer Woolen Factory, it is merely the evidence of my ownership of an interest in the property of that corporation. My certificate of stock is to me precisely what the farmer's deed is to his land—the evidence of its ownership. It would be just as ridiculous for the assessor to assess the farmer's land and then assess his deed to it, as it is to assess the property of the Pioneer Woolen Factory and then assess my stock in that corporation. Indeed, this proposition is so absolutely monstrous that Volney E. Howard, in a lengthy argument in the Bulletin, has vainly attempted to explain it away. His explanation is that, inasmuch as the new Constitution declares that "all property shall be taxed in proportion to its value," this is a guarantee that corporate "property" will not be taxed twice. But the trouble with General Howard's argument is that the Constitution itself defines what shall constitute "property." If the Constitution says that all "land" shall be taxed as "property," and that all "deeds" to land shall also be taxed as "property," how can we escape taxation on "deeds" by showing that the "land" is taxed? The Constitution says that, for the purposes of taxation, they are both "property." It is not for General Howard to say they are not. The Constitution says they are. I am willing to admit that the Constitution lies, but I will not allow General Howard to assume that it tells the truth for one purpose and lies for another. The position I have taken receives additional strength from the marked and conspicuous absence in the new Constitution of that provision which should guarantee all taxation to be "equal and uniform." If this safeguard had been retained in the new Constitution there would be no fear, but its absence creates both suspicion and alarm.

Now, it possibly may be claimed that the provision under discussion simply proposes to tax the value of corporate "stocks" only so far as their market value may be in excess of the value of the corporate property. Let us illustrate by taking two large dividend-paying concerns, one a corporation—the San Francisco Gas Light Company—the other a partnership concern—the Morning Call. The taxable property of the Morning Call, consisting of its presses and type, does not quite reach $20,000. It pays an annual income to its proprietors of fully $100,000, and it could not be purchased for a quarter of a million dollars. Here, then, is a private business that pays taxes on less than $20,000 that could not be bought for ten times that sum, and yet the community makes no fuss about it. It seems to be generally conceded that this excess in business value over the assessable value of the property is "good will," which ought not to be taxed. And yet the Morning Call is not a monopoly. On the other hand, the San Francisco Gas Light Company pays taxes on perhaps $3,500,000, while its capital stock is worth on the market between $8,000,000 and $9,000,000. And yet there are a great many innocent and good people who wonder why the Gas Company is permitted to escape taxation. It is simply for the want of light, not gas light, nor electric light, but intellectual light—that light which comes from calm and dispassionate investigation, and not cheap demagoguery about the tyrannical "monopolies." The profits of every business constitutes its "good will," and this can not, on any principle of justice or policy, be taxed. If the corporate property of the corporation in question were owned by a partnership, consisting of Messrs. Pickering & Fitch, no one would ever think of taxing the property more than its actual worth, whatever the profits of the business might be.

V.—CONCLUSION.

It is not in accordance with my taste to pick paltry flaws in the new Constitution. I have not condescended to make a bare list of objections to it, supported by hasty reasons, but have patiently confined myself to pointing out one monstrous iniquity, to wit: the taxation of intangible things, which lies at the basis of all other provisions. For it is mainly through taxation that we are made aware that we have a government. If our system of taxation is unjust to any portion of the community we can not live happily together. And I hereby respectfully but fearlessly challenge any gentleman of this State who favors the new Constitution to show wherein any position I have taken is illogical or incorrect; not by retorting that I am a mere "corporate attorney," or the "hiring of capitalists," but an honorable and direct reply to the positions I have herein maintained on the new system of taxation.

Respectfully, H. N. CLEMENT.

The Chronicle of Friday acknowledges the organization of a "plan" among merchants to kill it. It boldly defies what it pleases to style a conspiracy, and declares that the "merchant class" is acting under the whip of monopoly to cause a withdrawal of advertising patronage. It is an unpleasant condition of things that justifies an organized raid on the press, but the relation of a newspaper to a commercial community is after all but a business one. If the community thinks the journal injuring it, it may injure the journal in the only way it can—namely, by ceasing to do business with it. This is not persecution. It is not conspiracy. It is self-defense. If the Chronicle has excited the uprising of the mob, and written a dangerous agitator into prominence, and the result has been a depreciation of property values and a paralysis of business, the men who own property and do business have a right to strike back. The experiment is not a new one, nor when tried has it proved unsuccessful. Self-preservation is the first law of nature. It would be an exhibition of arrant cowardice for an intelligent community to fear the press. A newspaper but reflects the opinion of the people, and no journal is any better or worse than the men who control it.

A SAGE-BRUSH CHIEF.

While the bones and body of Captain Bob, the recently defunct chief of the Piutes, have scarcely begun to mingle themselves with the alkali of the surrounding earth I take occasion to pen a brief history of his life. Captain Bob, for more than ten years the chief of the Piutes of Storey County, Nevada, was thirty years old when he breathed his last, at his wickiup, on the 16th of February, surrounded by the leading lights of the tribe over which he had ruled. For an unadulterated specimen of the guileless savage, just barely leavened with the yeast of civilization—such as it was—Bob had no equal on earth.

The first time I ever had the pleasure of meeting the gentleman was one hot summer afternoon, on Taylor Street, Virginia City. Bob was mounted on a little, stumpy mule, and the only exertion he seemed to be engaged in was to bend his knees sufficiently to keep his colossal feet from bumping against the ground. The animal was led by Bob's wife, who had about one hundred and fifty pounds of wood on her back, and was shedding perspiration at a rate which threatened to render the services of a street-sprinkler useless on that thoroughfare. Bob looked every inch like a lazy man born to rule, and held his head with an air that a mining superintendent might have envied. The same night the mule alluded to was stolen, and Bob came to the Chronicle office with a woeful history of the outrage:

"Some dama sunagunna heap stealum mula. You putta in pappu one piecer. Catchum, you bet."

A blood-curdling account of the ravishment of Bob's stable was accordingly promulgated in the columns of the paper next day. The description of the mule (one ear gone, four brands on his body, and a game leg) was recognized by an honest rancher in Carson Valley, and the animal was rescued from the hands of a tramp. Bob got his mule, and from that time his respect for the power of the press was something akin to the reverence of a Hindoo for one of his manufactured deities. To Bob's untutored mind all things were possible with a newspaper, and although the rascal could not read a word of English, he came next morning and ordered a copy left regularly at his wickiup.

"Me reada to my mahala."

"When it came to thanking the staff for the return of the mule, language is impotent to describe his expressions of gratitude; and when he learned that I was the man who was immediately responsible for the mule's return, it required the efforts of three able-bodied men to prevent his hugging me to his bosom.

Finally understanding that such familiarities would not be tolerated during business hours, he contented himself with admiring me from a distance, and ejaculating at short intervals:

"Heep gooda man, you betcherlife."

I was at once established in his estimation as a "bigger man than old Grant."

Next day, about nine o'clock in the morning, he filed in with his wife and two children, and gave all hands a formal introduction to the family. As a mark of special distinction to myself he insisted that I should be allowed to hold the baby, a little, weazley-looking papoose, wrapped in greasy swaddling clothes, and smeared all over with ham-fat.

He sat down and stayed an hour, with his feet in a pile of fresh exchanges, and chinned us about the forthcoming Presidential election.

When told that Henry Ward Beecher was the people's choice for the White House, he communicated the fact to his wife with a chuckle, and nudged her in the ribs with a leer which spoke volumes for his knowledge of the great Brooklyn sensation.

"Bleacher no good. Me hear allee 'bout;" and throwing back his head he made the building echo with his laughter.

He was finally invited outside and given half a dollar to cover a pedestrian lap of two blocks.

Next day he came in with six squaws and introduced them with a great flourish as "his sisters and cousins, and his aunts." I was specially pointed out to them as "heep gooda man, catchum mule." This announcement made me a family favorite at once. For the next two months I was pointed out by the Piutes on the street as the matchless recoverer of stolen mules, and soon my popularity with the tribe was such that no buck ever thought of passing without shaking hands, while the squaws would skip across C Street in three bounds to say, "How you do, Harra Dava?"

Presently the attentions of Bob took a more pronounced turn, and he would come in with:

"Say, you got any ole plants, some vlests, blue fannell shlufts, may bee. Some ole clote some day, you sabbe?"

This business would be kept up until a man would be willing to take clothes off his back to satisfy the demands of the unrelenting savage.

His cheek increased in proportion to the kindnesses he received, and soon the office became a regular resort for the royal family.

He outthrew the worst of exchange fiends. Although he did not know a single letter, he would frequently speed an hour looking over the papers, pretending to be absorbed in their contents. He had a general idea of what belonged to a newspaper, and was cunning enough to occasionally look up and remark:

"Heep big fire New Lork." "Steamblot blow up San Flisco."

When ever the ARGONAUT contained pictures he would slip it into his pocket and carry it away to decorate the walls of his cabin. He also liked the cuts in Boruck's paper, but finally began to throw it aside in disgust, with the remark: "Too mucchee hoss."

After he had finally established himself as a regular visitor, he made it a point to bring along his squaw and two dirty children, Pat and Bob. Mrs. B. would comb her hair in front of the office looking-glass, while Bob would black his brogans with the office blacking, generally using a whole box. Pat would wander into the composing room and pity.

One day Mrs. Bob sat down on a hot stove, mistaking it evidently for a settee. She presently discovered her blunder, and rose up—somewhat hastily. She was on fire. We put her out, first with a Babcock extinguisher, and next with a strong shove through an open door. She no doubt still bears the inscription, "Charter Oak No. 12, Patent applied for," as evidence of the first lasting impression made upon her by civilization, and can no longer be alluded to as an "unlettered savage."

One day Bob grabbed up a just finished editorial, written by Dennis McCarthy, on the corruptions of the Bank of California under Bill Sharon, and proceeded to light his pipe with it, while Mac was turning round to give a theatrical agent his ruling figures for three-sheet posters. The author of the editorial never knew where it went to, and no one dared to tell him, fearful of a subsequent homicide.

There was a half-breed in his tribe who could read, and when ever the Chronicle contained an approving notice of Bob, the half-breed would translate it to the chief and his family. These notices soon bore unexpected fruit.

One day Bob came in with some game, remarking, "You likee fish?" throwing down a trout. "You likee labbit?" slamming a hare on the table. "Plalie (prairie) hen pretty good?"

These tokens were thankfully received, to Bob's delight; ducks, hare, grouse, and trout were showered upon the reporter staff by the hunters of the tribe. Whenever the supply began to fall short, a slight allusion to Bob's eminent fitness for the place he occupied and a passing notice of his good looks, or gentlemanly treatment of his squaw, would bring another deluge of game.

The reporter staff, which numbered three, went into keeping bachelor's hall, hired a Chinese cook, and began to live on the fat of the land, at the mere cost of beer and stove-wood. A petition from the staff to the county commissioners, asking an appropriation to build Bob a board house, was jokingly taken up, and the lumber furnished. This made the staff perfectly solid with Bob, and the supplies of fish and game increased until it seemed like Christmas all the year round. To keep this stream of luxury and high living flowing to the full capacity of its banks now became our main object in life.

One day, however, Dan de Quille, who was no doubt a little envious of our popularity with his pet tribe, was taking dinner with us, and there put up a job which sent our Bachelor's Hall to the dogs at a single kick. He told us, in a confidential way, that nothing so delighted a Piute as to be considered the father of twins. We swallowed the bait, hook and all, and the next day officially announced in the Chronicle that Captain Bob was the happy father of twins, weighing respectively ten and twelve pounds. We waited next day at the house, expecting Bob to heave in sight loaded down with game. He came a little earlier than usual, with several stalwart bucks and the interpreter. He rushed in, and waving the paper aloft, shouted, "Heep dam lie!"

The Indians awaited for no explanation, but pounced upon us bodily, clearing out the astonished staff in a about five minutes. We fled through the back window, and Bob and his followers proceeded to smash the crockery and demolish the furniture, after which he left, satisfied with his work. The damage was estimated by the landlord at $65, and I guessed this to be an undervaluation of at least $50.

We ascertained that night that nothing was such a disgrace to a Piute family as twins, it being supposed by the Indian that each twin required a separate father. Thus our game supply was cut off with one fell stroke. Yet we forgave Dan de Quille for his infamous hoax, for to such dizzy heights does some men's magnanimity soar.

Presently Bob fell into evil ways and became a poker sharp. He made his own rules and counted the spots to suit his own sweet will. He would construct four aces from a pair of deuces, on the principle that the deuces contained the requisite number of spots. For a year or two he had about all the money of the tribe, his flexible and endless rules carrying a percentage in his favor of about ninety-five to five.

Finally his victims rose in revolt and demanded a set of rules for all time, and not for each change of the moon. They held a poker convention on American Flat, and the ways of the Comstock said that the spirit of Poker-hontas presided over the deliberations, and wanted the rule of "Pass the buck" abolished. After that poker convention Bob never won a hand, and quit gaming in disgust.

A few weeks ago he lay in his cabin dying. It was the house which he had built from the County's lumber. This inclosure and its cooking stove inside had proven too much for the constitution of the savage, and he was literally dying from a stroke of civilization. He had all his life been accustomed to the cold blasts which sweep over the sage brush; he had slept in the snow a thousand times, and crouched under the quartz croppings when the storms were fiercest, and recked little of the night with its bitter winds and starless sky. When, however, he moved into a roofed house he fell a speedy victim to the change.

When his brother came up to say that Bob wanted to shake hands with me before he died, and ask me to forget the little disturbance at Bachelor's Hall, I was glad to go. The other two reporters had left the country a year before.

I found him in his house, stretched on a couch of skins, dying. He was surrounded by squaws, who filled the air with lamentations, and men of his tribe, who seemed utterly indifferent to the situation. His head was held by his wife, who was utterly disconsolate over the prospect of his speedy demise. At every change in the condition of the dying man the wailing of the squaws broke forth afresh. Every beating of the pulse was noted, every chill that passed over his frame, and every flutter of his breath.

I knelt by his side and grasped a hand that seemed to belong to a skeleton. He turned his head a little and lifted his eyes. There was always an inexpressible comic look in Bob's face, and a merry twinkle was always in his eye. As he looked up, I could have wagered a thousand that the cruel sell of which Dan de Quille had made us a victim was flitting across his mind and interrupting a rising view of the spirit world. His hand closed upon mine like a bird's claw. The same irresistible smile wreathed his thin lips, and the same comic leer came for an instant from the corners of his eyes. His face then resumed a serious expression, the grasp of the claw tightened. Bob was dead.

His wife bent her face to his closed mouth, and as she did so the lower jaw slowly settled down, but there was no breath for her cheek. She raised her head with a look of unutterable despair, and the lamentation of those about her ceased at once, all leaning over and gazing upon the dead in silence. Even the little children seemed impressed with the idea that the climax of the scene had been reached, and, although weeping bitterly with the rest but a moment before, they now hushed their little cries.

When I left the group there was not a sound in the cabin, yet from the face of every squaw the tears were streaming down like summer rain. At the door was an old hag, whose white hair and shriveled skin told of at least a hundred years of life. She was in a sitting posture, with a robe of rabbit skins thrown over her naked shoulders. Holding a staff between her two hands, she leaned forward upon it, motionless; alongside this relic of another generation, the Witch of Endor, or the foul hags who confronted Macbeth, seemed as rosy, dimpled babes. She made no effort to move out of the way, and I was almost obliged to leap over her to make my exit from the cabin.

The next morning the body lay in the Catholic Cathedral, for years ago Bob had embraced the Catholic faith and received the rites of baptism. All day the Piutes crowded the sanctuary, and gazed upon the features of the dead chief, who was coffined like a Christian and lying amidst burning tapers. It was nearly sunset when the service was performed. The measured notes of the organ and the solemn chanting of the choir swept through the aisles.

It was a peculiar and picturesque sight—a group of savages in their red blankets and paint standing before a background of gothic architecture in blue and gold, and flanked with images of the Saviour and Holy Mother. How Tavernier would have plied his brush at such a scene!

Presently the procession went forth from the church, headed by Father Monogue. Eight of Bob's tribe bore his coffin, and darkness was gathering about the cemetery as they threw in the last clods. Thus the poor fellow was buried a Christian as he had lived, for no one will question that he was a better man than his surroundings.

Although his poker accomplishments sometimes overstepped the bounds of honest play, let us suppose, for sweet charity's sake, that he learned the game from dishonest whites, and actually believed that a sleeve full of Jacks was as much a factor in the play, and as indispensable to success, as mature judgment in deciding whether to complete a flush or draw to three kings.

An honest and kind heart beat in the breast of the unlettered savage, and in the midst of a mad race for wealth he lived content with what he had—an extra mule, or the possession of a cast-off pair of pants, being the only ambition which ever tried his soul.

VIRGINIA CITY, March 20, 1879.

Thackeray, the Bohemian.

Among the most charming Bohemians of history was Thackeray, and upon that side of his character we lose sight of all his keen satire, and see him sitting, like a true, jolly companion, with the art students in Germany, or walking in the vineyards. The satirist has laid aside his keen blade, and beneath nature's pure influences, breathing its delicious incense, he walks in the warm sunlight, and is full of love and sympathy. One of the unprinted anecdotes illustrates this side of his character at the time when he had achieved his greatest triumphs. A young painter, poor, but honest and talented, had made the acquaintance of the author of The Newcomes, and especially admired him since he portrayed so many of his own trials and sorrows in that charming story of the loves of Clive and Ethel. The author often sat behind the young painter, and smoked and chatted as he watched the magic brush selecting and blending the colors, until one day, noticing the poverty of his friend, he proposed to buy the picture on the easel for a hundred dollars. The artist modestly protested that the work was not worth that much money, knowing that Thackeray meant a delicate and polite piece of gentlemanly charity. Thackeray persisted, however, and finally forced the offered sum into the artist's hand, grabbed the picture and walked off with it under his arm, the sight not being at all uncommon in Dusseldorf, or any other European city where artists abound. When the great author was gone with the picture, and the poor painter stood with the twenty pounds in his hand, the happy feeling of wealth contrasted with the shame of accepting the money as a polite sort of charity; and the young man (who has since grown to be a great artist), having the strong character nourished by manly pride, thought and thought the matter over, until at last he settled it satisfactorily.

He wrote a note to Thackeray, asking him to take supper with him in his studio the next night, and promised him the company of Bierstadt, Irving, Elder, and others of the cleverest students. The room was very large and could hold enough. Thackeray was delighted; it was just what he liked; art talk, story, jolly companions, genius, and beer. He arrived to find not less than a score of geniuses, and the corners of the room filled with the variously-labeled bottles of the Rhine, and especially the squat black flasks with handles which hold the glorious "Steinwine." They drank, smoked, and told stories, sang songs, and one of the Americans showed Thackeray the "break-down," another played him the "Arkansas Traveler," and a third criticised the "Virginians" as he had never heard it done before. He, himself, repeated his poem on "The Bouillehaise," and when the company was tuned up to concert pitch, supper was announced. Thackeray seemed at once to perceive that his artist friend and host had conceived the idea of defeating his well-meant charity by spending all the price of the picture in a supper. He grew serious, and was thinking sadly about the failure of his scheme and the false pride of the painter, when the latter said to him, gayly:

"Old fellow, excuse the familiarity, but you are in Bohemia, where genius never thinks it a condescension to cook. Behold your beefsteak: there is the fire, and while you cook it I will set the table."

The illustrious author bowed with stately gravity as he received the piece of meat on a fork, and with the other hand took the gridiron; but he had to look at the other amateur cooks before he knew exactly how to proceed to the impromptu cuisine. Every guest took a raw beefsteak and went to cooking, each in turn; presently the table was spread. The host took his seat at the head of the table, Thackeray at the foot, and then such an orgie began as youth and genius can alone fully appreciate. The hundred dollars was dissolved in wine and cooked in steaks; but, perhaps, it was Thackeray's hearty declaration that it was the most pleasant night he ever spent which contributed to the artist's start on a great career.

THE DEVIL'S FUNERAL.

I felt myself lifted up from my bed by hands invisible, and swiftly borne down the ever narrowing avenue of Time. Each moment I passed a century, and encountered new empires, new peoples, strange ideas, and unknown faiths. So, at last, I found myself at the end of the avenue, at the end of Time, under a blood red sky more awful than the deepest black.

Men and women buried to and fro, their pale faces reflecting the accursed complexion of the heavens. A desolate silence rested upon all things. Then I heard afar a low wail, indescribably grievous, swelling and falling again and blending with the notes of the storm that began to rage. The wailing was answered by a groan, and the groaning grew into thunder. The people wrung their hands and tore their hair, and a voice, piercing and persistent, shrieked above the turmoil, "Our lord and master, the Devil, is no more! Our lord and master is no more!" Then I, too, joined the mourners who bewailed the Devil's death.

An old man came to me and took me by the hand. "You also loved and served him?" he asked. I made no reply, for I knew not wherefore I lamented. He gazed steadfastly into my eyes. "There are sorrows," he said, meaningly, "that are beyond utterance." "Not, then, like your sorrow," I retorted, "for your eyes are dry, and there is no grief behind their pupils." He placed his finger on my lips and whispered, "Wait!"

The old man led the way to a vast and lofty hall, filled to the farthest corner with a weeping crowd. The multitude was, indeed, a mighty one, for all the people of every age of the world who had worshiped and served the Devil were assembled there to do for him the last offices for the dead. I saw there men of my own day and recognized others of earlier ages, whose faces and fame had been brought down to me by art and by history; and I saw many others who belonged to the later centuries through which I had passed in my night progress down the avenue of Time. But as I was about to inquire concerning these, the old man checked me. "Hush," he said, "and listen." And the multitude cried with one voice, "Hark and hear the report of the autopsy!"

From another apartment there came forth surgeons and physicians and philosophers and learned faculties of all times, charged to examine the Devil's body and to discover, if they could, the mystery of his existence. "For," the people had said, "if these men of science can tell us wherein the Devil was the Devil; if they can separate from his mortal parts the immortal principle which distinguished him from ourselves, we may still worship that immortal principle to our own continued profit and to the unending glory of our late lord and master."

With grave looks upon their countenances, and with reluctant steps, three delegates advanced from among the other sages. The old man beside me raised his hand to command perfect silence. Every sound of woe was at the instant suppressed. I saw that one was Galen, Paracelsus another, and Cornelius Agrippa the third.

"Ye who have faithfully served the master," said Agrippa, in a loud voice, "must listen in vain for the secret which our scalpels have disclosed. We have laid bare both the heart and the soul of him who lies yonder. His heart was like our own hearts, fitly formed to throb with hot passion, to shrink with hatred, and to swell with rage. But the mystery of his soul would blast the lips that uttered it."

The old man hurriedly drew me a little way apart out of the throng. The multitude began to surge and sway with furious wrath. It sought to seize and rend to pieces the learned and venerable men who had dissected the Devil, yet refused to publish the mystery of his existence. "What rubbish is this you tell us, you charlatan hackers and hewers of corpses?" exclaimed one. "You have discovered no mystery; you lie to our faces."

"Put them to death!" screamed others. "They wish to hoard the secret for their own advantage. We shall presently have a triumvirate of quacks setting themselves up above us, in place of him whom we have worshiped for the dignity of his teachings, the ingenuity of his intellect, the exalted character of his morality. To death with these upstart philosophers who would usurp the Devil's soul!"

"We have sought only the Truth," replied the men of science, soberly, "but we can not give you the Truth as we found it. Our functions go not further." And thereupon they withdrew.

"Let us see for ourselves," shouted the foremost in the angry crowd. So they made their way into the inner apartment where the Devil's body lay in state. Thousands pressed after them and struggled in vain to enter the presence of death that they, too, might discover the true essential quality of the departed. Those who gained entrance reverently but eagerly approached the massive bier of solid gold, studded with glistening stones, and resplendent with the mingled lustre of the emerald, the chrysolite and jasper. Dazzled, they shrank back with wild faces and bewildered looks. Not a man among them dared stretch forth his hand to tear away the bandages and coverings with which the surgeons had veiled their work.

Then the old man who with me had silently witnessed the tumultuous scene drew himself up to a grand height, and said aloud: "Worshippers of the Devil, whose majesty even in death holds you subject, it is well that you have not seized the mystery before the time. A variety of signs combine to inspire me with hope that that which has sealed the lips of the men of science may yet be revealed through faith. Let us forthwith pay the last sad tribute to our departed lord. Let us make to his memory a sacrifice worthy of our devotion. My art can kindle a fire which consumes weighty ingots of gold as readily as it burns tinsel paper, and which leaves behind no ashes and no regrets. Let every man bring hither all the gold, whether in coin, or in plate, or in trinkets, that he has earned in serving the Devil, and every woman the gold she has earned, and cast it into the consuming fire. Then will the funeral pyre be worthy of him whom we mourn."

"Well said, old man," cried the Devil worshippers. "Thus we will prove that our worship has not been base. Build you the pyre while we go to fetch our gold."

My eyes were fixed upon the face of my companion, but I could not read the thoughts that occupied his brain. When I turned again the vast hall was empty of all save him and me.

Slowly and laboriously we built the funeral pile in the centre of the apartment. We built it of the costly woods that were at hand, already sprinkled by devout mourners with the choicest spices. We built the pile broad and high, and draped it with gorgeous stuffs. The old man smiled as he prepared the magic fire that was to consume the gold which the Devil worshippers had gone to fetch. Within the pyre he left an ample space for their sacrifice.

Together we brought forth the Devil's body, and placed it carefully in position at the top of the pile. Thunders rolled in the lofty space above our heads, and the whole building shook so terribly that I expected it to fall, crushing us between roof and pavement. Crash came after crash of thunder, nearer and nearer to the pyre. Lightnings played close around us—around the old man, the Devil's corpse, and me. Still we waited for the multitude, but the multitude returned not.

"Behold the obsequies!" said the old man at last, thrusting his lighted torch into the midst of the pile. "You and I are the only mourners, and we have not a single ounce of gold to offer. Go you now forth and bid all the Devil worshippers to the reading of the last will and testament. They will come."

I hastened forth to obey the old man's command, and speedily the funeral hall was thronged again. This time the Devil worshippers brought their gold, and every man sought to make excuse for his tardiness at the pyre. The air was thick with explanations. "I tarried only," said one, "to be sure that I had gathered all—all to the very last piece of gold in my possession." "I have fetched," said another, "the laborious accumulations of fifty years, but I cheerfully sacrifice it all to the memory of our dear lord." A third said: "See, I bring all of mine, even to the wedding ring of my dead wife."

There was a contention among the Devil worshippers to be the first to cast treasure into the fire. The charmed flames caught up the gold, and streamed high above the corpse, casting upon every eager face in the vast room a fierce yellow glare. The Devil's body shone incandescent through its cerements. Still the fire was fed by hands innumerable, and still the old man stood beside the pyre, smiling strangely.

The Devil worshippers now cried out with hoarse voices: "The will! the will! Let us hear the last testament of our dear lord!"

The old man opened a roll of asbestos paper, and began to read aloud, while the hubbub of the great throng died away into silence, and the angry roar of the consuming flames subsided into a dull murmur. What the old man read was this:

To my well beloved subjects, the whole world, my faithful worshippers and loyal servitors, greeting, and the Devil's only blessing—a perpetual curse!

Forasmuch as I am conscious of the approach of the change that limits every active existence, yet being of sound mind and firm purpose, I do declare this to be my last will, pleasure, and command as to the disposal of my kingdom and effects.

To the wise I bequeath folly, and to the fools, pain. To the rich I leave the wretchedness of the earth, and to the poor, the anguish of the unattainable. To the just, ingratitude; and to the unjust, remorse; and to the theologians I bequeath the ashes of my bones.

I decree that the place called Hell be closed forever.

I decree that the torments, in fee simple, be divided among all my faithful subjects, according to their merit. But the pleasures and the treasure shall also be divided equitably among my subjects.

Thereupon the Devil worshippers shrieked with one accord: "There is no God but the Lord Devil, and he is dead! Now let us enter into our inheritance."

But the old man replied: "Ye wretched! The Devil is dead, and with the Devil died the world. The world is dead!"

Then they stood aghast, looking at the pyre. All at once the gold-laden flames leaped in a blazing column to the roof and expired. And forth from the red embers of the Devil's heart there crept a small snake, hissing hideously. The old man clutched at the snake to crush it, but it slipped through his hands and made its way into the midst of the crowd. Judas Iscariot caught up the snake and placed it in his bosom. And when he did so the earth beneath us began to quiver as if in the convulsion of death. The lofty pillars of the funeral chamber reeled like giants seized with dizziness. The Devil worshippers fell flat upon their faces; the old man and I stood alone. Crash followed quick on crash on every side of us, but it was not this time the concussions of thunder; it was the hopeless sound of the tumbling of man's structures and fabrics, and the echo from the other worlds of this world's crack of doom. Then the stars began to fall, and the fainter lights of heaven came down upon us like a driving sleet of frozen fire. And the children died of terror; and the mothers clasped their dead babes to their own cold breasts, and hurried this way and that for shelter that was never found. Light became black, fire lost its heat in the utter disorganization of Nature, and a whelming flood of chaos surged from the womb of the universe, and swallowed up the Devil worshippers and their dead world.

Then I said to the old man as we stood in the void: "Now there is surely no evil and no good; no world and no God."

But he smiled and shook his head, and left me to wander back through the centuries. Yet as he disappeared I saw that high over the ruins of the world a rainbow of infinite brightness stretched its arch.

In the history of mankind there is no grander subject of investigation than that of the career of the great Aryan family, which, starting from its rugged Asian home, has encircled the world, founding successive empires, ever foremost in the arts of peace and war, and in the race of civilization, and evidently destined in the future to dominate the earth. The events now taking place in the East wear a new and picturesque significance when viewed in connection with the past. It is probably at least five thousand years since the European Aryans left their brethren to the east of the Caspian; and now we see a fragment of the Teutonic branch returning by new and circuitous paths, and over-throwing a realm of their Hindu kindred four thousand years old; while the Slavic branch has gone back by nearly the original route to recoccupy its ancestral seat, and Saxon and Slav are preparing for a death-struggle, the prize of the victor being the original home of the common stock.—Nation.

OUR OWN POETS.

Interview.

My mother drew me to her at the gate,
Kissed me, blessed me, and I walked away
To take my chances bucking against Fate,
Or else to fall, like many, by the way.

I looked not backward, but I knew she stood,
With hand above her tearful eyes, to gaze
On me, erewhile she prayed I might be good
And be her boy at home in future days.

That's all. What was there else 'twixt this and that?
Ah, well. I did not fall, or, falling, rose again—
Stung back to manhood by my mother's kiss—
And fought my daily battle, hand and brain.

And then? Well, then—it is my tend'rest theme—
I got another woman's kiss upon my mouth
And was again a boy; as in a dream
She brought me love and warmed it with her youth.

West round the world we wandered half the way,
And built our home, at last, upon the verge
Where wide Pacific flings the eastward spray
Through the full music of eternal surge.

And she? I think there was a funeral,
And since that day the house is very still—
Although her shadow hangs upon the wall—
And I have lost the essence of my will.

Oh, no, I am not feeble yet with years,
But, sometimes, what the women give they take.
They send us forth and bring us back with tears
And keep us always living for their sake.

And that is all the story you've to tell?
Yes, all. Oh, well! Of course you fill it in
With little things which, here and there, befall;
Of joy and folly, piety and sin.

These had their days and hours, and minutes too;
But, mostly, over all, around, above,
I have possessed—though simple, it is true—
Two honest women's everlasting love.

Now, you may take my property and place,
And then come back and take away my life;
But you can't rob me of the crowning grace
I borrowed from my mother and my wife.

J. W. GALLY.

To S—.

In haven hid 'mid fairy bowers
On dreamland isles of Night's strange sea,
In temple clad with speechless flowers
That wreath and climb the elfin towers,
I sink to sleep, to dreams of thee.

On dreamland isles the white stars glow,
The flowers bloom as they bloom in June,
The faint soft breezes perfumed blow,
And Ocean sings in surges low
A monotone of mighty tune.

There I may own thy tropic face
As mine alone on those sweet isles;
There I may know thy soul's best grace,
And in a long and sweet embrace
See heaven born amid thy smiles.

Though through the years in earthly sight
I may not kiss thy lips so leal,
I may not own thy eyes' dear light;
Yet on that land, amid the night,
Devoted at thy feet I kneel.

SAN FRANCISCO, January.

SIGNA.

When Thou Art Near.

When thou art near,
The wild pulses of my heart
Will throb and bound—
Rebound—yes, and bound again
At thy voice, which gives no pain.
Ne'er a sorrow, ne'er a dart
You throw to wound.

When thou art near,
All the darkness turns to light,
To one bright day.
Though to thee I may not speak,
I may listen to thy voice—sweet
As the music of the night
When mermaids play.

When thou art near,
This dull, weary world of care's
A paradise.
When away, no joy, no rest,
My soul for ever is oppressed,
Unseen by men, marked with care
By angel eyes.

SAN FRANCISCO, March, 1879.

MORA.

The Aztec Plains.

On Arizona deserts, where shadeless palm trees seem
A weird realization of some dim, unpleasant dream,
Amid the lonely wilderness of barren, trackless sands,
Are silent ruins, bearing still the trace of Aztec hands.
Grim palms, like spectral Ishmaelites, stand round the broken walls;
On broken wall and fading mound the desert mirage falls.
Time was—the present ruins bear the story on their stone—
When grass and trees and flowers were in this forsaken zone;
Where gleaming engines sped across a waste, unpeopled plain,
The Aztecs knew of bending trees and fields of waving grain.
By convex sacrificial stones, by hearths for ages cold,
By sherry rings and painted shards, the Aztec tale is told;
The drifting sands have yielded up the secrets of the dead;
Words graven on the broken stones of ruins have been read—
Vocal of streams the Aztecs brought to fertilize their lands,
Of living streams that waste, and wane, and perish in the sands.
The ruins speak of Aztec homes, of skill and patient toil,
Of husbandmen and garnered stores, of corn, and wine, and oil.
The change—no record yet reveals the causes of decay,
No traces indicate the time, the toilers passed away;
Encroaching sands lie over all, the desert veil is spread
Above the cities of the plain, the cities of the dead.
Beyond the plains, in purple seen, the mountain summits glow,
Fretted with sombre piñon pines and pinnacled with snow;
And still from pinnacle and dome, when summer days are long,
The snowland streams come leaping down, the limpid water throng Trace of the Aztec! Yes, for still their aqueduct remains
In sturdy scars on cañon side above their ancient plains.
Swart grangers, prehistoric moons, beheld their harvest
Their threshing floors were strewn perhaps in days of old
Now, rushing by their wasted farms, the speeding engine
And buried homes in Aztec land seem only things of old.

MERCED, February, 1879.

ACCORDING TO SHAKSPEARE.

A Captious Character Sketcher Among the Oakland Belles.

"If we offend, it is not with our good will.
That you should think, we come not to offend,
But with good will."—A Midsummer Night's Dream.

"There is a kind of character in thy life
That to th' observer doth thy history Fully unfold."—Measure for Measure.

The subject of this sketch appears before me a beautiful vision—a picture starting from its frame with all the vividness of actual life, and impressing me with that same sense of awe, that hush of reverence, that I always feel in looking upon a masterpiece. A more complete or many-sided girl it has never before been Oakland society's good fortune to welcome than this glorious realization of our wildest imaginings. Her début was made just before Lent—usually an unfortunate time, but here we have the somewhat remarkable instance of Lent's being forgotten in the contemplation of so much varied loveliness condensed into such small space. Don't imagine, however, that she can be called petite. On the contrary, her presence is extremely commanding—almost martial. To lovers of Homer I should describe her as was Juno—ox-eyed—except that the translated term bears so little poetry in it. "Diana's lip is not more smooth and rubious" (Twelfth Night, I, 2). The nearest approach to a likeness is in a fine copy of "Roxana," the original of which she has undoubtedly admired in the Villa Farnesina, at Rome, only perhaps this breathing image has a greater depth of brow and thinner lips. Her hair is almost the exact tint of Roxana's, where "the painter plays the spider, and hath woven a golden mesh to entrap the hearts of men" (Merchant of Venice, III, 2). It is a very peculiar blonde and changes color from day to night. How I should love to see her in a passion once. I can just imagine the flash of those blue orbs, her drops of tears turned to sparks of fire, the straightening of her elastic figure, and the scorn she would express—and wanting not a word. In accomplishments she acknowledges to nothing in which she does not excel—painting, singing, and conversation. Her conversational powers are extraordinary. There is a peculiar fascination which I can't describe, but in her graceful company you forget that you stand before the rage—the belle. The ease with which she draws out opinions, suggests ideas, turns subjects from dangerous points to more pleasant experiences is wonderful. And here again the chief charm is, that it is all done without your perceiving how or in what manner. She speaks seldom of herself, yet is far from avoiding the subject. There is an essence, a flavor of good breeding, a strain of innate gentleness about her which, like delicate perfumes, proclaim the rose so softly on the still night air. You feel that the "manner of her life" does "unfold her history," because it is so free from oppressiveness. In a fine picture it is a serious fault to have any detail so forcible as to attract especial attention. So in the harmony of her nature you notice only the general effect. I doubt if among the many ardent admirers who have lately flocked about her half a score can tell the color of her eyes, the components of a costume, or a set expression. Everything is smoothed and blended into perfect symmetry. She is a lady who would never be compelled to repulse undue attention, for her peculiar Eastern training admits of no familiarity. In opinions, although she is disposed to be somewhat philosophical, she steers widely of "rights." She has very well determined opinions on historical matters, and expresses them to whomever of her acquaintance she thinks can appreciate them. Her motto is, "Che sara sara" (whatever is to be, will come), from which I infer her to be something of a fatalist. A peculiar gift of sarcasm belongs to her, but without malicious sting. Her humor is of a very high order, and yet her gentleness tones down her strokes so beautifully and sweetly that resentment can not show its head. You may feel, in conversation, that she is gently making fun, reproving, or giving an opinion which effectually knocks a request you opined making, and yet her smile assures you all the while that no harm is meant. This paragon is not an overdrawn or strained description, although allowance may be made for my dazzled daze, but this I choose as a fit preface to a short description of our beauties and celebrities. What faults she may possess I know not of. She has not lived in Oakland long enough to discover them. Not to this century does she belong, but the seventeenth, and the days of Rembrandt. With hopes of a long and happy reign let me drink

"Her health; and would on earth there stood
Some more of such a frame,
That life might be all poetry,
And weariness a name."

"By Heaven, that thou art fair is most infallible, but—"
Love's Labor Lost.

"And who having unto Truth, by telling of it, made a sinner of thy memory."—Tempest.

This picture is somewhat marred in effect through having attracted so much attention as to have been cut from its frame by thieves, and held for a long time in seclusion. Imagine a statue, not the dull white things of days gone by, but the latest colored fancies of that wonderful Roman school—a statue in all respects, a beautiful statue in justice, but still a statue. And why, do you ask, is she so cold, so dead, to all common passions? Has life no interest for her? Was she always thus? No. Not twenty summers have passed that golden head since she was a light-hearted, happy child, romping all day beneath the pines, scaring the hares at noontide from their sagebrush coverts, or bathing her dimpled feet in the cool snow-water of a mountain stream. Why, then, so changed? In one fell word the fearful portent doth appear. Europe, O dread Europe! how much have you to answer for! Now for that simplicity and naturalness,

"A marchand des modes is her oracle,
And Paris her earthly paradise."

She is a perfect blonde, with all accessories. Her manner is very dignified, and, until known well, she is much feared by timid young men—other than whom we have none. It is claimed that her mannerisms are the result of diffidence. She seems naturally fitted to a carriage, and shows one off to excellent advantage. Indeed, it is then that the "dignity" is best elaborated. Her dancing is, to put it mildly, exalted; and, in fact, she seems ever waiting in fit costume and position for an artist. Although Hill gets on so nicely, Rosenthal could not exist in such a frigid atmosphere, nor can I think the reception he would get would serve at all to thaw his reserve. This lady must, however, be approved by all students of Chevreul in regard to the excellence of her ideas of dressing. Her toilets are generally perfect, except with an occasional and seemingly impossible tendency toward the statuesque. Her favorite author is Tennyson, and, forsooth, it was quite the thing, just after her return from Europe, for admiring and wondering friends to present her with a copy of the Idylls of the King with a certain passage conspicuously denoted. Beyond the laureate's stilted and ponderous style no literature can charm, no conversation interest or please her; hence, what wonder that we poor, common clay fear to approach her in kindly talk, or do ought but gaze in silent marveling. She belongs to "The" Club, of course; gives receptions, makes calls on a few favored ones of the "blues," skates spasmodically, but beyond this her life is wrapped in repose.

"But that your royalty
Holds idless your subject, I should take you
For idleness itself."

"Why, I'll exhibit a bill in the Parliament for the putting down of men."—Merry Wives of Windsor.

"Would it not grieve a woman * * * to make an account of her life to a clod of yardward marl? Adam's sons are my brethren."—Much Ado About Nothing.

"She will sing the savageness out of a bear."—Othello.

Number three is a strange being—very, for she is the only lady in our set who is wholly without desire for a husband or a lover, and who has already announced her intention of remaining in a state of single blessedness. Men (her brothers) are to her subjects for study and contemplation, and women, too, for that matter, only she does not as readily adopt sisters as brethren. A very peculiar being, truly. Her hair is brown, not very dark, contrasting light blue eyes, beneath the brow so massive, as needs be to balance a non-retiring chin. Her features are very irregular, and yet the result, due to great expressiveness, is pleasing. She dances if need be, but would prefer watching others, commenting the while on occurrences of the ball room in very paragon style, which shows her to be familiar with the organizing machinery of thought and its expressions. Her authors—oh, dear! I can never get them! They are mostly black letter, and very deep; and the deeper, the more kindly does she take to them. She has some very peculiar ideas of reforming the world. Men are tyrannical; women are poor, abused creatures—abused by all others wrongfully and without warrant; but for her all humanity is fit game, as you would believe if you heard her sing. Her style is something odd, and therefore refreshing in these days of sameness. In fact she has a style and fashion all to herself, which I must own differs very materially from that of most ladies. Whoever has been honored with her attentions once, in the line of her fair discourse, will never regret it, and must needs credit her with a masterly mind. Everything, the commonest occurrence, takes in her gothic brain a grotesque and weird cast of countenance. This comes of German poets and philosophers. She paints—not as an amusement, but for the purpose of improving—her mind. In very truth, so everything she does is with the avowed purpose of additional culture. But where is it all going to end, is what is now agitating our little world. It is anything but reassuring to a fellow, after he has been trotting himself up and down for her inspection, trying (in vain, perchance) to show off all your good points, and keep your blemishes as far as possible in the background, to have those cold blue eyes regard you, while you are nervously awaiting the verdict, with a steady, thoughtful, half inquiring gaze, as an entomologist watches the squirming object through which he has but just thrust a pin, and wonders in what case he will place it away. That is always my feeling; but if I continue to allow her to study me, to learn all my ways and means, to get my thoughts checked off, all my little imperfections laid bare, to know beforehand what my impressions are about to be, going to be, how long will she continue? where will conversation come in? She will degenerate, like Coleridge, into monology. She asks questions now, but she answers them mostly herself. What bothers me is, what will be the result when she ceases to ask questions? Gods defend us! But by that time perhaps the human mind will have been gradually cultivated up to that long looked for point, when spoken language shall be no more, but thoughts shall be communicated by silent impressions of the brain. Two gifts she holds, but holds so strangely that I know not if they be gifts or not. One is acting—this is hysterical. The other is singing—and this in turn is gymnastical. But if all is said that can be said,

"This will outlast a night in Russia,
When nights are longest there. I'll take my leave."

DROMIO.

The entire Bible has now been translated into the Turkish language, which is spoken by 150,000,000 people. Only 149,000,000, however, will read the new version, and become good Christians.

ARCHERY NOTES.

Now that the spring skies are looking clear again, the archer takes his bow from its case, straps on his quiver, and sends his arrow whistling toward the gold. Last year was the initial period of archery on the Pacific slope; this year will see those early seeds bring forth good fruit.

A few weeks ago a party of archers met in solemn conclave in Oakland, and decided upon having an archery tournament. Mr. Frank C. Havens was elected president and Mr. Daniel O'Connell secretary of the Executive Committee, in whose hands lie the arrangements for this grand gathering of archers. The grounds where the shooting is to take place have not been as yet selected. As each club will have its marquee on the ground, the spectacle of a dozen or so tents with the club flags displayed, the brilliantly painted targets, the ladies and gentlemen with the badges of their respective clubs, will form a unique and interesting picture. Archery is essentially a sport wherein the ladies stand an equal chance for the honors with their male competitors. The gold arrow has often in England been carried off by a lady, even when the opponents were archers of long experience and unusual skill.

The tournament will take place in the first week in June. There will be prizes for the clubs and individual archers. The club cup will be shot for at ranges of thirty, forty, and fifty yards, at the regulation target, forty-five inches in diameter. The prize for the championship will be contested at a sixty-yard range, at the same target. Prizes for the best archers at the various ranges will also be given, and the committee have ruled that no single archer can bear away more than one prize. If the winner of a match at a certain score has already won a prize, the next to him in skill can claim the award. The ladies' prizes will be shot for at twenty and thirty yards, but of course those who are ambitious, or who rely upon their powers at longer ranges, can shoot at all the targets.

The Bow Club, of Oakland, of which Frank C. Havens, Richard Bush, Charles, Henry, and Albert Havens are members, is a strong body, and will turn out a very formidable team for the tournament. Frank Havens, unless some Robin Hood as yet unknown turns up, is certainly the crack shot of the Pacific Coast. Frank has shot twenty out of thirty arrows into a twelve-inch target at thirty yards, and this is hard to beat. This club shoots its practice matches at Frank's ranges, on Vernon Heights. The ladies of the club are working hard, and by June will "arch" well.

The "Merry Foresters," of which Dan O'Connell is president and William L. Eyre secretary, have a range at Adam's Point, and promise to "make it warm" for the "Bow Club" when the cup is fought for. There is one lady in this club who has made such extraordinary progress that, if her nerves are steady on the match day, the lady's gold arrow may possibly fall to her lot. Another Diana, it was whispered among the ladies at the practice matches on Saturday, has hit an onion at sixty yards. This was alarming, but nobody knows how many onions she dispatched before piercing the fragrant bulb.

The Mills Seminary Archery Club, which numbers about fifteen young ladies, has gone into hard training. It is said that Mrs. Mills herself is quite an adept at drawing the long bow, and that the good lady exercises daily in increasing her proficiency in this respect.

The Robin Hood Club of San José, of which Mr. George Babcock is president, and in which I believe the ladies have a majority, are said to do some good shooting. They will uphold the cause of the Garden City in June.

Nathan Josephs, on Clay Street, has introduced the Telt-ham bows, which are preferred by many to the Highspeed or Ayers. He assured the writer a few days ago that the demand for archery tackle is so great that his large stock is rapidly diminishing. Mr. Josephs has offered a fine bow, arrows, and belt to be shot for at the tournament.

OAKLAND, March 28, 1879.

QUIVER.

The Hermit of Lake Merritt.

Oakland society has had of late a very interesting subject under discussion, namely, the little suppers and lunches given by the recluse of the lake. The charming Mrs. W. has declared that the broiled kidneys prepared by the recluse are in themselves a strong source of attraction to his semi-aquatic abode. Mrs. H. and Miss S. have found that those little patés, which the recluse mysteriously obtains, are the very perfection of the cuisinier's art. These "little feeds" are very pleasant affairs. Thackeray tells us that he had never found a poor Irishman who didn't have a poorer countryman to arrange his affairs, conciliate his creditors, and transact his business generally. So it is with the recluse. He invariably has in his train some impecunious foreigner, who does the chores about the house, who, in consideration of the crumbs that fall from his patron's table, keeps the garden in order, and gives an air of ton to the establishment. The master is said to have a great weakness in the line of widows. Having been a widower several times, he strongly affects the society and cheering presence of those ladies who have buried their husbands, and who are in the enjoyment of comfortable incomes. He is decidedly on the marry, and though peremptorily and indignantly refused by a young and wealthy Spanish belle, who was visiting Oakland, and to whom he wrote a most sentimental and pathetic appeal for her heart—and property—the old man's cheek, so to speak, hasn't decreased a particle, but he feels as confident to-day of the effect of his "fine old English gentleman's manner" on the female brain as when he was a young swell rambling down Piccadilly. This same recluse is in every sense of the word a society man. Mrs. M., the prize at the Grand Central, has been exposed to his fascinations, but has so far succeeded in not being led to the altar though, the temptations are very strong. Miss S., who is so very, very pretty, has looked kindly on the recluse—hardly kindly, though rather compassionately—and the "old boy," as his friends delight to call him, has hinted about orange blossoms and wedding favors, and enlarging the cottage, and hiring a few English servants, "by Jove." I have headed this little gossip "The Hermit of the Lake," though the "old boy" is not by any means a hermit. He is very jolly and very sociable, and may marry well and be happy before the close of the year.

ENTRE NOUS.

PRATTLE.

A correspondent, noting a statement made in these columns, to the effect that the prevalence of twaddling braggarts in American political life disgraces and belittles us in the eyes of civilization, is of the opinion that another statement in the same issue disgraces and belittles us even more than the braggarts do—the statement, namely, that “the average United States Senator is not fastidious in his friendships, scrupulous as to his instruments, nor over-respectable in his family relations.” The only question of importance is this: Is the assertion true? If so, the blame attaches, not to him who utters it, but to those of whom it is uttered. There is nothing disgraceful in the truth except the fear of it.

This correspondent, more patriotic than wise, should study to so broaden his understanding as to include much of the ground now occupied by his feelings. Let him learn that truth is better than anything in this world or the next—better than love of country, better than country, better than any form of government, better than liberty, dominion, and glory. Let him learn that, within the limits of their influence, the severest censor of his country is its foremost benefactor, and its loudest laudator its worst enemy. Patriot, wouldst thou serve thy fatherland? Cultivate, then, the habit of uttering whatever thou art most reluctant that its enemies shall know. So shalt thou attain to be stoned to death, but in the clearer light of the after time it will be seen that the wielded hands of thy persecutors have but builded thee an honorable monument, the stones whereof shall be passionately kissed by pilgrims' lips which said “Father” to the savages that flung them.

In a recently tried case against a local bank, Mr. A. A. Cohen began his argument for the plaintiff with a parable from the Gospel of St. Luke.

Disputing for a doubtful soul,
The devil quoted, almost whole,
A chapter from the Sacred Book,
Then met Saint Peter's startled look
With: “Who than I more keenly feels
The truth of all the Word reveals?”
Cohen, his purpose to achieve,
Quotes what himself does not believe.
Accept, O Cohen, this rebuke
From me, the devil, and Saint Luke.

“Wealth has its cares, but we are quite willing to assume them for the sake of the position it gives us.”—Financial Editor of the Bulletin. The date of publication of this philosopher's Book of Aphorisms will be duly announced in these columns. It is now approaching completion—that is, he has finished the foregoing brilliant apothegm, and has only to write the rest of the volume. He is the golly-be-John-dangest rough-and-tumble thinker that the century has turned up, and don't you forget it.

In “pure intellectuation” the philosopher of our vespertine contemporary is run pretty hard by that matutinal mage, Brigadier-Gen'l John McComb, of the Alta; but when it comes to clothing thoughts that breathe with words that burn a hole in a blanket at fifty paces the latter is distinctly inferior to many a leaner man, as was most lamentably apparent when, as Grand Marshal of a Fourth of July celebration, he undertook an extemporaneous address in place of the Orator of the Day, who had the misfortune to be shivering drunk. “Flow citizens,” began the burly warrior, “accustomed as I am to handling the sword more than the tongue, this glorious nation, less than a hundred years hence, was the tributary providence of an effoot monarchy; instead of which the patiment of sentriotism is incoherent in the American heart!” At this point the great man's oration triumphantly died for its country, the orator standing statuesquely silent like a tallow monument erected to its memory.

Says Fitch: “I'll draw my longest bow
This Ingersoll to overthrow.”
The devil heard, and lightly laughed,
Then shouted, down a mining shaft:
“Bob's tackled by the fellow Fitch,
And I'm to pay!—make hot the pitch.”

It is probably not the fault of the members that the coming ball of the San Francisco Art Association is announced as an “elegant” entertainment to be given under their “auspices.” One smells the hand of the reporter in that kind of diction: “elegant” is a term from the lexicon of penury, and “auspices” belongs to the vocabulary of ignorance. It only remains for indigence to explain that the entertainment will be given in “palatial” apartments, and for uninstruction to add that it will be an “ovation.”

The crop of poets who sing of Spring will be larger this season than last. They began a month ago, thinking the rains were nearly over, but nature's tardiness has enabled them to write several poems each, instead of one, and has also brought to the fore some scores of bards who had not intended to write at all, but were beguiled by the protracted opportunity. With copious protrusion of tongue and abundant confusion of legs, these industrious people have ground out an irritating quantity of “extemporaneous” rhyme (relating mostly to vegetation—which they are pleased to call “Nature”), and a good deal of it will be sent to the newspapers, owing to advice of injudicious friends. In addition, the writer of this has knocked off a few verses himself, which several persons in whose judgment he has confidence have assured him are not wholly unseasonable, nor altogether unworthy of print.

It is increasingly apparent that when the news goes blazing and thundering across the continent that General Grant has set his foot in San Francisco, that gentleman will find himself not very much to his surprise, perhaps) the centre of the most powerful and least reputable political uprising that the extra-mural malefactors of the country ever devised for purposes of plunder. The man who does not now perceive how all Grant's movements since he left the White House two years ago have been arranged, by or for him, with the one definitive object of his reëntering it two years hence, may justly boast himself impenetrable to the light of events, and fortified against the assaults of reason. There have before been notable feats of electioneering, but this rascally ingenious plan of roping-in the rulers of the Old World as platform statuary and “honorary vice-presidents” forges a clear length ahead of anything hitherto attempted. The scheme has no political parallel, and the only neat thing in “enterprise” that nearly matches its crafty audacity is the devil's plan of getting himself so advertised in the pulpit that his name, the nature of his business, the seductive quality of what he has to offer, and his alacrity in serving parties at their residence, are matters of familiar household knowledge in quarters whence he hopes for the largest orders.

“If this oppressive instrument
Is ratified, it's my intent
To pull up stakes, by Jove, and go,
With all I'm worth, to Mexico!”
Says Mr. Brown, who seems to think Unreal estate, if taxed, will shrink.

The repairs on the Jeannette will cost Mr. Bennett $40,000. Add to this sum the expenses of the expedition and the value of the vessel, deduct the price of the North Pole, and in the remainder you will have the amount of Mr. Bennett's contribution to the cause of Arctic exploration. The loss to his associates will probably not exceed twenty-five or thirty lives—men in moderate circumstances can work for science pretty cheap nowadays when so many gentlemen of wealth are willing to incur nearly all the expense and risk.

The Watt mine, in Nevada county, has been closed, the managers not caring to invest any more money in improvements necessary to a continuance of work which the adoption of the new Constitution, with its liability-of-directors clause, might compel them to definitely abandon. This gives the thirty-five or forty laborers hitherto employed more leisure to expound the merits of the Workingman's Constitution.

Chief Moses is expected on the steamer George W. Elder to-day. This lecherous scalp-holder is thinking of making his home in the northern part of this State (Oregon has become too parching for him) and has come down to consult his attorneys as to the effect of the new Constitution. Double taxation is his special and particular aversion, and he wants to know whether a scalp on which the tax has once been paid by the gentleman (or his executors) whose head it would fit can be again assessed against the gentleman whose roof-tree it adorns.

It is a knotty question that Chief Moses propounds, and must be determined, not by construing any single provision of the new instrument, but in the spirit of its general intention, which is to tax all kinds of property, real, personal, and imaginary, a great many times indeed, both where it is and where it is not. The only section of the new “organic law” that appears to bear directly upon the scalp question—and that not in a way to relieve the person in present possession—is the one allowing a rebate, or drawback, on poll-tax, under conditions not very clearly defined in the new o. g. This section, that able jurist, Mr. Psalmuel Williams, of the Bulletin, interprets (unselfishly, no doubt) to the advantage of the taxpayer who has but part of a head.

By the way, if the new Constitution should be adopted—and the Post is vigorously opposing it—there will be four days (from Thursday noon, January 1, 1880, to Monday noon, January 5, 1880) when the State will be absolutely without a government or officer of any kind. No court of record will be in existence, no judge in office to make an order, grant an injunction, or issue a warrant. Nobody will be liable in purse or accountable in person to anybody else for anything which it may be his pleasure to do, to be, or to suffer; and if the hand which now points out this peril to the good and opportunity of the wicked be not then incarnadined with gouts and clots and blobs of local poets' blood, it will have basely abdicated its critical function, shaming alike the powers that urge it and the sentiments that guide.

It will be a blessed season of cold and pitiless vengeance, and it shall go hard, but every nuseman of the uncanny lot shall offer his broad soles to the horizon, spread his fat fingers, and shiver out his pellucid ghost to squeak and gibber unscanable meters to the moon-blasted fens and frog-noxious morasses of the Mission—haunt of the gloomy Stuart!

“Dr.” C. C. O'Donnell and a fellow named Bates are going East with a brace of Chinese lepers for public exhibition in the giddy capitals of the Atlantic seaboard. The judicious showmen, determined to please all tastes, did not hamper themselves with a rigid and inelastic standard of merit in selecting talent for their entertainment. One of their attractions, a fat and well-liking person, is supposed to be a recent convert to leprosy, the only outward and visible sign of his change of heart being a sea-green complexion of exceeding splendor. The other sportsman is iridescent, beaded, clatter-boned, mealy-meated, and crummy to the verge of dissolution. It is believed, however, that these worthy members of an ancient and honorable disorder—the neophyte and the magister mysteriorum—are in reality only one of the “Doc tor's” jaundice patients, before and after treatment, respectively.

A letter from the Bureau of Statistics in Washington has been received at this office, asking for a statement of the professions and other callings represented in the recent constitutional convention. Nobody about this paper has the time to look into the matter as carefully as its importance deserves, but it is hoped the following report will be found valuable so far as it goes:

Beerstretcher practices law upon fools,
Vacuquerel sweats on the roast that he rules,
Freud on the corset doth sew and sew,
And Bonnet arranges the furbelow.

“I say, Tom, why didn't you come to my house-warming?”
“Why didn't you invite me?” “How punctilious! Didn't you hear the fire-bell?”

“Wild young men and criminals,” says the society reporter of the Call, in the charming, jerky style of which he is the foremost living master, “have, when arrested, on several recent occasions, in this city, given the name of prominent citizens as their own.” This is not justifiable in the wild young men and criminals, but the natural desire to keep their own names and misdeeds out of the Call's weekly record of social events must be frankly acknowledged as a mitigating circumstance.

Mr. Clitus Barbour—for whose first name might be substituted a word which, it is hoped, no one will have the hardihood to suggest—is good enough to swear “as God lives” that the advocates of the principles of the Workingmen's party shall be heard, or every street in California shall run with blood.” Well, we will choose the blood; but see here, Clit.; while we are paddling about in that liquid you fellows have got to stop arguing, or it's no bargain. We are not going to get our feet wet and be called anthropophagous old salacities at the same time. Oh, no!

Gussie Wax, the other day,
Married, so the papers say,
And a wit of great renown
Dazed and tickled all the town;
For his unexpected joke
Fell as falls the lightning stroke
From a sky without a cloud,
Over traffic's dusty crowd,
Darkening the noonday blaze,
Stillling all the city's drays—
Nature's wit, compounded right,
Half amazement, half delight.
Even so this joker's jest
Startled while it charmed each breast.
“What his jeu d'esprit?” Attend,
Mark, digest, and comprehend:
When Miss Wax's name he heard,
And to wed that she preferred,
Spake he not a single word.

Wits, ambitious more than others
For distinction o'er your brothers,
Recollect his fame's the brightest
Who can hold his tongue the tightest.

“You are too severe on my friend,” expostulated a tender-hearted gentleman, the other day, to a rather censorious writer, mentioning the name of a local poet; “the poor fellow is in almost the last stage of an incurable disease.” “Too severe!” was the warm reply; “can you point to a line of mine in which I have asserted that he was getting well?”

A good deal of satisfaction is expressed concerning the malevolent astuteness of Messrs. Hansbrough and Gibson in spoiling the gigantic hoax devised by Sam Davis and Chester Hull. Well, they didn't. The only hoax these ingenious gentlemen planned they successfully executed in making the public believe they had planned a hoax. Your rogue is never so little to be trusted as when confessing his rognery.

A stock sharp of the good old days
The crown when Ralston wore Went South e'er the Bonanza craze,
Returned when it was o'er.
This rusty old Peruvian
Knew naught of things Diluvian.

He opened at the same old stand
And shouted Ophir wild;
“Hold!” roared his partner—“stay your hand—
Jim Flood is long!” He smiled, Explaining: “By attacking him,
We'll learn what blockhead's hacking him.”

Consistency is the base and spurious imitation jewelry that ornaments common minds. It evidences the lowest order of talent, and the most cowardly of mental and moral organizations. A consistent Christian is bigoted, dogmatical, and stupid. A consistent politician is an old party, brass-bound bottom, covered with barnacles—he is a Bourbon, a fool, a Democrat. A consistent editor is one of those double-humped dromedaries of the press that thinks he must always remain a donkey because his father was an ass. Consistency is impossible to the man possessing a progressive, thinking, self-reliant, original mind. Conditions change. New facts are presented, new ideas are formed, and new conclusions arrived at. The man who will not admit this fact is dishonest. If he will not accept the conclusions he is an idiot. If he will not frame his conduct in accordance with his convictions he is a moral coward. We never see a consistent man that we do not desire to kick him. It is better to be right to-day than consistent with yesterday.

To the list of clergymen who are endeavoring to resist public opinion in the interest of the Chinese invasion we may now add the name of the Reverend Doctor Bowles. This new Universalist preacher seems anxious for the distinction of a quarrel with the Reverend Doctor Kalloch, reminding us of the person who had the ambition to be recognized by the Duke of Wellington—and who was. We are now compelled to admit that Doctor Guard, a Methodist, Mr. Bowles, a Universalist, and Otis Gibson, a Congregationalist, are the three particular bulrushes of the clergy who are endeavoring to dam Niagara. If any other minister desires to have his name enrolled in this dam business he will please send it to the ARGONAUT.

Mr. F. Hassaurek, of Cincinnati, has written another book, drawn from his experience and observations at Ecuador. It is a romance, having the title The Secret of the Andes, with the scene laid at Quito, about sixty years after the discovery and conquest of Peru by the Spaniards. Atahualpa, the last of the Incas, left at Quito a great hidden treasure, in the existence of which the Ecuadorians and Peruvians religiously believe, and for which they have vainly searched for centuries. The object of the book is to prove that Mr. Hassaurek did not steal it while United States Minister at Ecuador.

There are two kinds of men that tell the truth: the force of circumstances and the other for a

A HELP TO FREEDOM.

It was in the days when what is known as the Fugitive Slave Law was in force; when an escaped slave could be taken in a free State as lawfully as upon his master's own plantation; when the officers of the Government were bound to make arrests, and hold a negro till he could be proven; when a man aiding such escaped slave was liable to fine and imprisonment as though he had been a thief. But by the secret link that binds one sympathy to another, slaves were aided and assisted. Food, shelter, and transportation were furnished them. They were passed along in the dark from hand to hand till they reached Canada. This passage in the dark to freedom was known as "the underground railway." Not all who made a practice of helping the trembling slaves along were known, but most were marked, and the practice was frowned upon by the authorities. The name "Abolitionist" came to be a term of reproach next in spite and loathing to "nigger."

My grandfather, Elisha Baldwin of Ohio, was one of these Abolitionists. A man of principle and of upright life, besides being a deacon deep in the rigidity of Presbyterianism, he could not but have the respect of his neighbors, though many hated him, and the little playmates of my mother used to tell her, their lips curling with scorn, that her father was "an Abolitionist." Those days are long gone now, but to-day one of the old stories stirs my memory—the story as I have heard it over and over, and many another like it, too. My mother has told me about it many a time. She was a little thing, six, may be seven, years old. It was the first snowfall of an Ohio winter, and she ran out the next morning, mittens on her hands, and red woolen hood tight over her head, and her light curls falling from under it over her shoulders. She was a hardy child, and a fearless one, besides being the youngest of a large family, or she would never have been allowed the freedom out of doors that she always was. The snow was a beautiful light to her blue eyes, tired of the dust of summer, the glorious hues, and then the bare twigs of the later autumn. So she frolicked about in it like a playful kitten, till at last her little feet wandered away from the old brick house that stood like a dark blotch upon the pure white landscape. On and on she skipped till she reached the edge of the wood, and into it further and further by way of the path, upon whose edges in the early spring she gathered the first Ohio wild flowers.

Suddenly she stood transfixed with fright; her heart clutched itself, and she would have cried out but that the sound choked in her throat. Five negroes were huddled together round a small fire, their black faces shining like dead coals amidst the snow. It was a terrifying sight to a child who had scarce seen a negro in her life before. With a start one looked up.

"My Lord bress me!" she exclaimed, being an old woman with grizzled eyebrows and great fat cheeks, holding in her lap and covering with her shawl the head of a small and slighter woman who neither moved nor spoke. "It's one ob de little angels," she added, clasping her hands.

With a smothered oath one of the men rushed forward and seized the child in his arms.

"Don't yo' hu't dat chile, Gawge," called the old woman; "don't yo' do it."

"Yes, I will," he answered, in a low voice; "I done kill her ef she's sent hyar fur to spy."

"What fur yo' don't know I got as much to lose as yo'? Gib dat chile to me." And the man carried the limp little bundle toward her and delivered it into her hands, black on the backs but white on the palms. "Yes," she began, comfortingly smoothing the white cheeks, "dat Gawge he's a mighty good boy, an' he wouldn't hu't yo' fur a meal o' vittles, honey. Don't yo' be scairt, now, little missis; ole Victory done tole yo' de truf. I spec' may be de little Ohio gals tinks a nigger's de bad man, sure nuff."

"How'd she come way froo de woods?" suggested one of the men, suspiciously. "Somebody must 'a' brung her."

"Tell de ole Victory, now, honey, who brung yo' froo," said the old woman, in a petting tone. "Twas a young man, now, warn't it, honey, wid a fine ring blazin' on his finger, an' a gold chain dangle?" He tole yo' to fin' Victory an' Em'ly, didn't he, honey?" And at this the woman with her head under the shawl moaned and turned her head, and the old woman put her hand down as if to comfort her.

Gathering so much of courage as yet remained to her, the little wanderer turned her eyes from the scowling black faces above her and hid her head on Victory's fat shoulder.

"It wasn't a man that brought me," she sobbed; "I brought myself."

"An' what was his name?" persisted Victory, hushing the head on her lap.

"I tell you, it was nobody," said the little girl, growing indignant. "These woods belong to my father, and I come here often and often, though never before in the snow; and if you please, good niggers, to let me go home, I'll never, never, never come again."

A little murmured moan came in a broken, smothered voice from the folds of the shawl: "Oh, I hoped it was him; I hoped so."

"Mother," said George, fiercely, "ef Em'ly done goin' to keep dat up ebery day, I wish to gracious I neber brung her."

"Yo' Gawge, yo' hush, now; yo' don't know nuffin', yo' idgit! Nobody but her own mudder know how Em'ly feel. Nobody but a woman know how to feel fur anudder woman, ennybow. Lemme tend de po' gal, Gawge; she sufferin' like she done come to de bad place a'ready," and she laid her great hand on the heaving shoulder and quieted it.

"Now, little gal, yo' jes' tell us who yo' be," said one of the other men, joining in the conversation.

"Yes; what's yo' name, little pritty?" asked Victory, persuasively.

"Elsie Baldwin," answered the little girl, bravely.

"Bress de Lord for eber and eber," said Victory, bringing her hands together with a loud clap; "but Gabe an' Gawge, I do b'lieve de chile am Mas'r Baldun's baby! An' where does yo' live, honey? In de humbly brick house out yonder? Oh! de little lamb, de little white lamb! 'Clar to goodness, boys, 'tis Mas'r Baldun's baby. Stand away dar from dat fire an' let little Missis warm her hands, an' stir de coals a leetle, jes' a leetle, Gabe; white folks neber see no smoke; all keepin' snug in de house dis col' mornin'."

The woman with her head under the shawl stirred and said nothing to her herself again. The men looked at each other, nodded, and turned away. She sat up in a moment, nursed her knees, and turned a vacant gaze in among the trees. Her eyes were large and dull, and her curling hair was matted in her neck. She was lighter than the others, and her hands were small and delicate. Her mouth was partly open, and her under lip had dropped a little, disclosing the row of even, white teeth; and she shivered miserably and moaned like one who suffers a dead pain.

"I'm so very cold," she whispered finally, while Victory watched her anxiously; "I think all the time I'm freezing, an' there's such a gnawing at my stomach."

"Never yo' min' nothin' Em'ly, honey. We'll be clean froo it all in a few mo' days, an' in Canady dere'll be plenty to wa'm an' plenty to eat, an' de little feller, Em'ly, 'il be crowin' in yo' arms, an' we'll be free. Oh! de good Lord, dat lets ole Victory be free at de las'!"

"But there's such a gnawing here," said Emily, placing her hand on her breast, and swaying backward and forward. "It's my heart that aches an' aches, and I've heerd the white folks say the yaller gals hadn't no heart. Oh, they don't know, they don't know!"

Under the yellow of her skin there was an ashy paleness, and her eyes were bloodshot. A tear forced itself beneath her lash, and, rolling over her cheek, plashed upon the hand clasped across her breast, but she never heeded it. Pretty soon she moaned again:

"I wish I was back at the old place, mother. I don't care if I'm never warm nor have a bite to eat again. I don't want to be free, mother. I want Mas'r Henry. He'll never know his baby, an' he tole me over an' over it should be free. Oh, I want to go back, I want to go back!"

"Em'ly, chile, yo' don't know it, but I tole yo' over an' over how 'twas. Don't yo' tink ole Marse John tole Victory her little chile should have freedom, too, an' look at yo' now, Em'ly, fur all his promise. An' Marse Henry goin' to be marr'd, too, next month! I tell yo', ole Missis have yo' sold fo' one yea' mo', an' some udder man buy yo' case yo're a fine, likely gal. An' yo' gettin' de lash kase yo' wasn't sprightly no mo', an' sent off wid dem common niggers, like Mandy and Lize. Ef yo' heart's broke in two, now, Em'ly, dat would smash it, suah. Now, heah to yo' mammy, Em'ly."

Emily burst into a passion of tears, and sobbed on her clasped hands, while great drops of sympathy fell from Victory's cheeks. Finally, Emily wiped her face. "It know it's all true, mother," she said. "If we could only be gettin' on, and not lyin' here among the snow freezing an' starving. If it wasn't for the other little life in me playing with my heart-strings I should have died a week ago. My spirit's all gone, an' I feel like another gal—all broken down an' tired."

"De good Lo'd!" said old Victory, "but here's dat little un a listenin', all ears an' eyes an' mouf. Sich talk ain't for sich a little Missis. Come, now, what yo' folks doin' dis mornin' dat you run'd away in de cold, darlin'?"

"I didn't run away, though I don't think ma will quite like it 'cause I came so far," said Elsie. "But they're all in the kitchen, cooking up a great lot—ma, and Mary, and Harriet, and Julia, and Ellen, the hired girl, and they said I was nothing but a bother. It's for some poor folks just come to town, and they haven't had a thing to eat since yesterday noon time, ma said."

"Yo' got a good mammy, chile. Mighty few white folks got feelin's fur niggers. Bress de Lo'd ebery minute in de day, little gal, dat yo' hadn't de luck to be born wid a black face. When de souls go a flyin' an' a flyin' roun' de earth, sometimes dey gits in a black body, sometime in a white body—jes' as it comes; an' once in, dey neber git out till dey come befo' de great throne, an' den de Lo'd he'll say: 'No matter, children, 'bout de bodies; de souls is white all froo, jes' alike.' But de black skin has drefful times heah, little Missis, an' sing praises dat it didn't happen you was a nigger!"

"No," said Emily bitterly, "nobody cares for niggers—not even God. They've got no feelin's; whip 'em, and starve 'em, and curse 'em. And yet Marse Henry was always kind," she added in a broken voice; "never spoke cross words to me. Oh! how I wish I was back on the old place! 'Pears like the col' and the hunger don't strike in as they ought to, 'cause I'm so col' and so hungry here," and she struck her breast despairingly, and her teeth chattered, and her lower lip dropped again.

"Oh, yo' po' gal! don't yo' know Marse Henry done yo' de mos' hahm? Not de once yo' got de lash on yo' shouldahs hu't yo' half so bad! Keep up, Em'ly, fur yo' ole mudder, till we done git de udder side into Canady. Ebery minnit now I's spectin' yo'll have a bite to eat, an' when de dark done come agin' we'll be on de underground way to freedom."

In a moment more little Elsie was taken by George near to the edge of the wood, where she found John, their own hired man, with a great basket on his arm, and it dawned upon her then who the poor folks just come to town the day before must be.

As she walked along in the path behind the crunching of John's boots a great many things that had been a puzzle to her were made plain. The whole thing of the mysteries in the kitchen, the bundling away of clothing, the still whispers that sometimes seemed to fill the house from garret to cellar, the nods, the consultations, the busy days, the bread and the great piece of bacon that never came on the table—all of a sudden a strange world seemed to open to the little girl.

When she reached home, and John had communicated in a few words her discovery, she was bidden never, never, never to speak of it, as nobody knew what hurt might come of it; and a little motherly caution was added about going so far into the wood again.

She had heard stories—since she was old enough for stories—of the slaves and their cruel treatment, of their endeavors to escape, of their capture; and on this day of discoveries she was busying her brain with putting two and two together. Once she broke out with: "But, ma, in Ohio they never have any slaves, and why?" but her inquiry was smothered away under her mother's hand, with a warning: "Hush, hush! my little girl musn't talk!"

Toward night it began to snow again—large, soft, muffle-like flakes. They seemed like words spoken without sound. They were watched anxiously by all, and the low sky was appealed to for encouragement so often. The sleigh in the barn had quilts, and provisions, and bricks ready for heating stowed away in its bed, and little Elsie knew that all things were waiting till dark to take the runaway slaves to free soil. And John was on the lookout somewhere in the wood.

But just at dusk he came in hastily, and as the candlelight struck his face it seemed filled with concern. Again the house was filled with whisperings and their echoes. "The poor, poor creature!" exclaimed the women, one after another, and father shook his head, and mother went to fixing up the little room that was partitioned off in the garret, and her face was very sad. "There is no help for it," said father, "we must run the risk and bring her in. Elisha Baldwin, deep-dyed abolitionist already, must take a deeper plunge, and harbor the runaways under his own roof. It is very unfortunate." And then old Victory came in the back way, and Emily's head was on her shoulder. "Em'ly's took! Em'ly's took! Marse Baldun," said she, and her voice was all of a tremble; "I was afeared she'd neber hol' out till we got ober into de promise lan'." And Emily's eyes were fixed and dull, her brow was drawn, her lip dropped, her chin shaking, and she moaning, moaning. She was taken up into the garret, bottles of hot water and blankets carried after her, and so she was put to bed.

About midnight little Elsie was awakened by a sobbing and wailing outside the door of her little chamber. It was the voice of old Victory.

"My po' leetle gal!" it said, "yo' ole mammy done goin' to leave yo' in de pangs. My Lord, I neber done nothin' to make eberyting come so ha'd. Don't let my leetle gal go back, Marse Baldun. It's Marse Henry done got her heart down Souf, but he just tink she like what else he own—de horse in de ba'n, de dog in de kennel. What he care 'bout her love? Don't yo' let her go, Marse Baldun, yo' heab to me."

In a moment more the sound of a sleigh deprived of its bells was heard running off the back way, and then the little girl drifted away into sleep again. Yet next morning the sleigh was under cover, as usual, and John, though a little tired in the eyes, was about at his work. Oh! yes indeed; but Elsie knew all about it, and quiet as a little mouse she meant to be, never opening her mouth on the subject to her little playmates. But now that she knew, and they knew that she knew, she did think they might talk right out before her, and not be so very mysterious, nodding and hinting at things, and consulting with each other, and not taking her into confidence at all. For instance, grandmother said: "A dreadful mess we've got into, girls! I declare I'm just nervous for fear it may turn out a serious case, and I know it wouldn't do to call in either of the doctors here."

Now what on earth did that mean?

Then grandfather said at table, "I learn that another lot of corn will come up before long, and may be expected any time the next six months. Same section of country as the last, but it was thought best not to ship too large a lot at once."

Grandmother answered, "Father, father, do be careful. This is an unpleasant business to be mixed up in. I know that suspicion is turned in our direction now, and what if discovery should make that suspicion certainty?"

"I know, Jane, I know; but I feel it's the Lord's work. I can't take back my hand now that I've once put it out."

And Mary, and Harriet, and Julia were busy at sewing on garments almost small enough for Elsie's great rag doll. They were fashioning little woolen slips and skirts of flannel, and once Harriet said she didn't mind about her plaid shawl any more, and she guessed they'd better wrap "the baby" in it. Day after day grandmother kept herself in the garret, and she slept up there nights; and coming down to her meals, she would tell how worried she felt, and how Emily had a fever, and wandered in her mind, and how the red spots in her cheeks kept coming and going, and she knew it was owing to cold and exposure she had suffered.

Elsie grew very indignant indeed, and finally spoke out her mind to grandfather, who said indulgently to grandmother that he guessed Elsie might as well know. And so she was bidden to walk quietly up to the garret, where Emily lay in bed. Emily had been very sick, but for a week she had been better. Her eyes looked very large, and her cheeks thin, and her lips pale; but she was a very pretty girl, with black hair curling over her forehead, and small fine features. Wonder of wonders! when the covers were turned down, upon her arm lay a little, little saffron-colored baby, with its fists shut up tight.

"I'm sorry she was a gal, missis," said Emily, earnestly, "cause bein' a gal she mus' suffer so much, anyhow you can fix it; but I'm goin' to do all I can fur her now I brought her to the world. I'm jus' as 'fraid somebody'll fin' me an' take me, 'cause I want my baby to be free. Marse Henry was mighty good to me," and here a spasm passed over her face; "but I never want my baby to be a slave like her mammy." Then she brightened, and said, in an embarrassed, shamed way, "Don't you know she got blue, blue eyes? Oh, I do hope she'll be real white!"

And then in another week the sleigh ran cautiously up to the back door again in the dark, and this time Elsie was up and awake.

"I'll never forgit what you done fur me," said poor Emily, sobbing. "I never could pay you if I had the money; but I pray every night that if ever you come to misfortune I'll know it somehow, jus' fur the pleasure of bein' sorry with you. Missis Baldun, I could jus' git down an' kiss your feet," and the tears streamed over her cheeks.

The sleigh drove away with its burden, and ran off into the night. "Thank God!" exclaimed the mother, with a sigh of relief. And next morning the horses were stabled, the sleigh was in its place. John sat down to breakfast as usual, and not a word was said during the whole meal or at any time thereafter before Elsie about the fugitives. But she learned long afterward that in three days more two men had come with a bang to the front door. "You will know your own marshal," said one, haughtily, "and recognize his authority. I have come for the niggers named respectively, Victoria Hunt, George Hunt, Gabriel Britton, Samuel Pettit, and the wench Emily Hunt, whom you are suspected of harboring."

"I have never heard these names before," sturdily spoke out old Elisha Baldwin. "I do not know the whereabouts of these people. If I were put upon my oath I could not even guess at their whereabouts, but I should judge that every slave headed for Canada as soon as the shackles were struck from his limbs."

As the two took horse at the gate, the younger and handsomer was heard to mutter between his teeth: "Damned old abolitionist!"

KATE HEATH.

FRENCH BONBONS.

Magistrate—You seem to have been drinking, and to have left your wits at the bottom of your tumbler.

Prisoner (blandly)—Impossible, your Honor; I never leave anything at the bottom of my tumbler.

Child (pointing to a bronze group representing a terrific combat between a lion and a crocodile)—What are those things doing, pa?

Father—Talking politics, my dear.

They were discussing the venerable theme of money and happiness.

"Money does everything for a man," said one old gentleman, pompously.

"Yes," replied another one, "but money won't do as much for a man as some men will do for money."

Reigning beauty to her hair-dresser—Mrs. X's hair is really thicker and longer than mine, but I am not a bit jealous. It doesn't seem so.

The rare, pale Margaret is a very orderly young lady. Not in vain has her fond mamma impressed upon her the advantages of keeping an exact account of all she does. For instance, on one page of her neat little pocket-diary is the following account current:

1879.	Cousin Jack.	Dr. to Me.
Feb. 13.	To 1 kiss given him.1
" 20.	By 1 " returned, Cr.1

A fond father marries off his daughter. When the matrimonial contract is about to be signed his prospective son-in-law rubs his thumb and fingers together in expressive pantomime, and says, gently but firmly:

"Viellard, antez en haut!" (Anglice—Old man, ante up!)

The fond father produces his daughter's marriage portion of 20,000 francs and hands them over, and the young man shakes him warmly by the hand.

"I don't see what he had to shake my hand about," said the fond father later in the evening to a guest; "he must be as stupid as a goose. I have 100,000 francs; Cecilia is my only child, and if he had not accepted that money to-night he'd have got the money when I died; as it is he'll only get 80,000 francs. He must be an ass to throw away 20,000 francs that way."

The regiment was ordered out for target practice, and to the unspeakable disgust of the instructor the soldiers made bull's-eyes on barns and centres on the planet Uranus.

"Gimme that rifle, you cross-eyed son of an old smooth-bore Tower musket," yelled the instructor, "and watch me."

He fires and misses the target, the bullet striking about two hundred yards short, and a quarter of a mile to the right.

"That's the way you gawks do," says the instructor, calmly, putting in another cartridge; "never make any allowance for windage—pay no attention to your elevation—nothing."

He fires again and sends the bullet over the target.

"And that's the way some more of you do—get a good aim on the mark, but when you pull the trigger, up goes your muzzle, and the ball goes up among the little stars and all around the moon, fair regent of the heavens."

Fires again and makes a bull's-eye.

"And that's the way you ought to do."

"Father, is that a goose—that big white bird?"

"No, my boy; that bird is the swan—that immaculate giraffe of the wave!"

The Magistrate—You were a builder and contractor?

Prisoner—Yes, your Honor.

The Magistrate—Then what induced you to quit that honorable profession and open a savings bank?

The wife to her husband—Oh, how good you are, how generous; how thoughtful it was of you to buy me this lovely stuff dress! But, dearest, do you not know that the unhappy silk-weavers of Lyons are starving for bread? I prefer doing a little good, humble though it may be, to gratifying myself. Take this splendid merino dress back to the store and make them change it—a simple black silk robe will do for me. Let us remember the poor!

A manager who had just returned from a brief tour in Italy with an improvised opera troupe was asked how the theatre-going public was in that sunny clime.

"Well," said he, "the public varies according to locality. At Rome the people are warm—enthusiastic; why, you have hardly uttered a note before the houses rises at you and tears up the benches. At Turin, on the other hand, no reception is offered till you are half through your piece, and then every one gets up and goes out without saying a word. I don't like singing to one of these cold audiences. No artist does."

Two rich men of the self-made variety were discussing the trials and hardships of their early lives.

"I am worth three millions to-day if I'm worth a penny, and I came to Paris in a pair of patched boots."

"Four millions is my figure," says the other, "and when I came to Paris I hadn't any shoes at all. All I could call my own when I began life for myself was my dying father's curse!"

A small boy in Belfast, whose deportment at school had always ranked 100 per cent., came home one day with his standing reduced to 98.

"What have you been doing, my son?" asked the mother.

"Been doing," replied the young hopeful, "been doing just as I have all along, only the teacher caught me this time."

Bright Little Girl—The robbers can't steal my mamma's diamond ear-rings, 'cause papa's hid them.

Visitor—Where has he hid them?

Little Girl—Why, I heard him tell mamma he had put them up the spout, and he guessed they would stay there.

EXPLODED CRANIOLOGY.

One of the most entertaining chapters in the "Breakfast Table" series is that wherein the witty professor gives his views on Phrenology, which he calls a pseudo-science. Holmes says that to locate the functions of the brains from external signs, is like fingering the outside of an iron safe to learn the nature and quantity of its contents. The Professor's interview with Bumpus and Crane is a happy description of the art of the phrenologist. It is surprising that while the progress of science has gradually been taking away what little foundation craniology ever had, it has been growing in popular estimation. Many people are ready at first sight to believe in the mental powers of a man with a big bulbous forehead. There is much mention of "broad and lofty brows" in the description of the heroes in current fiction. By means of "phrenological magazines" and "busts," the public have been made familiar with the geography of the cranium. They know where to look on the bald head of a stranger for the craniological signs of his character and capacity. This kind of diagnosis is more difficult when the hair is on; but still the outlines determine whether the subject of the investigation has a "good shaped head" or not. It is then probable that there is more or less general faith in the ability of the craniologist to feel the mind through the skull.

Doctor Andrew Wilson, in a late number of the Popular Science Monthly, has given the hollow scone of phrenology a terrible rap. By an able presentation of the results of anatomical investigation, and by clear and convincing argument, he demonstrates that the old so-called "phrenology" has no scientific basis. The doctrine of phrenology, as preached in America by O. S. Fowler, allots to the brain some thirty odd "organs," and assigns to each a separate and distinct function. The skull is mapped out into corresponding sections, each section overlying its organ and bearing the same name. The strength or weakness of the various organs of the brain is indicated by the tell-tale elevations or depressions of its osseous envelop, appearing always in conformity to the official survey. For instance, if a boy develops a happy knack of stealing, and constantly exercises his talent as he grows up, until he attains a fat office or enters the halls of Congress, what would be the phrenological consequences? It would be found that his bump of conscientiousness had been gradually absorbed until a cavity or depression had resulted in that section of his cranium. Or, to take an opposite illustration, if a man, holding the office of public administrator, should give the reins to his "destructiveness" for a few years, what would result? The portion of his brain which exercised that propensity would grow and produce a corresponding protuberance on the cranial roof. But, unfortunately, the theory is not supported by experience. The comparison of the skull of Isaac Newton's friend, Dr. Gregory, a professor of mathematics and astronomy, with the skulls of fifteen notorious murderers, furnished a notable contradiction. Gregory was a man of ability and fine character, yet by the testimony of the skulls he was equaled in benevolence by the brutal Burke, who murdered so many persons to furnish subjects for the dissecting table, while in "causality," or reasoning power, he was not up to the average of the criminals. The heads of many living men, distinguished for character and ability, completely refute the teachings of professors of phrenology.

The truth is that the surface of the human brain in no way corresponds to the fanciful divisions of the craniologists' plaster cast. It presents many complex folds, or convolutions, utterly uncomfortable to the rectilinear divisions aforesaid. The brain may be compared in this respect to the kernel of a walnut, which in form it much resembles. Again, between some portions of the human brain and its bony case large air spaces, or sinuses, intervene. In the human forehead an inch of space separates the brain from that portion of the surface which reveals to the phrenologist the "form," "size," "color," and "individuality" of the owner. Form is located upon a nasal cavity; calculation, upon a solid, bony knob. Phrenology conveniently makes no account of the large base of the brain, which is beyond its manipulation, but is known to be active.

There is preserved at Harvard University the skull of a man whose "case" is of interest in this connection. While engaged in drilling rock, an accidental blast drove through his forehead and the top of his head an iron bar of fourteen pounds weight and three feet long. He recovered in a short time, and exhibited himself for years afterward, all over the United States. Although that crowbar must have carried away several ounces of his brain, and demolished in its passage his "causality," "ideality," and other intellectual organs, yet the man's intelligence remained as before the accident.

The late researches of anatomists have shown that in the brain of the higher animals, and probably also in man, there are certain nervous centres which govern many ordinary actions. Some of these nerve centres, notably that of the sense of touch, are found to be on the inner surface of the brain, a region of which the phrenologist has no cognizance. The old craniological divisions are irreconcilable with these discoveries, and in many instances run directly contrary to the revelations of anatomy. As to size and weight of brain, anatomists have ascertained that great intellectual powers are by no means necessarily associated with unusual cerebral development. Dull brains have weighed as high as 67 ounces, while the brain of Agassiz fell short of 54 ounces, and that of Dr. Chalmers weighed only 53 ounces. Women of but ordinary intelligence have had brains over 55 ounces in weight. In weight and size of brain, the red ant is infinitely above him in intelligence.

Beyond some general inferences drawn from the comparison of widely different races of mankind, there is yet no scientific basis for the determination of the character or mentality of any individual from a superficial examination of the bony processes of his skull. W. A. LAWSON.

SAN FRANCISCO, March, 1879.

In Strasbourg two hundred and fifty people are engaged in the business of cramming geese for the manufacture of pâté de foie gras. In order to bring the birds' livers up to the proper condition of disease thirty pounds of food are required. Twenty-three Strasbourgers have the monopoly of the trade, receiving altogether about a quarter of a million dollars yearly income, nearly four-fifths of which is for the liver.

LITERARY NOTES.

In the Albemarle Street Library, London, is still religiously preserved the famous copy of Holy Writ in which Byron gave his own version of the line "Now, Barabbas was a robber," by turning it into "Now, Barabbas was a publisher." It is a book that "the world"—of authors—"will not willingly let die."

Admirers of "In Memoriam," of whom we are a hundred, must endure to be told that Mr. Tennyson had only a speaking acquaintance with young Arthur Hallam, whom he did not specially admire.

We note a revived interest in all that relates to Dr. Johnson, a distinct tendency toward his style, and a successful popular attempt to restore his social manners.

In expressing their sense of the merits of Messrs. Howells, James, Stoddard, Aldrich, and all the school of the latter-day Atlantic, the critics have exhausted over and over again the vocabulary of such words as "delicate," "suggestive," "exquisite," and "subtle;" but we have not observed any disastrous run upon such terms as "great," "robust," "large," and "healthy."

The author of The Wide Wide World has written another novel called My Desire. The Book of Genesis tells her to whom her desire should be.

M. Victor Hugo's poem, "La Pitie Supreme," has appeared. Its general drift is that the real objects of pity are not the victims of tyranny or persecution, but the tyrants and persecutors; that the lot to be envied is that of Socrates, Huss, etc., while Pilate, Sylla, Tiberius were looked down upon with pity by those whom they sacrificed. All the same we would prefer the lot of the wicked persecutor.

Mr. William Winter writes to the Boston Journal denying that he is the author of "The Under Dog in the Fight." Perhaps he is the subject.

Mr. Winter explains that some years ago a similar attempt was made to fasten upon him the authorship of "The Beautiful Snow"—that execrable bit of bosh, of whom the author is not known only because every writer accuses his worst enemy of being the man, and every man accused, guilty or innocent, hastens to deny.

The author of La Fille de Madame Angot is now strumming it upon a golden harp in the regions of the blest—where they had never heard anything like it before.

Mr. Anthony Trollope has consented to contribute a study of Thackeray to the Men of Letters series which Mr. John Morley is editing for the Messrs. Macmillan. The omission of Thackeray's name from the list of announcements has been remarked, but was a mystery to nobody who knew the reluctance which his family have to the writing of the great novelist's life. The difficulties have been overcome by putting the matter in the hands of a writer who was Thackeray's intimate friend, who remains the friend of his family, and whom his family can trust to handle the subject with gloves.

The inscription cast on a big bell just made for a church in Newark, New Jersey, thus blossoms in poetry:

Presented by Miss Abby Coe.
Praise God from whom all blessings flow.

Mr. Froude has written a life of Julius Caesar, which is to be published in this country by Charles Scribner's Sons by arrangement with the author. Julius has been dead these twenty centuries. What we need is a life of Grant.

Why under the sun should the Riverside people publish a two-volume book of the poems of James Montgomery? Does anybody really read Montgomery?

Pepys's Diary can now be obtained complete for eighty cents; also Evelyn's. These famous books are worth all the novels of a prolific year, and all the magazine literature of the last decade.

A work in eight volumes quarto, one volume to appear every month after publication begins, is announced by Sampson Low & Co., of London, with the title, The Hundred Greatest Men. It will be written by one hundred of the greatest living writers if the publishers can induce them to abstain from autobiography in writing it.

The King of Portugal has finished his translation of The Merchant of Venice, and the royal pen is now turning Othello into Portugosling.

A London bookseller exhibits with pride, crowds admire, and collectors spiritedly bid for a Bible with some of Martin Luther's handwriting in it. The circumstance that it has some of God's composition in it does not appear to materially affect its value or interest.

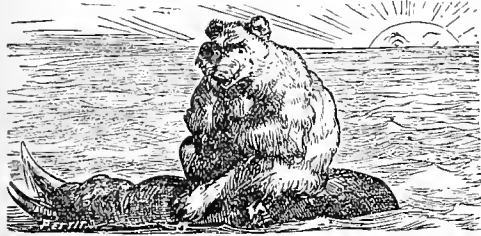

Mr. Robert Browning has a new volume of poems in press—probably a reprint from the "puzzle-columns" of some society journal.

Aubrey de Vere's new volume will be entitled Legends of the Saxon Saints. Ready in April.

If we had known that the Westminster Review had esteemed the poems of Mr. (or Mrs. or Miss) Adair Welcker, of Oakland, sufficiently important and meritorious to justify a criticism in its august pages, we should have spoken more reverently of them and him (or her) last week. It is no small honor to be reviewed in the Westminster. The Irishman who boasted that the Duke of Wellington had spoken to him (saying, "Get out of the way, you blackguard!") had no juster or more reasonable cause of pride than Mr. (or Mrs. or Miss) Adair Welcker; for that, in effect, is what the Westminster Review said to him—or her.

NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Rates of Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance. Postage prepaid. City subscribers served for 25 cents per 4 weeks. Single copies, 10 cents.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders should be addressed.
 A. P. STANTON, Business Manager.

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 29, 1879.

History repeats itself. Something less than five hundred years before the birth of Christ there appeared at Athens one Kleon, an Athenian demagogue, distinguished for his insolence and venality. He was a tanner in his youth, bred among the lowest of the people. He was of extraordinary impudence and little courage, slow in the field, but forward and noisy in the assembly; corrupt in practice as in principle, but boastful of integrity, and supported by a coarse but ready eloquence, he gained such consideration by flattering the lower orders and railing at the higher that he stood in the situation of head of a party. He was placed in command by the Athenians and won a victory at Sphacteria. Thucydides says that the reputation gained by him in this victory completely turned his head and added to his inordinate vanity. He was finally whipped at Amphipolis by Brasidas, a Spartan general; he was overtaken while running away, and killed by a Myrcinian targeteer. Kleon possessed no qualifications as a statesman, and had neither superiority of talent nor political knowledge, but he possessed a singular facility of speaking and a great command of words, which, combined with low manners, unsparing abuse of those who were better than himself, and a coarse, vehement mode of delivery, rendered him acceptable to the mob. His prominent and leading qualities were impudence and rashness. His influence and power among the masses was finally destroyed by the ridicule of the comic poet Aristophanes, who leveled at him the shafts of his satire and held him up to public scorn and contempt. These are the historian's words.

Eighteen hundred and seventy-eight years after the birth of Christ, and in the year of American independence the one hundred and second, there appeared at San Francisco an Irish demagogue, one Denis Kearney, distinguished for his insolence and venality. He was a drayman, bred among the lowest of the people. He was of extraordinary impudence and little courage, slow in a scrimmage, but forward and noisy on the sand-lot. Devoid of principle, but boastful of integrity, and supported by a coarse but brutal eloquence, he gained such notice by pandering to the lower orders and railing at the higher that he stood at the head of a party. He won a political victory and sent some fifty delegates to a Constitutional Convention. This so added to his inordinate vanity that it completely turned his head. He was finally whipped at Santa Ana by a boat builder in the employ of one McFadden; while running away, with a pistol in his hand, leaping back fences and cutting cross lots like a cowardly dunghill, destitute of moral or physical courage, he was overtaken by a German named Rule, who put a beautiful and bloody head on him. Kearney possessed no qualifications as a statesman, and had neither talent nor knowledge. He was simply a leather-lunged, brazen-faced, ignorant fellow, with abundant cheek; but he possessed a great control of blackguard phrases, which, combined with low manners, unsparing abuse of those who are better than himself, and a coarse, vehement mode of delivery, rendered himself acceptable to the ignorant foreign mob that followed him. His prominent and leading quality was impudence. His influence and power among the masses was finally destroyed by a mule, who launched at him the shafts of his satire and held him up to public scorn and contempt.

Such is the parallel between Kleon, the tanner of Athens, and Kearney, the drayman of San Francisco. The parallel is complete in all its parts between the two: of ignoble birth, of low associates, equaling each other in insolence and venality, of great impudence, little courage, forward and noisy in talk, cowardly in action, attaining consideration by the accident of a first success which turned their heads and led to their final defeat. Athens (fortunately for itself) had no daily Chronicle and Call—no mercenary, jealous, contemptible and cowardly rivalry of newspapers—to report the achievements of Kleon when he went out to combat, and to uphold by lies and misrepresentations his failing fortunes. If Athens had been thus accursed of two commercial journals, Kleon's career had been longer, and the comic poet Aristophanes had found it more difficult to put down the demagogue by his shafts of satire. Had Athens been so accursed of newspapers, the Athenians would doubtless have first suppressed the papers, in order that the destruction of Kleon had been more prompt and more certain.

The adoption or rejection of the Constitution has resolved itself into a drawing of close lines between the Kearney men and good citizens. If Kearney had remained at home, and the Chronicle had not married the Constitution to the sand-lot, and if Kearney had not made it the sine qua non of party allegiance and personal fealty that every one of his bummers' brigade should keep step to the crack of his blackthorn, there might have been a wider latitude of opinion. Kearney and the Chronicle, or the Chronicle and Kearney, have welded the two together in the indissoluble bonds of matrimony, good old father Call giving the bride away with his blessing, the Bulletin and Post acting as bridesmaids upon the happy occasion. There are hundreds of citizens who would have voted for the adoption that will now vote against it, because such a vote will identify them with the idiot band. When the worthless and vagabond element of society bands itself together and proclaims itself as the party of agitation, and becomes the party of misrule, and declares its only purpose to be destruction of private rights, it is time that those who have something unite for its protection.

This question resolves itself fairly down to a contest between the "have nothings" and the "have somethings." It is thrift, industry, economy, and accumulations on one side, against idleness, profligacy, waste, and poverty on the other. It is not a fight of the millionaires against the poor. Men of millions are beyond the casualties of political disturbances. This is the battle of the middle class against a band of desperate men who would override the law for the purpose of plunder, or who, having obtained a party and political control, would so mould legislation that they can direct it to their own purpose. Messrs. Stanford, Crocker, and the railroad magnates; Messrs. Flood, Fair, and the bonanza kings; Messrs. D. O. Mills, Lewis McLane, and the great bankers, may look with composure upon a political condition that shall disturb the money market, repress industries, depreciate values of real property, and destroy trade, commerce, and manufacturing industries. They are able to weather the storm, but the merchant, the manufacturer, the mechanic, the real estate owner, the man who has a mortgage upon his property, the owner of a homestead, the retail trader, the day laborer, how can they survive months and perhaps years of dull and hard times? Messrs. Haggin, General Williams, and the great unincumbered landowners will ride the storm, but how about the small farmers? Professional men, lawyers, preachers and rats they will—they always do—flourish; but how about the butcher and baker and candlestick maker?

There are two classes that ought to be friends, and under a normal and healthy condition of things they are. Wider apart than any other classes of society, they are mutually dependent upon each other—the idle rich and working poor, the spendthrift of wealth and the saving toiler. The poor man, while he is economical himself, is interested in having the man of means spend generously. Let this be illustrated in the career of Mark Hopkins and Michael Reese. They were poor boys, one of American birth and the other of Bavarian. Both were toilers. Hopkins aided to build a great trans-continental highway, obtained money from the General Government, from Europe, and in his enterprise expended millions among the laborers of California, and established an institution that to-day carries eleven thousand white men upon its pay-roll. The other loaned his money, sweated it for accumulations, and, like the snow-ball, rolled it up till he accumulated a great fortune. He lived alone, unmarried, at restaurants, died to save a silver groschen, and leaves no monuments or kindly memories behind him. The other laid the foundations of a palace—the best and most expensive house in America—a family mansion the like of which no king possesses. It adorns our city, a splendid monument of architectural beauty, and every thing about it, from the hewn granite of its base to the points of its gilded turret, represents labor. Every thing within it, from the beaten copper of its kitchen utensils to the beaten gold that adorns its richly frescoed walls, has paid coin to the toiler. Now which of these two men has been the poor man's friend?

If there were in our country any permanent class distinctions; if there were an hereditary monarchy with its crown lands, an hereditary aristocracy with its entailed estates, a ruling class with its privileges, a political and social line of demarcation beyond which the poor man might not dare himself to pass, and might not even hope to eradicate so that his children might pass it, then there might be justification for political agitation, that these political and social barriers might be broken down and destroyed. But—and thank God for it—there are no such differences in this country. There is no place in its political system that the native-born may not attain. There is only one office in America to which the adopted citizen may not aspire. Every honor, and every pinnacle of social or political distinction is open to the ambition of every male born upon the soil, and every white man who may choose to come among us as a citizen. As a fact, all the eminent civilians, all the distinguished military chieftains, all the men eminent in the realms of science and honored in the world of learning, have come from the ranks of the humble. We recall but three large fortunes that have descended beyond the second generation, and there is no great landed estate in America that has not been divided upon the death of its first owner that we now remember. Then, is it not a shame, and a disgrace, that any band of foreign or native-born idlers and vagabonds should combine to disturb a government so absolutely generous, and so perfectly fair to all. The very laws that enable the accumulation of a great estate, that makes millionaires possible, are those which afford the greatest protection to the struggling poor.

This form of government can not be changed except after a bloody struggle. The attempt to make it more communistic or agrarian will necessitate the calling upon the military arm for protection to guard the rights of persons and property. The first step in this direction is toward imperialism. It will be an evil day when the teachings of the sand-lot shall fruit in actions of violence, and it shall become necessary to call upon the army to suppress organized discontent. It is a mistaken idea of the German Workingmen's Club if it thinks to call out the military forces of the W. P. C. to protect an Irish agitator from having his head punched for offensive personal abuse against other and better citizens than himself or those who follow him. It is a mistaken idea of Germans, Irish, French, Italians, Scandinavians, or any other foreigners, if they think that the American people will be run over or trampled under the hoofs of any alien mob. If these ignorant people think to intimidate society by a display of their foreign uniforms, arms, helmets, flags, or braggadocio, they will awake to a bloody realization that they have been deceived by their leaders. The American people are in a very large majority in California, and when this crisis comes they will be united as one man. The foreign force will be disunited, the whole of its intelligence and wealth uniting with the Americans. Whenever this time comes for measuring arms with Mr. Antone Fischer's German Workingmen's Club, aided by all the "military force of the W. P. C." that he or his sausage-eating companions can muster, it will be driven into the bay, as Christ, in the miracle, drove the devils and the swine. If this dispatch of the German club, asking Kearney "to telegraph immediately for the military forces of the W. P. C., to protect him from further injury, as an American citizen, and agitator for the benefit of the people, (signed) Antone Fischer"—if this dispatch was not the result of a plethora of beer and blood pudding, that so muddled the thick brains of this German club that it did not realize the double-distilled and treasonable insolence of its action, it ought to be—well, no, it ought only to be held up to the contempt and derision of every sensible man. The military forces of the W. P. C. marching southward to protect an alien agitator in blackguarding American citizens!!! The farmers would set their dogs on them, and there wouldn't be a Dutchman with an inch of shirt, or coat, or trowsers covering his hind parts from his neck to his flying heels.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—In your editorial of last week you use the following expressions: "The 'German vote,' the 'Irish vote,' the 'Jewish vote,' are all expressions of a thing we despise. It is the 'American vote' that represents to us the national idea. St. Patrick parades; German, Prussian, French, or Irish military companies; foreign flags borne in processions; foreign languages taught in free common schools; newspapers printed in a foreign tongue; and all associations—except social and charitable ones—other than American we would discourage and destroy." Your argument upon St. Patrick's day, your views upon foreign companies and foreign flags, and upon teaching the languages in the schools, we understand; but we do not appreciate the reasoning that opposes the publication of newspapers in a foreign tongue. Yours, respectfully,

We will modify the article by striking out the word "destroy." German, French, Italian, and Mexican papers have a right to be published; hence, as they are protected by the law, we would only "discourage" their publication. It is our idea that everything that tends to preserve the distinctive nationalities upon American soil ought not find favor among American people. We are impressed with the great dominant idea of elevating everything that is American above everything that is foreign. When foreigners come to our country we hope to have them become Americans. They throw off their political allegiance to the king, prince, or potentate whose subjects they were, and by that act become citizens of the American Republic. If they will clothe themselves in the outer habiliments of citizenship, we desire them in heart to become American. Hence, everything that tends to keep alive their patriotism or love of native land we would discourage. If the original immigrants—as is natural—would preserve the memories of fatherland, we would allow them the indulgence, but we demand of them that these sentiments—however natural and however becoming to them—ought not to be engrafted upon their children. No "green above the red," but the American banner above the world is our motto. We respect the Englishman who comes to America and does not become a citizen. He is proud of his native land, of his English home, and we can respect the sentiment that clings to the soil and acknowledges no allegiance in opposition to the place where one was born. But we say, if he does forswear his allegiance to Victoria, Queen of England, Ireland, and Scotland, and Empress of India, then by that deliberate and solemn act he changes his nationality, and all his patriotism, and his love, devotion, and duty he owes the land of his adoption.

The German who comes to America, speaks German in his family, sends his children to a cosmopolitan school, takes a newspaper printed in German, and confines himself to a German social circle and votes a German vote, is undeserving the name of American, is not worthy to have become an American citizen, and if the test should ever come trying his fealty as between his abandoned and his chosen home he can not be relied upon. A German, French, Italian, or Mexican newspaper is an alien thing. It writes in a language beyond the criticism of the average citizen. It discusses our political and social affairs not from an American, but a foreign standpoint, and we have a right to suspect it of keeping alive memories that are not in harmony with our institutions. Foreign newspapers, therefore, we would discourage. The other things we would destroy—destroy by legal enactments, making a procession of foreign priests and politicians on the birthday of an hypothetical saint, bearing the banners of a hierarchy and the emblems of a church, a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment; a military company dressed in Prussian helmets, in Austrian equipments, in Irish green, flaunting the flag of the German Empire, the double-headed eagle of Austria, the colors or eagles of France, or any of the emblems, devices, or flags of a foreign nationality, we would imprison its members, confiscate and burn all the banners of the company, and disband the organization. Any military organization that can not parade under the American flag would never fight under it. The German or Frenchman who would educate his children in German or French in our free schools at the expense American tax-payers is, in our judgment, that kind of an American citizen that the fewer we have the better for the country. We hope these sentiments will not be regarded as illiberal. Certainly they should not be so interpreted. We desire to have Americans homogeneous; we desire all adopted citizens to become truly American, and we think that which is good enough for us is good enough for them. We would give them all the privileges we ourselves enjoy. We would accord them no other.

We have asserted before and now repeat that San Francisco is literally accursed of its daily press. There is no other institution on this coast so utterly debauched, so thoroughly licentious, and so absolutely demoralized as the four newspapers that enjoy the distinction of being the leading journals of this coast—the Chronicle, the Call, the Bulletin, and the Post. We name them in the order of their nastiness. Heretofore we have denounced these publications for their mercenary character, their selfishness, their cowardice, their personal jealousies, their vindictive quarrels. We have demonstrated their mendacity and exposed their hypocrisy. We believe they are utterly unprincipled, and in the pursuit of unlawful gains will stick at nothing. The truth of this assertion is apparent to every honest man who thinks that this entire Kearney business is attributable to the baneful influence of the daily press. Had these journals not existed Kearney would have to-day been as respectable and industrious a drayman as it is possible for an ignorant Irishman ambitious in ward politics to be. He has been lifted into a dangerous prominence by the rivalry of the journals named, and two of them are to-day, and to-morrow, and every day, by lying display type and audacious misrepresentations of his progress through the State, enabling him to do harm. Fifty millions of dollars do not represent the amount of depreciated property values brought about by this newspaper villainy. We can endure Chinese immigration, we can stand stock gambling, for both these evils have their compensations. If we had none of these newspapers it would have been better for the State. If we had respectable journals of large circulation they would have largely contributed to our prosperity. It is not of the injury to our material progress that we intended to write in this article, although we can not allow so favorable an opportunity to pass without saying that if the press had done its duty, we would not stand upon the brink of this financial and business crisis that to-day appalls us all. The Smith trial gives us the text for observations we have long desired to make.

A very offensive and most scandalous family quarrel, a family of quasi respectability, has been dragged, for no good motive, into the Criminal Court. The judge ought to be bastinadoed for not holding his nasty inquisition with closed doors. No respectable journal ought to send a reporter to the trial. Yet the four journals named are in rivalry, each with the other, to give the shocking details of this vile family scandal in their columns. The Chronicle has been heretofore accused of being the leading criminal in this direction, but now the Bulletin has come down to the same dirty work. How the proprietors of journals who claim to be gentlemen, heads of families, husbands of honest wives, fathers of young ladies, brothers of virtuous sisters, sons of honored mothers, and guardians of young children, can do this thing we do not understand. They ought to blush at their own breakfast and dinner tables for the presence of this vile literature. The Bulletin has claimed to be a family journal, it advertises itself as such, and knocks for admission to the family circle because it is clean, yet it prints all this libidinous love-making between these vile people—for what? Money. The Call, endeavoring to preserve its respectability in the editorial column by its non-committal platitudes and its empty mouthings, throws open its news columns to rival the Chronicle in its recital of all the beastly details of this beastly trial. And the Post—the poor, feeble, good-for-nothing little Post—comes sweating and limping behind, with its little lascivious tongue out, drooling concupiscence.

These journals are unfit for the family circle—unfit for a decent community. They demoralize our youth, are a vexation to mothers, destroy girls, lead boys into temptation; they are nasty; they would not be tolerated in England. The New York Herald leads the American press astray in this respect. The Chronicle is an imitator of everything bad in journalism. The Call imitates the Chronicle. The Bulletin has just now for the first time thrown itself into this horrible newspaper cess-pool. What will not these papers do for money? What quack advertisement is too indelicate for them to print? What notice is too plain for their personal columns? What lie is too bold for them to tell for coin? What thing is too disgraceful for them to publish in this disgraceful rivalry that is dishonoring them and disgracing journalism. Such a press has no influence. These journals have destroyed their power for good. No bad man cares for them. Dread of their vile misrepresentations and abuse may keep good men from public positions or from offering their services to the public for fear of being dragged into a scandalous notoriety by ribald and unprincipled mention. There ought to be in San Francisco a morning journal well capitalized, conducted by gentlemen with money enough to be independent, intelligence enough to give it able conduct, and self-respect enough to make it dignified and keep it decent. And for an evening journal, the Bulletin ought to return to its former ways when it was, if not more ably, at least more respectably conducted. We know it is said that the newspapers are as good as the community in which they are printed. We do not believe it, notwithstanding the success of the New York Herald, the Chicago Times, and the four unprincipled things of which we have unwillingly written in San Francisco. We believe that an able, truth-telling, independent journal that would not indulge in personalities, eschew sensations, give news, and keep respectable would succeed. The experiment is certainly worth the trial in a community, half of whose wealth is constantly imperiled, and its morals assailed by a quadrilateral of unprincipled and unreasoning newspaper proprietors.

Going home one evening last week upon the California Street cars, a gentleman said to us that he thought the Constitution would not be adopted if every employer would do as he did. "I employ in my store," he said, "eight men. They depend upon my capital and my business brains to find and keep them in employment. I think the Constitution will injure my business. I have therefore said to my employes that while in ordinary elections I claim no authority to direct your votes, in this election I do. The Constitution, in my judgment, perils my capital and destroys the industry in which I am enabled to give you salaries. If you vote for it you vote to destroy my business, and I can no longer employ you. This is a question vital to my interests, and unless you will unite with me in counteracting the efforts of political demagogues and agitators, I will not and can not give you work." This gentleman is a German and an adopted citizen. His position is correct and ought to be adopted by every employer.

As a rule it requires nerve to do right. It requires a good deal of nerve in this community to say anything in defense of any corporation or any rich man. Public opinion has been so debauched by a demagogue press and a demagogue class of politicians that it is a bold editor and a brave politician who dares to say that any association of wealth is not criminal; that any organized industry, using capital, is not a conspiracy against the public welfare; or that any rich man is not an enemy to the community in which he resides. This editor or public man is at once pounced down upon as a tool and subsidized servant of corporations, and is charged with wearing the collar and being the bondman and slave of the institution, enterprise, or industry for whom he would say a just word in honest defense. It is the fashion just now to suspect everybody, to denounce everybody, who is prosperous, and to brand as a criminal monopolist or monopoly every man and every organization that has been successful. In other words, the sand-lot element is in the ascendancy; it is fashionable for newspapers and politicians to pander to the mob and accept the harsh yell of its brazen throat as the voice of God. Now, what single editor of a daily journal, or what candidate for office, would dare to write or speak in derogation of that clause of our proposed Constitution that says that the consumers of water in San Francisco shall fix its price? The Spring Valley Water Company has been in existence for a quarter of a century. It has brought by expensive aqueducts, stored in costly reservoirs, and distributed through iron pipes, water from the Santa Cruz hills to our doors. Its stock is scattered over the world, and has had a fixed value growing up to par. The new organic law says that the consumers may fix the price they will pay for this water. Not the people of the State in the Legislature, not a joint commission representing seller and buyer, but the buyer alone. Now, everybody knows that this is legalized robbery; that it is practical confiscation of a valuable property; that it is unjust, dishonest, and dishonorable, and yet there is no journal—except the ARGONAUT—that dares to say so. If the same principle were applied to the venders of bread, or milk, or lager beer, or negro minstrelsy, or newspapers, there would be a row; but, in pandering to the selfishness of the mob, enlightened journalists are too cowardly to dare to tell the truth; and the politician does not live in San Francisco who would have the manliness to admit the truth in this respect, because it is fashionable and popular to aid the public to steal from the Spring Valley stockholders. The same feeling is manifested in dealing with the railroad corporations, the gas company, the banks, the stock exchanges, and capitalists of individual wealth and enterprise. All this cowardly pandering to the passions and the prejudices of the ignorant and the vulgar is sowing to the whirlwind; and in a government, republican in form, where every white male citizen may enjoy the ballot and bear arms, it is a dangerous thing to do.

The Bulletin has finally declared itself opposed to the adoption of the Constitution. It seems almost ungenerous to declare our conviction that it has been either bribed or driven to this resolution; but when we remember the history of the journal, and recall the fact that this crisis has now for more than a year been culminating; that it has encouraged the sand-lot by its silence; that it had a reporter in the Constitutional Convention; that it took no part and expressed no opinion at the critical period when opinions were forming, and waited till the indignation of the commercial classes and business men threatened to take form in action—we feel justified in saying that the Bulletin has manifested great prudence in finally arraying itself in opposition to the sand-lot. We wait to see whether it is in earnest and fights with the vigor of its earlier and better life. However, we welcome the ally, though coming late. There is work yet to do, and the Bulletin is capable of good service if its heart is in the combat. The Chronicle and Call have taken their destiny with the sand-lot. The Chronicle boldly flaunts the banner of the Workingmen's party. The Call does equally efficient service, skulking among the camp-followers in the rear to protect the wounded. There is something to admire in the fearless attitude of the Chronicle. There should be nothing but contempt for the cowardly position of the Call. A physical coward may find excuse in weak nerves; the moral coward is so for the opportunity of gain.

The Celtic, a leading magazine, proposes the idea that the Irish were the first discoverers of America; that away back in the thirteenth century the brave voyagers from the Green Island made a settlement upon the American continent, and founded a colony in that part now known as the Carolinas and Florida. And now comes the Visalia Delta and announces the discovery of a Chinese junk high up in the mountains of the Sierra, at the head-waters of King's River. Its timbers are of camphor-wood, and are copper-fastened, indicating, says the Delta, that the great interior valley was once an inland sea, and two thousand years ago navigated by Chinese. If this is so, then it does not seem quite so absurd to find the Chinese and the Irish now contending for possession of the continent. At present, however, it seems the Chinese have the best of the argument, as their possession antedates the Christian era, while the Irish are only two centuries ahead of Columbus. Question: What in the deuce is to become of us Americans, since it is found that we are only interlopers?

"Wellcock pinned a copy of the Chronicle to one of the supporting uprights of the stand on the sand-lot, expecting it to be hissed, but to his disgust the ringing cry went up, 'three cheers for the Chronicle.' 'Hurrah for the Chronicle,' burst simultaneously from thousands of lusty throats."—Monday's Chronicle.

"William Wellcock came to the front of the platform and nailed a Chronicle to one of its posts. This act was greeted with groans and cries of 'tear it down,' 'burn it,' 'put a match to it,' 'spit on it,' 'down with it.'"—Monday's Call.

It is from these journals that our community takes its facts and opinions. Is it surprising that they can not always be regarded as truthful? Is not the ARGONAUT right when it declares that they sacrifice the public good to advance their interests?

On Monday the Call found a mare's nest in the Chronicle office, and charged it with being a secret spy and enemy of the Workingmen's party. It says "the Chronicle's is not the open, the bold, the honest warfare of decent journalism." Great heavens! what a serious charge as coming from the Cœur de Lion of journalism. The Call charging the Chronicle with want of bravery is like that of the fearless jack-ass rabbit or the long-eared hare taunting the cowardice.

A FEW HINTS TO THE ENGAGED.

My friend Blank, in speaking of the Engaged, says "that there is no more insufferable condition for other people than to have to stand by and be spectators of their happiness."

There is something, after all, in what my friend says, though it can scarcely be supposed he is entirely serious, considering the advantageous match his daughter, Miss Lucy, has really made of it. The fact being assured, however, he sticks to his point about the discomfort he experiences in being a compulsory witness to "their extravagant affection." My good friend, you forget. So many things have occupied your attention since the day when you were first admitted to the family circle as the "engaged" of dear Amelia that you forget both the joy that was yours, and the "insufferable condition" that joy occasioned to the members of your inamorata's family, who received you so kindly. Pray, let us hear no more about "extravagant affection."

Long ago Charles Lamb raised his voice against the pretensions of the newly married, and held them up to scorn in various ways, in return for indignities which he suffered at their hands; but the claims and self-assertions of the would-be married have gone on unchecked since long before Lamb's time until now.

With the single exception of the bard, Bon Gaultier hight, who sang in moving verse the miseries of the lover's friend and confidant, no one has ventured to handle the delicate subject of the conduct of engaged people, either toward each other or toward other people. It is a delicate subject, to be sure, and a man might be excused for refraining to bring in the mirth-makers, who haply might select himself for the immediate subject of their laughter. There are so few who can afford to raise a laugh on this subject; so few who have not, once at least in their lives, to pass through the love-making period, and so to appear, as they say, ridiculous in the eyes of other people. It is a privilege which only old bachelors like myself (I never recovered from the blow my young affections received when the beautiful Mary, sister of "dear Amelia," threw me overboard for the bearded man of war afresaid) enjoy. We have a fee simple in the follies and extravagances of those who are about to take upon them the holy estate of matrimony—who can with impunity let "our jest among our friends be free"—and in the matter of courtship, we have a right to comment upon it as we like, because of the completeness with which we are excluded from the joys of it. I hold that my friend, who grumbles at the "insufferable condition" in which he is placed, is quite out of court. He does but see the reflection of his former self; it is an instance of the thing that hath been being the same that shall be; and, so far as he is concerned by it, there is no new thing under the sun. With me it is different. Though once in my life, as I have already hinted, I "sat like patience on a monument," smiling at the grief which the bearded man of war caused me in the matter of Mary, sister of "dear Amelia," I sighed to myself only, without declaring my passion, and had not, therefore, to go through any public exhibitions of "extravagant affection," such as, doubtless, I should have done had I been admitted to pratique, and had the Fates been kinder to me than they were. Thus, you see, I am at liberty to make any remarks I please upon the situation. No one can meet me with a tu quoque, or declare me estopped from using as freely as I like the gleanings of my experience. Let my friend, therefore, for decency's sake, stand aside and let me take his place. I am vain enough to think I shall treat the matter with a hand more tender and sympathetic than his, while I shall not the less expose what he would in his unamiability tear to tatters.

There is, then, to be noticed in the carriage and deportment of engaged persons an amount of awkwardness and restraint in the presence of other people which not only stamp them for what they are, but tend to make the whole party amongst whom they find themselves perfectly uncomfortable. Strangers—that is to say, any people but the two who are interested in maintaining the monopoly of mutual "extravagant affection"—feel almost guilty of being the occasion of so much discomfort.

They do not want to obtrude themselves on the attention of the loving pair; and assuredly, if their own personal comfort were alone concerned, they would get far out of sight of the enamoured. But circumstances will not admit of it; there must be certain rooms in common at certain times. Under no circumstances, for instance, do lovers, love they never so lovingly, quite dispense with the service of the dining-room. Common civility, moreover, requires that occasionally they should be in the drawing-room, or other place where the other members of the family are assembled; and it is on each and all of these occasions that the characteristics above mentioned are noticeable. There is in the manner and on the face of Adolphus an expression half of listlessness, half of anxiety to be agreeable in spite of himself, which strikes a disinterested observer rather curiously. He begins to think that Adolphus is unwell, that he is a genius pondering abstruse questions "even in the presence;" or may be the thought crosses his brain, as he sees the consciousness of Adolphus' absence of mind, that perchance he may have committed some crime which makes him ill at ease. Only one who is cognizant of the true state of the case can rightly interpret the meaning of that shifting glance of the eyes, that perpetually wandering to and from the beloved object, who sits uncomfortably upon some neighboring chair, and tries to play the hypocrite, though with as poor a result as Adolphus. As plainly as the expression on an intelligent being's countenance can convey a meaning, so plainly it is apparent to the disinterested unappropriated that Adolphus is chafing on the bit which good manners have forced into his mouth, and that he is wishing with all his heart he had wings like a bird, that he might fly into the garden, where he would be with Amanda. What pleasure, what satisfaction there can be in thus secluding himself with Amanda, I do not pretend to say. Would it not seem more glorious to stay in the midst of the family circle, and triumph openly and continuously in the conquest you have won? Or are there sweet mysteries, solemn rites of courtship, which none but the initiated may know, and which must be performed in so private a manner that the sudden entry of a Philistine into the room is enough to scare the votaries of Cupid from their vow-making, and to cause a trepidation that is observable long after the invader has entered. I presume it must be so, else there could not be so great, so manifest a desire on the part of Adolphus and Amanda, and on the part of Amanda's father before them, as I have already testified, to get away to some covert from the common gaze.

"Not in that room! They are in there!"

"Confound them! Suppose they are! My ARGONAUT is in there, too, and surely I may go and fetch it."

"My dear sir, you are too violent, and too inconsiderate as well. At all events, make a noise with the door-handle, so as to give some warning of your coming."

My friend enters his study to find his large easy chair vacant, but looking as if it had not been long so, drawn up in a comfortable position on one side of the fireplace, while Adolphus, who might be suspected of having sat therein, is busy seeing "why the lamp burns so dimly;" and Amanda, at the other end of the room, is so ostentatiously engaged in looking over some music, that one is bound to suppose, with Longfellow, that "things are not what they seem."

"Two are company, three none," says Marian, when it is proposed that she shall go with Adolphus and Amanda for a drive to the "Cliff House." "You are quite right, my dear," only there is the slightest possible tinge of dissatisfaction in your tone that you are of the three, and not of the two, which leads one to doubt whether your remark is prompted so much by a desire to let the company consist of the only harmonious elements, as by a wish to point uncomfortably towards the composition of the company in order to gratify yourself by enjoying their discomfort. If the tone be rightly interpreted I will pass by your remark as being cynical; if not, I cordially indorse the truism you have uttered. Engaged people do, as a matter of fact, dislike the presence of a third person, almost as much, perhaps more, than that of a large party. "A great company is a great solitude," and in it the "engaged" can be, comparatively speaking, free, almost unnoticed, whereas, in narrower limits, they both cause, and are required to give, a greater attention. I am far from being certain that the condition of the third person who is tacked on to the "happy pair" is not much more "insufferable" than theirs. If they so far consider him or her as not to talk about themselves, it will be in so forced and artificial a manner as to make their conversation less tolerable than their silence or their mutual self-appropriation. With what unblushing selfishness do an engaged couple walk off together, with a noli nos tangere expression on their faces, as though they had a monopoly of the earth on which they walk, and would resent any intrusion as the infringement of a patent right. While they choose to walk, they are as scarecrows to the timid and the good-natured, who avoid them as tabooed objects, and "steal away so guilty like" if perchance they stumble upon them.

My friend, the father of Amanda, complains—and herein, as a calm, dispassionate observer, I am compelled to join with him—of the demonstrativeness of the "engaged." "Positively, sir, I have seen them sitting knee to knee, with their hands clasped, their tongues as silent as the grave, their eyes reflecting all sorts of nonsense from one to the other, and looking like the most perfect fools outside of Bedlam."

Gently, my friend. This fault—this unshamefaced glorying, if you will—is very reprehensible. If it does nothing else, it asserts to all present, more plainly than is agreeable, that they are not happy as the "engaged" are. But I will mention the circumstance to them in a don't-do-it-again sort of way, and beg them to suppress the public exhibition of that which, to the observer, seems akin to lunacy.

Did the Captain take Amanda in to dinner? Well, it was a very gauche in the hostess to have arranged differently; but there is no reason why you, Adolphus, should sit savagely all dinner-time, saying nothing whatever to the amiable lady at your side, who is ignorant of your misfortune, and is trying to enlist your sympathies in the last report of the Society for Procuring a Change in the Color of the Ethiopian's Skin. Do not venture to press Amanda's foot, though you may think it to be within reach, under the table. You can assure her of your sentiments toward her, as well as of those you entertain toward the Captain, afterward. Meantime, though you may think to touch Amanda's foot with your own, it may happen you light accidentally on the Captain's, and some embarrassment may ensue.

Why should you be angry because an old friend of Amanda's chooses to talk to her longer than you like? Is it not enough for you that Amanda has preferred you to the old friend, to all her old friends, and only wishes not to make them feel the preference too keenly? Go to; you are unreasonable.

Again, while I recommend you not to wear your heart on your sleeve, or, in other words, not to flaunt your engagement in everybody's face, be careful how you inflict upon your friends the story of "how you did thrive in this fair lady's love, and she in yours." Your lady friends will perhaps welcome the recital, for their tender natures incline them to listen to a tale of love; but your male friends, glad enough to know that you are happy, will vote you a bore if you give them too many details of your happiness. They will be sure to discount your description of your lady love, and, ten to one, they will make fun of you, and of her, too.

As for Amanda, it would be almost presumptuous in me to offer her any counsel, yet, at the risk of offending so charming a young lady, I will venture to suggest that she should be very chary of confiding too much to her "dearest Jane." The chances are that she will say more than she intended, and there will be some additions made by lively imaginations. Let her remember she has some one else's confidence to keep besides her own. Let not the look of triumph, the communicative springs of happiness, still less the mere love of "hearing or telling some new thing," lead her into imparting thoughts which are already "engaged." Let her not exult by word or action, as I have seen some do, over her compeers who are unattached; "there is many a slip," etc. Above all, let her consider very tenderly the abnormal position in which she and all about her are placed during the term of her engagement—let not that be long; and let her try to accommodate herself to the convenience, aye, even to the prejudices, of those whom she is soon to leave, and to whom she will thereafter be glad that she showed so much consideration and self-denial. Finally, let her not on any account forget to ask me to the wedding. She may rely upon my services in the matter of giving away, of speech-making, of flinging the slipper, of drying the tears of the respective mothers-in-law, of anything, in short, which may properly and fairly be considered as forming part of the office and duty of the devoted admirer of all Amandas.

SAN FRANCISCO, March, 1879.

C. S.

ALL ABOUT WOMEN.

Modjeska's maiden name was Helena Benda; yet she never went on one in her life.

A tailor in New Orleans shot a woman because she coughed all night, and kept him awake.

A little girl, on being shown a neighbor's bonnet: "Mother says it's a perfect fright, but it don't scare me."

It takes the maiden lady of thirty-three to confess she is not so bitterly set against a man who smokes after all.

Mrs. M. C. Williams has succeeded her late husband as President of the State National Bank of Raleigh, N. C.

Can any mortal man tell why a woman will cross one sloppy crossing on her toes and the next one on her heels?

Lenten lunches, with the parish clergyman as the principal guest, are among the latest maddening dissipations of jaded society.

A charming young lady of Indianapolis is said to have a tubular tongue like a humming bird. She can talk with it all the same.

Very kind gent: "Do you know, my dear, that we have to-day the shortest day in the year?" Lady: "Very true! But your presence makes me forget it."

A young girl in Michigan, about to elope, and knowing she was too young to be married, altered the record of the family Bible, and took along the sacred volume for proof.

A writer of the gentler sex says that "a womanly woman never gets jammed, crowded, or pushed," and adds, "I am neither young nor pretty." This explains it. No man—

American girls chewed up seventy tons of gum last year. One-half of it can be found to-day sticking under mantel-shelves. The other half was carried away by the young men who go courting, and lost.

Senator Logan has the smartest wife, Senator Conkling the gentlest born, Senator Dorsey the most beautiful, Senator Sargent the strongest minded, and Senator Gordon the most distingue, but Mrs. Senator Bruce excites more comment than all combined.

A "gypsy camp" is the latest novelty in Presbyterian church circles. The enterprising young ladies of the church at Manchester, Pa., have introduced it. They camp in the Court House, wear gypsy costumes, and lie to young men about their future at twenty-five cents a head.

"What does your husband do?" asked the census man. "He ain't doin' nothing at this time of the year," replied the young wife. "Is he a pauper?" asked the census man. She blushed scarlet to the ears. "Law, no!" she exclaimed, somewhat indignantly. "We ain't been married more'n six weeks."

At first the women of France were obliged to keep their gambling a secret, but during the reigns of Louis XIV. and XV. they became less timid, and the wives of great men engaged in the deepest play at their own houses. "Such women," says La Bruyère, "make us men chaste; they have nothing of the sex but its garments."

A Boston lady, who contemplated purchasing a homestead in North Carolina, wrote to an old settler in that vicinity asking if it was true, as reported, that the grass in that country was infested with "jiggers" that creep into the flesh. The reply was: "Yes; but all you have to do is to keep your legs greased and they won't trouble you." She concluded not to buy.

Mlle. Sarah Bernhardt is about to go in for a new species of excitement. Actress, author, aeronaut, painter, and sculptor, she is now going to try a lawsuit, and it is said that she intends pleading her own cause. Some small print has insinuated that, having got other persons to paint pictures and to make groups of statuary, she has boldly signed them, and has exhibited them as her own work. She has determined to prosecute both writer and editor for libel. She looks upon it as the more serious that she got a reward at the last salon, and the article would insinuate she had obtained it by fraud.

"Atlas" of the London World says: "I was wrong the other day when I stated that the use of what may be called 'live jewelry' originated with an American lady. That was only true of its present shape, and in connection with live beetles. The idea itself, undoubtedly an original one, belongs to Mme. Musard, who startled Paris some ten years ago by appearing at a représentation de gala with a live snake around her shapely arm. The snake was bound with a thin chain to a splendid diamond bracelet, and at once became a subject of intense excitement to the audience. Several weak imitations, in the shape of live lizards, etc., made their appearance in the following days; but the fashion did not take, and it soon died out."

This is the way in which a Louisville girl disposes of a young man, according to the Courier-Journal. She says: "You have asked me pointedly if I can marry you, and I have answered you pointedly that I can. I can marry a man who makes love to a different girl every month. I can marry a man whose main occupation seems to be to join in a gauntlet in front of churches and theatres, and comment audibly on the people who are compelled to pass through it. I can marry a man whose only means of support is an aged father. I can marry a man who boasts that any girl can be won with the help of a good tailor and an expert tongue. I can marry such a man, but I won't!"

INTAGLIOS.

Our Prayer.

The prayer of Ajax was for light:
Through all that dark and desperate fight,
The blackness of that noon-day night
He asked but the return of sight,
To see his foeman's face.
Let our unceasing, earnest prayer
Be, too, for light—for strength to bear
Our portion of the weight of care,
That crushes into dumb despair
One half the human race. LONGFELLOW.

Baby Sleeps.

The baby weeps;
The mother took it from the nurse's arms
And hushed its fears and soothed its vain alarms,
And baby slept.
Again it weeps:
And God doth take it from its nurse's arms,
From present griefs and future unknown harms.
And baby sleeps. SAMUEL HINDS.

Somebody.

Somebody stood at the gate with me,
The moon was hid in a cloud;
Somebody stood very close to me,
But spoke not a word—aloud.
Somebody whispered my name last night
Out in the frosty air;
Somebody held my hands so tight
As long as I lingered there.
Somebody called me a "lovely girl"
As we stood on the frozen snow;
Somebody toyed with a tiny curl;
I thought he would never go.
Somebody kissed me late last night,
Close by the outside gate;
Somebody gazed in my eyes so bright,
With a look as fixed as fate.
Somebody knows that kisses are cheap,
And not any loss to me,
If taken when all the world's asleep,
And nobody there to see.
Somebody knows—this is not sin,
But relief from care and strife;
Somebody knows that it all goes in
To fill up the measure of life. E. E.

Pictures in the Fire.

The blazing coals were glowing bright
Upon the hearth so broad and wide,
And I was sitting in their light,
And Elsie by my side.
The tangles in her cloudy hair
She pushed aside; and just to see
More plainly where the figures were
She leaned upon my knee.
A rustic boy, with bare, brown feet,
Bright where the coals were deepest red,
Binding up roses among wheat,
She saw so plain, she said,
And then, to make me see him, too,
About my neck with witching grace
She put her arm, and softly drew
My face against her face.
Ah, is it strange I said I found
A picture that was very sweet,
But not a rustic boy that bound
Roses among the wheat?
Dear Elsie, in her modest trim,
I painted then with bashful art,
And said I saw her in the fire
A-burning in my heart.
And is it strange if new delight
Shook out to flowers our budding souls,
The while we sat and watched that night
For pictures in the coals?—Leisure Hour.

Dissipation.

A million little diamonds
Twinkling on the trees,
And all the little maidens said,
"A jewel, if you please!"
But while they held their hands outstretched
To catch the diamonds gay,
A million little sunbeams came,
And stole them all away.—St. Nicholas.

Snares.

Bright were the threads the lady wrought,
And bright the web her needles spun,
While the gay balls, upon the floor,
The little cat harried, one by one,
And in their gold and purple play
She only feints of flying prey.
Around the lady suitors pressed,
This pale with passion, that with pride;
These watched the flashing of her hand,
And those the fair face, violet-eyed;
One sang, one sued, one sighed, and each
Hung on the honey of her speech.
And as I saw the lady's smile,
Now here, now there, indulgence shed
Glances beneath a drooping lid,
Tremor of lip, and bend of head,
To me the little cat's bounding play
Had counterpart of nobler prey!

Four Sons.

A mother laid her babe to rest
Beneath the turf; her gentle breast
Rang with the better knell;
But Time his healing hand doth wave
Above the shadows of the grave,
And now she feels "Tis well!"
A mother saw the coffin lid
Close o'er her manly boy, and hid
Seemed half of being there;
But the rebellious heart, at last,
Hath learned its burdens all to cast
Upon a Father's care.
A mother saw the tomb again
Unfold to greet the warrior slain
In battle proudly brave;
She murmured not: "Twas right that I Should send my soldier boy to die
And fill a hero's grave."
A mother saw her last lone child
Reel from his midnight orgies wild
With oath and scowl and leer;
Then 'twas at last her quivering heart
Rebelling against the tireless dart
And fell despairing there.

All the Same.

The Hadji said: "If o'er my tomb
Should grasses wave and roses bloom,
And if with tears the spot should be
Sometimes bedewed for love of me,
My rest would be a blissful rest,
And I would count the Hadji blest."
No roses deck the Hadji's grave—
He sleeps beside a foreign wave—
And never woman's eye grows dim
In that strange land at thought of him;
And yet, no doubt, the Hadji's rest
Is quite as sweet as if his breast
Were by a million roses prest,
And woman made his grave her quest.
H. L. SPENCER.

THE RIVAL MANAGERS.

Mapleson, Strakosch, and the Sweet Singers.

[New York Sun.]

Official confirmation has been given of the reported engagement of Miss Clara Louise Kellogg by Mr. Mapleson to sing in London, and, as an offset to this, it seems that an attempt has been made to effect an alliance between Miss Minnie Hauk and the Strakosch troupe for the approaching season in California. So far as concerns Miss Kellogg, it has all been clear sailing; but the negotiations between Miss Hauk and Mr. Strakosch are at a standstill because of a very vital difference of opinion regarding her engagement with her present manager. The prima donna says it will be at an end this month, and Mr. Mapleson asserts as stoutly that he has the privilege of renewal. In the mean time Mr. Strakosch, deserted by Miss Kellogg, who is naturally anxious to have another hearing in London, and not being inclined to defy the law, much as he should like to secure the lady, supplements his negotiations with Miss Hauk by others with Mme. Marie Roze, another of the Mapleson prima donna and the daughter-in-law of the director himself.

Mr. Mapleson was found yesterday in the business office of the Academy of Music just before the hour when the matinee of Lucia di Lammermoor was to begin. The sidewalk of Irving Place was densely crowded with ladies, although the view from the window was somewhat obstructed by an immense crayon portrait of Mme. Gerster, wreathed in fresh-cut flowers, and surmounted by a crown of carnations and rosebuds. This trophy bore a visiting card with a salutation to "Etelka Gerster" in Hungarian. The elder Mapleson planted his stout elbows on the window-sill and conversed, with sundry interpolations directed at the ticket-sellers and other attachés. "The long and short of it is," said the manager, after acknowledging that the arrangement with Miss Kellogg had just been completed, "that Minnie will have to sail for England in a very little while now. She is legally bound to me, since I choose to avail myself of the privilege of renewal stipulated in the contract, and it is very hard to get around that fact. It is quite true that Minnie was not troublesome in England; she thought that it was the correct thing to do when she came to this country, but the public have been surfeited with such nonsense—you know the Kellogg-Roze row gave them a sufficiency of it. Then the trick Minnie played at the time she was to open the season in Boston was another mistake, based upon what she chose to assume was the 'advertising dodge' of Mme. Gerster's severe illness prior to making her debut. Because Mme. Gerster was received with such cordiality and made such a success after being seriously sick, Miss Hauk imagined that the same result would follow a physician's certificate and a delayed appearance in Boston. She was mistaken. The week's repertoire was upset, for the public were given the impression at once that the management was not going to keep its promises. This was the true reason of the poor business done—not, as Miss Hauk caused it to be announced, the disappointment felt by the people at not seeing her. In this matter, however, Minnie will find that she is vitally mistaken. I could prevent her appearing anywhere in Europe, and certainly any where in this country. She will sail this month—so her last appearance will be in Faust on Friday."

"There are three or four sites proposed for the opera house, the chief one being half of the space now occupied by Gilmore's Garden. This would cost $400,000, which is too much for us; but it can be got, I fancy, at a sufficiently moderate ground rent, which would be a good thing for Vanderbilt's heirs. See how the Duke of Westminster has profited by leasing Eaton square. Now his income is so many thousands dollars a minute that it takes away a man's breath to think of it. I find cooperation on every side. James R. Keene has subscribed $25,000 among others. Mr. Vanderbilt will probably help with the property, although the objection is made that Gilmore's Garden is too far down town. One of the sites proposed is on Forty-second Street, but nothing is settled yet. Doctor Hammond put himself down for $20,000 last night, and laughed in a jolly way when I told him there was no immediate prospect of a dividend."

At this juncture there was a tremendous rustle and rush outside. It was the onslaught of the fair attendants at the matinee. Henry Mapleson came into the office, pale but collected, and announced that the ladies had knocked over two policemen in their desperate crush at the door. "Oh, these women!" said the elder Mapleson, rubbing his hands; "they're worse than men—one can't manage them." "Excellent Miss Hauk," was suggested. "Ah!" was the smiling rejoinder, "Minnie will be a good little girl, and go back to England directly. I must let her know who is master, you know."

Mr. Max Strakosch is in Chicago, but Mr. Maurice Strakosch, who is at the Everett House, said that the arrangement between Miss Kellogg and Mr. Mapleson had been concluded. "The affair is only fifty minutes off," he added. As to Miss Hauk, what could he say to his dear friend, the poursuivant, but that Miss Hauk affirmed one thing and Mr. Mapleson another.

"Minnie," said the mellifluous Mr. Strakosch, rolling the word like a sweet morsel under his tongue, "says she is free! Mr. Mapleson says she is not—that she is engaged to him. Minnie is a dear friend of mine; Mapleson is a dear friend, too. What can one do? Max is negotiating with Mme. Roze, a fine artiste, and perhaps—but who can tell, my dear friend?—he may have both Roze and Hauk, they love each other so well. Minnie is the sweetest thing you ever saw," said the amiable director. "She isn't—not though Mapleson is a dear friend of mine—been done justice to here. In Berlin and Vienna she is a prime favorite, and I assure you, my dear sir, that I paid a premium to hear her in Aida and Les Diamants de Couronne. In Berlin it was as difficult to get seats to hear her as it is when Gerster sings in this country. People flocked to listen to her in Il Barbiere, and in Berlin she reigned not for one season, but for three. The Emperor would not hear of her leaving. As for London, her Carmen was the great hit of last season; people went as wild over it as they do over Pinafire here this year. It may be said it was the opera; but no, it was Minnie Hauk's performance. You may think, my dear sir, I praise Minnie because I have engaged her; but I have not engaged her. I only do her justice when I say that she made a greater hit last year in London than any one, not even excepting Adelina Patti. Poor Minnie has not done the 'Elsa' in Lohengrin, nor 'Aida' here, and it is sad, for she is so versatile, and one of those singers who grow upon one. As to this engagement, Minnie says she can go to California, or anywhere else; Mr. Mapleson says she can't—et voilà!"

BUTTERICK'S

PATTERNS—SPRING STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

WANTED,

BY A YOUNG LADY, A POSITION
as Governess or Companion. Can teach Piano Music, French, and English. Highest testimonials given. Moderate compensation. City or country. Address MISS M. JAY, this office.

ELOCUTION, ORATORY, AND THE DRAMA.

MARY J. BRADLEY, 510 ELLIS
Street. Ladies and gentlemen fitted for the Platform, Stage, or Teaching.

C. O. DEAN, D.D.S., F. M. HACKETT.

HACKETT & DEAN,

DENTISTS, Latham's Building, 126
Kearny Street, San Francisco.
Office hours from 8 A. M. until 5 P. M.

PRESIDENT COFFEE,
PURE MOCHA COFFEE,
PURE JAVA COFFEE,

Ground to order at

LORING'S

Dealer in choice

JAPAN AND BLACK

TEAS

922 Market St.,

Between Stockton and Powell Streets, near the Baldwin.

JENNINGS S. COX,.....OLIVER TEALL.

COX, TEALL & CO.,

REAL ESTATE AGENTS AND
AUCTIONEERS, 303 Montgomery Street, under
the Nevada Bank, San Francisco.

Auction Salesroom, H. M. NEWHALL & CO., 309, 311
and 313 Sansome Street.

J. O. ELDRIDGE, Auctioneer.

ANDREW ONDERDONK, Civil Engineer.

RARE ENGRAVINGS,
MODERN ETCHINGS.

VISITORS WILL BE ALWAYS
welcome to inspect collection.

W. K. VICKERY,

22 Montgomery Street, opposite the Lick House.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office
and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11
A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST,
removed to 200 STOCKTON ST., cor. Geary, S. F.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

DR. JAS. M. HUTCHINS,
DENTIST, REMOVED TO 737 MARket Street, opposite Dupont.

ELECTRIC BELTS,
A sure cure for nervous debility, premature decay, exhaustion, etc. The only reliable cure. Circulars mailed
free. Address J. K. REEVES, 43 Chatham Street, N. Y.

DR. JAS. M. HUTCHINS,
DENTIST, REMOVED TO 737 MARket Street, opposite Dupont.

ELECTRIC BELTS,
A sure cure for nervous debility, premature decay, exhaustion, etc. The only reliable cure. Circulars mailed
free. Address J. K. REEVES, 43 Chatham Street, N. Y.

ELECTRIC BELTS,
A sure cure for nervous debility, premature decay, exhaustion, etc. The only reliable cure. Circulars mailed
free. Address J. K. REEVES, 43 Chatham Street, N. Y.

ELECTRIC BELTS,
A sure cure for nervous debility, premature decay, exhaustion, etc. The only reliable cure. Circulars mailed
free. Address J. K. REEVES, 43 Chatham Street, N. Y.

ELECTRIC BELTS,
A sure cure for nervous debility, premature decay, exhaustion, etc. The only reliable cure. Circulars mailed
free. Address J. K. REEVES, 43 Chatham Street, N. Y.

ELECTRIC BELTS,
A sure cure for nervous debility, premature decay, exhaustion, etc. The only reliable cure. Circulars mailed
free. Address J. K. REEVES, 43 Chatham Street, N. Y.

ELECTRIC BELTS,
A sure cure for nervous debility, premature decay, exhaustion, etc. The only reliable cure. Circulars mailed
free. Address J. K. REEVES, 43 Chatham Street, N. Y.

ELECTRIC BELTS,
A sure cure for nervous debility, premature decay, exhaustion, etc. The only reliable cure. Circulars mailed
free. Address J. K. REEVES, 43 Chatham Street, N. Y.

ELECTRIC BELTS,
A sure cure for nervous debility, premature decay, exhaustion, etc. The only reliable cure. Circulars mailed
free. Address J. K. REEVES, 43 Chatham Street, N. Y.

ELECTRIC BELTS,
A sure cure for nervous debility, premature decay, exhaustion, etc. The only reliable cure. Circulars mailed
free. Address J. K. REEVES, 43 Chatham Street, N. Y.

ELECTRIC BELTS,
A sure cure for nervous debility, premature decay, exhaustion, etc. The only reliable cure. Circulars mailed
free. Address J. K. REEVES, 43 Chatham Street, N. Y.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.
THOMAS O'SULLIVAN, plaintiff, vs. JOHN LICENS, in signature and acknowledgment JOHN LINUS.
Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JOHN LICENS, in signature and acknowledgment JOHN LINUS, defendant.
You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court, adjudging that a certain deed executed by defendant to plaintiff, on March 4th, 1888, be reformed and amended in the description of certain real property particularly described in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby expressly made, and for costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded therein. Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 22d day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

(SEAL) THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By W. STEVENSON, Deputy Clerk.

JOHN J. COFFEY, Attorney for Plaintiff.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

JOHN A. WOOTEN, plaintiff, vs. JOHN WOOTEN, defendant.
Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to John Wooten, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby made, and for costs of this suit, counsel fees, and alimony, reserving for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 15th day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

(SEAL) THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.
By W. STEVENSON, Deputy.

R. THOMPSON, Plaintiff's Attorney.

GOULD & CURRY SILVER MINING

Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the eleventh day of March, 1879, an assessment (No. 35) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 69, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the sixteenth day of April, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the seventh day of May, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors,
ALFRED K. DUBROW, Secretary.
Office—Room 69, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

HALE & NORCROSS SILVER MIN

ing Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the twelfth (12th) day of March, 1879, an assessment (No. 61) of one ($1) dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 69, Nevada Block, northwest corner Pine and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the sixteenth (16th) day of April, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on THURSDAY, the eighth (8th) day of May, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JOEL F. LIGHTNER, Secretary.
Office—Room 68, Nevada Block, northwest corner Pine and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF

the Eureka Consolidated Mining Company, Nevada Block, Room 37, San Francisco, March 15, 1879.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, a dividend (No. 41) of two dollars per share was declared, payable on THURSDAY, March 20th, 1879. Transfer books closed until 21st inst.

W. W. TRAYLOR, Secretary.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.—NOTICE

is hereby given by the undersigned, Administratrix of the Estate of JOHN A. MAY, deceased, to the creditors of, and all persons having claims against, the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administratrix, at 432 Montgomery Street, Room 3, the same being her place for the transaction of the business of the said estate in the City and County of San Francisco.

M. A. NEUMANN, Administratrix of the Estate of John A. May, deceased.
Dated at San Francisco, March 10th, 1879.
PAUL NEUMANN, Attorney for Administratrix.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS,
REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.

No. 510

Bright and burning jewels often have their lustre lost, and their natural brilliancy overshadowed by an insignificant setting and improper surroundings, but when the skillful jeweler's tasteful touch gives the required harmony and the proper conditions, the bauble beams. So with the stock company of the California Theatre. I have heard these people railed at. Men about town have wagged at them a wicked and uncompromising tongue, and critics have stabbed them through and through with the pen of remorseless comment. But when that "illustrious government scout and popular military guide," Buffalo William—the Hon. W. F. Cody—comes with his new, refined, sensational drama (written expressly for him by Major R. S. Burt, U. S. A.), entitled May Cody, or Lost and Won, with real Indian interpreters, a white boy-chief of the Pawnees, a real live jackass, and realistic scenes and incidents, I see the injustice of the past standing clearly out in the light of present excellence—and opportunity and ability vault right into popular appreciation and approval. The cast of May Cody, or Lost and Won, as presented at the California, is something that both the author and the star performers ought to be—and doubtless are—proud of. As "May Cody," Augusta de Forrest actually and unqualifiedly shines; "Mrs. Stoughton" and "George Stoughton," and "Brigham" and "Ann-Eliza" and "Amelia Young," and "John D. Lee," in his five or six different shapes—and "Darby McCune," and "Black Dan," and "General Harney," and "Captain Chambers," and the "First Mormon," and the "Second Mormon," and the "Bull Whacker"—with "Bill" as the whacker and "Darby McCune" as the whackee—all these characters were interpreted in a most delightful, artistic, and talented manner, some of them being really creations from the original text. The scenery was true to life, and the tableaux—especially the Mountain Meadow massacre—thrilling bits of realism. The Indian dances, the songs, the emigrant wagons, the real live horses prancing up the ravines, the thorough disguises of the villain, "John D. Lee," and the make-up of "Brigham Young," together with the musical selections of Charley Schultz, which included "Fantasie Bilden," "Faithful Forever," and "The Devil's Call"—all went to the making up of a programme that has rarely, if ever, in fact never, been excelled at the California, even in its palmy and gorgeously golden days. Any one who would, or could, find fault with the plot, people, or presentation, ought to be summarily dragged out into the clammy glory-blaze of the Jablochkoff light, in the background, and shown his own insignificant shadow. It was worth from one dollar to one dollar and fifty cents of any man's money to hear Buffalo Bill crack that immense black snake, which the advertised bull whacker couldn't move without pulling himself up by the roots, and to see the long-haired Adonis of the plains make potato salad with a parlor rifle. I congratulate the management of the California Theatre at this most signal success of their new departure in catering to the public taste. True, the success has been at the cost of the lower portion of the house; but true, also, that it costs more to pander to the plebeian below than the patrician above, with fewer ducats in the box office and less appreciation in the end. So hurrah! for The Knight of the Plains, now in active preparation, and God help The Banker's Daughter if she ever strikes the Bush Street Bowery.

I do not think that Rose Eytinge has had altogether a pleasant visit to San Francisco this season. Her little contretemps at the California with Clara Morris was brought back to us toward the close of last week when she played the fated part of "Nancy." You've seen her "Nancy." She is much better in it than her rival, but I do not want to see her again. I can not fancy what her feelings must be when she is playing the servile mistress of the brutal "Bill Sykes." This week she has produced the play advertised at the California under the name of Kate Peyton, only she has re-named all the characters, calls herself "Kate Gifford," and entitles the piece A Woman's Life. It might be anything else, so far as it expresses any suggestion of the plot. It is Griffith Gaunt canned, and it tastes of the can. I blamed Mr. Maguire, you remember, for passing off on us Proof Positive and The Green Lanes of England as works of art. But I feel inclined to apologize to him when I see what poor stuff a leading actress like Rose Eytinge accepts as great, because it bears the names of Charles Reade and H. J. Byron. Byron has written as bad plays as anybody; in fact, Byron's successes are infinitesimal as compared with his failures; but I am sure that he is not responsible for A Woman's Life. Charles Reade may be. I do not think much of a man who translates a French play, and, simply because he has already made use of the author's brains in a novel, sells it to an American actress as a dramatization of an original story; and Charles Reade is in novel writing much what Boucicault is in dramatic literature. Rose Eytinge could have gone into the library of the theatre and picked up an "acting edition" of any old used-up play and been as fortunate in the selection. Fifty years ago, before the Proof Positive era, A Woman's Life might have astonished the hay-seed gentry of the English rural districts. To-day there is not a gallery boy who can discern a shadow of art about it, even as he understands art. What a tedious tissue of absurdities and improbabilities! "Gerald Barron" fights a duel with "Arthur Noel," in the first act, because "Kate Gifford" has exchanged horses with him. "Gerald" kills "Arthur Noel," and some time between a quarter to nine and nine o'clock, while the curtain's down, she marries "Gerald." He is jealous, and is incited to action by the absolutely childish machinations of his wife's maid. He finds "Kate" on the brink of some peculiar precipice, with somebody he supposes to be "Noel." He tries to throw her over the precipice when he is suddenly stunned. When he comes to himself he gives himself up as her murderer; but while he is in prison it is discovered by "Noel" that his wife is confined in a cave under the cliff by "John Archer," ex-lawyer's clerk, now a smuggler of the deepest dye, and who loves her and hates "Gerald." She is saved, and they are reunited. There is only one scene for Miss Eytinge, and that, of course, she does well. How fond she seems to be of being choked, and pulled about the stage! How she seems to enjoy mad appeals to the mercy of villains, back falls, fits of hysterics, and other exciting conditions, which do not in the least add to her reputation, and are beginning to pall upon the public! How she did want to fight "Fagin," and how she struggled with "Bill Sykes" in Officer Twist! And this seems to be the attraction in A Woman's Life. There is nothing for her but the scene in the cave where she tries to knock "Archer's" brains out with the manacles on her wrists. Is there any histrionic art in this? I do not think so. You know I look upon her as one of the few good actresses we have. She has the healthy stage tradition about her, and does not affect the modern society drama in the modern way, only enjoyable when perfectly done. But she seeks the mechanical too much of late, and seems to be neglecting legitimate fields in which she might make many triumphs. She wants a new play, but it must not be the Woman's Life style of drama; and for the sake of art, I hope she will not accept any more manuscripts before she forms some better conception of what they are worth. James O'Neill looked very nice in a brown wig and a country gentleman's rig, and Lewis Morrison was a polite and stiff aristocrat as ever graced the boards at Baldwin's. I do not think you would have recognized him, with his hair "hanged" for the occasion. Mr. Herne was so much of a villain in looks that it is to be wondered at that he was ever allowed into any respectable house. There was another love thread running through the piece, and Mr. Bishop was put on as a country-boy to make fun between the heavy acts. But A Woman's Life is not likely to trouble theatre-goers long.

Next week Rose Eytinge will play "Armande" in Led Astray, for her benefit on Monday night. Rose Wood will also have a benefit on Thursday night, giving us the late success at Wallack's, Sardou's charming Scrap of Paper, and an act or two of Camille.

The Honorable Tom Fitch, whose public appearance in connection with the Arizona divorce bill, the question of the immortality of the soul as against Bob Ingersoll, and the Smith scandal, is the public talk, proposes to take advantage of the happy moment and figure in the part of "Richelieu," supported by the Baldwin company, sometime in the coming week. "Uncle Tom" ought to make a sensation of some description.

The Quintet Recital of next Tuesday evening will be the last of this series, and probably the final programme of this character that we shall have in this city for a considerable time to come. The place of Miss Schmidt, who is not yet sufficiently recovered to resume her post at the piano-forte, will be filled by Mr. Espinosa, whose playing at the last soirée gave great satisfaction, and whose numbers will be the E flat Pologneise of Chopin and a movement from Hummel's Concerto in B minor. Mr. Jacob Müller makes his second appearance with The Monk of Myerbeer and songs of Mendelssohn and Goltzman, and the Quartet numbers include compositions of Rubenstein, Bach—the lovely Aria of last season—and Mendelssohn—Canzonetta in G minor. Today's matinee also brings an exceedingly interesting programme, including quartets of Rubenstein and Haydn, a piano-forte solo by Mr. Espinosa, and Gounod's effective transcription of Schubert's Young Nun.

The Opera question seems at last to be conclusively arranged, and the season will probably begin about the middle of next month. The accomplished facts are, Cary, Roze, Litta—a new and successful legere Soprano—Pantalloni—who is hailed by the Eastern press as a great Baritone—and a Tenor whose name I have forgotten. Mr. Behrens comes as Conductor. Chorus and orchestra are to be supplied from home material.

Wilhelm, who was to have taken California at the end of his Southern tour, has returned to New York. As he is in the hands of Strakosch, who brings the opera company to Baldwin's, we are not likely to hear his Stradiarius fiddle this season.

I refer to the musical festival of the Young Men's Hebrew Association, given at the Grand Opera House on last Tuesday evening, only to express my surprise that a society that can command a chorus of one hundred and fifty voices, and is sufficiently sure of a house to risk such lavish expenditure as must have been entailed by this performance, should not possess somewhere among its membership enough brains to have suggested a something better than the utterly abominable programme that was presented. I can imagine the musical long-ears of some benighted Western village taking up Roof's stupid and ridiculous Cantata and drawing it through their noses with a certain satisfying of their aesthetic appetite commensurate with the distance at which they are removed from any sort of respectable musical surroundings. But in San Francisco, and in our day, I had hardly expected this diet of musical thistles and bran to be found worthy of dishing up with the piquant sauce of gorgeous costumes, scenery, and an orchestra, and can only account for it on the supposition that its flavor was palatable to the consumers beyond what respectable music would have been. The performance was entirely worthy the composition; from the chorus singing, which was abominable, and solos, which were on a par with the chorus, to the conducting—which was probably the most absurd part of it—the whole thing was simply contemptible. Ditto the olio, and ditto the scenes from Un Ballo. The only respectable musical performances of the evening were the gymnastic exercises by members of the Olympic Club and some club swinging by Mr. Warschauer.

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

One day Bildad that's the new dog was a lyn fore the fier, were it was offie hot for his nose, and every little wile he wude haf to lift it up for to make it git cool, and then he wude lie it down agin tween his poz, pintin at the fier, like it was be fore. Uncle Ned, he sed: "Ile teech that feller a lessen, seef I dont."

So Uncle Ned he got sum whax, and made it worm and soft, and wen Bildad rose his hed Uncle Ned he lade the whax tween Bildad's poz, and Bildad he lade his chin in it and shet his eys up and smiled, much as to say: "That's a goodeel more cumfiable, thank you."

But bime by wen Bildad's nose was red hot agin, and he went for to lift it up, he cudent make it come, and you never seen sech a camp meetin pformance in ol yure life, and sech yellin glory hally looyo!

Me and Billy was took to camp meetin once, and I was too little for to know wot it was ol a bout, but Billy he sed it was the minstels. Birneby a big black feller he got xcited by the singin, and jumpt up an down and hollerd wild for a our, and no body else sed any thing til he got done and took out a grate big yaller hankchef for to whipe the swet off of his face. Then a white boy, which was wicked, he hollerd out: "Giv it back to Desdimony!" and all the white fokes laughd like they wude bust, but I think if he cudent say nothing no funnier than that it wasent harly worth while for to disturb the meetin.

An now Ile tel you a bout a other dog. Once a man had a dog wich dident have no tail, the dog dident, cos it was cut of wen it was little, but Franky, thats the baby, he is little, too, yes indeed, like puppies. So the mans dog grode up with out no tail for to waggle, but one night sum notty boys they got a peece of old rope out of a ship yard, and sum pitch, and fastend the rope onto the end of the dogs back with the pitch like it grode there. Then that dog was proud like he was a new dog on a old tail, an he went swellin a round a mung the other dogs, a tryin for to waggle it til he most broke his back. But he cudent lift it of the ground, and after a wile it was drug across a cigar wich a feller had threw a way, and it got a lite, the tail did, and had a smoke its ownself. Then the dog it lied down like it was agoin to sleep, and it sed to the uther dogs: "There wasent never enny pup wich cude be so cool and callum like me wile his tail was a house afire. I ot to be hired out to teech fortytude to Crision martars. Jest wake me up wen its ol burnt of, cos I have got a importent engagemant."

But wen it was ol of, and the fire was got hold of the cake of pitch onto the end of his back, he dident hav to be woke up, cos he woke the hwole town up hisself.

One day Towser, thats the dng, died, he got his tail cetched in a gate and houled, but pigs thay squeals, and a jackous it brays like a bras band.

One evening just after my sisters yung man had ben to see her and was gon home agin, and her and my father was a settin in the poller, there was a jakus, and it brade fritefle. Then my father he said: "Missy, nows yure time."

Then she sed: "Time for wot, father?"

And father he sed: "Time to remember yure vung man. Dident he tel you, not halef a our ago, a settin at that very pinnao, that wen uther lips and uther harts their tale of love shude tel then yude remember him. But tween you an me, I gess this fellers voice wude reminded you of him if he hadent mention it at all."

Then Missy she was the furioesest girl that ever was, but she dassant sas her pop.

One day Missy and her yung man met in the orchard and was taking holt of one a other, and me an Billy we was in the summer hous lookn out. Billy he got xcited and ran up to em a hollerin: "Get the under holt, Missy, get the under holt, and wen you trip him jest kanock his feets out forwards, and fetch him down onto his back, wop!"

Then Missy and the yung man let go, and she went in the house, and there wasent any rassel after all. That shows wot comes of takin sides, cos fair play is a jool. But wen me an Sammy Doppy was having a fite, Billy he come a long an hit Sammy in the spoot of his nose with a rock jest in time to save him from the werst lickin he ever got, yes, in deed, I wude busted his mouth soon as he let me up.

Ole Gaffer Peters was to our house one day a bragin wot a good fiter he was wen he was a yung feller, and Billy he said wy dident he go for a sojer, like Gorge Washington, which was the best fiter in the world. Gaffer he sed: "I did, William, I did. I was an officer in the war for ten year."

Then my father ast wot branch of the service did he be a dorn, and ole Gaffer he sed: "Hay?" Then my father ast a other time: "Was you Calvary, or Infootry, or was you a cannon sojer, or wot?"

Ole Gaffer he rubed his hed awile, wich aint got no hair on it, jest like a apple, only not so many fli spex, and then he sed: "It was so long ago I dont recokly jest this minit, but I bleev I was a Poltroon."

I shude spose that ole feller wude hav to lie a wake nites for to think wot a fool he is, cos one day wen Jack Brily, wich is the wicked sailer, he fire a eg at him, and it busted on his sholder, he wiped it of, and then he loked up to the ski for a long time, but cudent see nothin. Then he wocked over to Mister Pitchels house, thats the preacher, and ast more than a thousan hundred questens a bout the angels, and jest how much a angel is like a bird.

But if I was a angel I de rather be a eagle, and have my photograph onto all the green backs, and the dollars, and evry were, yes, in deed, with stickers on one foot, and a switch in the other to lick the British, hooray!

SAN RAFAEL, March 23, 1879.

The first concert of the Handel and Haydn Society, under the leadership of Mr. Toepeke, its new conductor, takes place at Platt's Hall on next Monday evening, the programme consisting of the overture of Oberon, a quartet from Verdi's Requiem, a Battle Hymn for basso and choruses, by Mr. Toepeke, and Mendelssohn's music to Racine's Athalie. The soloists will be Mrs. and Mr. J. E. Tippet, Mrs. Pierce, Miss Rightmire, Mr. Borneman, and Mr. O'Connor.

Photographic artists are not professional bruisers, and yet they mount all their customers.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Reduction in Commutation Rates, Etc.—Preparing for Summer Travel—Greatly Reduced Rates to Favorite Summer Resorts.

We have just received new schedules of rates covering the Northern Division of the Southern Pacific Railroad, the same to take effect April 1st, and which show that a general reduction has been made in local, round trip, excursion and commutation rates. The reduction in commutation rates is liberal throughout, and will no doubt be appreciated by many families who are desirous of having a suburban home on the line of this attractive route, but who may have been prevented from doing so heretofore on account of the existing higher rates. The company also announces, in anticipation of a large travel during the coming season to the various well-known Summer resorts on the line of its road, that they will place on sale at their several ticket offices in the city, through tickets to Aptos, Soquel, Santa Cruz, Monterey, Paraiso Springs, etc., at greatly reduced rates.

There is nothing so thoroughly satisfying to one's self as a thoroughly artistic and well-executed photograph; there is nothing so disgusting and worthless as a poor one. Everybody has a pride and a taste in this matter that is commendable; and those who believe that, as in a painting, the skill of the artist has something to do with the result of his work, go to the gallery of Bradley & Rulofson and pay a good price for a good picture. There is no sense in economizing on one's self in this respect. Go where you can get the best work and the best satisfaction. Price is—or ought to be—a secondary consideration.

A man walking rapidly home at night is stopped by a robber. "Hold!" says the robber, "I want your money." "Don't stop me," says the frightened citizen. "I am going after a doctor for a man who has just dropped dead!"

J. M. LITCHFIELD & Co., Merchant Tailors, No. 415 Montgomery Street, have the smallest stock and the poorest goods in the city, and keep the dearest place to buy fine custom clothing, as they do not sell their goods from thirty to fifty per cent. below cost.

An elegant assortment of gold watches and chains at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

Dr. E. O. Cochrane, Dentist, No. 350 Market Street, corner of Stockton (over drug store), San Francisco. Office hours, from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M.

Artistic novelties, manufactured from California quartz, at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

CONSUMPTION CURED.—An old physician, retired from practice, having placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for consumption, bronchitis, catarrh, asthma, and all throat and lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for nervous debility and all nervous complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it this recipe, with full directions for preparing and using, in German, French, or English. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. SHERAR, 149 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y..

STERLING SILVERWARE.—A large assortment of elegant designs at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

Modern Artists' Etchings, 22 Montgomery Street.

"AMONG THE MORMONS."

THE SPICIEST BOOK OF THE Season. Marrying seven wives in two months. By RING JEPSON. 50 cents, post paid. S. F. NEWS COMPANY.

FLOWER POTS AND VASES.

A house without flowers is not homelike. FLOWER POTS of all sizes, GARDEN VASES at the Pottery Depot, 22 California Street, S. F. JOHN B. OWENS.

"ATHALIE."

AT PLATT'S HALL,

Monday Evening, March 31, the

HANDEL & HAYDN SOCIETY

Will present for the first time in this city Mendelssohn's Sublime Oratorio,

"ATHALIE."

The Chorus of One Hundred Voices will be assisted by the favorite local artists:

MRS. J. E. TIPPETT,
MRS. J. M. PIERCE,
MRS. S. A. RICHMIRE,
MR. F. BORNEMANN,
MR. J. E. TIPPETT,
FRANK O'CONNOR, Esq.
And a Full Orchestra.

CONDUCTOR.....WILLIAM TOEPKE.

ADMISSION, ONE DOLLAR.

Tickets and Programmes may be obtained at the various music and bookstores and at the Hall. The Box Office will be opened at Platt's Hall on Monday, March 31, from 5:30 A. M. to 4 P. M., when reserved seats can be secured without extra charge.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.

FAREWELL BENEFIT OF

MISS ROSE WOOD

.....ON.....

THURSDAY EVENING.....APRIL 3, 1879.

On which occasion a most attractive bill, embracing the entire strength of The Baldwin Company, will be presented, consisting of the last new comedy, now being played at Wallack's Theatre, New York, Boston, and London, entitled a

SCRAP OF PAPER.

Produced with new costumes and scenery, in which MISS ROSE WOOD will appear in an entirely new character. The performance to conclude, by special desire, with the last three acts of

CAMILLE,

With the beneficiary as the heroine.

Reserved seats at the Box Office.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER,
F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER,
CHAS. H. GOODWIN.....TREASURER.

This (Saturday) evening, March 29th,

A WOMAN'S LIFE,

A play, in four acts, written expressly for

ROSE EYTINGE.

Last ROSE EYTINGE Matinee this afternoon March 29th, at 2 P. M.

For one night only, the first time in this theatre,

THE LANCASHIRE LASS,

Cast to the full strength of The Baldwin Company.

Monday, March 31, benefit of MISS ROSE EYTINGE—LED ASIRAY—on which occasion the great Indian Chief, Moses, and his party will attend the theatre.

Thursday, April 3d, farewell benefit of MISS ROSE WOOD.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

Immense Success and Last Nights of the Popular Government Scout and Military Guide, BUFFALO BILL

(HON. W. F. CODY).

Monday Evening, March 31, first time in this city of the thrilling melodrama entitled the

KNIGHT OF THE PLAINS,

Or Buffalo Bill's Best Trail, dramatized expressly for him by Col. Prentiss Ingraham.

BURGESS BROTHERS.—Eddie Burgess, the white boy-chief of the Pawnees. C. A. Burgess, U. S. Scout and Interpreter, will also appear nightly. Only Knight of the Plains Matinee Saturday.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—This theatre will be closed for redecoration and renovation during the week commencing Monday, April 7, and will reopen Easter Monday, April 14, with Mr. DION BUCICAULT in his great Irish play as Conn, the Shaugraun.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

Monday, March 31, and every evening including Sunday, and Wednesday and Saturday Matinees.

Another Novelty—The Acme of Originality Reached.

THE HYERS SISTERS

Combination, including

BILLY KERSANDS, WALLACE KING, WILLIE LYLE, JOHN W. LUCAS, in their new extravaganza,

URLINA,

THE AFRICAN PRINCESS, presented with Beautiful Scenery, Entirely New Music, Startling Situations, and Gorgeous Costumes.

MATINEES WEDNESDAY AND SATURDAY.

STANDARD THEATRE.

Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.

M. B. LEAVITT.....MANAGER.

MATINEE TO-DAY AT 2 P. M.

Another gigantic success of the sensation programme.—The greatest bill yet offered.

This (Saturday) evening, at 8 P. M., and every evening until further notice, the racy sketch,

FEMALE BATHERS.

The spicy sensational comedy,
FORBIDDEN PLEASURES,
Or IT'S NAUGHTY BUT IT'S NICE.

MME. RENTZ MINSTRELS

—AND—

MABEL SANTLEY'S BEAUTIES

In New Specialties.

Bear in mind, this is the last week of the genuine French CAN-CAN!

MATINEES WEDNESDAYS AND SATURDAYS.

WILLIAM M. PIERSON,

ATTORNEY AT LAW, 616 SACRAMENTO STREET,

NORTH PACIFIC COAST R. R.

Fare between San Francisco and San Rafael REDUCED TO 25 cents.

SUMMER TIME TABLE

IN EFFECT SUNDAY, MARCH 30, 1879.

Between San Francisco and San Rafael.
WEEK DAYS.

Leave San Francisco (via San Quentin Ferry).	Leave San Rafael (via San Quentin Ferry).
7.10 and 9.20 A. M.	8.00 and 11.00 A. M.
1.45 and 4.45 P. M.	3.20 and 5.20 P. M.
(Via Sausalito Ferry).	(Via Sausalito Ferry).
5.45 P. M.	7.00 A. M. and 3.50 P. M.

SUNDAYS.

Leave San Francisco (via San Quentin Ferry).	Leave San Rafael (via San Quentin Ferry).
8.15 and 10.15 A. M.	8.50 and 11.30 A. M.
12.50 and 3.45 P. M.	2.15 and 4.30 P. M.
(Via Sausalito Ferry).	(Via Sausalito Ferry).
8.00 A. M.	5.35 P. M.

† 8.45 A. M. Daily, except Sundays, from Sausalito Ferry, for all points between Sausalito and Junction.

†† 9.20 A. M. Daily, except Sundays, from San Quentin Ferry, for all points between San Francisco and Olema.

††† 1.45 P. M. Daily, except Sundays, from San Quentin, Through Train for Duncan Mills and Way Stations. Arriving at Duncan Mills at 7.13 P. M.

† This train returning leaves Junction at 4.00 P. M., arriving S. F. via Sausalito 5.40 P. M.

†† This train returning leaves Olema 1.55 P. M., arriving in S. F. via Sausalito Ferry 5.40 P. M.

††† This train leaves Duncan Mills 6.40 A. M., arriving in S. F. 12.05 P. M.

Stage connections made at Duncan Mills daily, except Mondays, for all points on North Coast.

SUNDAY EXCURSIONS.

8.00 A. M. from Sausalito Ferry, and 8.15 A. M. from San Quentin Ferry, for Duncan Mills and Way Stations.

Returning same day, arrives S. F. (via Sausalito) 8.10 P. M.

ROUND TRIP—Olema, $2 00; Tomales, $3 00; Duncan Mills, $4 00.

JNO. W. DOHERTY, General Manager. W. R. PRICE, General Ticket Agent.

SOUTH PACIFIC COAST R. R. (NARROW GAUGE.)

Commencing TUESDAY, APRIL 1, 1879. Boats and Trains will leave San Francisco daily from Ferry Landing, foot of Market Street, at 5.30 A. M. (this train leaves Sundays at 7.45 A. M.), 9.00 A. M., and 4.15 P. M., for ALAMEDA, SAN JOSE, LOS GATOS, WRIGHT'S, and all way stations.

Stages connect with 9.00 A. M. train at Wright's for Hotel de Redwoods, Soquel, and Santa Cruz.

FERRIES AND LOCAL TRAINS, DAILY.

FROM SAN FRANCISCO—15.30, 16.40, 7.45, 9.00, 10.30 A. M., 12.00 M., 1.30, 4.15, 5.30, 6.40, 8.30 P. M.

FROM HIGH STREET, ALAMEDA—15.40, 16.45, 7.50, 9.07, 10.35 A. M.; 12.05, 2.40, 4.20, 5.35, 6.45, 8.25, 9.35 P. M.

† Daily, Sundays excepted.

NOTE.—Trains leaving San Francisco at 5.30 A. M. and High Street at 8.32 P. M. do not stop at Third Avenue, Schuetzen Park, Morton Street, and Chestnut Street.

REDUCTION IN RATES.

Regular Local Tickets between San Francisco and San Jose, $1 75; Santa Clara, $1 65. Round Trip Tickets (good until used) between San Francisco and San Jose, $3 25; Santa Clara, $3 05. Excursion Tickets sold Saturday Afternoons and Sunday Mornings from San Francisco and Park Street, Alameda, to Santa Clara or San Jose and return, $2 50, good only until Monday Evening following date of purchase. Commutation Tickets, good for one round trip daily during calendar month, between San Francisco and San Jose, $20; Santa Clara, $19. Family Tickets for 10 Rides and 30 Rides, also Six Months and Yearly Commutation Tickets, on sale at corresponding reduction in rates.

THOS. CARTER, G. H. WAGGONER, Superintendent. G. P. Agent.

922 POST STREET.

MME. B. ZEITSKA'S FRENCH,

German, and English Institute for Young Ladies—

with

KINDERGARTEN

For children from three to six years of age.

The next term of this well known Institute (established since 1863) will commence on MONDAY, March 24th, 1879. For catalogue and particulars, address

MME. B. ZEITSKA, Principal.

BERLIN COLOGNE

FIRE

INSURANCE COMPANY.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 21, 1879.—I have this day appointed Messrs. Hutchinson & Mann, 322 and 324 California Street and 302 Sansome Street, General Agents of the above named Company.

F. HENNINGS, Special Attorney for Berlin Cologne Fire Ins. Co. of Berlin.

We invite attention to the above notice of our appointment as General Agents of the Berlin Cologne Fire Insurance Company of Berlin, Germany, and solicit a continuance of the liberal patronage heretofore extended to this popular Company.

HUTCHINSON & MANN,

322 and 324 California Street, and 302 Sansome Street.

MULLER'S OPTOMETER!

The only reliable instrument for Testing Defective Vision.

135 Montgomery Street,

Near Bush, opposite the Occidental Hotel.

NEW BOOKS

Life and Times of Stein, or Germany and Prussia in the Napoleonic Age. By J. K. Seelye. 2 vols., 8vo, cloth.....$7 50
The Government of Thiers. From the French of M. Jules Simon. 2 vols., 8vo, cloth.....4 50
The Life of Louis Adolphe Thiers. By Francois L. Goff. 1 vol., 8vo, cloth.....2 25
Veterinary Obstetrics. By George Fleming. Over 200 illustrations. 1 vol., 8vo, cloth.....6 00
The Dawn of History. By C. F. Keary, M. A. 1 vol., 12s Castle Hohenwald. Translated from the German by Mrs. A. L. Wister. 1 vol., 12mo, cloth.....1 50
At a High Price. By E. Werner, author of Good Luck. 1 vol., 12mo, cloth.....1 50
The Works of Montaigne. Edited by Hazlitt. 1 vol., 8vo, cloth, illustrated.....3 50
Send for copy of our "Literary News" for March, containing reviews of new books, mailed free.

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,

NOS. 3 AND 5 MONTGOMERY STREET.

Responsible!
Reliable!
Experienced!

MADISON AND BURKE,

REAL ESTATE AGENTS, HOUSE
Brokers, Rent Collectors. Office, Nos. 501 and 503
Montgomery Street, corner of California.

ESTABLISHED 1858.

Without Exception, the Largest and Most Responsible Rental Agency
on this Coast.

Special attention given to the charge of Real Estate Selling, Letting, Collecting, Paying Taxes, Insurance, Street Work, and Repairing. We have actually had over

Twenty-one Years' Experience

In the management of Real Estate, giving perfect satisfaction to those doing business with us. We are prepared to take charge of property on the Most Reasonable Terms,

And guarantee satisfaction. Property owners traveling, or absent from the State, can have their accounts and rentals sent to any part of the world without extra charge or delay.

Our commissions are much lower than any other RESPONSIBLE OFFICE in the city.

MADISON & BURKE.

J. H. MADISON. M. J. BURKE.

FAMILIES

LEAVING THE CITY.

FURNITURE, TRUNKS, PIANOS,

Pictures, Carpets, etc., stored and taken care of (not necessary to pack them). Parlor Sets, Carpets, and Blankets aired once a month. Trunks stored separate, for parties to have free access to them. We have the best facilities for storage, having built our warehouses expressly for it. Don't pay rent or interest, and can afford to store goods low. Advances made, insurance effected, and reference given. Please send postal card, and we will call and give estimate for storage, etc. H. WINDEL & CO., Principal Office, 310 Stockton St., bet. Post and Sutter, Corner Stockton Place, San Francisco.

S. B. BOSWELL & CO.,

STOCK BROKERS,

No. 318 California Street,

SAN FRANCISCO.

The Best and Cheapest Advertising Medium.

THE NAPA

DAILY & WEEKLY REGISTER

NAPA, CALIFORNIA.

FRANCIS & SPALDING, Publishers and Proprietors.

THE REGISTER—Daily and Weekly—

is unsurpassed as a Local and County Newspaper, both in the quantity and quality of its matter, and its value as an advertising medium. THE REGISTER is the only daily paper published in Napa. Daily and Weekly have a large circulation. Daily $5, and

G. M. FRANCIS, Proprietor.

JAPANESE FABLES FOR LITTLE FOLKS.

Translated for the Argonaut by T. E. Hallifax.

XII.—SHIPPEI TARO.*

In the olden time, when cavaliers knew how to handle the swords they wore at their sides, not like the effeminate lovers of singing, and dancing girls of these degenerate times, it was the custom for young men of the military class to wander about, practicing fencing, until they became widely renowned swordsmen.

It happened once that one of these young fencing students, when traveling in the northern provinces, lost his way one night in the hills, and could not find a lodging. At last he approached a small wayside shrine, and feeling weary, and finding that the shrine was just large enough inside, he decided to pass the night there. In the middle of the night he was awakened by a great noise, and looking out, saw a multitude of cats gamboling about in the light of the rising moon. Presently he heard them saying, "Don't tell Shippei Taro; keep it all dark; let it be private," and away they danced at a great rate. Being tired, and a little superstitious, the young traveler kept quiet, and did not disturb them. In the morning, hunger drove him to follow a by-path that looked as if it had been but recently traveled over; and before he had proceeded far, he heard a woman's voice, as if crying in distress. Approaching, he inquired the cause, and was told that at the shrine of the "mountain god" a human offering was made yearly, and that she was to be the next victim. A little further inquiry convinced the student that it was at the shrine of the "mountain god" that he had slept the previous night, and he determined to save the girl. Asking her friends if there was any one in the neighborhood called Shippei Taro, they told him that it was the name of a fine dog belonging to the prince's agent.

Having obtained this information, he started at once for the agent's place, and, after considerable difficulty, succeeded in obtaining the loan of the dog, which he placed in the cage that had been made to confine the poor girl who was to be that year's sacrifice. The student told the girl's friends to watch her closely, and to leave him to perform his part at the shrine. Having esconced himself in the shrine, with the cage containing Shippei Taro, he awaited further developments. About midnight the cats again assembled, this time accompanied by an immense Tom, who appeared to be their leader; and all of them, evidently glorying in the feast that awaited them, as they danced and howled around the cage. Presently the watcher opened the cage, and out flew the dog, seizing the great Tom cat, and holding it while the student killed it. They then seized and dispatched the other cats, and returned to tell the girl she was saved.

The young girl, in her gratitude to the young student for having snatched her from a horrible and untimely death, consented to become his wife, and after all the customary formalities had been gone through, and they were made one, he returned with her to his native place, and lived there happily.

Ever since that time the offering of human beings has ceased at that shrine.†

XIII.—KAGUN YUKI KUMUGI.

In the time of Godai Tenno (A. D. 1319) there lived in the province of Oshiu a noble named Yuki Rodzuke no Niyudo Michitada, who was not only very fond of birds and of poetry, but was very learned and brave. Among his retainers was a young fellow named Hayato, who was in love with a waiting-maid of the palace named Kikuno. This young lady had induced Hayato to set free a couple of oshi dori (ducks noted for their loving dispositions, and always going in pairs, originating the proverb, oshi dori fu-fu, a loving couple), and these birds were destined to be in future mingled in the lives of the lovers; indeed, their amorous propensities had first caused the young people to think of love.

The disputes between Godai Tenno and the Hojo family (of Kamakura) at length broke out into open war. The Daiiri called on Yuki, as also did the Hojo, to assist them; but considering that his duty lay with his sovereign, the Tenno, he took the side of Godai. When departing he charged his household to take care of his son Kojiro, and, in the event of his death, to be loyal to their young master.

After a long and bloody war the Hojo were at length utterly routed and deposed, but Yuki had been severely wounded, and before he could be conveyed home breathed his last, vowing with his last breath to pursue the Hojo even after death. Yuki's brother, Hiogo, a wicked and ambitious man, had remained behind, hoping that if his brother should be killed to be able to usurp his nephew's position, and possess himself, not only of the property, but of the fair Kikuno also.

About this time a man of Shikoku, one Hagiu Hoshi, a retainer of the Kawano princes, being fond of traveling, in his rambles wandered to Echiu, where the mountain Tateyama rears its lofty head. On the sides of this mountain are numerous deep valleys, from which fire and smoke are vomited; and this was considered by the people of the olden times as the true pandemonium of the Buddhists.

Traveling through the forest he was overtaken by darkness before he had found a place of rest, and, becoming bewildered, he sat down to consider what he should do now that he was benighted in such a lonely spot. Presently a priest, dressed in black, approached him, and Hoshi, being a devout man, addressed him with great reverence, and inquired where he could find a shelter for the night. The priest told him that, knowing of his approach, he had come to meet him, and said that he had something to show him, adding that though what he saw would no doubt frighten him, he was not to betray his fear or to break silence. Receiving Hoshi's assurances that he would maintain strict silence, the ground immediately under their feet trembled, and the motion increased in violence, accompanied by loud noises that echoed weirdly in the night through hill and vale. Suddenly, with a tremendous explosion, an enormous iron gateway sprang up before them, at which the priest knocked with his wand. It swung open and admitted them. Hoshi beheld ghouls of frightful aspect. Some, with heads like horses, oxen, lions, and so on, were busy slicing up a man and throwing the pieces into an immense cauldron, then drawing them forth, joining them together, and repeating the cruel process, to the intense horror of Hoshi, who inquired who he was that deserved such tortures. The priest told him it was Yuki, who had vowed to pursue his enemies in the spirit, after death even; and this was the punishment awarded him for this greatly impious vow. Moreover, if Hagiu Hoshi wished to relieve him from such a horrid fate, he must go to Oshiu, and instruct the widow, son, and other relatives of Yuki to pray for his release, and to devoutly perform the ceremonials for the repose of the souls of the dead. Meantime Hiogo had so far succeeded in his base schemes as to gain possession of the palace; but Kikuno turned a deaf ear to his flatteries. He also had a sagacious enemy in Hayato, who, faithful to his young lord, and jealous of his rivals' attentions to Kikuno, determined to frustrate, if possible, the wicked plots of the usurper.

Hiogo, discovering the bond that united Hayato and Kikuno, accused them of lewdness, and of disgracing and defiling the palace, and ordered them to be bound and brought before him. When they appeared, he ordered them to be beheaded—Hayato first, so that his mistress might suffer the torture of witnessing the horrible spectacle before she, too, was decapitated; but just then a messenger providentially arrived from Kamakura, saying that a child had been born to the Hojo, and that, in honor of the joyful event, the lives of all malefactors were to be spared. On hearing this news and the accompanying command, Hiogo reluctantly ordered his two prisoners to be set free. The messenger, as soon as the lovers were released, conducted them to a place far from where they had been so near meeting an untimely and cruel death. On the way he told them that he was the oshi dori whom, with his mate, they had formerly released from imprisonment, and that, in gratitude for their kindness, he had freed them from the cruel Hiogo; adding that now they must watch over, and endeavor to save, the young lord Kojiro, saying which the messenger changed into a duck, and flew away.

Soon after the rescue and flight of Hayato and Kikuno, Hiogo set about the completion of his scheme; but finding the widow of Yuki, and Takahama, a faithful retainer of her husband's family, were two serious obstacles to the success of his plans, he accused them of some frivolous offense against himself, and, without any hearing, ordered the widow to be beheaded, and Takahama to commit seppuku (suicide by cutting open the abdomen). The young lord Kojiro, who had been shut up in prison, being a horrified witness, from a window, of the murder of his mother and his faithful kerai (retainer).

After considerable difficulty, and not without frequently running the risk of being recaptured, and probably meeting the fate formerly intended for them, Hayato and Kikuno at last succeeded in communicating with the young Kojiro; and, having laid their plans carefully, and having an ally in the palace in a youth whose father died fighting by the side of Yuki, they waited till a dark, stormy night, and, stealing into the palace grounds, worked their passage under the floor of the chamber in which the Prince was confined. They then removed a board, raised the tatami (a very thick mat which covers the floors of every Japanese house), and signed to Kojiro that all was clear. Kojiro squeezed himself through the aperture, replaced the mat in its former position, and followed his deliverers by the way they had come, arriving, before his escape had barely been discovered, at a place of safety among the mountains.

Shortly after the above events had taken place, Hagiu arrived at Oshiu, and, making inquiries about Yuki's grave, learned where it was to be found. Approaching the grave, he erected a tablet, and was earnestly engaged in prayer, when, to his amazement, a voice recited the unfinished poetical sentence in the composition of which Yuki Michitada had been interrupted when summoned to assist the Emperor. The words were remembered by Hagiu, who exclaimed: "This must be the troubled spirit of Yuki. I must finish the verse, or the soul will not rest in peace." Then, after much thought, he completed the verse, repeating it aloud, when the voice answered in a joyous tone, "Oh, how happy am I now, relieved of torture and anxiety!"

Hagiu, having learned the escape and flight of Kojiro in company with Hayato and Kikuno, now set out in search of them, finally discovering them at a house at which he had accidentally called for the purpose of making inquiries. This happy meeting, they all agreed, was providential, and argued well for the future. They met next day to decide upon their future line of action, Hagiu having informed them that Nitta Yoshitada, of Kodzuke, was mustering men-at-arms to overthrow the still too powerful Hojo (A. D. 1332-3), advising Kojiro to go to that chieftain and join him, when, no doubt, there would be little difficulty in obtaining his assistance in expelling and punishing Hiogo, and regaining his own rightful position.

Acting promptly on this advice, Kojiro proceeded to Nitta's camp, and received from that chief a patent granting him all his father's titles and endowments of which he had been deprived, and in gratitude joined the troops of his benefactor, displaying great bravery, and with his own bow and arrow slaying Akahashi Sagami no Kami, by which the Hojo lost their best general, and the Imperial forces gained a complete victory, resulting in the overthrow of the Hojo power at Kamakura. Kojiro returned to his northern home to take possession of his own, hitherto withheld by his wicked uncle, and to avenge his mother's murder.

The oshi dori again appear upon the scene and lend their assistance in overcoming Hiogo, who is finally entrapped and securely bound. He is condemned to be beheaded, but as Kojiro is averse to spilling the blood of a relative, even to avenge his mother's murder, Hayato strikes the fatal blow, and the palace is freed from the wicked usurper, and the young lord is hailed with enthusiasm. For several days following there is great feasting and rejoicing among Kojiro's retainers, and much sake (wine) is drunk. Hayato received as a reward for his devotion a position of high rank near the person of his prince, and with his wife, Kikuno, lived to a good old age, loved and respected by every one.

In the bright lexicon of the chronic borrower there is no such word as pay.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

Ooster.

There was a young woman of Worcester,
She petted an old Shanghai rooster;
When asked what indorchester
To fondle the rooster,
She blushed, for the question conforchester.
—Truth Seeker.

Spring.

Pack away your sealskin ulster,
Get your straw hat out of pawn,
Renovate your linen duster,
Spring has come as sure's you're born.

Obituary.

His little drawers hang on the line—
He ne'er will wear them more.
He scratched a mule's heel with a straw,
And Dobbin kicked him in the jaw.
No more we'll hear his little snore—
The minister'll be in at four,
And boost him to the shining shore.
—New York Dispatch.

The Cause in Nevada.

'Twas out in Sierra Valley,
A far Nevada town,
That the cause of the Murphys flourished,
And would not be put down,
But at last some of the members
Forgot their solemn vows,
And the brethren held a meeting,
At which one Mr. Howes
Moved that the fallen Murphys
Be stricken from the rolls.
Lost. Then another brother,
The "Rev. Dr." Bowles,
Remarked: "I make a motion
That all them be expelled
Who hasn't broke thar pledges."
Carried! And then they yelled
Three times for "Johnny Barley!"
And adjourned across the street,
At the President's invitation,
Who stood all round a treat.
—Louisville Courier-Journal

"The Sweet Singer."

I've a peanut in my pocket,
Emeline! Emeline!
I'll jerk the kernel from its socket,
Emeline! Emeline!
To the theatre I'll go,
On the floor the shell I'll throw,
Then I'll munch to music slow,
Emeline! Emeline!
—Bungtown Bugle.

A New Departure.

It was a worthy pastor,
Who saw with grief and care
His congregation go to sleep,
Or, which was worse, elsewhere.

He pondered long and deeply,
This wise and pious man,
And at last hit upon a simple
And most effectual plan.

Next Sunday—of his sermon
The text when he had said—
He slid a-down the pulpit stairs,
And stood upon his head!

By thousands flocked the people
That preacher great to hear,
And the trustees raised his salary
To fifty thousand a year.
—Telegram.

Boardbill Mine.

I've a notice from the landlord,
Boardbill mine! Boardbill mine!
I've been fired by the landlord,
Boardbill mine! Boardbill mine!
I must sail for Kankakee,
I must go to Mill-wau-kee,
Or perhaps to St. Lou-ee,
Boardbill mine! Boardbill mine!
I must skip the Tra-la-lee,
Boardbill mine!
—St. Louis Times.

Inside.

'Twas naught but apple juice she drank—
That sparkling Jersey cider;
It made her feel supremely gay,
Or else her looks belied her.
I questioned why she acted thus,
But thought not to deride her,
And quickly came her answer bright—
"It was the stuff in cider."
—Syracuse Times.

Acquitted.

Two trembling culprits, sad and pale,
Before His Honor stood;
One said: "Mine is a thrilling tale—
I shed my neighbor's blood;
But then he tempted me to shoot
Because he practiced on a flute."

The other lowly dropped his head:
"Mine is a crimson crime;
I took a pistol and shot dead
A young man in his prime,
But then I freely shed his gore
Because I could not stand his snore."

His Honor then, sedate and wise,
His chin upon his palm,
In deep reflection closed his eyes
As solemn as a clam.
Then softly said to each, "Go free!
There is no law for such as thee."
—Cincinnati Star.

"There's no smoking allowed!"
The conductor exclaimed
To a man who had jumped on the car.
"I'm not smoking aloud,"
He gently explained,
"For I noiselessly puff my cigar."
—Hackensack Republican.

* Shippei is a head agent or officer of a prince. Koro, Taro, Yaro, etc., are common names, given to dogs.
† The custom of human sacrifices at shrines, and on the death of great people, existed in very ancient times; later, clay images were substituted, and recently these also were discontinued.

COMMERCIAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA, FIRE AND MARINE.

Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.

JOHN H. WISE, President.

CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT

—AND—

INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE

CASH ASSETS.....$450,000

Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS:

A. J. BRVANT, President,
RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President,
CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary,
H. H. WATSON, Marine Survevo

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD

Tourist Season, 1879.

Excursions to Mount Shasta and Cloud River.

GENERAL PASSENGER AND TICKET DEPT.,
San Francisco, March 13, 1879.

FOR THE SPECIAL ACCOMMODAtion of Tourists and Sportsmen, special arrangements have been made with the C. & O. C. L. Stage Company, whereby we will be able to place on sale during the season, commencing May 1st (next), at our offices in San Francisco and Sacramento, SPECIAL EXCURSION TICKETS—contract limited to thirty (30) days from day of sale, at the following rates for the round trip:

Miles from Redding.	To Station named and Return.	From S. F.	From Sac'to
22	U. S. Fishery—Allen's.....	$24.50	$19.50
44	Slate Creek.....	28.80	23.80
54	Southern's.....	30.80	25.80
64	Lower Soda Springs.....	32.80	27.80
65	Castle Rock.....	33.80	28.80
69	Upper Soda Springs.....	35.40	30.40
77	Strawberry Valley—Sisson's....	35.40	30.40

NOTES.—The U. S. Fishery is on the Cloud River, at the only point where that stream is touched by the stage road, and is two miles below the hotel at Allen's Station.
Slate Creek, Southern's, Lower Soda Springs, Castle
Rock, and Upper Soda Springs are on the Sacramento River.

Strawberry Valley (Sisson's) is at the base of Mt. Shasta.
At Sisson's Upper and Lower Soda Springs, guides and horses are provided for Excursions to the summit of Mt.
Shasta, and to the Salmon and Trout Fishing Stations and Deer Licks on the headwaters of the Cloud River.

T. H. GOODMAN,
General Passenger and Ticket Agent.

LITTLE BELMONT FOR SALE.

THIS BEAUTIFUL SUBURBAN
property, situated contiguous to the Belmont Mansion, twenty-seven miles from San Francisco, on the San Jose Railroad, is offered for rent or sale at reasonable terms.
The property is located in a beautiful valley, with a glimpse view of the Bay; contains thirty acres of land, highly improved, with fruit and ornamental trees. The residence is new, spacious, and elegant, with all modern improvements.
It has a detached cottage for servants, with laundry room
and offices; a stable with six stalls, carriage house, cow houses for thoroughbred stock, chicken house, grounds un-derlaid with water-pipe; outhouses provided with gas; gas
and water furnished from the works of larger Belmont;
water free. The residence and cottage are furnished with all fixed articles, such as book cases, armchairs, billiard table,
range, kitchen and dining-room furniture, floors carpeted,
rooms filled with attractive engravings, all of which will be disposed of with the property and at a low price. A bargain is offered in this property, and if not sold will be rented at a moderate figure for a summer residence. For particulars, inquiry may be made at the ARGONAUT office, No. 522 California Street.

ALASKA COMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 SANSOME STREET,

WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.

R. P. & H. N. CLEMENT,

ATTORNEYS-AT-LAW,

Nos. 2, 3 and 4, SHERMAN & BUILDING,
Montgomery Street, N. E. corner of Clay, San Francisco
(P. O. Box 779.)

COMMENCING MONDAY, Nov. 13, 1878.

Passenger trains will leave San Francisco, from Passenger Depot on Townsend Street, between Third and Fourth, as follows:

8.30 A. M. DAILY for San Jose, Gilroy, Hollister,
Tres Pinos, Pajaro, Salinas, Soledad, and all Way
Stations. At Pajaro, the Santa Cruz R. R. connects with this train for Aptos and Santa Cruz. At Salinas the
M. & S. V. R. R. connects with this train for Monterey.
STAGE connections made with this train.

10.40 A. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

3.30 P. M. DAILY (Sundays excepted) for Gilroy, and Way Stations.

4.40 P. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

6.30 P. M. DAILY for Menlo Park and Way Stations.

STAGE The extra Sunday train to San Jose and Way Stations is discontinued for the Winter season.

EXCURSION TICKETS to San Jose and intermediate points and return sold on Saturdays and Sunday mornings.
Good for return until following Monday, inclusive.

A. C. BASSETT, H. R. JUDAH,
Superintendent, Asst. Pass. & Tkt. Agt.

SOUTHERN DIVISIONS.

Passengers for points on the Southern Divisions of the road will take the cars of the Central Pacific Railroad
via OAKLAND, leaving SAN FRANCISCO via Ferry
Landing, Market Street, at 4.00 P. M. daily (Arizona Express Train), and making close connection at GOSHEN for Sumner, Mohave, LOS ANGELES, Wilmington, Anaheim, Colton, Colorado River, YUMA, and Stanwix (85 miles east from Yuma).

SAN FRANCISCO AND NORTH PACIFIC R. R.

Commencing Monday, November 11, 1878, and until further notice, Boats and Trains will leave San Francisco:
(Ticket Office, Washington Street Wharf.)

3.00 P. M. DAILY, Sundays included,
Steamer "James M. Donahue" (Washington Street Wharf), connecting with Mail and Express Train at Donahue for Petaluma, Santa Rosa, Healdsburg, Cloverdale, and way stations. Making stage connection at Lakeville for Sonoma; at Geyersville for Skaggs Springs, at Cloverdale for Ukiah, Lakeport, Mendocino City, and the GEYSERS.

STAGE Connections made at Fulton on the following morning for Korbels, Guerneville, and the Redwoods (Sundays excepted).

Freight received from 7 A. M. to 2.30 P. M. daily (except Sunday).

TICKET OFFICE, WASHINGTON STREET WHARF.

ARTHUR HUGHES, Gen. Manager. A. A. BEAN, Sup't.

P. E. DOUGHERTY, Gen. Pass. and Tkt. Agent.

OCCIDENTAL AND ORIENTAL STEAMSHIP COMPANY

—FOR—

JAPAN AND CHINA,

Leave Wharf, Cor. First and Brannan Streets, at noon, for

YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG.

Connecting at Yokohama with steamers for Shanghai,

GAELIC, OCEANIC, BELGIC.

May.....16	March.....22	April.....16
June.....17	July.....17	May.....15
August.....15	September.....16	October.....15
Novemdr.....15	December.....16

Cabin plans on exhibition and Passenger Tickets for sale at No. 2 Montgomery Street.For freight apply to GEO. H. RICE, Freight Agent, at the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's Wharf, or No. 218
California Street.

T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Passenger Agent.

LELAND STANFORD, President.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP CO.

First-class steamers with unequalled accommodations for passengers will leave San Francisco:

FOR YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG,
On the 1st of every month.

FOR SYDNEY AND AUCKLAND, via HONOLULU,
January 20, February 17, March 17, April 14, May 12, June 9, July 7, August 4, September 1,
September 24, December 22, and
every fourth week
thereafter.

FOR NEW YORK, via PANAMA, CENTRAL AMER-ICAN, MEXICAN, and SOUTH AMERICAN
PORTS, HAVANA, and all WEST IN-DIA PORTS, on the 6th and 20th of each month.

FOR VICTORIA, B. C., PUGET SOUND PORTS,
and PORTLAND, Oregon, on the 10th,
20th, and 30th of each month.

WILLIAMS, BLANCHARD & CO., Agents,
Corner First and Brannan Streets.

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Steamers of this Company will sail from Broadway wharf
for PORTLAND (Oregon), every five days, direct, and for
LOS ANGELES, SANTA BARBARA, SANTA CRUZ,
SAN DIEGO, SAN LUIS OBISPO, and other Northern
and Southern Coast Ports, leaving San Francisco about
every third day.

For day and hour of sailing, see the Company's advertisement in the San Francisco daily papers.

TICKET OFFICE, No. 214 MONTGOMERY ST., NEAR PINE.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO., Agents,

No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco.

NEWTON DOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento,
J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DODGE, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco

C. P. R. R.

Overland Ticket Office, Oakland Ferry, foot of Market St.

COMMENCING MONDAY, MARCH

3d, 1879, and until further notice.

TRAINS AND BOATS will leave SAN FRANCISCO:

7.00 A. M. DAILY, VALLEJO
Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with the trains for Napa (Stages for Sonoma), Calistoga (The Geysers), and Sacramento. Connecting at Davis (Sundays excepted) for Woodland and Knight's Landing, and at Woodland for Williams and Willows.

[Arrive San Francisco 8.10 P. M.]

7.00 A. M. DAILY, LOCAL PASsenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and via Livermore), arriving at Tracy at 11.30 A. M., and connecting with Atlantic Express. Connects at Niles with train arriving at San Jose at 10.15 A. M. [Returning, train from Tracy arrives at 6.05 P. M.]

8.00 A. M. DAILY, ATLANTIC
Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern
Ry. and S. P. & T. R. R.) for Sacramento, Marysville, Redding (Portland, Or.) Colfax, Reno (Virginia City), Palisade (Eureka), Ogden, and Omaha. Connects at Galt with train arriving at Loue at 3.40 P. M.

[Arrive San Francisco 5.15 P. M.]

SUNDAY EXCURSION TICKETS TO SAN PABLO AND MAR-
TINEZ AT REDUCED RATES.

10.00 A. M. DAILY, (via OAKland Ferry), Local Passenger Train to Haywards and Niles. [Arrive San Francisco 4.05 P. M.]

3.00 P. M. DAILY, SAN JOSE
Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and Niles), stopping at all way stations. Arrive at San Jose at
5.20 P. M. [Arrive San Francisco at 9.45 A. M.]

3.00 P. M. DAILY, NORTHERN
Railway Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry)
to San Pablo, Martinez, and Antioch.
[Arrive San Francisco 9.35 A. M.]

4.00 P. M. DAILY, ARIZONA
Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.), for Lathrop (and Stockton),
Merced, Madera, Visalia, Sumner, Mojave, Newhall
(San Buenaventura and Santa Barbara), LOS ANGELES,
"Santa Monica," Wilmington, Santa Ana (San Diego), Col-
ton, and Yuma (Stages for Prescott and Colorado River Steamers), connecting direct with daily trains of the Southern Pacific Railroad of Arizona for Stanwix (85 miles east from Yuma) and end of track. Daily Stages for Maricopa, Phoenix, Florence, and Tucson. Sleeping cars between Oakland, Los Angeles, and Yuma.
[Arrive San Francisco at 12.35 P. M.]

4.00 P. M. SUNDAYS EXCEPTED,
Vallejo Steamer (from Market Street Landing),
connecting with trains for Calistoga (The Geysers), Woodland, Knight's Landing, and Sacramento, and at Sacramento with passenger train, leaving at 9.35 P. M., for Truckee, Reno, Carson, and Virginia. Sleeping cars between Vallejo and Carson. [Arrive San Francisco 11.10 A. M.]

4.00 P. M. SUNDAYS EXCEPTED,
Sacramento Steamer (from Washington Street
Wharf) for Benicia and Landings on the Sacramento River.
[Arrive San Francisco 8.00 P. M.]

4.00 P. M. DAILY, THROUGH
Third Class and Accommodation Train, via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.)
connecting at Lathrop with train arriving at Los Angeles on second day at 11.55 A. M. [Arrive San Francisco 9.05 A. M.]

4.30 P. M. DAILY, LOCAL PASsenger train (via Oakland Ferry) to Haywards,
Niles, and Livermore. [Arrive San Francisco 8.35 P. M.]

5.00 P. M. DAILY, OVERLAND
Emigrant Train (via Oakland Ferry and Northern Railway), to Ogden, Omaha, and East.
Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all
trains, Sundays excepted, at "Seminary Park Station."

FERRIES AND LOCAL TRAINS. FROM SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

To	To Alameda.	To Peninsula.	To East Oakland.	To Niles.	To Berkeley.	To Del Norte Street.	To Debarre Street.
To Oakland.	To Alameda.	To Peninsula.	To East Oakland.	To Niles.	To Berkeley.	To Del Norte Street.	To Debarre Street.
A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.
6.10	12.30	7.00	17.10	7.30	10.00	8.30	8.00
7.00	8.00	8.00	9.00	8.30	9.30	9.30	10.00
7.30	1.30	9.00	10.00	9.30	10.30	10.30	12.00
8.00	2.00	10.00	11.00	10.30	11.30	11.30	1.30
8.30	3.00	11.00	12.00	11.30	12.30	12.30	3.30
9.00	3.30	12.00	1.00	12.30	1.00	1.00	4.30
9.30	4.00	1.00	1.30	1.30	1.30	1.30	5.30
10.00	4.30	1.30	1.00	1.00	1.00	1.00	6.30
10.30	5.00	2.00	1.30	1.30	1.30	1.30	7.30
11.00	5.30	2.30	2.00	2.00	2.00	2.00	8.30
11.30	6.00	3.00	2.30	2.30	2.30	2.30	9.30
12.00	6.30	3.30	3.00	3.00	3.00	3.00	10.30
.....	7.00	4.00	3.30	3.30	3.30	3.30	11.30
.....	8.10	4.30	4.00	4.00	4.00	4.00	12.30
.....	9.20	5.00	4.30	4.30	4.30	4.30	1.00
.....	10.30	5.30	5.00	5.00	5.00	5.00	2.00
.....	11.45	6.00	5.30	5.30	5.30	5.30	3.00
.....	12.45	6.30	6.00	6.00	6.00	6.00	4.00
.....	7.00	6.30	6.30	6.30	6.30	5.00
.....	8.10	7.00	7.00	7.00	7.00	6.00
.....	9.20	7.30	7.30	7.30	7.30	7.00
.....	10.30	8.00	8.00	8.00	8.00	8.00
.....	11.45	8.30	8.30	8.30	8.30	9.00
.....	12.45	9.00	9.00	9.00	9.00	10.00

TO SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

From	From Berkeley.	From Niles.	From East Oakland.	From Peninsula.	From Alameda.	From Oakland (Broadway).
From	From Berkeley.	From Niles.	From East Oakland.	From Peninsula.	From Alameda.	From Oakland (Broadway).
A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	A. M.	P. M.
5.40	5.40	7.00	5.10	8.00	5.00	5.20
6.30	6.30	8.00	6.00	9.00	6.00	6.20
7.00	7.00	9.00	6.30	10.00	6.30	7.20
8.00	8.00	10.00	7.00	11.00	7.00	8.20
9.00	9.00	11.00	7.30	12.00	7.30	9.20
10.00	10.00	12.00	8.00	1.00	8.00	10.20
11.00	11.00	1.00	8.30	1.30	8.30	11.20
12.00	12.00	1.30	9.00	2.00	9.00	12.20
1.00	1.00	2.00	9.30	2.30	9.30	1.20
2.00	2.00	3.00	10.00	3.00	10.00	2.20
3.00	3.00	4.00	10.30	3.30	10.30	3.20
4.00	4.00	5.00	11.00	4.00	11.00	4.20
5.00	5.00	6.00	11.30	4.30	11.30	5.20
6.00	6.00	7.00	12.00	5.00	12.00	6.20
.....	8.00	1.00	6.00	1.00	7.20
.....	9.00	1.30	7.00	1.30	8.20
.....	10.00	2.00	8.00	2.00	9.20
.....	11.00	2.30	9.00	2.30	10.20
.....	12.00	3.00	10.00	3.00	11.20
.....	1.00	3.30	11.00	3.30	12.20
.....	2.00	4.00	12.00	4.00	1.20
.....	3.00	4.30	1.00	4.30	2.20
.....	4.00	5.00	2.00	5.00	3.20
.....	5.00	5.30	3.00	5.30	4.20
.....	6.00	6.00	4.00	6.00	5.20
.....	7.00	6.30	5.00	6.30	6.20
.....	8.00	7.00	6.00	7.00	7.20
.....	9.00	7.30	7.00	7.30	8.20
.....	10.00	8.00	8.00	8.00	9.20
.....	11.00	8.30	9.00	8.30	10.20
.....	12.00	9.00	10.00	9.00	11.20
.....	1.00	9.30	11.00	9.30	12.20

* Alameda passengers change cars at Oakland.

NO TEAM THROUGHFARE.

The Long (Oakland) Wharf from and after Dec 2, 1878, will be closed to Teams, Stock, etc.

CRUISE ROUTE

FROM SAN FRANCISCO—Daily—10.00—9.20—8.15—9.15—

10.15—11.15—A. M. 12.15—1.15—2.25—3.15—4.15—5.15—

6.15 P. M.

FROM OAKLAND—Daily—10.45—7.10—8.05—9.05—10.05—

11.05—A. M. 12.05—1.05—2.15—3.05—4.05—5.05—6.05—

CHICKERING

PIANO WAREROOMS,

31 POST ST., Mechanics' Institute Building.

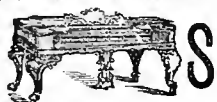

ELEGANT PIANOS.

L. K. HAMMER,

Sole Agent for Pacific Coast.

Owners of Chickering Pianos are specially requested to leave orders for tuning at warerooms, 31 Post Street.

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.
WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.HERRMANN
HATTER336 KEARNY ST.
& 910 MARKET ST. S.F.

SPRING STYLES

ALL IN NOW!

Send for Illustrated Catalogue.

MARBLEIZED
IRON MANTELS.

IN ELEGANCE OF DESIGN, QUALITY of finish, and durability of polish, they are every way superior to slate or marble. In point of economy, also, they cost very much less, are stronger, and certainly far more durable than either.

ALL SIZES AND STYLES

ENAMELED GRATES.

FRENCH COOKING

RANGES

All sizes, suitable for Hotels, Restaurants, Families, and Boarding-Houses.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, & 120 BATTERY ST.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,
FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE
for Gentlemen, and Families. 2nd Entrance of Court. A. D. SHARON.THE Automatic
SEWING MACHINE STANDS PRE-EMINENT.

A machine that delicate ladies can run as well as the strong. So simple in construction that no experience is required to operate it perfectly. Makes the strongest seam, there being three threads in every stitch. A machine that will sew leather or lace, woolen, or cotton goods without any change. POSITIVELY NO TENSION. The only machine in the world based on AUTOMATIC principles. Thousands now in use, giving the most entire satisfaction.

WILLCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.
C. L. HOVEY, AGENT,

124 POST STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, AND 361 TWELFTH STREET, OAKLAND.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

NICOLL THE TAILOR

BRANCH OF NEW YORK,

Begg to inform his numerous patrons (and their name is Legion), that he employs only WHITE LABOR, and that the reason he is able to sell cheaper than any other Tailor is that, having Sixty Stores all over the United States, and a London House, he is able to buy and import in immense quantities direct from the Mills at home and abroad, thereby saving all the intermediate profits which other Tailors have to pay.

Gentlemen, before ordering elsewhere, will do well to call and inspect my immense stock at any of my branch stores, and their daily arrivals of New York and Paris fashions. Also, of French and English Goods from my London House.

Pants in Six Hours. Suits to order in One Day, if required.

TO ORDER:

Pants, - - - $4
Suits, - - - 15
Overcoats, - 15
Dress Coats, - 20

Genuine 6 X

Your Ready-Made Tailor

TO ORDER

Black Doeskin
Pants, - - - $7
White Vests, fm 3
Fancy Vests, - - 6
Beaver Suits, $55.

The Trade and Public supplied with Cloth and Trimmings at Wholesale Prices.

Any length cut, and all kinds of Cloth kept in Stock. Samples, with Instructions for Self-measurement, sent free.

A small stock of uncalled-for Goods to be sold at a great reduction.

CLOTH AND WOOLEN BROKER.

FINEST STOCK OF WOOLENS IN THE WORLD.

NICOLL THE TAILOR'S GRAND TAILORING EMPORIUM,

727 Market Street, 505 Montgomery Street, 18 Kearny Street,
And 853 Broadway, Oakland.

GRAND SPRING OPENING.

MADAME SKIDMORE,

NO. 1114 MARKET STREET,
WEDNESDAY AND THURSDAY, APRIL 2d AND 3d, 1879.GRAY'S MUSIC STORE

AGENCY FOR

PIANOS

SUPERIOR QUALITIES OF

Tone, Touch, and General Finish.

PRICES VERY MODERATE.

HOME SCHOOL, Oakland, Jan. 29, 1879.
M. GRAY—Dear Sir: In reply to yours of this date, I purchased one Kranich and Bach Piano, No. 4,432, of you in 1874. In 1876 I purchased another of the same make No. 6,080. Both have been in use ten months a year since, and on an average ten hours a day. They have required tuning three or four times a year, have had no repairing, and are now in good condition. All the anticipations at the time of purchase have been realized.

Yours truly,

H. N. FIELD.

M. GRAY—Dear Sir: In reply to your note asking if the Kranich and Bach Piano purchased from you in 1875 has given satisfaction, I am pleased to inform you that it has proved to be all that was represented at the time of purchase. I will also add that a piano subjected to four years use in our club, where there are upward of five hundred members, is as severe a test as an instrument can be put to. The Kranich has stood the test, and at present writing is in first class condition—in fact as good as new.

Respectfully,

W. S. LAWTON,
Superintendent of the Olympic Club.ST. MARY'S COLLEGE, San Francisco.
Mr. M. GRAY:—In answer to your inquiry I would state that the Piano purchased from you in 1872, made by Kranich and Bach, came fully up to our expectations. We regard it as a fine instrument.

Yours truly,

BRO. JUSTIN, President.

KRANICH & BACH PIANOS ARE IN USE AT

The Mills Institute, Alameda Co.
Washington College, Alameda Co.
Sisters of Charity, Petaluma.
St. Vincent's School, Santa Barbara.
Protestant Orphan Asylum, S. F.
R. C. Orphan Asylum, S. F.
St. Peter's School, S. F.
J. D. Smith's College, Livermore.
Blind Asylum, Berkeley.
St. Mary's College, Benicia.
Temperance Legion, S. F.
Christian College, Santa Rosa.

Send for Catalogue.

GRAY'S MUSIC STORE,
117 POST STREET.J. C. MERRILL & CO.
SHIPPING

—AND—

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Agents for the

SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET LINES.

204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST. - - - San Francisco.

INDEPENDENT LINE

—FOR—

ASTORIA AND PORTLAND, OREGON.

The splendid Low-pressure, Side Wheel American Steam-ship

GREAT REPUBLIC,

3882 TONS,

JAMES CARROLL.....Commander

Will sail from Spear Street wharf, for the above ports,
On SATURDAY, March 29, at 10 A. M.

Steerage Passage.....$2 00
Cabin Passage.....7 00
In Bridal Rooms.....10 00
Freight.....at Lowest Rates

FREIGHT RECEIVED DAILY.

For freight or passage apply at the office on Spear Street wharf. Tickets also for sale at No. 5 New Montgomery Street, under Grand Hotel.

P. B. CORNWALL.

The Argonaut.

VOL. IV. NO. 14.

SAN FRANCISCO, APRIL 5, 1879.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

AN INCENDIARY SERMON.

The Mule's Address to The-m-asses of the Sand-Lot.

[The following address, published in the ARGONAUT of March 22d, is reprinted in satisfaction of the demands of hundreds of people from all portions of the State who have not been able to obtain a copy of the edition containing it.]

My fellow-asses: Owing to the absence of your long-eared and brazen-lunged leader and orator, who is now traveling through the State in the kindly endeavor to teach the American people the sort of laws they ought to adopt, and the kind of men they ought to elect to administer them, I have been induced to fill his pulpit for a Sabbath-day's discourse. If I do not blaspheme God, nor abuse the Constitution, nor denounce as "hell-born and bell-bound" the "bloated aristocrats and lecherous bondholders," nor sympathize with him or you in his or your cowardly threats toward that class of foreigners whom you uneducated Irish, German, and other aliens have undertaken to drive out of the country, in violation of laws made before your arrival and international treaties entered into before you came to the country, you must excuse me. Being of American birth, I can not be expected to fully enter into prejudices that result from institutions with which I am not familiar. Being well born and educated, having served my country as an army mule, and bearing upon my shoulders the brand "U. S." well burned in, you will excuse me if I entertain prejudices which you asses from Germany and Ireland do not entirely sympathize with, and entertain opinions which in your ignorance you can not fully understand. While I intend to be entirely courteous, and to avoid the vile and ribald language which you are accustomed to hear, I shall indulge myself in the use of plain talk within the comprehension of the most stupid donkey of you all, and perhaps endeavor to stir your thoughts with some sharp cuts of Saxon speech, which if you will carefully consider will do you no end of good.

And now, my dear adopted fellow-citizens, let us drop the smile of the ass. Let me, for the purpose of this discourse, forget that you are unreasonable, inconsistent, thistle-eating donkeys, led by one of the most obstinate and illiterate of your own kind; but treat you as American citizens, upon whom—unexpectedly to you—has fallen the duties and responsibilities of government, through the exercise of privileges denied you in the countries of your birth, and unwisely accorded you by ours.

What is it of which you complain? What have we as American citizens done to you that we ought not to have done? What act toward you have we left undone that we ought to have done? How is it that you, citizens by adoption, clothed with all the prerogatives of American nationality, have arrayed yourselves in opposition to our country and its laws? Why is it that every Sabbath-day now for more than a year, in rain and sunshine, in heat and cold, you have come here to the sand-lot to hear American citizens and American institutions abused, vilified, denounced, and threatened? How is it that you, the meanest and most ignorant part of our foreign population, have organized yourselves into a distinct party, threatening to burn property and destroy lives, to carry out your peculiar ideas? What miserable infatuation has seized upon you that you think to be allowed to manage our political affairs? And what madness induces you to think you will be indulged in controlling when you ought humbly to follow and modestly to submit? Do you exalt your ignorance over our intelligence, and your vassalage to kings over our pupillage to institutions of republican liberty?—your ignorant and enforced abasement to Church and State over your birthright of freedom? Do you remember the conditions from which you fled in your native lands? Do you forget that in Prussia or Ireland for the utterance of your incendiary language you would be punished by imprisonment and fine? Do you recognize that while this is a land of freedom and free speech it is still a land of law? If you had stayed at home, you Germans would have been compelled in the interests of the German Empire to have served in the army. Do you Irishmen understand that if you had stayed in your native land you would have enjoyed no right to make laws, and no right to break them except at the penalty of the tread-mill? And all of you foreigners, of whatever European nationality you may be, have you forgotten that in your own country you were but peasants, compelled to labor for inadequate wages, and only permitted to denounce authority at the peril of your lives and liberties? There, you were serfs, landless, propertyless, and hopeless of advancement. Here, you are freemen, sovereigns, clothed with political power, and in your ignorance and base ingratitude you are shamefully betraying the confidence that has been placed in you, and retarding with most vile and unprincipled acts, the kind things that have been done you. You were starving upon inadequate wages in your native lands, and we have given you such compensation as no other country has paid to laborers. You were ignorant, and our common schools were thrown freely open to you and your children, and in our night schools we teach your adults; our schools from our primaries to our highest universities of learning are open to your children. If you profess religion, we ask of you no questions concerning it. You may worship as you please Christ the God, the sun, the oaks, the Pope, the tablets of your ancestors, the white bull, Buddha, Mahomet, the Grand Lama of Tibet, or the devil. We put no restraint upon your conscience if you have any. We give you equal protection of our laws; we defend you in our courts. If sick, we take you to our free asylums; if criminal, we welcome you to our prisons. We have no property entailed from your acquisition. We have no laws of primogeniture; no laws that place traps and spring-guns if you poach for game or fish. We have millions of free acres of government domain which we invite you to occupy without payment. Our mines are open to your labor. No vocation is closed to you. The highest political honors are within your reach. When you die you may transmit your accumulations to alien heirs. In a word, we make you citizens, and place you on the same plane with ourselves. All professions, all civic honors, all military achievements, all arts, industries, and employments are offered to your competition. If there are any wrongs in the enactment or execution of the laws, we offer you the electoral urn, and give you equal voice with the native-born to correct and remedy them. That all this is true you know. Look about you in our community, you Catholics. Look to your clergy, your churches, their millions of accumulated wealth. Look to the Jesuit College on Market Street, and the other place of learning and religious worship now being erected on Van Ness Avenue; your church spires on every side; your parochial schools and institutions of higher culture. You Irish and Germans, look to your savings banks with nearly $30,000,000 of deposits; to the bankers, bonanza kings, millionaires, Senators, Governors, State officials, leading merchants, prominent business men, honored and honorable citizens, who, under our laws and the generous hospitality of our political and social system, have attained wealth, honor, and honorable positions. How does it happen that there are to-day in San Francisco fifty thousand prosperous, wealthy, honorable, and respectable citizens of foreign birth in the enjoyment of their homes, their churches, their clubs, and their innocent recreations at rural picnics, or you two, or three, or four thousand discontented, grumbling, impetuous, political malcontents are down here among the fleas upon the sand-lot, cursing God, the Constitution, and the American people that you have had bad luck? I will answer you, and you may kick back with all the malevolence of your ignorant heads and your malicious heels.

You are an idle, drunken, worthless, vagabond lot. You drink too much beer. You hang about corner groceries, and you play "pitch seven up" for whisky. You are worthless ward politicians. You gamble in wild-cat stocks. You waste your lives pursuing demagogues who are more worthless than yourselves, more idle, more ignorant, more selfish, and more criminal. If you would go to work, there is plenty of work to do. If you will stop drinking whisky, give up Chinese cigars, save your money, follow your wives' advice, stay at home nights, and go to church on Sundays, you can save money, buy a homestead, become independent, educate your children, and by sobriety, industry, and economy, become honored and respectable American citizens, instead of remaining what you are—a discontented, worthless set of ignorant foreigners. You ought to be ashamed of yourselves. There is not a millionaire, nor prosperous business man in California that has not had his days of adversity—his days of trial, poverty and hard labor. Those who came to California in the early time endured its hardships. Some fell under the burden, and filled early graves; some prospered, all toiled, all struggled; and now you—most of you either late comers or men of unthrift, idle, and dissolute habits—what do you demand?

That we divide with you? Not much! We will see you collectively and individually damned first. You must work as we did, and if you won't work, you shall have no beer, nor whisky, nor "pitch seven-up." You shall not help yourselves by threats, nor by violence. You shall not bring about agrarianism, and division of property, by politics or Constitutional tricks. We are not afraid of you as a political party, nor of your shillalabs. The time has not come in California for Nihilism, nor Socialism, nor Communism; and if your leaders—your Kearney, your Beerstecher, your Clitus Barbour, your Freud, your Vaqueruel, your Bonnet, your Larkin, your Tinnin, your Howard, your Terry, and all the other demagogues who deceive and mislead you; all the draymen, corset-makers, cooks, hair-dressers, lawyers, and demagogues whom you have set up as political oracles—would tell you the truth, they would tell you that you enjoy to-day all the political privileges for which Nihilists contend in Russia, Socialists in Germany, or Communists in France.

You have every political privilege in this State for which revolutions have been stirred and dynasties overthrown. There is not a principle for which martyrs ever died or heroes contended that you do not enjoy. You are free in your conscience, free in your persons, free of speech, with perfect freedom of action within the law. You are not serfs to lords, nor villains to the soil. You owe no military service to feudal chieftains, nor are you drafted to the armies of the State. You are not subject to exactions by taxation. You are in every sense freemen and citizens of a free republic. To your children descends the heritage of freedom, and in whatever chains you were born, or by whatever bonds you were fettered, you are now free; free by the generous political policy of a nation that has made you citizen, sovereign, and equal with themselves under the law.

If you can not prosper in this country, it must be for one of two causes: either God has given you no sense, or it is because you are idle and unenterprising. If God has not given you the proper modicum of brains, it is His fault, and not the fault of the American nation or its laws. If you are idle and unenterprising, it is your own fault. We did not create you, and we can not recreate you.

If you do not like this country, then, in the name of heaven, why don't you go back to that country you came from? If wages are inadequate here, return to your peasant homes in Germany, where women are yoked with steers to plow; go back to Belgium, where women drag carts with dogs; go back to Ireland, to France, to Scandinavia, to the plains of Lombardy, where women wield the mattock; to Portugal, where women hold wooden plows, and where you are liable to do military duty. Go back and tell your countrymen and countrywomen that in a land of inexhaustible fertility, where farms were free, where religion was honored, where education was within the reach of all, where mines, and forests, and fisheries were open to the world, where the law protected all, and where you were clothed with the sovereignty of citizenship—that you could not make a living. Go back and starve, and die, and rot. Be cremated, be damned, be anything, and give us a rest from this insufferable, never-ending din of beer-drinking, whisky-guzzling, pitch-seven-up foreign-born politicians.

As Americans we are sick and tired of it and you; we are wearied of your whining mendicancy. We question the fact that you can not get work. We believe you do not try. If no one supplies you with labor, go and make labor for yourselves. Land is plenty and free; game is free in field and forest; fish abound in stream and ocean; the mines, the forests, the quarries, the broad range of pasture lands are open to your enterprise. Do as we did who crossed the continent on foot and mule-back, toiled in the mines, baked our own beans, and cooked our own slapjacks. Do as our fathers did, who pioneered the western wilderness, subduing savage beasts and nature, to make the homes where we were born. Fish for clams and crabs upon the seashore; dig roots; live on acorns and pine nuts, hire a sow and raise pork; but, for God's sake, stop your whining. The Digger Indians could live in California. Are you less enterprising? The early Californian could live. Have you less capacity? If everything fails, and in this land of broad opportunity you can not earn your living, then go hang yourselves. Abraham's bosom is never full.

Again, we are angry at the insolence of your political demands. You are accustomed to the argument of kings, and in your ignorance you are unfit to be freemen. Therefore, we ask the respectable, the prosperous, the contented, the reasonable of your own countrymen to unite with us, in order that we may silence your clamor, and relegate you to your proper positions. You! an ignorant mob of unwashed foreigners, would teach Americans their political duties. You! a propertyless mass of unskilled laborers, who are too idle and too vicious to earn your beer and whisky—your demand of us a division of our earnings, and call it Communism. You would overthrow our laws, and style it Nihilism. You would level all barriers of society, break down all distinctions of class, and this is the sand-lot's idea of Socialism. You would steal the money you have not earned, and call it Agrarianism. You have the impudence of bandits, with the courage of panel thieves.

Now, my dear adopted German and Irish fellow-citizens of the sand-lot, let us again take up the smile of the ass. You are the asses, and I am the speaking one that Balaam bestrode. Let us discuss the Chinese question, remembering all the time that I am a mule and that you are donkeys. Have we—imported jackasses that we are—have we any right, or does it become us, to dictate to the American people what other animals they may import. We are natives of Central Asia. Some naturalists think our wild ancestors belonged to Africa. So, then, we are no better than Africans or Chinamen; and being foreigners ourselves, coming to the country by the invitation of Americans, with what sort of reason, propriety, or decency, shall we set ourselves up to say that Africans and Chinese shall not come to the country because they are more patient, will stand harder knocks, work more hours, bear heavier burdens, and live upon meaner food than we? Remember, I am not addressing you now as Germans or Irishmen, but as jackasses. I am not comparing you, my dearly adopted fellow-citizens, to these unfortunate animals; I am only using the smile to illustrate how utterly absurd and inconsistent it is for one kind of wild animal to kick another out of the pasture to which all have been admitted by the same kind of invitation.

And now—again dropping the smile—let me ask you, German and Irish workingmen, if the American citizens of California are not doing all they can to rid the State of the Chinese, and to prevent more from coming? Are they not doing it in your interest, and for your benefit? Have not both political parties, all the Christian churches, all the respectable clergymen, the entire press, the Chamber of Commerce, delegates in both houses of Congress, the Senate and Legislature of California, the Mechanics' Institute, State and county conventions, the people in public meetings, the Governor of the State, the Mayor of the city, the Board of Supervisors, the Health Office, the Police Department, men of eminence, everybody, everywhere, under all circumstances, at all times when opportunity presented, have they not honestly worked to solve this Chinese problem? You know they have, and you know they have made great progress. And you know that your insane threats, your violent and illegal conduct, have injured and retarded this business. You have placed difficulties in the way of legislation. The brutal and cowardly motto that the "Chinese must go" is a piece of absurd demagogism. The Chinese that are here are here under the invitation of an American treaty, and while it is well and desirable to prevent any more Chinese from coming, there is no more right, nor sense, nor justice, nor humanity in driving Chinese away than there would be in driving away Germans or Irishmen. You know this, and you know that the threat is a contemptible and cowardly one. You do not intend to carry it out, and, what is more, you dare not attempt it.

You claim to want labor. The sand-lot is not the place to find it. You have the sense to know, and if not the sense, you have had the experience to demonstrate, that your present mode of angry agitation is making labor less, and is reducing wages. Capital and labor are mutually dependent upon each other. If you intimidate capital, it is timid and hides itself. While it is hiding you are starving. It never comes forth at threats. It never circulates in times of violence and danger. Before this agitation commenced you were prosperous. The Real Estate Associates built hundreds of houses in a year. Since this agitation times have been hard. Real estate values have depreciated, enterprise is arrested, and you are the first to feel the blow. If there are no bricks laid, there is no money for carrying the hod. As soon as you cease agitating, confidence will be restored. Money was never more abundant. New enterprises will be inaugurated, new industries stimulated. Money will again circulate freely, and you will get some. It is your own fault that this period of stagnation has come. Ten years ago this was the happiest, most hopeful, and most independent community in the world. Everybody was elastic and buoyant; everybody was industrious and economical and nearly all had their own homes. You gambled in stocks, went into politics, lost your grip, gave way to the Chinese, began to drink whisky and beer, and to play "pitch seven up" at the corner groceries. Your bad example made hoodlums of your children, and now you meet on the sand-lot, blaspheme God, and denounce the laws of the American Republic because you have reaped the consequences of your own crimes and follies and because you have been the contrivers of your own ruin.

Now, take the advice of a sober-minded mule—one who came early to the country, worked hard, and ate thistles. Abandon the leadership of the good-for-nothing, long-eared, leather-lunged, asinine brayers who have undertaken to set themselves up as teachers of political economy. Abandon politics and go back to honest labor. Stop drinking beer and whisky. Give the corner groggery, "pitch seven-up," "cinch," "blue-Peter," "old sledge," and stocks a wide berth. Give ear again to the sermon of your priests, the advice of your wives, and the prayers of your children. Leave "lecherous bond-holders" and "hell-born and bell-bound" rich men alone till you can change places with them. Do not attempt, through the organization of a Workingmen's party, to secure for yourselves the places of thieving, dishonest, devilish politicians, lest you should be tempted, and, like them, fall. Let Americans, assisted by foreigners of intelligence, wealth, and common sense, govern the country of your adoption; and, for God's sake, desist from howling about the Chinese—whom many honest people, who are not asses, think a more desirable class of citizens than the ignorant, idle, political, discontented, ever agitating, ignorant set of foreign-born brutes they think you to be. And now let us pray.

ADDENDUM.

At the conclusion of this address the owner of the animal came forward and apologized for the rude manner and harsh expressions used by his mule toward the very large and respectable audience of adopted fellow-citizens—both ladies and gentlemen. He thanked them on behalf of his long-eared property for their indulgence of his plain talk, reminding them that freedom of speech within the bounds of license was one of the bulwarks of American liberty. He also advised the audience that the mule did not comprehend within the criticism any order-loving and law-abiding citizen, of either foreign or native birth, and did not exempt from caustic denunciation any idle, good-for-nothing, worthless human ass, whether native or foreign born; that his mule, having retired from politics, did not desire their votes, nor require any of their small advertisements for his support.

Kearney went out to instigate our ignorant American farmers like a lion in March. He was escorted to the boat with threats of brass. His trip all the way to San Buenaventura was a triumphal procession. At the latter place he ran against Sheriff Covarrubias, abused him, and apologized to save himself from being kicked. At Santa Ana he was soundly whallopped by one Rule, showed the white feather, and howled. Took water at Visalia from Senator Tom Fowler, and came back to San Francisco on Wednesday unnoticed. He brought no scalps to adorn his belt, no captives chained to his chariot wheels, but he had his expenses paid, had a good time, saw the country, abused plenty of people, and was only whipped once. His trip was a success; altogether a good April fool joke.

William Wellock, the ranting English shoemaker who came to San Francisco from Canada some eleven months since, had a benefit ball and concert given to him by the workmen of this city. He acknowledges the contributions as ample. If this man has done an honest month's labor since he has been in California we have not heard of it. It occurs to us that if the collections taken up for the agitators, spent in politics, squandered in processions, disbursed for papers, contributed to send Kearney in a palace car across the continent and back, and that gathered at his public meetings, had been devoted to the benefit of unemployed labor, there had been less to complain of.

"In Prussia the number of persons paying taxes on an income exceeding $12,000 is twelve hundred and forty."—Official statement. There are twice as many Prussians in America, thanks to our beneficent laws, who have an income of one thousand dollars a month. Now we commend this fact to those Prussians who meet upon the sand-lot to hear an ignorant, flannel-mouthed Irishman denounce American institutions, and let every Prussian remember that the opportunity for him to secure an income is greater here than in his native land.

"Kearney and the Chronicle" is the signboard of the nation, and those who vote for it will be obliged to do so in new firm. They are honorable gentlemen without a doubt.

A DOUBTFUL EXPERIMENT.

Why, of all books in the world, should they have chosen A Daughter of Heth for their evening readings aloud? Doubtless they were quite unaware how dangerous it was. For it is a dangerous book. One may not be the "Whaup," because not good-looking enough, not sufficiently brave and erratic; nor "Earlshope," because lacking wealth, polish, grace of carriage; and, if one be feminine, "Coquette" may chance to have no meaning as indicating one's looks, or likings, or temperament. There may be no "Lady Drum" among the listening circle, no "Mr. Cassilis," no "Leezebees," but, nevertheless, it is a dangerous book, and Mr. Potts was extremely blind not to see this before proposing the readings aloud, and naming, somewhat dogmatically, a book which he had previously read and liked.

There were five of them. A benedick, a matron, a bachelor, a maid, and a small boy. To be descriptively economical, it will suffice that the host and hostess were "pleasant people." Their two guests were wont to qualify "pleasant" with certain adverbs belonging to the superlative degree; but then there was a spice of partiality in their enthusiasm, natural certainly, but unmistakable nevertheless. The small boy was a study for a great painter of children and other unschooled animals—too many-sided a subject for this little canvas; but it will add to the picturesqueness to imagine him in mercurial attendance upon the crackling fire, the wondering moth-flies round the lamp, the eager interest of the listeners, until bedtime. The maid was not "Coquette," in all the word meant to the pen which created her. She was not beautiful in the sense which challenges criticism, but she had the sort of beauty which always disarms it. And like "Coquette," so strangely like her, that the others came to marvel at the likeness; her face had the rare quality of changefulness which we talk and write about so glibly, yet may never fairly tell about. As for the rest, your imagination must supply the details, and overlay the colors.

Mr. Potts was of that noble army of martyrs who merit no description. The inelegant "scrubby" would be accurate to a fault if indicating what he was not would fill the measure of our descriptive needs. But Mr. Potts is our hero, and it must be explained that he had a soul, and some well-worn purple of sentiment, and a way of looking at things, which, with greater capacity and better strength of purpose, might have made him of value in the world.

The five were storm-bound. A cabin in the lower Sierra, rather larger than usual, comfortable, arranged after a fashion in a sense artistic, and altogether, to three of them at least, little short of charming. The weather had shut them in to their own resources, a well-provided larder, a few books, and a supreme indifference to the outside world.

It was a wonderful place in itself, and a week before had seemed like a glowing scene from one of Church's fairest landscapes. Far away to the southwest, Tulare Lake glistened like the growing moon on the measureless green of the sea at night. The trackless Sequoia region, almost unknown except to the wild animals and John Muir, stretched southward into the blue distance; and to the north and east, the turrets of pine rose grandly, oft above the other, to the very edge of the rock-ribbed snow line, surmounted by its pinnacles of glistening, perennial whiteness. All around them grew the pines, rank, and yet shapely in their luxuriousness, odorless, with a stimulating fragrance their very own.

To all the five the pines were a ceaseless wonderment and joy, making monotony impossible. The cabin sat in a clearing on the crest of a hill, and there was no dread of danger from falling tree or rocky avalanche. Inside was a delicious atmosphere of coziness, induced by the big fires and the cheerful friendliness of the evening pastimes.

The pleasant days of the previous week, with their forest rambles in search of flowers and ferns and mosses and bits of shining quartz, the merry scrambles, the dizzy mule-back clambers, the fishing rivalries, the hunting triumphs, all these were at a stand-still; for the clerk of the weather, either in payment of some outstanding debt, or for some other wise but inscrutable reason, had gone to work with most business-like impressiveness, and every morning for a week Freita Macaire said gayly, in merry travesty of her text, "The rain it raineth every day."

"We will read A Daughter of Heth aloud," said Moses Potts, oracularly, and all the people said, "Amen!"

So every night of that tempestuous week they read a certain stint of that eerie tale, so wildly sweet, so vivid, glowing, and strong at times; so quiveringly sad, so mutely tragic always.

When Mr. Potts began his task he had not studied Miss Macaire with any special diligence. He had found her an extremely welcome companion during the preceding fortnight of sans souci in which they were first thrown together. Moses was a somewhat light-headed young man, who had paid the inevitable tribute of light-headed young men to the first pretty face he met, and had been becomingly repulsed. The hurt was not passing deep, though of course he thought it was, and three weeks before he had imagined he could go on for ever crying for the moon, to die at last constant and serene.

The first night of Coquette's troubled story taught him his mistake. He saw before him what he had never really known before—an actual woman. Not a waxen doll, reciprocal as a kitten; not an intellectual prodigy, too near Parnassus for patience of sentiment. Here, at last, was the living, breathing embodiment of womanhood which he had dreamed of, talked of, read of, yet had never seen. Therefore, it came about that to him this reading was at once a pleasure and an experiment. He would test himself and study the character page before him at one and the same time.

In the day time, when the prisoners were not sleeping or eating, they were dawdling, impatient for the night; and when the great pine logs were roaring on the hearth, the curtains drawn, and the lamps lit, there was a subdued hum of expectancy, and a brief buzz of question hazards as to this and that possible happening: to all of which Mr. Potts, the reader, made no sign, and zealously warded off all conjectures of the climax. And then he went on with the reading, the wondrous charm of the tale compelling the others, even through his tame delivery as though his voice had been the voice of a seraph; and there was always a pretty clamor for "more" when the stint was finished, to which the judicious Moses always turned a deaf ear.

Mr. Potts was a maker of verses, and in the day-time he used to amuse himself trying to put his words into rhythmic praise of Freita Macaire. As well attempt to "arrange" the music of the spheres. Only a jumble of dissonant rhymes "wild and mild," "love and glove," and the like, came at his muse's bidding. And small wonder it was, for the jade was handicapped with an odd ghost or two: a baby face, a boy's ambition, a man's ennui—not to be shaken off lightly, either, at the whim of an ingrate whose ignorance of actual romance was his only excuse for the folly.

Luckily, Miss Macaire was not pestered with his gawky lines (he wisely lit his cigars with them), and his manner was not more pronounced than a gentleman's respectful attention to an attractive woman ought always to be.

It was Thursday evening, the book was more than half-finished, and every one was eager for the rest, but Moses was inflexible. So the host, who had a toothache, retired early, and the small boy carried off his mother to tell him "sleep stories," and the two young people were left together.

Miss Macaire lay on a tiny lounge before the red embers in the fire-place; her dainty wraps were draped in graceful folds about the flexible outlines of her dress; one wee, tantalizing, Cinderella slipper peered incuriously at the hearth-glow. She was charmingly picturesque, yet quite unconscious of its possible bearing upon other life-lines. She was thinking of the story, pitying, wondering, questioning, fearing.

To her Mr. Potts was merely a rather obliging, not at all disagreeable young man; distinctly ugly in appearance, and not at all overpowering in intellect or attainments—a person so obviously unromantic, so impossibly unloverlike, that her sense of humor was the only mental messenger which ever stirred to meet him.

Moses leaned in an outside angle of the fire-place, where his face was in the shadow and he could see her face distinctly. They sat a while in silence, and then he said, abruptly:

"What do you think of 'Earlshope,' Miss Macaire?"

"I am very sorry for him," she answered, simply.

"Why," he asked.

"Because he was unfortunate; because he was interesting, also, I suppose."

"That is a woman's reason, that last—'because he was interesting.' Come, now, be honest. Hadn't the last half of your answer the first half of your meaning?"

She laughed carelessly, and then answered: "Perhaps it had. I am not at all a philanthropist. I like persons, but I don't care much for mankind outside of my own experience."

"But suppose, Miss Macaire, the pity were narrowed down to your own experience, and a common-place young man should become very fond of you, and—"

"Then I should be very sorry for the common-place young man," interrupted the young lady, rather impatiently. "You surely would not have me marry him, would you?"

A somewhat discouraging opening that; an ordinary combatant would have struck his colors and surrendered at discretion; but Moses Potts was a little out of the ordinary as regarded pertinacity, if not constancy. He was merely silenced for the nonce, and bided his time.

Sunday night the story was finished, discussed, perhaps cried over; the painstaking reader received his meed of thanks and compliments; and then some one suggested another book for the coming week. To this Moses assented, but excused himself from further elocutionary duty, nor could entreaties or persuasions move him to change his resolve.

The next day, Monday, opened without a cloud. The chance for an outing was welcomed hungrily by the ladies, and a tramp was projected by the host to Coyote Lake, a point of interest which neither of the visitors had previously visited. The day continued bright and warm, and the ladies, unencumbered by wraps, walked quite as rapidly and easily as their companions. They had covered nearly seven miles of rough, sometimes muddy, country ere they halted for their nooning. It was understood that they should remain all night with some herdsmen living beside the lake, and would take their chances of getting back the following day without being overtaken by a storm.

In the afternoon the host and hostess and the other two paired off by themselves—the small boy playing a running accompaniment for both sets, and for a long while all were busy about leaves and mosses and "sich."

After a while Mr. Potts said, not more than half aloud: "Is it less sin than folly this game of love, at which men play so recklessly? I don't know, and it wearies me trying to solve the riddle."

His companion, that golden afternoon, was in perfect rhythm with the marvelous summer day in winter, under whose spell they moved. The vagrant sentimentality of the young man jarred upon her like an unskillful discord in a psalm of joy. She did not answer for a long moment, as if she struggled with the swift disdain which made her lip curl and her nostrils quiver. Then she said, quietly: "Don't ask me such questions, Mr. Potts. I have no answers for them. If I had I could not bring myself to think them out to-day."

"Will you go out on the lake with me to-night?" he asked, with odd abruptness.

"Yes, if you like—and it does not rain—and you'll promise to be sensible."

The evening was as cloudless as the day. The little canoe, crank and rather clumsy, looked a goblin boat in the shadow of the pigmy pier. It could hold only two, of which circumstance Moses was glad, and his companion not at all sorry.

The young girl wanted to be perfectly still, in sympathy with the almost pulseless night, and she believed that the young man facing her had only to be bidden to be silent too.

Behind them the treeless, grassy table-land sloped at a slight angle from the little lake up to the craggy shoulders of Coyote Ridge, crowned by the Titan forehead of Grizzly Peak. Over their heads, beneath their feet, the "starry hosts" were being "marshaled on their nightly plains," and away before them the arrowy pines, which came down to the water's edge, rose again, black and distant, against the starlit sky. There was no moon, and in the starlight they could scarcely see each other's faces; but there was no need. The man was in love, the woman was not, and, for the moment, each was content.

In the middle of the lake Moses ceased rowing; there was scarcely a sound, except the swish of the ripples against the sides of the canoe, an indistinct, far-away murmur of the pines, and, now and then, the distant howl of some bandit coyote, with its answer and their weird echoes.

"Have I been silent long enough?" he asked at length.

"Yes, you may talk to me all the way back—if you can find any subject slight enough for my woman's intellect."

"That is the most withering, the most unkind thing you ever said to me. Have I ever shown your sex even an implied discourtesy, or misvaluation, in your presence? Or are you a physiognomist? and do you read woman-bater in the lines of my unhappy face?"

"To tell you the truth, Mr. Potts, I never troubled myself to study your face, and I am certainly no physiognomist. I rather like to hear you talk, I think, when I understand you. Hadn't we better go home?"

Moses turned the awkward boat toward the opposite shore, and pulled for a while silently. Then he said slowly, and the words came out one by one, as if tugged at by a strong band, "I know I may be spoiling everything by what I am about to say, but—"

"Then don't say it, Mr. Potts. Everything is such a big affair to spoil. You may never mend it again."

She spoke lightly, but there was a world of suppressed meaning in her tones. Almost any other man would have been warned in time, but he went on, slowly, as if she had not spoken:

"But I can not help myself. I have known you just three weeks—and I love you."

"I am very, very sorry, Mr. Potts, for your sake—for my own sake. I don't like to give pain—you know that, I trust. Yet I can not but think you needlessly cruel to both of us in bringing me here to tell me this folly."

For a brief moment he pulled on, still silent; then he said, swiftly, yet almost cheerfully, "Can you row, Miss Macaire, while I roll a cigarette?"

"I think I can," she said, nervously. She changed seats, took the oars, and pulled, somewhat awkwardly, with her gloved hands, while he slowly filled and rolled the bit of white paper, somewhat abstractedly, it seemed; then he lit his cigarette and puffed a moment in silence. In a few minutes he said, quietly:

"We are almost at the pier, Miss Macaire; shall I relieve you?"

"No, thank you," she said. "I'm beginning to like it. I am quite sure I can take the boat in by myself."

"Then you may," said Mr. Potts, rising to his feet. "Good evening, Miss Macaire!" and the next instant the waters of Coyote Lake closed for ever over Mr. Moses Potts.

RALPH SIDNEY SMITH.

SAN FRANCISCO, March, 1879.

Why it was Called Hangtown.

Among the many quaint names given in early times to mining camps and towns in this State, such as Jackass Gulch, Dogtown, Poker Flat, Pinchment, etc., may be added that of "Hangtown." The last name was baptized in blood.

The news of the discovery of gold by Marshall, at Coloma, in the winter of 1848, brought hither the outlaws and vagabonds—as well as many good people—of the North Pacific Coast, from Panama to Alaska. Large numbers of the former class were at the various missions in the Territory at the time of the discovery who made haste to the gold fields. Life and property were of little value in a community a large number of whom were forced adventurers from home, deserters from whaling-ships, the navy, and bandits from many nations of the world. For many months after the discovery of gold, and until the emigrants began to arrive from across the Plains, this lawless set held sway.

During the spring and summer of 1849, after the arrival of American emigrants from the Eastern and Middle States, they deemed it advisable to correct this marauding spirit of the first comers, and make an example of the first who offended by summary punishment. Murderers and robbers were frequent along the branches of the South and Middle Forks of the American River, north of Coloma, and finally found their way to a mining camp situated on the north branch of Weber Creek, known then as "Old Dry Diggins," now Placerville.

A Frenchman who kept a trading post on Log Cabin Ravine—now Beadford Avenue—was known by the gang to have considerable gold-stuff, and was selected by the "owls," a self-styled name of one of the robber gangs. Four of these bandits, composed of one American, one Mexican, and two Frenchmen, made a descent upon the trading post, and robbed it while the owner lay in bed in the building, with his eyes partly closed, not daring to make a defense, the robbers swearing at the same time that any movement on his part would result in his instant death. The robbers were marked men from that moment.

The robbed Frenchman soon gave the alarm, and vigilantes started in pursuit of the robbers, who were captured, brought to trial, condemned, and executed—except one of the Frenchmen who escaped from those who had the prisoners in charge. The conviction and execution of the three were hastened by the arrival during the trial of persons from the north side of the river, who identified the prisoners as parties who had been suspected of theft and murder in that vicinity. Sentence having been passed, the execution was next in order. A white oak tree of gigantic size, standing on the south side of the creek, directly opposite to where the Cary House now stands (the stump of the tree, more than six feet in diameter, now being covered by the floor of the building of George G. Blanchard, on the northeast corner of Main and Coloma Streets), was selected as the place of execution. As the sun sank in the West, on the 25th day of September, 1849,* the three culprits paid with their lives the penalty for their misdeeds. Their bodies were allowed to hang until the following morning, when they were taken down and buried on the north side of the creek, on the site where the Mountain Democrat office now stands. From the day of the execution the name of "Old Dry Diggins" was dropped, and that of Hangtown substituted. The first Legislature gave it the legal name of Placerville, yet many of the old miners speak of it only as Hangtown.

E. N. STROUT.

* There is some dispute as to the exact time the execution took place; some think it was in the spring. My informant was J. C. Johnson, who was the first Treasurer of El Dorado County, afterward a member of the Legislature. Johnson was killed by Indians in Arizona about two years ago. W. T. Sayward, capitalist, who had an office some two years ago at 420 California Street, might give the correct date, as he was in 1849 Deputy Pretect of "Old Dry Diggins."

"NATIVES OF KENTUCKY."

Last winter, while in Aurora, the recently resuscitated Nevada mining camp, I would frequently take long walks over the mountains to free myself from type fumes—for the country paper's "our sanctum" and "our composing rooms" are separated only in the editor's mind. On one of these walks I came across the old town burying-ground, and a deserted, unkept-looking affair it was. Brushing the snow from the face of one head-board, standing considerably apart from any others, I made out this inscription:

"NATIVES OF KENTUCKY."

Although the painted letters were much worn, I could see that they were the only ones the board had ever borne. The oddness of the inscription, the entire lack of descriptive history or moral suggestions found on the regulation head-board, excited my curiosity. I determined to learn something concerning the occupants of this doubly-inhabited grave.

That night I visited at his cabin Old Joe, as he was called, a pensioned Wells-Fargo messenger, who had often before served me as a directory and guide-book of early Aurora.

"Know anything about those 'Natives of Kentucky?'" Well, I should remark that I do," said Joe in answer to my question. "You have come to the right party for that story, sure enough. You keep plenty of wood on the fire and plenty of toddy hot, and I'll give you the whole business, straight."

It was in the fall of '61, or '62, that I first met one of those Kentucky chaps. I was driving stage from here to the Half-way Station on the Carson road, and return. One night, as I took the stage at the Station, I noticed a slight little fellow who had been riding inside make a sickly-looking chap on the driver's seat change places with him, saying he could stand the ride outside easily. It was a good thing the change was made, for I think the sick man would have frozen to death riding outside that night. The little fellow had lots of blankets and rode outside with me pretty comfortably. He hadn't much to say until we neared Aurora in the morning, when he asked me a good many questions about the town. He seemed quite broke up like, when I told him the town was fearfully crowded; that the only chance for a night's sleep was to spread a blanket on a bar-room floor, and that men were paying two and three dollars even for that privilege. At that time Aurora was filling up with a rough lot of customers, and I used to feel uneasy about leaving my cabin alone so much; for you see I was here only three times a week and then only in the day time. Thinking of this, and having put up Dummy—which is the only name I ever knew for the chap who rode outside with me that night—to be a square man and no beat, I told him he could have one of the bunks in my cabin until he found something better. Dummy was so glad at my offer, and thanked me so decently, that before we pulled up at the stage office here we had it arranged that he should cabin with me as long as he stayed in town.

Well, things went along for a while after that nice and quiet-like. At first Dummy asked a good many questions of the stage agent and postmaster about a certain party that neither of them knew anything about. Then he bought the right to work a little claim over on Last Chance hill, and, with a couple of miners he hired, began running a tunnel for his ledge. The men about town called him Dummy, because he had so little to say to any of them. He only went down town when he wanted tools or powder, and would go back to his work without saying much. The mornings I was in town he would wait at the cabin to eat breakfast with me, and tell me how the tunnel was getting on before going to work. One morning, after Dummy had been here about three months, the stage agent said to me as I was unloading:

"Joe, there is a chance for a nice row between your pard and the Doctor. They are both running for the same ledge, and their tunnels are sure to meet, and soon, too, like the sharp points where three roads cross. If they strike anything the best man will hold it, that's all."

What the agent said moved me considerably. The man he had called the "Doctor" was a bad customer to quarrel with. He was a man well liked by the miners for the regular professional way he tended any of them hurt by accidents, and for the way he spent money. He gambled big and at times drank hard. It was whispered about that he traveled under a different name in each camp, but no one seemed to know much about him.

When I got home that morning I told Dummy what the agent had said. He did not seem to think much of it though; said he was working his own ground, and if he struck anything proposed to hold it. He agreed to pack one of my pistols after the matter was settled, and after breakfast went out to work. I followed him soon to see how the ground lay. I met the Doctor at the mouth of his tunnel.

"Hello, Joe!" said he, "going to give up staging and go to mining?"

"Too dangerous," said I. "How are you getting on with your tunnel?"

"Getting pretty close to that other party. We can hear their blast, d—n 'em."

"The other party is my pard, Dummy, and he is a good shot."

"The hell you say! Well, tell him to heel himself. Good morning."

I saw that a fight was certain, but, of course, could do nothing to prevent it, so trusted to luck to end it all right.

A few mornings after that, when I reached my cabin, I found one of Dummy's miners there, all out of breath, just in from the tunnel. Dummy had been shot, and had sent for me. As I ran out to the tunnel with him the man told me that early that morning a big blast they had fired had joined the two tunnels and uncovered a rich ledge at the same time. Dummy had been sent for, and nearly reached the opening when shots were exchanged, and Dummy hurt. When I reached the tunnel I found poor Dummy lying white and still on some miner's clothes. When he heard my voice he opened his eyes, and, motioning me near him, said:

"Joe, carry me home; I'm hit hard, but I must tell you something before—oh, quick, Joe!"

One of the men and myself carried him in my overcoat to the cabin. When we had laid him in his bunk he told me to send the man to inquire how the Doctor was, for he was shot, too. When the man was gone, Dummy said:

"Joe, get some snow and put it here, on this wound; it is burning me."

I got some snow, and, uncovering the wound in the breast, discovered what I had never before suspected—Dummy was a woman.

"There, Joe, you see—no, don't go for a doctor or a woman. I can't live; you must listen. Remember everything I say, for if I don't see him again before I die, you must tell him—the Doctor—what I tell you. In my home, Joe, in Kentucky, this man and I were brought up together. When I was but a girl he went North to college. When he returned after four years he found his little play-fellow grown to be a woman, whom he loved, and who loved him, Joe. We were engaged, and for a while were, oh, so happy in our home in Kentucky, Joe, and it was beautiful there, and—oh, yes, I must tell you so that he may know. There was a meeting between my father and him. What passed between them I did not know until a year afterward, but I never saw him again until—O my God!—until to-day. One year after Walter—the Doctor—left, when my father thought my broken heart had healed, I learned from him that Walter had gone from our house thinking my love only a pretense, for in the heat of their discussion—they were both proud and hasty—my father had said that his daughter had no desire or intention of marrying an educated beggar. The thought that these were my words to him through my father sent Walter away. Feigning indifference, I learned from my father that he had heard of Walter's leaving New York for California."

"I determined to follow him, to undo the wrong father had done, to prove my love to him. Secretly I left my home. On arriving in San Francisco I assumed this disguise to better continue my search. For two years I have wandered from camp to camp, mining in some, for I needed money to follow any clue I might find. Sometimes I thought myself near him; sometimes—as but yesterday—utterly lost. This morning, as I walked toward the opening of the two tunnels, I saw a lantern light, and knew the trespassers were on the ground before me. I called out for them to leave; the answer was a shot—this shot, Joe. As I fell I fired toward the spot where I had seen the pistol flash, and then I heard a voice—his voice—exclaim, 'I am shot!' I could not believe my senses, until, as he cried out, they raised a lantern to his face, and then I saw that it was Walter—my Walter—and I had shot him!"

Just then the man returned from the Doctor's cabin, and reported him badly hit, not likely to live more than an hour or so. When the poor girl heard this she said to me: "Joe, go to him and say it was Nora, of Kentucky, whom you shot and who shot you; quick, Joe, for I am dying."

I ran as I never ran before, and as I gasped Nora's message to the doctor, he jumped from the bed where he was lying, and, after glaring at me for a moment like a madman, he staggered toward the door and fell, but was caught by one of the miners who had helped carry him to his cabin from the tunnel.

As soon as he could speak he said, quietly enough: "Boys, do me one more favor, the greatest you have ever done; get me to Joe's cabin before I die." The poor fellow was very weak, and it was plain to see he couldn't last long, but we carried him to my cabin all right. I opened the door first, and saw poor Dummy—Nora—lying on her bunk, with her eyes strained toward the door like she was looking for something she wanted more than life.

As the men came to the door bearing the Doctor up between them a look came into her eyes that seemed to drive out all the suffering in them. She sprang from her bunk, and the Doctor broke from the men and held the girl close in his arms. We only heard the words, "Nora!" "Walter!" as we quietly left the cabin. It was a scene rough fellows like us were not fit to look at. When we returned we found them lying on the floor locked in each other's arms—dead. And we buried them as we found them.

E. W. TOWNSEND.

SAN FRANCISCO, March, 1879.

There is but one kind of man that can by any possibility become a successful candidate of the Republican party for Governor. In making this nomination the history of the party must be considered. It must be remembered that the Republican party, since the nomination of Gorham, has been divided into two parts of very nearly equal strength as regards numbers. It must not be forgotten that these discordant elements have not been reconciled, and that they are only sleeping upon their arms, ready to be aroused to fighting antagonism when either shall challenge the other to combat. This present contest will be settled on the 7th day of May by a rejection of the Constitution, and by such an overwhelming majority that the Kearney people will possibly cut but a small figure in the State election. The Kearney party will play but a small part in the gubernatorial contest, and will, at best, be but a disturbing element to the Democracy. It is quite possible that the contest will be a square, downright, old-fashioned, straight fight between two candidates, Republican and Democratic. In such an event, and indeed in any event, the Republican candidate must be one, who, if he does not reconcile the two contending factions, must make it possible for each to fight under his banner. He must not be a Sargent or Booth man, he must not be short-haired or Dolly Varden. He must not be the unreasonable enemy, nor yet the instrument, of corporations. He must not be the creature of any interest or the tool of any clique. He must not be the candidate of any faction, and his nomination must not signify the humiliation of any part of the Republican organization. In a word, he must be of sufficient intelligence, character and party standing to make his candidacy acceptable to all the party. He must have such standing and qualifications as will guarantee that in the event of his election he will be Governor. This is the portrait of several gentlemen whom we have now in view, any one of whom would honor the candidacy, and in event of success honor the office; any one of whom we shall most gladly do valiant service for. Any one who does not come up to this standard of independence, intelligence, and qualification we shall oppose with zeal and earnestness.

An English magazine epicure insists that American oysters are much inferior to the little coppery English variety. He is like the ducky who went catfishing, and, happening to catch a fine trout, threw it back into the water, saying, "When I come catfishing I want catfish."

A anonymous article—A baby before it's christened.

THE MASTERPIECE OF BROTHER FELIX.

Two monks were in a cell at close of day—
A cell that, too, the artist's craft betrayed.
Dying upon a bed the younger lay,
The older one beside him knelt and prayed.

The older spoke: "Your end is very near;
You can not live to see another day;
So banish thought of earth, my brother dear,
And with me join while I the last prayers say."

"Nay, Francis," said the other, "speak not so;
I can not die my life-work incomplete.
Were that but finished I would willing go—
Then death would be a messenger most sweet."

Then Francis spoke: "The world counts the success,
But God will judge by what you have essayed;
And though you fail, He will not deem the less
The efforts and the struggles you have made."

"The painter's earthly triumph is but brief—
A passion-flower is fame that soon decays;
There is a poison in the laurel leaf,
While green the wreath of heaven keeps always."

And Felix answered, "Brother Francis, so
You dream I hanker after earthly fame.
I sought for it one time—'twas long ago,
But now a holier, better meed I claim;

"And if grim Death were standing by the gate,
A messenger who brought the final call,
I tell you, brother, that he still should wait
Till I had done yon picture on the wall."

"Nay, more—were I beside the golden throne,
I would bend down at the Almighty's feet
And beg with tears: 'My life-work is not done—
Let me return until it be complete.'

"Of praying, therefore, speak not now to me—
Or, if you pray, pray I may still live on Until my painting all completed be,
That I may die content, my life-work done."

"God give you grace, my brother," Francis said,
"Your heart submissive to His will to keep."
And then he turned away and silent prayed,
But soon, o'ercome with watching, fell asleep.

Then from his bed to rise up Felix tried,
But with the effort, faint and weak, fell back;
Then, clasping hands imploringly, he cried:
"O God of heaven, one little hour I lack

"To work again upon my masterpiece,
Till I the face divine have painted there;
I care not then how soon my life may cease.
Kind God, one hour unto thy servant spare!

"But death creeps fast; too weak is now my hand
To picture true the thought that fills my brain.
Send down an angel from the spirit-land
That I may not have dreamed such dream in vain!"

The cell door opened as he ceased to speak;
A young man entered—tall he was and fair,
The glow of youth was mantled on his cheek,
His eyes were blue, and golden was his hair.

"Why come you?" Felix questioned, "and your name?"
The youth made answer: "I am Angelo,
Who, hearing of the Brother Felix's fame,
Have come that I his wondrous art might know."

Then Felix spoke: "I am the man you seek;
But I am dying, and have not the power
To teach you aught. My heart and hand are weak,
But you may aid me in this final hour."

"Take yonder painting—set it on the stand
Here at my bedside, full within my view—
Palette and pencils all are here at hand;
Then paint, good youth, as I desire you to."

"Tis all complete except the Saviour's face,
And that upon the canvas faintly lined,
But still so clear that you may plainly trace
The features fair and God-like. You will find

"The face is somewhat of a Jewish cast—
I sketched it from a beggar in the street.
Ah, little dreamed I then, a few weeks past,
Another hand my painting would complete!"

Then spoke the youth: "A spirit sure has brought Me to your cell, to be, as 'twere, a hand
Acting responsive to your every thought—
Your faintest wish shall be as a command."

"Speak, and I paint!" The dying Felix spoke
A few words now and then—no need of much;
The canvas into life and beauty woke
Beneath the magic of the artist's touch.

The youth at last his pencil laid aside,
And spoke: "O master mine, your work is done;
Can I assist you more?" The monk replied,
"Go on your way and leave me here alone."

The youth departed, and then Felix prayed:
"I thank thee, God, and death is now most sweet.
Since Thou its shaft a little while hast stayed Until my masterpiece is all complete."

Francis was woke up by the matin bell;
He rose, and lo! the light of early day
Upon the painting of the Saviour fell
That on the easel all completed lay.

In silence Francis by the painting stood;
The features gleamed as with a love divine,
From hands and feet transferréd gushed forth the blood,
'Twas perfect and complete in every line.

"In truth," then Francis spoke, "no mortal hand
Has limned the rapturous beauty of that face.
Heaven surely heard his supplication, and
An angel must have visited the place."

To Felix turning: "Yes, the laurel crown
Is yours, for you have reached art's proudest goal."
Then, bursting into tears, he knelt him down,
"May God have mercy on the passing soul!"

SAN FRANCISCO, March, 1879.

W.

"Georgie," said a devoted young mother of ance to her very juvenile son, "you can't cookie till you ask for it properly?" "Pie-sake, amen," said little innocence, with immo-hands.

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

Last Monday's performance of Mendelssohn's Athalie by the Handel and Haydn Society--the first of a series of four Oratorio evenings that are promised for this year--was, taken as a whole, quite even and satisfactory, and may be regarded as very creditable to Mr. Toepke, the new conductor. The choruses were sung with greater precision than we are accustomed to from this society--they are all comparatively easy in this respect--and the accompaniment was remarkably steady considering the picked-up nature of the orchestra and small number of rehearsals had. That the music was gone through in a humdrum monotone of mezzo-forte goes almost without saying; the one thing that our Handel and Haydn people can not do is to sing a chorus--be it never so easy--in the least as it should be sung. I do not believe that the oldest inhabitant can cite a single instance of a carefully prepared or well sustained crescendo or diminuendo, or a real piano or forte, in any of their public performances; they sing through the score in a dry, pointless sort of way, and are apparently quite content to get to the end all together and without a break. Of course, even such singing is better than none, since it furnishes an opportunity at least to hear the works; and when, as in this instance, the selection falls upon one that is not too difficult for them, even this is enjoyable. But with a little intelligent work it might all be so much better! The solo voices in Athalie (announced as an oratorio, but really nothing of the sort, but music written to accompany a tragedy), were eminently unsatisfactory. Mrs. Tippet, who has the adequate musical intelligence for the part, has not sufficient voice; Miss Rightmire may have the voice, but as she showed neither training nor intelligence what voice she has went for nothing; and Mrs. Pierce, whose voice sounded pleasantly enough, is evidently not quite in her element in music of this style. In the Domine from Verdi's Requiem a (glorious quartet, in which, however, the finale was taken at a tempo that left it well nigh unrecognizable) this weakness was even more striking than in the Athalie. Here the music is so obviously written for large voices, and a rendering of it en miniature is so palpably no rendering of it at all, that the choice must be regarded as little short of an absurdity. The fact that Mr. Borneman has great volume and sonority of tone only weakened the effect, since it destroyed the evenness and nice balance that might have resulted with a lighter basso. Why Mr. Toepke preferred in Athalie to substitute the nuisance of a pianoforte for the harp, when we have two good resident harpists, or why the long pause was made between the melo-dramatic music of No. 3 and the following chorus, No. 4 (the score says allegro), are conundrums; both of these blemishes were unnecessary and unmusical-like, and the more noticeable from the fact that in certain other matters--as, for instance, in accompanying the declamation--he displayed excellent judgment. His Battle Hymn might more properly be styled a "A reminiscence of the Pilgrim's Chorus in Tannhauser;" the Wagnerian "melody without end" here becomes monotonous without limit, and, indeed, I wonder that so excellent a musician as Mr. Toepke should not have had better discretion than to place so trivial an effort in direct contrast to such a powerful composition as the quartet of Verdi that immediately preceded or the Mendelssohn music that followed it.

The Schmidt Quintet made "a good end" at their Recital on last Tuesday evening; the audience was large and evidently thoroughly en rapport with the artists, who were all at their best. The quartets--three movements from one in F by Rubenstein, the Aria of Bach, and Mendelssohn's graceful and piquant Canzonetta in G minor--were beautifully played and seemed to make an unwanted impression, the Adagio of Rubenstein and Aria of Bach especially. Mr. Jacob Müller sang--The Monk, of Meyerbeer, songs of Mendelssohn and Goltzman, and, as encore, The Wanderer of Schubert--in a thoroughly artistic manner, and with admirable control of his beautiful voice. It is a long time since we have heard such singing in this city, and probably will be before we hear it again, for, now that these concerts are over, there are not apt to be many programmes that will put an artist like Mr. Müller on his mettle and arouse him to put forth his best efforts. Passing by a rather trivial Fantaisie by Vieuxtemps, well enough played by Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr. (with a pretty bit of sourde effect by Sarasate as an encore), and a somewhat prolix and dry Concertstück for 'cello, in which Mr. Ernest displayed his usual evenness of execution and finish of style, we come to Mr. Espinosa, whose portion of the programme consisted of Chopin's Polonaise in E flat and the first movement of Hummel's B minor Concerto. Mr. Espinosa has considerable execution and an exceedingly pretty, light touch, and with proper opportunities for more study--above all, when he attains somewhat more of repose--will undoubtedly become a very fine pianist. But for the present, I am inclined to think his selections somewhat over-ambitious, and fancy that he would be heard to greater advantage in compositions of a lighter style than any he has hitherto placed on his programmes. At the Matinée of a week ago he gave a really delightful rendering of Liszt's Rossignol, and his playing on Tuesday (as an encore) of Chopin's Berceuse was in many respects charming; but in the larger works he makes the impression of being over-weighted; gets flurried, hurried, unsteady in tempo (quite a different matter from a celibate rubato), and sometimes decidedly muddled in his passages. Much of this may safely be laid to the account of youth and a superabundance of the "fiery glow in boyish veins," and will probably clear itself in due course of time. But the fact remains that difficult Concertos are not to be well played with fingers alone; they require nerve, as well; and exacting compositions like the Polonaise of Chopin or the Lucia of Liszt are only enjoyable when, besides the mere dexterity necessary for the performance of the passages, one knows how to phrase them properly, and has the coolness, or routine, to do it. Besides which, my dear Mr. Espinosa, one should never play tricks with compositions of Chopin, and your lopping off a big slice of the Andante pianato which precedes the Polonaise was the more noticeable inasmuch as the bit you dropped under the piano is neither long nor difficult, and is very beautiful. Adieu, you have a delicate, pearly touch, lots of technique, and a future before you, and I believe everybody will be glad to see you again, especially if you will play lighter things.

Young Leopold Lichtenberg, who will be remembered by those who heard him on his last visit to this city as a genial and promising violinist, has scored a fine success at Brussels, where he has lately played, as well as at Antwerp, where he performed Vieuxtemps' fifth Concerto (a very difficult work) at a grand orchestral concert.

I observe that the Boston society Euterpe--for the performance of chamber music--has established the rule of permitting no person to enter the concert room during the performance of a number. This, which is the custom almost throughout Germany, is precisely as it should be. The late comers who tramp up the aisles (generally preceded by a stupid and noisy usher) and fuss themselves into their places in the midst of a performance are an abomination to everybody; they disturb--frequently completely upset--the performers and distract the attention of the audience. I do not think I have ever been present at a concert in this city the first number of which was not rendered entirely unenjoyable through the bad taste of those who, coming late, had not the good manners to refrain from disturbing those others who were in their places at the commencement.

The early departures are also a source of great annoyance; the crowd--mob--who are afraid of a crush or anxious to catch a car, and who consequently invariably accompany the final number with the rustle of gathering up dresses and cloaks, putting on overcoats, picking up canes and umbrellas, and tramping to the door with the most superbly selfish disregard of everybody and everything save only their own comfort. The clatter of this kind that marred the final number of Athalie on last Monday evening was simply disgusting, and would have fully warranted Mr. Toepke in following the example of Theodore Thomas, who, on similar provocation, abruptly suspended the performance, to resume it, as he stated, when the "nuisances" had left the room.

The cloud that lowered upon the operatic firmament of last Wednesday morning was dissipated ere setting of the sun (it wasn't out that day, but the figure is none the worse for that, nor am I going to spoil it on account of a trifle of fog), by the receipt of a telegram from the irrepressible Max to the effect that the important negotiations that for the past fifteen days have taxed to their utmost the diplomatic ingenuity of at least half a score of opera sharps are at last so far concluded that the preliminaries to a preliminary treaty (which is preliminary to a final and all-embracing, every-detail stipulating-and-everything-finally-concluding treaty), have received the signatures of the high contracting parties, and--Marie Roze is coming! So we are to have a genuine dramatic singer, a real flesh and blood Carmen (she is said to have considerable of the flesh, at least) after all; three prime donne--a dramatic and a florid soprano, and a contralto. Charles Adams, the tenor, is also of the company, and Conly and Lazzarini, besides those whose names I gave last week. The Music Trade Review states that Roze is to have $1,000 per week for her season here, at which rate--if it is the rate--our opera is like to be a pretty expensive affair. Whether it will be worth it? Nous verrons.

I heard little Mitchell Banner play the violin at his concert of last Thursday night, and I think it will go hard with that boy, but he will some day become a very fine violinist. A more pronounced and decided talent I never beheld, nor of all the precocious youngsters who have crossed my path have I ever heard one who had at once such a sympathetic and full tone combined with extreme accuracy of intonation. The boy plays delightfully. That he should have some faults is but natural; that he has so few is remarkable, since the nature of the pieces selected for him leaves it beyond question that he is under injudicious training. That a child of nine years--this seems to be about his age--should be set to play the Legende of Wieniauski, or the Carnival of Paganini--on a violin almost too large for him at that--is ridiculous. And yet the little fellow went at them so bravely, and played them so well in time, and with such evident faithfulness to the style in which he had been taught to do them, that it was quite wonderful. To talk of sentiment--what is called feeling--or expression in the playing of a child is absurd; it is shown how to do this thing, and imitates through intuition. But the quality of tone, the true fiddle tone, is a thing that can not be entirely taught; one has that naturally or never at all. Little Banner has this tone-quality in his fingers, and whether the fates be propitious and bring him the right opportunities for study or not, he will be a violinist. But he should undoubtedly have a chance; a twenty-dollar piece each out of a hundred pockets that would never miss it would probably open for this boy a career that would be a source of pride and gratification to the friends who aided him.

At this concert was also heard some singing by Miss Ellen Coursen. I have heard this young lady sing at various times. I have also heard her play on the violin. I think she might wisely "hang up the fiddle and the bow," since she sings much better than she plays. But I think, also, that she might wisely discontinue her vocal performances as well, since--and sad as it is it is true--she has got no voice to sing with. Miss Coursen seems to be a very brave and industrious young lady, not without a certain evident aim at something that, if she had anything in her with which to express it, might be quite artistic and nice. But, in all seriousness, the something with which to express it seems, so far at least, to be entirely and totally lacking. When I have heard her play the violin she has played very much out of tune and without any style. When I have heard her sing I heard nothing but ambition and a noise. What voice she has is not beautiful. What she does with it is mostly ungraceful; never musical. Yet she seems to be in earnest with it all--sometimes even almost to succeed in expressing herself. And in these occasional moments of almost success--it is of her singing that I am speaking--there is recognizable in her efforts a certain quality--dramatic rather than vocal--that helps me to understand why she is hopeful, and that seems to well nigh justify her ambition. If Miss Coursen had a voice I believe she would do great things with it. But--although she will probably never believe this--Miss Coursen has got no voice. S. E.

THE TYPICAL OAKLANDER.

A grave, sad-looking gentleman was observed a few days ago on Broadway intently studying the faces of the passers by. He was well, but not ostentatiously, dressed, and carried a note-book, in which from time to time he made certain entries. I approached him, and observed, with a sort of timid politeness, which I have found very serviceable on certain occasions, "Pardon me, sir, but you appear to be a stranger here, and at a loss; can I assist you in any way?" The stranger looked at me mildly over the rim of his spectacles. "Perhaps you can," he said, in a low and perfectly well bred voice, "I am in search of the typical Oaklander. It is extremely perplexing to find such a variety of race in this city, and very difficult, I assure you, to determine upon the predominant type." At that moment a young gentleman clad in a perfectly developed ulster passed by. His face was pleasing; his nose, a trifle ahead, in its ripe fruition, of the other features. The stranger made a memorandum in his book, regarded Mr. S. with much earnestness, and then, sighing deeply, said: "He is not the typical Oaklander. His hair is too short, and he is destitute of a lunch basket." A tall gentleman, with a charming blonde leaning on his arm, crossed the street. "Nor he," said the stranger; "yet," added he musingly, "he comes close to it, but in the legs and whiskers there is a fatal flaw." The genial Mr. C. bustled by, hurrying after a lady who, by her appearance of haste, seemed anxious to catch the 10:30 train. "C." said the stranger, "smacks strongly of the soil, and his pleasant manner makes up for his lack of comeliness; but still he is not the typical Oaklander. I have," he continued with much earnestness, "been seeking for a well marked type of the natives of this village for several months. Once I saw a long, red-haired man, a blue cape over his arm, spectacles on his nose, a lunch basket in his hand, and a clump of violets stuffed in his button-hole. But, alas! before I could interview him he was gone. Mr. B., who always sails in the wake of the wealthy Mr. H.--laughs when he laughs and weeps when he weeps--is not far off the specimen I so ardently desire to obtain; but there are defects in him which spoil him as a scientific subject. The females of the species are abundant; the classification of the males is difficult. I have, however, made arrangements with the honorable fraternity of Oakland hotel clerks to give me, in narrative form, the result of their observations among the Oaklander proper and the casual Oaklander. In that way only I may arrive at the typical Oaklander and make him a niche in the corridors of time unstirred by the dust of ages." With this eloquent remark my strange friend strode rapidly off in the direction of the Grand Central. I shall try to hear from him the narratives of the hotel clerks, and I shall anxiously await the result of his investigations. ENTRE NOUS.

Archery Notes.

A fair number of ladies looked on at the practice matches of the Bow Club and Merry Foresters on Saturday afternoon. They were shot on the range of the latter club at Adams' Point, and after the final arrow had been drawn from the target the archers sat down to lunch under the trees in true Robin Hood fashion. Though the shooting showed in the case of some archers marked improvement, there is still plenty of hard work ahead of all before the target's face shall bristle with shafts like quills upon the fretful porcupine. In the Bow Club practice Mr. Bush came out ahead, with the following good scores: 190 at 30 yards, 141 at 40 yards, 112 at 50 yards. From the fact that Mr. Bush when practicing shoots principally at 60 yards some people imagine that he has designs on the golden arrow, and there is no doubt that his chances in that direction are good. Mr. E. C. Macfarlane, member of last season's team, did some good shooting this week. The Merry Foresters have been strengthened by two new members, both of whom are trained bowmen. Mr. O'Connell intends that the Foresters shall make a good showing if there is any virtue in hard work at the targets. The Pacific Archery Club team this season will consist of Messrs. Darneal, Maxwell, Kinney, Ward, and Pettigrew. Mr. Kinney is considered the crack shot of the club and is probably the best long-range shooter on the coast, making splendid scores at from 60 to 100 yards. His chances for winning the gold arrow are good. Mr. Kinney is at present in the country, but without doubt his bow and extremely long arrows are with him. Mr. Maxwell began late last season, but developed quickly into a good archer, and is now one of the best shots of the team. Messrs. Darneal, Ward, and Pettigrew can always be depended on for good scores, and taking into consideration the fact that they are working hard with the object of capturing the club medal, I feel justified in the prediction that if they do not win it their scores will be much greater than archers at present anticipate. In last year's match with the Bow Club they were beaten at the 30-yard range by only a few points, notwithstanding the excellent shooting of Bush, whose score was a surprise to himself and everybody else. I know that several ladies of the Pacific Archery Club have made good scores and are practicing regularly. Miss L. B. is said to be a capital shot, but has not yet enrolled herself in any of the clubs. Mr. Peatfield, Mr. Ghiardelli, and Mr. Eyre, of the Merry Foresters, did some good long-range shooting last week, using heavy bows. The young ladies of Mills Seminary are working hard and taking great interest in archery. Mrs. Mills is enthusiastically fond of the sport, and launches her shafts at the target like a veritable Diana, showing the girls an excellent example in the management of the bow. QUIVER.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.--Sunday, April 6, 1879.

Sorrel Soup.
Fried Oysters. Kola Shau.
Brains Fried with Sherry Wine, Parsley, and Shallots, served in Paper Cases.
Green Peas. Mushrooms.
Roast Beef, New Potatoes cooked in the gravy.
Indian Salad, French Dressing, Cheese.
Cream Meringue. Macaroons.
Fruit-bowl of Apples, Bananas, Pears, and Oranges in sections.
TO COOK BRAINS WITH SHERRY WINE AND SHALLOTS--After blanching the brains, put them into a frying-pan in which you have nicely browned some butter, and fried a few pieces of shallot very finely minced; stir until nearly cooked. Then add some minced parsley and a wine-glass of sherry wine, plenty of black pepper, and some salt. Have some small paper cases ready, drop a large spoonful of the mixture in each, and squeeze some lemon juice over the top. Serve very hot. Cheese is the first plate of dessert to be eaten.
"A dinner without cheese is like a handsome lady with but one eye."--Brillat-Savarin.

PRATTLE.

A has a horse; B has nothing, but is honest and industrious. B buys A's horse and gives his promissory note for one hundred dollars. The horse previously taxed as property in A's hands, is now taxed as property in B's hands, and A is taxed—just as much as he was before—on B's note, which is property also. That is to say, the new Constitution holds that by a mere stroke of his pen, B, who has nothing, and can give himself nothing, can instantaneously create as much property for others, as others may happen to think that he will some day be able to acquire. Truly the performance of the man who causes two trees to grow where but one grew before, is of so little comparative benefit that he might be justly censured for a sin of omission.

Let us suppose that B had given, not a written but an oral promise. Ought not A to be taxed on that? If not why not? Because an oral promise is not an evidence of debt? not a "credit"? But how if there were witnesses? Oral promises are credits, however; nay even implied promises are. You have to pay—the courts will make you pay—your tradesman's account whether you have ever passed your word or not.

Now a "credit," be it promissory note, mortgage, certificate of deposit, or what you will, is not only not property, but is proof that the holder has parted with property that he once had. His paper credits, which merely certify that in consideration of certain advantages (interest, freedom from cares of management, etc.) he has surrendered his property to another, have no function but that of enabling him at some future time, not to resume his own, for it is no longer his, but to acquire its equivalent from the present owner. The more a man has of these things, which the new Constitution proposes to tax as property, the poorer he is—not necessarily poorer than a man with none, but poorer than himself was before he got them. It is only by surrendering them that he can become again as wealthy as he was.

Is he then to escape taxation, living at his ease on his interest, while the man who pays it bears the expense of government for both? Let us see if under the present system the latter does anything of the kind. X wants a thousand dollars of Z, for which he can afford to pay, say sixty dollars a year. But if the State Government is going to exact from him ten dollars he can afford to give Z but fifty, with which that person must be content or X will either get the money from another or not take it at all. It is clear, therefore, that the lender really pays the tax, the borrower, being unaffected directly; what he pays to the State he would otherwise have to pay to the lender. Indirectly he is affected thus: taxation of the principal, by reducing the interest, reduces also the volume of borrowable money by driving a part of it into more profitable investment, and the scarcity so created tends to restore the rate of interest, the cause thus counteracting its own effect—as the slackening in the speed of a steam-engine is the agent that increases its velocity.

This is not the whole problem; there are factors omitted; but if enough has not been said to make it clear that under the system of not taxing credits the money lenders help to pay the taxes I must, with all deference, and in default of the Sibylline Books and the Delphic Oracle, refer the reader to that eminent authority in finance and political economy, Colonel J. P. Jackson, of the Evening Post, whose peculiar position—in the political interest of his employer favorable to all that the Workingmen attempt, in his material interest hostile to all that they accomplish—enables him to speak with the two-fold authority of a divided mind, the parted responsibility of a double tongue.

Reverting to the matter of the horse, we find that quadruped in the possession of B, a note for one hundred dollars in the hands of A. Relying on B's payment of the note, A purchases a hundred dollars' worth of flour from C, giving his note. C knows that A is good for the amount, and gives his own note for a hundred dollars for a barrel of whisky to D, who then feels rich enough to purchase a thousand cigars, at ten dollars a hundred, from E, satisfying him with a note. At the end of a month D's hospitable friends have burned all that gentleman's cigars; C, in one protracted, solitary revel, has gone through his barrel of whisky like a rat through a water-pipe; A's family and retainers have consumed his flour like a flame in flax; and B's charger, broken by the weight of the financial superstructure reared upon his patient person, lies deadwound on the plain, with daisies at his head and at his feet. But he has left a legacy of taxable "solvent credits" that does honor to his memory better than a monument of brass—

"Nothing beside remains round that colossal wreck!"

Working for a dead horse is proverbially disheartening, and it is some years before B has put by enough money to discharge his debt to A, of whom the multitudinous and omnivorous brood has kept him from paying C, whose habit of being supinely drunk has made the expensively befriended D whistle in vain for the wherewithal to pay E. But finally B hands a hundred dollars to A, who hands it to C, who hands it to D, who hands it to E; and four hundred dollars' worth of taxable property, on which the government of this State had been living, like St. Simon Stylites on his capital, vanishes into thin air; for the notes go to the kitchen stove, and Mr. Kearney's Convention made no provision for taxing the ashes.

Charles de Young takes a pig in payment for his paper—like for like. Being a Jew, Mr. de Young has conscientious scruples against eating pork, so he sells his pig to a butcher, taking his note. The butcher, finding the animal more than usually intelligent, thinks it would be wrong to hide the light of its political sagacity under a bushel of salt, and sells it alive to Clitus Barbour to represent that statesman at the sand-lot. Clitus gives his note for the pig. Becoming jealous of its rivalry he sells it to Governor Kearney (taking his note), whose parlor it graces for a season, but being detected in an indiscretion with Mr. Wellock, is divorced from the Arch-agitator's bed and board, and bought by General Volney Howard—who gives his note. General Howard wants this pig to write letters to the Bulletin favoring the new Constitution; but as it scorns to prostitute its intellect that way, its less scrupulous owner parts with it to the congregation of Metropolitan Temple, whose pulpit it now fills, they giving their note and a benediction. I don't know any pig in town that has experienced so many vicissitudes of fortune.

The foregoing pig is now represented by five promissory notes, and a benediction not taxed. None of these notes bear interest, nor are they of any benefit to their holders except as they may enable them, at a stated time, to get something of the same value as something previously renounced. The various notes make a trail of papers like that left by the "hare" in the boys' game of "hare and hounds." Now comes the assessor under the new Constitution, and, in obedience to a righteous provision taxing property used for religious purposes, assesses that porker in the bosom of the church. Then he strikes the paper trail extending out through secular spaces into the infernal regions of the Chronicle office, and having assessed the grunter where it is he again assesses it where it was last, and again where it was the time before, and so on, through the whole series, until that not very valuable fitch of bacon, which has "dragged at each remove a lengthening chain" of "solvent credits," has been the innocent cause of six payments into the State treasury. Beyond Mr. de Young the assessor does not trouble himself to go, for on the ranch of the granger who is so intelligent as to exchange pigs for Chronicles the pachyderm's trail consists of tracks in the mud, and these General Howard's Convention neglected to declare property.

Than sin more wicked, more than madness mad,
Curse to the good and blessing to the bad,
A crime amusing and a heinous joke,
Both tears and laughter fitted to provoke,
This Constitution, nevertheless, excites
The feelings only to engage in fights:
E'er Sorrow, taking note of all the sin,
Can signal to the filling eyes "Begin,"
She's pushed by Joy ungenially from the throne
Which yet th' usurper can not make his own;
For when the face with sunshine he's o'erspread
Shame clouds it with a rising storm of red.
If thus distracted when we mark and read,
Pray God from the digesting we be freed!
What body politic with mortal maw
Can stomach the provisions of this Law.

Up in Nevada City, the other evening, they held a "mum social" for the benefit of a church, anyone who ventured to speak during a certain hour being fined ten cents a word. There was but one person present who had nothing assessed against him; he had not only held his tongue, but had treated every remark addressed to him with contemptuous inattention, expressed by a snapping and flirting of his fingers, as if he were flinging cold water on the ardor of those who accosted him. He was unanimously voted a mean fellow, and the resolution to that effect read and handed to him, signed by all present. He immediately wrote on the back of it: "I am not stingy; I am pretty liberal for a deaf mute. Didn't you hear me speaking the sign language?"

A chaque saint sa chandelle—in the endeavor to mention everybody by name, the Call has hit upon the happy expedient of printing the San Francisco Directory as a serial in its Sunday edition, thirty columns at a time. The proprietor of that progressive journal says that henceforth the preference of the reading public for the multiplication table shall be without excuse.

A cow country journal says that circumstances have brought Jesus Christ prominently before the public, but from the tone of the editor's remarks I infer that he does not predict a lasting celebrity. It is at least gratifying to note the considerable degree of interest attaching to a name that has not been mentioned in connection with the Presidency.

A Nebraska "cattle king" and ten of his cabinet are under impeachment by a Grand Jury of his State for burning a couple of commoners at the stake. The proceedings will be watched with interest by both the friends and the enemies of monarchical institutions in this country. Indeed, it is asserted in the dispatches that his majesty's father and brother—royal cattle dukes, probably—are on the way from Texas "with 1,000 horses." These animals, it is feared, are a corruption fund intended to unsettle the foundations of the republican Ship of State, and exalt the stronghold of the regal prerogative (I write in the usual political metaphor), a kind of "British gold," that modern political equivalent of Judas Iscariot's thirty pieces of silver. The outcome of this crisis no man can foresee; but we may at least hope that the day is distant when public opinion in this country will sanction, in a king of whatever commodity, the incivility of burning his untitled neighbors at the stake.

It was a pleasing thing on Wednesday last to see the representatives of half a dozen rival newspapers burying their estrangements in the grave of Chester Hull. The poor fellow died in harness, and there is none left to take it up and wear it as worthily as he. He delved in the drudgery of a daily newspaper, wore out his life at a reporter's desk, and then wrapping the mantle of his poverty about him, died without leaving his wife and children a dollar. It is a melancholy comment upon the times that such should be the reward of literary talent and industry. Besides holding a modest estimate of his own abilities he was a hearty admirer of worth in his associates, two qualities which many of his co-laborers might adopt to advantage. The little procession of Bohemians passed hundreds of homes that had been cheered and brightened by his pen, and the inmates asked what it was all about. The best tribute which could be paid the man was the tears of his professional associates mingling upon the coffin lid with the scent of summer flowers. His wit called forth laughter and his pathos tears, but he is now in the land where tears cease to flow and the sound of laughter is hushed forever.

"A few more medical schools, and there will be no business left for resurrection day."

CORRESPONDENCE AND COMMENT.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—In the last number of your very excellent paper you inform its readers that I am one of three clergymen "who are endeavoring to resist public opinion in the interest of the Chinese invasion." Of course in this you intended to give true information; but failing to do so, the respectability of your paper imposes upon me the necessity of correcting you. Assuming that the public opinion of California favors restriction of Chinese immigration, I am able to say that I am quite in accord with it; and that I have never, either in private or in public, said anything to the contrary. And assuming that public opinion is opposed to any personal abuse of the Chinese, or of any one for a difference of opinion on this question, I am equally in accord with it on that.

Not that there is any merit in being in accord with the majority of the people among whom one may happen to live, for merit more frequently belongs to the minority. But, whether right or wrong, every honest man objects to being misrepresented. You also inform your readers that I "seem anxious for the distinction of a quarrel with a certain gentleman whom you compare to the Duke of Wellington." To which I have only to say: If one preëminently superior to the duke should propose to "wipe out the Chinese in blood," and not merely the Chinese, but all here, or in the East, who would presume to protest against it, thus assailing the United States flag, and all the liberty, law, and order for which it floats, every lover of that flag, however humble, would have the "distinction of a quarrel" with him.

In your admirable editorial of the same number you say "The American banner above the world is our motto," and to that I have a most hearty amen. And so long as you will continue to write in the prevailing spirit of that article, though I do not favor any one's "having his head punched" for speaking his mind, I can forgive the mistakes you have made and all you may yet make about me.

Yours, for free speech and no blood,
2622 Bush Street, March 31, 1879. B. F. BOWLES.

WATSONVILLE, March 31, 1879.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—Edward Martin, news dealer in Watsonville—also, late delegate to the Con. Con.—says that the demand for ARGONAUTS at his stand is increasing. He also has the good sense to add: "We are becoming enlightened." I suppose that when Gabriel receives the great final order: "Toot," he will stand in Egypt, or in some place of long forgotten antiquity æons older than Egypt, in the midst of the primal graveyard, and, while he is wiping the mouthpiece of his trumpet with the ball of his thumb, preparatory to the great awakening, you can try to imagine him muttering to himself: "This is a d—d poor place to start a revival." I should say the same of Santa Cruz County, but Martin says as aforesaid. Our people of the Pajaro are just now engaged in helping to "bust" the Constitution, as you see by the following:

PUBLIC MEETING.—There will be a meeting at the Rink in Watsonville on Friday evening, April 4, 1879. The object of this meeting is to show that the proposed new Constitution is not fit to be made by the people of California; that it is too complex and prolix to be taken in by the average human intellect; that it is bunglesome as a whole, and dangerous by sections. All persons are invited to this meeting, and those in favor of the object for which it is called are expected to participate in its action. J. W. GALLY, Chairman Committee.

N. B.—This meeting has no connection with San Francisco, but is purely local.

Observe the postscript: "No connection with the little meeting house around the corner"—no connection with the cheap John next door. Watsonville goes it alone, paddles its own canoe. It don't want the new Constitution. It won't have it. It likes the old one. It proposes to let well enough alone. It does not want a divorce. Like the well-to-do old fellow who married a young wife, he found her too radical. New brides and new Constitutions are very trying. Old men are conservative. I am an OLD MAN OF WATSONVILLE.

In reply to the numerous signed request to have my article in last week's ARGONAUT against the adoption of the proposed new Constitution printed in pamphlet form for general distribution, I can only say that I give my consent upon the condition that another article on a different, and, as I think, more important branch of the same subject shall first be completed, so as to be embodied in the same pamphlet. Respectfully,
H. N. CLEMENT.

The following leading editorials from our two leading daily journals intelligently illustrate the causes that lead to the present political agitation, and that so disturb the business of the community. The causes that have brought about the present discontent may be summed up in two words: "Small advertisements."

There is at the present time a just appreciation of the advantages to be derived from the insertion of small advertisements in the Call, so as to keep one's trade before the public.—Monday's Call.

The Chronicle is not in the habit of calling attention to its small advertisements. Its well-filled columns emphasize the fact that it is the people's paper.—Wednesday's Chronicle.

In order to profit from the depression, persons must take measures to be posted as to where bargains can be had, hence our small advertisements are carefully scanned.—Wednesday's Call.

The following is the way Waite tells it: When the ferry-boats came into collision, the Rev. Mr. Bartlett, of the Bulletin, was thrown into a state of the wildest confusion. He piled the life-preservers upon himself till nothing was visible but his hat and boots. The ladies were in a panic. One fair creature appealed to know if the danger was imminent. "No, madam; you see the boat is not sinking." "Then, Mr. Waite, why does this gentleman so pile himself over with cork?" "Oh, well, you see he is a clergyman and he writes for the Bulletin; hence, it is natural that he should fear to meet his God."

"Don't wave your ears at me, you flabby-hearted, green-livered plug," exclaimed a school-house orator at a debate. The chairman decided that the speaker was out of order, and that the gentleman from Elder Blossom should indulge in the time-honored custom of "holding his own" against his opponent, providing they did not interfere.

THE WINDINGS OF THE LITTLE WHEEL.*

Translated for the Argonaut from the Japanese by T. E. Hallifax.

[A story of the struggles of true love, and the eventual reward of true devotion and merit, from the Japanese of Choyonoharu-michi, A. D. 1807, and founded on the story of Oguri Hanguwan and Terute Hime, of Kamakura, during the latter part of the fourteenth and beginning of the fifteenth centuries.]

During the rule of the Ashikaga Prince Yoshinori, the Governor of Kamakura, Mochiujii, died, leaving his widow, Katsuma no Maye, and his son, Ken wo Maru, then only eleven years of age; and the karo (a daimio's minister) Yokuyama became guardian of the young Prince. Some years after, on the night of the fifteenth of the eighth month, the festival of Tsuki-machi (a convivial celebration in honor of the full moon) was observed with all the usual merry-making, and it was suggested by the attendants of Katsuma that she send for Terute, the lovely and accomplished daughter of Tōne Maguroku, to perform the Ina-yo-no-maye, a dance founded on that by which Ama-no-ussome no mikoto enticed Ten-sho-ko-dai jin-gu from the cave, and which Terute was reputed to dance to perfection; indeed, her admirers said even as well as Shidzuka Gozen, the mistress of Yoshitsune, and a celebrated danseuse of ancient days. Great preparations were made for the feast, and in the apartments silver candlesticks were placed, golden screens spread around, and all the great people of the palace invited.

Hanguwan, the son of Oguri Sayemon, a handsome lad, reputed as clever at these dances, was also summoned to assist Terute to amuse the assembled company.

During the entertainment Terute had opportunity to observe Hanguwan, and the latter saw the lovely girl for the first time that evening. They were thus mutually attracted by that, to them, yet unknown but powerful charm of love at first sight. Afterward the lady Katsuma, being delighted with the performance of the young people, handed to them her own beautifully lacquered sakadzuki (wine cup), and ordered it to be frequently filled and passed round among the guests. The excitement of the unusually gorgeous feast, and the wine cup, out of which they had each successively sipped, had a most exhilarating effect on them both, and Terute, retiring to the yengawa (balcony), whereon the pure moon shone, rested herself and cooled her throbbing brow, quaffing deep draughts of delight at the lovely scene. Beneath her was a cluster of the blossoming hagi (lespedeza), on which the moon shed her soft rays, and unconsciously a few poetic words escaped her; when to her surprise she was answered in appropriate verse by Hanguwan, who had stolen to her side unperceived, and was lost in rapture as he gazed on her lovely features in the clear, pale light. Finally, yet with a tremor of delight in her sweet, musical voice, she said to him: "See, Hanguwan Sama, how clear the pure moon shines! Is it not a beautiful, moon-lit, cloudless scene?" "Truly so," answered Hanguwan, "the moon shines, also does the hagi blossom; but clouds cross the moon, and rude winds and pitiless rain destroy the bloom; take care, I beg you."

Yokuyama, the acting Governor, had a son named Saburo, who was smitten by the charms of Terute, and to whom he had often written; but she, instead of answering his love-letters, had avoided him. He had watched his opportunity, and hoped that now he might address her, she being a guest in the palace. Hiding himself in the garden, he watched long and patiently, but when he saw her gazing at the moon-light scene he approached closer, but only to discover that Hanguwan was already at her side. Jealous rage took complete possession of him, and he retreated from the vicinity vowing vengeance on his rival and on the innocent girl.

Not long after this Hanguwan went to the shrine of the Tsuruga oka Hachiman, and ere he arrived near home it had become dark. He therefore lighted his lantern before entering the dusk forest through which his road lay. Before he had proceeded far he was surprised by a man—whose face was concealed—dashing the lantern from his hand, and then attacking him. Hanguwan demanded who it was that thus assaulted him in this unprovoked manner, and he was answered that it was Saburo, the son of Yokuyama, who had thus waylaid him to take revenge for being an obstacle in the way of his love. Said Saburo, in continuation, "As you stand between me and Terute, I am determined to slay you, and if she then rejects my love I will be revenged on her as well." Hanguwan defended himself bravely, till presently he perceived a light approaching. The bearer proved to be the father of Terute—old Maguroku—who, seeing the fight, and only recognizing Hanguwan, drew his sword to assist his young friend. Before he could inform the old man of the cause of the affray, Saburo attacked Maguroku, and, before Hanguwan could interfere, in consequence of the darkness, Saburo had mortally wounded Maguroku. This so enraged Hanguwan that he made a fierce onslaught on the more powerful Saburo, who at length, finding Hanguwan his superior in prowess, fled into the water and escaped death at his adversary's hands. Hanguwan leaped after him, but, the night being very dark and the sky overcast with clouds, he could neither see Saburo nor track his path of escape; so he was compelled to abandon the pursuit and return to his home to send assistance to Maguroku. He then went to Terute and her mother Sayoginu, and related what had occurred, "and," said he, "the old man met his death helping me; and when I failed to avenge his death on the spot by killing Saburo, the craven took to flight, and I bethought me of putting an end to my own life, but had I done so perhaps men would say that I was the murderer of my loved one's father; and I at once decided to come here and tell you what has happened, and then die as a man of honor should." While he was saying this the two women, mother and daughter, could not restrain their grief, and Terute said, "I am the cause of all this; my unwillingness to listen to Saburo's love tale is the reason of his conduct. If you, Hanguwan, die, then I shall join you in the other existence, and die with you as becomes a maiden." The mother here interferred, and said to Hanguwan, "It is not fit that you should die thus, nor should my daughter forget that her father's death yet remains un-avenged. Let us honor his remains by burial, although the ceremony must needs be in secret, and then it becomes our duty to avenge him. Let Hanguwan join with us in effecting this," and Hanguwan agreed with what the women said.

Yokuyama and her daughter Terute now petitioned the officers to allow them to revenge themselves on Saburo for the murder of Maguroku; and at the same time Hanguwan had, with his father's consent, also applied to be allowed to assist them, Maguroku having been slain while assisting him. The officials met in council, but Yokuyama, the father of Saburo, refused to allow Hanguwan to join the women in their plan of revenge, and ordered him to be dismissed from the palace and his income confiscated, as he had failed to conquer Saburo, and behaved badly with Terute. The women, he said, might do as they liked, but they could not claim their pension unless they were successful in taking their revenge on Saburo. Thus Hanguwan and the beautiful Terute were disgraced by this unjust father, to the great grief of Sayoginu the widowed mother.

Hanguwan, now an outlaw, bade farewell to his father, and joined Terute and her mother, and they all started off to track Saburo, find him, and be revenged.

All search for the assassin proved fruitless, he had so cleverly concealed himself, and the three took themselves to the hamlet of Ashiya, where Hanguwan put up a hut in which they lived for some time; and hearing that Saburo had gone to Suruga, Hanguwan disguised himself as a komoso, a person of the military class, who, having been guilty of some political offense, takes refuge in a temple and lives by begging. When he goes out begging he dresses in white, wears a basket over his head and face, and plays on a flute. Hanguwan, disguised thus, started off in search of his enemy, leaving the two women in the hut at Ashiya, sure of their safety now that Saburo was far away. A few days after Hanguwan had departed the women heard rumors of a man having appeared in the neighborhood, who, from the description, they concluded to be Saburo, and becoming much alarmed they closed up the hut; but shortly after nightfall a disturbance in the vicinity aroused them, and presently a mob of armed ruffians, among whom Terute recognized Saburo, broke into their humble dwelling. Sayoginu seized her husband's sword, and Terute soon seized another, which Hanguwan had left for their better protection during his absence, and they both made for Saburo, who advanced boastfully to meet them, and as he parried their feeble thrusts maliciously complimented them on their valor. He declared his errand to be to carry off Terute; that he had designedly circulated the report of his absence in order to draw Hanguwan away so that he might the more easily carry off his prize. While the five or six of his villainous companions surrounded the grief-stricken mother, Saburo caught the slender form of Terute in his arms and made off with her, unmindful of her piteous cries to save her poor mother from the ruffians. In the meantime the mother had been mortally wounded in her endeavors to reach Saburo and rescue her daughter from the arms of the murderer of her husband.

A fresh actor now appeared on the scene, being no less a person than Hanguwan, who had heard of the trick of Saburo and had hastened back to protect his loved one and her mother, whose imminent danger he with just reason feared. His appearance was the signal for the hirings of Saburo to take to flight as soon as they saw that their employer had made off with his prize, and Hanguwan soon learned what new misfortunes had happened during his absence. He immediately started in pursuit, but being overtaken by a storm which made the night intensely dark, he was compelled to relinquish the chase and return to the dying woman's assistance. The falling drops of rain had momentarily revived her, but ere Hanguwan had returned life was extinct.

Meantime, Saburo had run down to the beach, and, jumping with his burden into a boat ready manned with strong scullers that he had previously placed there, he put to sea. Then, turning to Terute, he addressed her, and recounting the ardor of his passion for her, told her that it alone was the cause of his violence. Had she not rejected his advances in the first instance, and shown a preference for the doll-faced Hanguwan, all might have been well, and her father and mother still alive. "Now you are in my power, and I may do with you as I wish," Terute, gaining courage from the very desperation of her position, feigned to believe his love tale, and was successful in deceiving Saburo into releasing his hold of her; then suddenly she drew a keen-edged kuwai-ken (dagger) from her girdle, and stabbed him severely and repeatedly before he could guard himself against her furious attack. Saburo, now really enraged, caught her by the hair, and threatening to kill her by the most cruel slow tortures, commenced to cut at her, but her clothes (lined with cotton wool) protected her, until suddenly a storm which had been threatening now burst with all its fury, and the sea became violently agitated. A weird figure skimmed the water, a strange light appeared on the top of the wave, and the boat was upset. Terute was rendered senseless, and was only conscious of some supernatural support that prevented her from sinking amidst the battling waves. Presently she became aware of the vicinity of some floating object, and in a feeble voice cried for aid, when she found herself drawn into a fisherman's boat which she afterward learned, was seeking shelter from the storm. They soon landed, and, lighting a big fire, the fishermen speedily dried her clothing, and gave her some refreshment, and revived her. She then related to her deliverers the story of her abduction, and the struggle in the boat, at which they were greatly incensed.

Saburo alone, of his companions, was able to reach the shore, but in a feeble condition, having been cut severely by Terute, and previously by her mother, and was weak from loss of blood. A piece of floating timber from the boat which he had seized, alone saved him from the same fate as that of the boatmen.

Terute, when she recovered from the shock of the dreadful tragic scenes in which she had been one of the chief actors, became persuaded that the spirit of her mother had alone saved her, and being thus rescued to fulfill her destiny and avenge her father before she should die, she became more determined than ever to hunt down, and, if possible, destroy the wicked cause of so much misery.

Yokuyama Kengio, Saburo's father, had endeavored by wily schemes to usurp the authority of his lord's heir, temporarily intrusted to him, and had, with his son's help, gathered round him a band of lawless and reckless reprobates, prepared to carry out any villainy he might plot. He sent for the sorcerer, Rai-go-ajari, who made a straw effigy and stuck it with innumerable needles, and left instructions for it to be buried under the sleeping palace of the young prince. Kengio found opportunity to do this, and the young lord fell ill, and, to the great wonder of his mother and the attendants, doctors, physio, charms, and prayers were all equally unsuccessful in staying the disorders of mind and body of the bewitched child. One night, when the watchers, and even the anxious mother, had dozed off to sleep, wearied out, a great noise and crashing aroused them. The startled child, in a great freight, cried to them to drive away the horrible goblins that were tormenting him; but as they saw nothing, they concluded it was merely the disturbed dream of a sick child, and endeavored to pacify him, and finally succeeded in getting him to sleep once more. The frequent repetition of the strange sights and sounds in the sick-room came to the knowledge of Oguri Sayemon, the father of Hanguwan; and the old man, and faithful officer, suspecting foul play, determined to watch for himself in the chamber of the sick child of his deceased lord. The latest manifestations had been a spirit duplicate of the child, and the attendants could not distinguish the real from the false one. On the night on which old Oguri watched, he was startled by the appearance of the double, and hearing the spirit and the bewitched child wrangling, he caught one of them, when the other, with a fiendish, weird laugh, disappeared in a cloud of black fetid smoke and flame. Yokuyama hearing of this, reprimanded Sayemon for intruding into the private apartments, and for outrage on the young lord, and he condemned the old man to commit seppuku (or hara-kiri, suicide by cutting open the abdomen), and arrangements were at once made for the carrying out of the sentence. All being ready, Oguri ripped his abdomen across with his dagger, and a swordsman, or executioner, stationed behind, struck off his head, which was placed in a box and sent to Yokuyama. Sayemon's spirit took flight to the room in which his young master lay, and held communication with him, promising protection. The wife of Sayemon, the mother of our hero, was witness of this last tragedy, and heard the last words of her good-man. The child, to the great chagrin of Yokuyama, rapidly recovered, and no art of witchcraft, or poison, could hereafter take effect on the young prince. Sayemon's protecting spirit ever hovered near as a guardian angel.

Karaori, the widow of Sayemon, with a faithful follower, Ikeno Shoji, visited daily the tomb of her husband; but on the forty-ninth day she committed suicide, bequeathing to Shoji the duty of finding her son, if still alive, and charging Hanguwan to be revenged on Yokuyama for the double murder of his parents, and on Saburo for the murder of Maguroku.

We leave Ikeno prosecuting his search, and return to Hanguwan, who has been diligently seeking Terute and Saburo, hoping that, if alive, the former was not in the scoundrel's power. Saburo being known to have friends in Owari, Hanguwan searched throughout the Bishiu (Owari) country, and made the acquaintance of one Utayemon, a man of culture, living on a small farm in Matsukase. They were both fond of the shaku-hachi (a kind of flute), and Hanguwan put up at Utayemon's house from time to time, throwing aside the overdress and basket hat of the komoso which he had adopted as a disguise. Utayemon had been many years a widower, but he had a lovely daughter named Usuyuki, who was both clever and accomplished. Being necessarily much in each other's society during his periodical visits, the young lady, unused to the world outside of her secluded home, and never having been brought much in contact with young men, conceived an affection for Hanguwan, much to his sorrow, and ere long hinted to him the state of her heart; but he, in honor to his lost Terute, explained that he was in difficulties which made it impossible for him to love her.

We will leave Hanguwan with his host and his daughter seated on the verandah, enjoying their musical trio and the mild evening twilight scene, and go in search of our other characters. Shoji had traveled some days, when, on the road beyond Suruga, he saw an exceedingly beautiful girl begging by the road side; and on approaching closer he discovered, to his astonishment, that the poor creature was no other than the long missing Terute, his young mistress; and her surprise and delight were great when she recognized her father's faithful servant. But Shoji's joy was somewhat damped on perceiving unmistakable signs of her intellect being greatly disordered from the frightful scenes in which she had been a participator. He managed to gather her story, and then related to her the tragic death of her lover's parents. After resting a couple of days, to recruit her strength, they resumed their journey together, till one evening they heard the sound of music and pleasant voices. Hoping to receive a welcome and a shelter for the night they approached, and what was their surprise and joy when they recognized Hanguwan.

Terute's delight, though great, was alloyed by jealousy when she observed the lovely companion of the pleasures of her long missing lover. Nor was Usuyuki at all pleased to find so lovely a woman on such intimate terms with her dear Hanguwan. Before the parties had time to recover from their mutual surprise a disturbance took place which interrupted the meeting and likewise the jealous glances of the rival beauties.

Saburo had returned to Kamakura, and, believing Terute to have perished, he induced his father to assist him in obtaining possession of Hanguwan, dead or alive; thus getting rid of a serious obstacle to the father's ambitious aims, and revenging himself for the successful rivalry with Terute. Kengio sent several officers and a number of armed men in search of Hanguwan, of whom they found traces at Matsukase, and having stated their errand to the village chief, induced him to accompany them in their search, and the whole were now approaching Utayemon's house. Forcing an entrance, they loudly demanded Hanguwan; but the host denied the existence of such a person on his premises; whereupon Washikuro, the leader of the party, ordered his men to surround the house, light lanterns, and seize any one attempting to escape, while others searched the house. Utayemon, at this threat, was much distressed, and at a loss how to act, but the critical circumstances calling for instant action, he deliberated but a moment, and, addressing the leader, promised to produce the head of his visitor, of whose name he obstinately professed to be ignorant, and craved a short delay, which was unwillingly granted. After the lapse of a few minutes Utayemon reappeared with the head, and presented it to the officer, who examined it slightly, and then putting it into a receptacle which had been prepared, departed with his men. Shoji and Terute had been horrified listeners to all this, having hidden in a recess; and after the departure of the men they both attacked Utayemon for what they considered his base treachery to his guest; Terute, as she flourished her weapon, saying, "Take that for my lord's sake!" Shoji echoing by saying, "Take that for my young master's!" Utayemon, stunned by the sudden and fierce onslaught, snatched up one of the musical instruments to defend himself, praying for a word or two of speech, when, to the astonishment of both Terute and Shoji, Hanguwan sprang into the room, wondering at the strange scene.

Utayemon, mortally wounded, gasped out his story, to the effect that he was originally an under officer of Hanguwan's father, and recognizing his former master's son, had defended him in gratitude for former protection and kindnesses received, when he, Utayemon, had in a drunken affray killed a man. In return he had taken his daughter's head and given it to the officers as Hanguwan's, and displayed to the horrified trio the beautiful tresses of Usuyuki; further stating that the girl had gladly consented to die for Hanguwan's sake, and revealed to her father her hopeless and rejected love. Terute, upon hearing this, was stricken with grief, and taking the poor girl's corpse in her arms, vowed eternal gratitude and daily prayers, and promised to renounce Hanguwan in the next world in favor of Usuyuki as a reward which she deserved to receive were she now alive. Utayemon further explained that Saburo was the child of his sister, who was the mistress of Yokuyama in former times; hence his inability to help Hanguwan, and the manner in which the track to the house was followed up by Yokuyama's men. Usuyuki's koto (harp) was heard to moan as the wind passed over its cords, calling to the dying man's mind his dead child's song and with one deep groan his spirit passed away. Shoji then drew from his bosom the mourning tablets of the deceased father and mother of Hanguwan, and informed him of all that had happened, concluding that he was now an orphan, with a legacy of double revenge on Saburo and his wicked father. Terute related to him her adventures, and how she had been saved by her mother. Thus were the lovers reunited in this intensely tragic manner.

Saburo, now believing Hanguwan dead, came forth from his concealment, and gave his father all the assistance in his power with a view to the usurpation of the control of Kamakura; and, being well supplied with money, he visited all the gay resorts. One day, at Oitsu, he was astonished to see Terute and Hanguwan, with their faithful follower Shoji. It was with difficulty that he restrained the impulse to at once take them unawares and assassinate them; but reflection taught him caution, and he set a watch on them.

Terute, Hanguwan, and Shoji saw Saburo and hastened away from the vicinity; for Hanguwan's great exposure to hardship and privation had reduced him to the condition of a cripple and almost of leprosy. The faithful Terute had a platform mounted on four wheels made for him, and dragged him along, while Shoji amused the villagers by antics, and thus gathered a few coins to buy their food.

Terute wished to take Hanguwan to the hot sulphur baths at Kumano Gogen, as hitherto doctors, prayers, and penance had failed. Owing to their extreme poverty and the weak condition of Hanguwan, they were completely at the mercy of the wicked Saburo; but at last, after innumerable hardships, they arrived at the shrine of Kumano Gogen, where Terute, for several days in succession stood, at frequent intervals, under the waterfall, as a penance to propitiate the Kami (deity) in favor of her lover. But all was in vain; Hanguwan apparently would never again recover the use of his legs.

Returning to their abode one day, they were set upon by a party of ruffians, but Shoji attacking them they took to flight, drawing him after them. As soon as Shoji had disappeared in pursuit of the villains, Saburo suddenly appeared before our hero and heroine, and, taking advantage of Hanguwan's helpless state, bound Terute to a tree, and then, after deriding and insulting them, threatened to torture him. Hanguwan then, with a wail of despair, called on the gods and on the spirits of his parents to give him strength, and with a superhuman effort drew from his bamboo crutch his never-failing blade, as keen as a razor, and sprang to his feet—no longer a cripple, but a vigorous man, with all his former strength restored. His first act was to seize Saburo, the next to cut Terute's bonds. Terute, on finding herself free, drew her dirk and stabbed the cowardly Saburo to the heart, at the same time offering a prayer to her murdered parents.

Meantime Saburo's followers had been dispatched or dispersed; and Shoji returned to find his master miraculously recovered, and the head of Saburo, which had been struck off, placed upon Hanguwan's truck; while the headless trunk had been thrown into the gutter.

Having no further object in remaining in the neighborhood, the now happy trio returned joyfully to Kamakura. Their first act on their arrival was to carry the head of Saburo to their parents' tombs, over which Hanguwan and Terute pledged eternal love and fidelity. The next day, as Terute was without any relations or other friends with whom she could find refuge, Hanguwan made her his wife and took her to his house.

Shortly after his return to Kamakura, Hanguwan compelled Yokuyama to admit his claims, and after receiving the pension due to him, he set about exposing Yokuyama, and restoring the young prince to his rightful authority.

The successful carrying out of all his projects, and the downfall and death of Yokuyama are told in the sequel—a story of the government of the times, into which love does not enter; suffice it to say, that Oguri Hanguwan and Terute Hime lived happily to a good old age, and had a numerous family to whom they frequently recounted their former terrible adventures, and the plots and conspiracies of Kamakura and his wicked son Saburo. The faithful Shoji remained with them, teaching his master's sons as they grew strong enough, the use of the terrible two-handed sword.

[NOTE.—This story is the basis of numerous tales and dramatic pieces. Woman's devotion is here strongly portrayed in the persons of Terute and Usuyuki. From the translator's personal knowledge and observation, a Japanese woman when she loves truly will make any sacrifice, even to her life, for the object of her affection; as witness the numerous suicides of young people who, from some real or fancied obstacle to their union, tie themselves together, and plunge into the dark water. With regard to Utayemon's sacrificing his daughter to save the son of his old master, this picture is not overdrawn, for if a Japanese has received any favors or services at the hands of any one, he considers it his duty to make any personal sacrifice, even to that of life, if necessary, in order to requite such favors. In the above story some reference is made to supernatural agency, as for instance the bewitching of the young prince, and the miraculous escape of Terute when the boat upset; but though no Japanese novel or romance is complete unless it has the supernatural largely mixed up with it, still the natives of Nippon are not the only people who delight in reading of spectres, demons, and transformations; for have we not our Corsican Brothers, our favorite Christmas ghost stories, and old legends and traditions telling of banshees, goblins, mysterious warnings, etc., etc?—TRANSLATOR.]

ABOUT WOMEN.

The ordinary female pedestrian has no laps to spare.

Little Mlle. Grévy has an immense mass of hair, black as a crow's wing.

Just because she snores a refined man will not refer to his wife as "a regular snorer."

She was not a beautiful girl. She had a nose on her that you had to steer for and then tack.

If a man really wants to know of how little importance he is, let him go with his wife to a dressmaker.

The Empress of Austria is called "the Imperial Diana" by the Irish people, with whom she goes fox-hunting.

We read with entire pleasure that "a number of women were present, last week, at a collar and elbow wrestling match, in Boston."

Queen Victoria, it is rumored, has a strong wish to see Canada, and the Prince of Wales is encouraging her to visit both that country and the United States.

"Have you the song, 'Saccharine Futurity?'" asked a girl of the music clerk. "We have," he answered, as with a pleasant smile he rolled up a copy of "The Sweet By and By."

According to the New York Herald, Mrs. Hayes told a lady who threatened to attend a Presidential reception in a low-necked dress that a shawl would be thrown over her shoulders.

A Western girl broke the engagement because the fellow was so bandy-legged that she couldn't sit in his lap. She acted too hastily. She should have remembered that a friend in-need is a friend indeed.

Of course no woman ever did such a thing, but supposing now for the sake of argument, as it were, that a woman was to go to church for the purpose of showing off her new sacque, would it be sac-religious, so to speak?

A certain Washington citizen, if we may trust the Capital, called on a friend last week and asked him for the loan of a dollar. "My wife has left me," he said, "and I wish to advertise that I am not responsible for her debts."

She leaned her fair, blonde head fondly upon his shoulder, and, after she had felt in his pocket to see if he had a new silk handkerchief, she whispered: "Will you love me always?" "Yes, always." "What, always?" "Well, almost always."

When a Hartford woman patted her friend's seven-year-old youngster on the head, and said, "I should like to have such a little boy as you are," he looked up into her face and replied: "Well, I guess you can. I don't believe God's lost the pattern of me."

I've a letter from your ma,
Mary Jane, Mary Jane,
She is coming here to stay,
And she never'll go away,
And the devil will be to pay,
Mary Jane, Mary Jane.

"Amanda, put the large Bible in a prominent place on the centre-table, and place two or three hymn-books 'round on the sofas; I have advertised for a young man to board in a cheerful Christian family, and I tell you what, if you girls don't manage, either one of you, to rake him in, why you can just gravitate about and get somebody else to pay for another advertisement."

The following scene took place the other day in a Paris restaurant, on the occasion of a wedding dinner: An awkward waiter, in attempting to place on the table the soup tureen filled with fat chicken broth, spilled its contents on a lady's white satin dress. The lady screamed and was seized with hysterics. The waiter stooped and shouted in her ear: "Don't despair, madame, there's plenty of broth yet left in the kitchen. I am going for it now."

It is said that a lady chiropodist in Brighton, England, has placed above her door the legend:

"Hell hath no fury like a woman's corn."

In this country, where the vernacular is elastic, we are accustomed to say:

"Hell hath no fury like a woman corned."

Mlle de B., of the Faubourg, has a very bad tooth. Nothing can be done for it. The dentist looks over his list and sends for Mlle C., in the Quartière, who has a fine set of teeth. Mlle C. trips in. The chief pulls the bad tooth of Mlle de B., an assistant the good one of Mlle C. The bad tooth is thrown out of the window, the good one is inserted in its place. Poor girls are beginning to count their marriage portions after this fashion: "I will bring to my husband a dot of thirty-two teeth. They are worth thirty francs each, to be called for as wanted."

Mrs. Haweis, the English writer on dress, recently gave a children's fancy ball, at which a daughter of Walter Crane, the artist, appeared as Alcestis, in green and white, with mot-toes from the Flower and the Leaf written on the long "tip-pets" of her sleeves, and daisies around her pretty head-dress, and was most captivating. Mrs. Haweis's own children represented Aurelius and Dorigen, in Chaucer's Franklin's Tale, their costumes being charming in themselves and absolutely true to mediæval authority, even to the very seams of the hood and "liripe."

On the day preceding the marriage of Patrick, son of Victoria, to the little German girl related to William of Prussia, the boys in the streets of Windsor were singing:

"Three cheers, then, for the happy bride,
His loving little wife;
Now she's come to England may she
Be happy all her life!
For the duke will try and comfort her
With every little joy;
Let's hope before twelve months are past
They'll have a little boy."

If this was the best wedding ode Tennyson was capable of he ought to resign his post of royal poet to some eligible writer—say the renowned singer of Michigan.

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAVORITES.

The Deserted Mill.

It stands in the lonely Winterthal,
At the base of Iisberg hill;
It stands as though it fain would fall—
The dark, deserted mill.
Its engines, coated with moss and mould,
Bide silent all the day;
Its mildewed walls and windows old
Are crumbling to decay.

So through the daylight's lingering hours,
It mourns in weary rest;
But soon as the sunset's gorgeous bowers
Begin to fade in the west,
The long-dead millers leave their lairs,
And open its creaking doors,
And their feet glide up and down its stair,
And over its dusty floors.

And the miller's men, they too awake,
And the night's weird work begins;
The wheels turn round, the hoppers shake,
The flour falls into the bins.
The mill bell tolls again and again,
And the cry is, "Grist here, ho!"
And the dead old millers and their men
Move busily to and fro.

And ever as night wears more and more
New groups throng into the mill,
And the clangor, deafening enough before,
Grows louder and wilder still.
Huge sacks are barrowed from floor to floor;
The wheels redouble their din;
The hoppers clatter, and the engines roar,
And the flour o'erflows the bin.

But with the morning's pearly sheen,
This ghastly hubbub wanes,
And the moon-dim face of a woman is seen
Through the meal-dulled window panes.
She opens the sash, and her words resound
In tones of unearthly power:
"Come hither, good folks, the corn is ground;
Come hither and take your flour!"

Thereon strange, hazy lights appear
A-fitting all through the pile,
And a deep, melodious choral cheer
Ascends through the roof the while;
But a moment more, and you gaze and hark,
And wonder and wait in vain,
For suddenly all again is dark
And all is hushed again.

—Translated from A. Schnesler.

Widder Green's Last Words.

"I'm goin' to die!" says the Widder Green.
"I'm goin' to quit this airthly scene.
It ain't no place for me to stay
In such a world as 'tis to-day.
Such works and ways is too much for me;
Nobody can't let nobody be.
The girls is flounced from top to toe,
An' that's the hull o' what they know.
The men is mad on bonds an' stocks,
Swearin', an' shootin', and pickin' locks.
I'm real afraid I'll be hanged myself
Ef I ain't laid on my final shelf.
There ain't a cretur but knows to-day
I never was a lunatic in any way,
But since crazy folks all go free
I'm dreadful afraid they'll hang up me.
There's another matter that's pesky hard:
I can't go into a neighbor's yard
To say 'How be you?' or borrow a pin
But what the paper'll have it in.
'We're pleased to say the Widder Green
Took dinner on Tuesday with Mrs. Keene,
Or 'Our worthy friend, Miss Green, has gone
Down to Barkhamsted to see her son.'
Great Jerusalem! I can't I stir
Without a-raisin some feller's fur?
There ain't no privacy, so to say,
No more than if this was the Judgment Day.
And as for meetin', I want to swear
Whenever I put my head in there;
Why, even 'Old Hundred's' spiled and done
Like everything else under the sun.
It used to be so solemn and slow—
Praise to the Lord from men below;
Now it goes like a gallopin' steer,
High diddle diddle, there and here!
No more respect to the Lord above,
No more'n ef he was hand and glove
With all the creturs he ever made,
And all the jigs that ever was played.
Preachin', too—but here I'm dumb;
But I tell you what! I'd like it some Ef good old Parson Nathan Strong,
Out o' his grave would come along,
An' give us a stirrin' taste o' fire—
Judgment and justice is my desire.
'Tain't all love and sickish sweet
That makes this world or t'other complete.
But la! I'm old, I'd better be dead.
When the world's a-turnin' over my head,
Sperit's talkin' like tarnal fools,
Bible's kicked out o' destrict schools,
Crazy creturs a-murderin' round—
Honest folks better be under ground.
So fare ye well! This airthly scene Won't no more be pestered by Widder Green."

—Anonymous.

The Declaration.

'Twas late and the gay company was gone,
And light lay soft on the deserted room
From alabaster vases, and a scent
Of orange leaves, and sweet verberna came Through the unshuttered window on the air,
And the rich pictures with their dark old tints
Hung like a twilight landscape, and all things
Seemed hushed into a slumber. Isabel,
The dark-eyed, spiritual Isabel,
Was leaning on her harp, and I had stoyed
To whisper what I could not when the crowd
Hung on her look like worships. I knelt,
And with the fervor of a lip unused
To the cold breath of reason, told my love.
There was no answer, and I took the hand
That rested on the strings, and pressed a kiss
Upon it unforbidden—and again
Resounded her, that silent evidence
That I was not indifferent to her heart,
Might have the seal of one sweet syllable.
I kissed the small white fingers as I spoke,
And she withdrew them gently, and
Her forehead from its resting-place Earnestly on me. She had been

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance—postage prepaid. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders from the trade should be addressed.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 5, 1879.

The great wave of hard times that has swept over the world has spent its force in Europe and in our Eastern States. We, here upon this distant shore, have felt its influence. The causes which produce these periodical pressures we do not understand, and have never had intelligently explained. In California, other and local causes have united to bring about a financial and business depression such as we have not before experienced. The presence here of too many Chinese, the tendency of our people to stock gambling, the unnatural drift of population to our one commercial centre, the fact that avenues of immigration are not open to competition, and the other and perhaps controlling fact that we are isolated from the great busy commercial world and separated from our own populous Eastern territory by a broad and unpeopled desert, make our condition a serious one when the wave of prosperity is reflux. Then, again, we have been spoiled by our good luck. California is the petted child of fortune. It was born in the lap of wealth. Not wealth for which other generations had toiled and suffered, not wealth inherited with the axioms and admonitions of prudence, but the lucky, copious shower of gold; wealth, not hidden under bowlders requiring strength to move, nor in the deep mines to be hunted with drill and blast, but scattered in the soil; placer gold dust, to be picked up in nugget, washed out in pan and rocker; not here a spec and there a minute particle, to be treasured in a quill or homeopathic vial, but gatherable by everybody—great buckskin bags full of gold. It was splendid while it lasted. We toiled and spent, gambled and frolicked, drank and dined. We laughed at poverty and shook our fists at misfortune. We were poor to-day, rich to-morrow, and generous always. Our climate has contributed to the formation of a character peculiar to ourselves. There were no realities of life for the early Californian. A house was not indispensable. No winter's cold required him to save a summer's harvest, nor provide for a day when to work was impossible; and so we drifted along, spending as we went—jovial, light-hearted, improvident, and gay. But time brought its wrinkles to our faces, its gray hairs to our heads. Old age made us conservative; families gathered around us, and Californians, like other people, found themselves compelled to face the realities of life.

We invited the Chinaman, and when he came we welcomed him. He brought habits of industry, thrift, and economy. We admired these qualities, the more because we did not possess them, and we are now driven to explain the seeming paradox that it is because he possesses these virtues that he is dangerous to us. And yet this is true. He is making our poor people poorer, because, without family, with instincts of economy, the growth of heredity, he can earn more and spend less than our own working people. This able-bodied adult heathen is driving our toilers to the wall, and while he takes the place of the working class he does not compose an order upon which we can build with safety the superstructure of a higher civilization, or safely rest the fabric of a republican and constitutional form of government. This skeleton casts its shadow across the path of our prosperity, and while the substance works ill to our present, the shadow threatens our future. In this coming conflict of civilizations many will go away to avoid it, and many refuse to come to meet it. To our propensity for gambling, which is the natural growth of the conditions of our immigration and early Californian life, to the Chinese question with all its menacing complications, we have added a political condition that is in itself deplorable. The solemn truth is that all our best people are so intent upon gaining money, and so busy in keeping what they have acquired, that they have neither the time nor the inclination to devote themselves to public affairs, and this has left political control to the scramble of meaner minds. The result is epitomized by the single expression "Thieves in office!" Not thieves in the sense that officials will, as a rule, expose themselves to the guilt of robbing the treasury, but thieves because they do not personally perform their official duties; because they are indifferent, neglectful, extravagant, and careless—Supervisors who are usually dishonest and always extravagant; a Board of Education, usually a shaky lot and always ignorant; a School Department, extravagant, absurd, and to the last degree misrepresenting the original idea of education for the poor; a Street Department entitled to be designated as the "Highway Robbery" department; carelessness, indifference, profligacy on every side; crimes, for which suicide and the State prison are but partial compensation. The result of all these—fraud, jobbery, and misgovernment—is exorbitant taxation. Exorbitant taxation tends to induce everybody to hide away all they can from the tax-gatherer. All personal property plays "hide and seek" with the assessor, and only real estate, because it cannot hide, is compelled to bear the burdens of government.

Organized discontent first appears among the poor. They are the first to feel the burden; and of the poor, it is the unthrift, idle, and criminal that first feel the pressure of poverty, and first cry out against it. This discontent among the foreign-born, beer-drinking, idle ones, organizes itself into a party of violence and disorder; an ignorant and audacious Irishman is found to place itself at the head of it; an alien and ignorant Englishman is named second in command of this ragged regiment; a short and dirty lawyer from Nova Scotia is next, and we need not particularize further than to say that Germany, France, Italy, Ireland, Scandinavia, every foreign European land, furnishes its quota of ignorance, discontent, and disorder to swell the mob of malcontents who began by threats of torch and hemp, and ended by consolidating into a political party for legalized misrule. This band of agitators, composed for the most part of uneducated foreign paupers, have undertaken to give an organic law to the State. A few American demagogues, mostly men of desperate political fortunes, have struck hands with this element of misrule. A few journals, owned mostly by men who do not, and by virtue of birth, education, and natural instincts can not, understand or appreciate the necessity of obedience to the law, have given the party immediate support; while another part of the press, servile, selfish, and cowardly, has not dared to do otherwise than to give to the movement an implied recognition. And thus we have had intelligence, property, good government, and social order placed upon the defensive in San Francisco. We are to-day as American citizens standing at bay with our backs to the wall, our property threatened, our families imperiled by the menace of a foreign organization, whose avowed purpose is to compel a division of property. Fortunately for us, there are very few American-born citizens in this disorder-threatening mass, and we are still more fortunate that almost without exception foreign citizens who have any sense of gratitude, or any property to lose, or any social or business position, are with us, and upon the American and the decent side.

The issue as it comes to us is, shall the new Constitution be adopted, or shall we adhere to the old one, under which we have so long prospered? Shall we undertake to uproot and overthrow the entire business, financial, and social fabric in order that we may correct certain evils? Shall we burn the dwelling in order to kill the rats that infest it? Shall we as Americans lie down upon our backs, and allow this vile, servile horde of foreigners to overrun and destroy us? Shall the business community—the merchants, the real property owners, the capitalists, the bankers—allow itself to be intimidated by the discontented classes?—by disappointed and embittered demagogues?—or by a vile, cowardly, and treacherous press? So far as our personal views may have any weight, we say this conflict may as well come to-day as later. It may as well come to California as any other part of the Republic; to San Francisco as to any other part of the State. So far as we are personally concerned, we would offer no compromises and make no concessions. We would neither ask nor give quarter. Let it be war à la Ponce—war by the ballot or the bayonet, just as the drift of circumstances may determine. Indeed, this is not a matter of choice to us who are native-born, or for our allies who are foreign-born. It is all very well to talk about leaving the country. It is easy to assert that men of wealth will go away. They can not get away. They are anchored here by ties of investment, property, and accumulations that can not be removed. The mechanic can not take up his homestead, nor can Mr. Flood take up his Nevada Block. Foreign capital may be driven away, a foreign bank may withdraw itself, a foreign insurance company may close its business, a home bank may retire its capital. Men may refuse to invest, to renew loans, to engage in new enterprises, to build ships, to construct railroads. Depreciated values may destroy savings banks. All this may occur. Rich men may become poor, and poor men may starve. But we do not believe that California has any such future in store for it. It has too much intelligence to fear it; it has too much of moral courage and personal valor to allow this uprising of the slums to either intimidate or destroy property. This storm will blow over, and we shall be surprised to see how small a following this foreign agitator has who has so disturbed our dreams.

The Constitution will be defeated. It must be defeated. It is agrarian, communistic. It means revolution. It is the outgrowth of chaotic events, and a contemporary wisely says: If it was as perfect, as defensible as the Decalogue, even then, when the influence of its adoption is considered—unsettling every vested right, menacing every enterprise, throwing doubt and uncertainty into the scale against every contemplated improvement, filling the entire land with feverish mistrust—even then all its excellencies, only to be verified by twenty years of judicial exposition, count for nothing; they are less than the "fine dust of the balance." Improvements of a solid character do not rise up by magic in a new State. Both capital and labor are distrustful; the charter of rights—the fundamental law—must be first settled by the highest courts; and when settled—when capital and labor each knows its belongings—even then confidence comes in by slow approaches, and years elapse before the perishable, temporary "experiments" harden into enduring, costly granite. Over all this road, darkly feeling her uncertain way, California has traveled. Thirty years has not been too long a time for able jurists to define mutual rights under the Monterey Constitution. Not a man in all the State will live to see such a settlement of the new instrument, if it is adopted by the people. Even now an undefined dread of calamity pervades every class of society, every avenue of business. Our merchants stand idly at their doors, our artisans and laborers linger at their homes or wander aimlessly about the streets. Every muscle of wonted activity is paralyzed. All this, for the sake of the argument, may be admitted as baseless as the fiction of a dream—but the hard fact is patent; and the fact, harder to contemplate, is also patent, that it must continue until the highest courts tell us just where our individual rights under the new Constitution begin, and just where the right of others under it may end. Should the people decide that the millions of capital, certain to be lost by this unrest—sweeping away, as it will do, much of the accumulated savings of the frugal, and precipitating undeserved disaster to merchants and manufacturers—is too dear a price to expend upon a conundrum, then we may fairly look for an elastic up-springing of our commercial and industrial activities, not later than the moment when this incubus rises from us on the 7th of next May. We do not forget the growing necessities of the State demand some changes in the fundamental law. Not one of these but can be inaugurated by the next Legislature, in a few well-considered amendments, and that, too, without danger of any disturbing shock to any legitimate interest or pursuit.

The Kearney movement is only formidable in San Francisco. Its habitat is in the immediate vicinity of the lowest dead-falls, the gin mills, the meaner corner grogeries, the water front. His American-born followers are composed largely of the bleary-eyed and drunken, who wear Bardolphian noses, sleep in bay-bunks, under the wharves, in lumber piles, feed on the charity of restaurants, pick up decaying fruit and melons from the markets, purloin vegetables, and steal onions and potatoes from rent sacks. They beg money at nights for lodgings which they spend in gin; they drink the dregs of beer barrels from kegs controlled from saloons. Most of his followers in San Francisco are foreigners. At his great Thanksgiving parade there was not a hundred native born, and at his Sunday sand-lot meetings scarce an intelligent face can be seen other than those drawn there from curiosity. His great following is Irish, and the lowest and the meanest of that nationality—that part that has broken loose from the teachings of the church and the influence of the priesthood. Kearney, in order to ingratiate himself with this renegade class, was compelled to denounce the Catholic Church and Catholic clergy. We know of no good Catholic or respectable Irishman who is a Kearney man. His next strength of following comes from the low Germans—in our judgment the very worst and most dangerous of all the foreign immigrants that have cursed our country; a class possessing less virtues, less patriotism, and having more vices, more sensualism, more ignorance, and more brutal instincts than any other, and less liable to be reached by public sentiment than any other because they only listen to speeches in German of German demagogues, read German papers, think in German, and drink German beer. An ignorant, brutal, low-lived German class is the most disturbing of all our foreign elements, as the intelligent German class is the most healthful and desirable. The Latin races—French, Italian, and Spanish—present the two extremes of civilization. Our best and worst people are from these countries. The worst and most ignorant are in this political movement. There are very few, if any, of the colored population who acknowledge Kearney for leader. We do not know of any. Some of our darkies have fallen down into the Democratic party, but we have never heard of one so utterly lost to self-respect as to acknowledge himself a member of the Kearney mob. In the country we do not fear that this movement will gain headway. Now for thirty years our Legislature has found its safety in the rural districts. San Francisco has been rescued from its own thieves a score of times by the intelligence, firmness, and integrity of the country members, and notwithstanding all that the Call and Chronicle have written about monster mass meetings and bucolic enthusiasm, we trust the sense and intelligence of the class that owns and tills the soil. The American farmer is the best citizen that we have. Republican government, law, order, and social organization, if preserved at all in America, will owe it to the hard sense and thorough integrity of the native and foreign-born American farmer. The village loafer and the tramp will go for Kearney, but not the man of cultivated acres and growing crops, and rising family. The idea that this class can be caught with the chaff of reduced taxation—a scheme resting on the promise of a constitutional law so imperfect and absurd as the one proposed—we do not believe.

The Kearney party, the Kearney demagogues, and the Kearney press, having stolen the name of "workingmen" for their organization, have, by studied misrepresentations and lies, claimed to embrace the great bulk of the labor element. This is emphatically untrue, and while the movement, in the earnestness of its promises, the vigor of its organization, and the hope that in this direction lay the correction of many abuses, brought many honest men to it from the industrial ranks, they have now nearly in a body withdrawn. The mechanics and artisans of San Francisco are a highly intelligent and honest body of men. They own homesteads; they have families; and no class is more interested than they in preserving the values of property, and in so administering the government that it shall give protection to business, encouragement to enterprise, and safety to all money, whether foreign or domestic. This class is, more than any other, interested to avoid money depressions, and has more to lose from a money panic. It is our judgment that, time being allowed for a careful consideration, the great mass of honest working men will find it to be to their interest to vote with employers against the adoption of the Constitution. The Kearney press—notably the Chronicle and the Call—are endeavoring to draw a line between the rich and the poor. Now, there is no such line to be drawn in this community. There is no line of demarcation between the class of labor and the class of leisure. We have no leisure class. We are all workers. We have no poor class in the sense that the term is used in other countries. We have poor men who hope to become rich, we have workers who hope to come to a period of leisure. Our rich people were all of them once poor; some of our poorest were once rich, and hope to become so again. Our richest people have no guarantee that their children will not be poor, while the chance of the child of the poorest man to become rich is more than equal to that of the wealthy born. We have no laws entailing property, no laws of primogeniture. Every opportunity of life and all the honors of station and emoluments of office are open to the ambition of the lowliest born. The man or the newspaper who encourages class distinction is either a knave or a fool, and, whether fool or knave, is an enemy to the class with which he or it affects to sympathize. An organic law that makes an attack upon property, makes its acquisition more difficult, or its tenure more insecure, is piling a dead weight upon the working man. It takes away the incentive for exertion, and leaves him to drag along in the rut of hopeless toil and poverty all his days, and condemns his children to an ambitionless life. Laws that make millionaires possible, that present great prizes in the struggle of life, laws that encourage business ventures, are the very ones under which there is opportunity for poor boys to come to the top. Hence we say that the movement, the party, the demagogue, the press, the organization, or the public sentiment, that seeks to array one class against another—the poor against the rich, the unfortunate against the prosperous—in this free republic and country of equal opportunity is criminal, and dishonest, and damnable. The poor man who is deceived by it, or the working man that regards his interest as identified with it, is a fool—simply a fool, and nothing less.

The Chronicle, of Saturday last, takes a position of bold defiance toward those sneaks (merchants) who withdrew advertising patronage from its columns, and declares it will "remember and punish them as enemies long after this fight is ended and forgotten." It declares that money is being raised to defeat the adoption of the Constitution, and this the Chronicle interprets to mean "corruption, bribery, and intimidation of voters," and says these parties are being watched and will be prosecuted to the extent of the law, without mercy and without regard to the reputation or wealth of the offender. It writes as follows: "Whoever, by any method, sneak or otherwise, attempts to interfere with our business, or to punish or bulldoze or intimidate us because we exercise this right decently and argumentatively, is our declared enemy, and shall be held and marked and treated as such until we shall have made him suffer as much damage as he inflicts, and with interest compounded. It has never been a habit with the Chronicle to be kicked without kicking back and struck without striking back. Blow for blow it shall be to the very end, and the devil take the hindmost. There will be days and months and years for the Chronicle long after this fight is ended and forgotten, and we shall think less of it than we now do if it does not prove equal to the duty of punishing such enemies more than they can now punish it."

This is bold language and smacks of arrogance. It challenges the wealth and business of this community to a combat that it can not well and with self-respect decline. It says to the commercial, business, and banking interests of San Francisco, I will elevate by all the arts and influence of my journal a wild and disorderly rabble to political power; I will encourage a mob of violent men to menace your property and the lives of your families; I will, with all the influence of my paper, support the men that build bonfires under the eaves of the dwellings of our rich men and that threaten with hemp our prominent citizens by name; I will by every means promote the adoption of a Constitution in opposition to the unanimous wishes of all men who have property to preserve; I will array the poor against the rich; I will inflame the passions of the desperate till society is driven to arm itself, and patrol the streets in self-defense, and while I do this thing I will demand the advertising patronage of the class whose interest I assault; I will claim the business of the men whom I hold up day after day to public contempt; I will charge Messrs. Williams & Blanchard with being dishonest agents, encouraging a drunken commander to destroy a ship, and they shall pay me to advertise the line; I will assault the Bonanza firm from day to day; I will name Mr. Flood as a thief, and I will drag the name of Mr. Mackay into unpleasant prominence; I will declare their whole business a fraud and a crime, and they shall advertise with me their mines; I will assault the railroad men by name; I will write concerning the illness of Governor Stanford in a manner that shall pain his friends, but the Corporation shall give me a column of advertisements; I will denounce railroads, steam lines, banks, mines, merchants; I will war against corporations and land owners; I will abuse Mr. Haggin and Mr. Carr; I will assail the credit of savings banks; I will destroy business confidence, and in the pursuit of my rivalry with another journal, I will hound on a vile, ignorant, passionate mob of unthinking criminals to follow the leadership of an adventurous alien, till I shall have destroyed business, paralyzed trade, made all enterprises halt, made real values to shrink, intimidated foreign capital, and then, if this outraged and insulted community, this injured class of merchants and business men, these frightened heads of families, these creditors under foreclosure of mortgages, these property owners under shrinking of values—if they shall dare withdraw their business: "I will remember and punish them long after this fight is ended and forgotten." Merciful God! what a terrible threat. Now, the ARGONAUT is but a weekly journal. It will reap no benefit from this victory or defeat of the Chronicle. But such an arrogant and disgracefully insulting attitude toward the commercial and business classes was never taken by a journal that deserved or expected to live upon the patronage of business men. The Chronicle must think this a community of cowards if it supposes it will lie down under such an insulting challenge.

The Chronicle writes like an ass when it assumes that the relation between a journal and the community in which it is printed is other than a business one. No man, or class, or guild, or corporation is under any obligation to the Chronicle. If they do not like it or its views they have a right not to employ it. If they think its course is destructive to the welfare of the community, they have a right to destroy it by withdrawing from its support. For the Chronicle to assume any other relation is to play the bully, the blackguard, and attempt the rôle of a tyrant. If any one interrupts Mr. Kearney "we break their heads," says the god of the sand-lot, and the Chronicle is his Mahomet and his prophet. Well, lock was admonished that he was disloyal to the order of Workingmen if he did not approve the Constitution. No member of a Workingman's club is allowed to entertain an opinion adverse to the new law. "You lie!" shouts a Workingman to the Reverend Mr. Hemphill while reading his Sabbath-day's sermon. Clitus, the short, threatens to wade knee deep in blood if the workingmen are discharged from employment for their opinions. The whole atmosphere of the sand-lot breathes menace, threats, and violence. Messrs. Beerstretcher, Reynolds, and McCue openly advise the withdrawal of business from the Call to give it to the Chronicle; yet, if the business men, because they regard the Chronicle as a dangerous and incendiary paper—inimical and unfriendly to property and business—withdraw their advertisements, they are to be punished. Although this is not our fight, we enjoy it. We quote from the Chronicle of Saturday, and reprint the motto: "Blow for blow to the very end, and the devil take the hindmost." In this fight between the merchants of San Francisco and the Chronicle we are interested to see which shall be the first to take water.

At this writing a labor strike is going on at the top of Nob Hill, where contractor Onderdonk is grading lots for the erection of two palatial residences, one for James C. Flood and one for James Fair. Messrs. Flood and Fair have nothing to do with the business, as they have engaged their lots to be graded under contract at so much per cubic yard. The rock is being used to build a sea-wall for the Harbor Commissioners, the contractor of which is also Mr. Onderdonk.

So this dispute is beyond the Bonanza kings' control. The laborers now get $1.50 per day. They demand $2. They ought to have it; by this we mean to say that we wish they may get it. The winter has passed. Ten hours of summer work with pick and shovel is worth $2. The men on this work are sober, decent, quiet, and orderly. We went to see them; talked with them. They chaffed us a little about the ARGONAUT, but admitted that we had as good a right to abuse Kearney as Kearney to abuse us. They are all for the new Constitution, but they were generous enough to say we had a right to vote against it. Most of the crowd were Irishmen; most of them have families. Now, it strikes us that if these striking laborers would select some level head from among their own number to meet employers and settle these labor differences there would be more satisfaction obtained and less of hardship—in the invariable loss of employment—to be endured. The employer can afford to be idle, the laborer can not. There is another idea suggested by this strike and the demand for higher wages that all of those people who so boldly proclaim their allegiance to the scrub of the sand-lot would do well to bear in mind. When, a year or more ago, Denis Kearney, the agitator, stood up in a buggy in front of the Mayor's office and demanded work for a thousand men at one dollar a day, he did more to degrade and destroy labor than the hardest times or the wildest strike, for he fixed a price from which it has been difficult to creep up to the present pittance. Since then everything has been figured from the basis of one dollar per day; since then capital has been driven to its hiding places; since then labor has been scarce; and if these striking toilers are at all anxious to fix the responsibility, they will find it on Sunday at the sand-lot. Our sympathy is with labor when it is orderly and law-abiding, and not unreasonable in its demands. Everybody is interested in the development and prosecution of this work. The whole commercial and business community want the sea-wall completed. We want Messrs. Flood and Fair to spend a million each in a magnificent residence. Labor will get the money, and we will have the pleasure of looking through the iron pickets at beautiful grounds, and over the fence at two handsome houses. This thing can be compromised by the expenditure of a little money and a little sense. We are willing to do half the work by supplying all the sense.

The Republican County Committee is legitimately constituted; is composed for the most part of disinterested and honorable men. It has the confidence of the rank and file of honest Republicans and will be supported by them. The liberal test proposed is right. The formation of clubs is untimely and premature. The movement evidences by its trail that the serpent is wiggling. Americus Clubs and Isaiah Rynders organizations are not to be tolerated this time. Let the County Committee attend to the affairs of the party, dealing with this Green-Solomon-Tom Sawyer business as though it was a conspiracy, as we believe it to be. There will be music in the air when we expose it, and we will expose it.

A young gentleman propounded to me this question: "My mother has a farm in Colusa County, assessed upon a valuation of $70,000. She has a mortgage upon it to a bank for $20,000. Will she be relieved from any part of her taxes if the new Constitution is adopted?" I replied: "Your mother's mortgage provides that she shall pay all taxes levied upon or concerning the land, and the rate of interest is predicated upon that fact. The terms of the existing mortgage can not be disturbed by any ex post facto law. When she comes to renew her mortgage the bank will calculate the tax it must pay and add the amount to interest; and as the tax levy for, say, five years in advance is an unknown quantity, the bank will place the interest high enough to cover all possibilities of large taxation."

Some curious stories are told of the European money-lenders. Those in California are no better and no worse. One in Bruxelles was always prepared to discount a good note if the borrower would purchase his cat. The price of the cat was just the difference between the legal rate of interest and the rate demanded. It was seldom the purchaser ever took away any thing more than a bill of sale of "one Maltese cat named Tom," and if he did insist upon carrying off his chattel, Tom always made his way back to the money-lender ready to do similar service for his master on the following day. If the farmers of this State expect the money-lenders to pay taxes on their mortgages, they will have to pay increased interest, and pay for Kearney in addition.

Elsewhere in our journal will be found the card of Michael Hawkins, of the firm of Daly & Hawkins, in which he asks of the public an indulgent consideration of their position till from the ample assets the firm shall have time to realize sufficient to pay their debts. This is but a reasonable demand. A long acquaintance with Mr. Hawkins justifies us in the belief that he will emerge from his financial embarrassments honorably. So long a business career, upon which this is no stain of dishonorable conduct, should not be to carry gentlemen through a more serious financial crisis than we believe theirs to be.

"LES PRESENTATIONS."

How a Young Lady in France Makes her Choice of a Husband.

[Adapted from the French of Louis Leroy.]

Mme. de Cardillac (inspecting her daughter).—Yes, that will do. Perhaps it is a little high in the neck, but it has to be to night.

Emmeline (laughing).—Why, ma; why any higher in the neck to-night than any other night?

Mme. de C.—Because, Emmie, to-night Mme. de Luc intends presenting a young gentleman in whom she is deeply interested, M. de Grandclos.

Emmeline.—And it is on his account that I am put into this strait-jacket?

Mme. de C.—Yes, dear; you see, the young man is an orphan, and since he was eight has been at school and college, and not being used to society he might be scandalized.

Emmeline (significantly).—Then he is a —?

Mme. de C.—Yes, and one of the most serious of suitors, too.

Emmeline.—Good-looking?

Mme. de C.—I haven't seen him myself, but Mme. de Luc assures me that he is quite acceptable for a young man.

Emmeline (laughing).—But it remains to be seen whether he is quite acceptable for a young woman.

Mme. de C.—Be reserved, my love, and do not give him any encouragement except as he declares himself.

Emmeline.—Don't worry, mother; if he doesn't suit me I won't give him any encouragement at all.

Mme. de C. (shaking her finger at her).—You will do precisely what your father and I wish you to do, miss.

Emmeline (kissing her).—Yes, ma—unless he is quite too awfully ugly.

Mme. de C.—The guests are beginning to arrive; let us go to the drawing-room.

II.

(At the most auspicious moment of the soirée, enter, unannounced, a young man.)

Young Man (bowing respectfully to Mme. de Cardillac).—I had anticipated the honor of a presentation to-night by Mme. de Luc, but, unfortunately, she is indisposed, and hence I have ventured to introduce myself. My name is—

Mme. de C.—I know, I know. And so we shall not see Mme. de Luc to-night?

Young Man.—I fear not, unless she should be much better than when I left her, twenty minutes ago.

Mme. de C.—So sorry. You dance?

Young Man (smiling).—On all occasions.

Mme. de C. (pointing to her daughter).—There is my daughter; ask her to dance this quadrille with you.

Young Man (approaching Emmeline).—Excuse me, mademoiselle, but your mother was so good as to permit me—

Emmeline (with superb indifference).—With pleasure. (Aside) He is quite good-looking, this M. de Grandclos!

Young Man (aside).—By Jove, she's a beauty! (Aloud) Shall we take our places?

Emmeline.—If you please. (They dance, and afterward retire to the card-room, where Emmeline turns over the pages of an album, chatting the while with her partner.)

What do you think of this picture?

Young Man.—Very charming, indeed.

Emmeline.—Oh, you're only making fun of me. Charming? That scraggy little school-girl in the convent-school uniform!

Young Man.—The head is splendid—anyone could see it was you.

Emmeline (laughing).—Then you recognize me in it? Still, you do not really mean what you say?

Young Man.—On the contrary, I do not really say half what I mean.

Emmeline (with suspicious innocence).—Why don't you?

Young Man.—Because—because—

Emmeline.—If it is anything uncomplimentary don't be afraid to say it.

Young Man.—Oh, mademoiselle, could you for an instant believe—

Emmeline.—I do like people that are frank.

Young Man (in a low tone).—If frankness alone could qualify me to aspire to the happiness of being reckoned among your friends, how gladly would I—

Emmeline (seeming not to hear him, and blushing).—How do you like this one?

Young Man (dazzled).—It is you, and in the most exquisite ball dress—

Emmeline.—Don't you think it becomes me better than this one I am wearing to-night?

Young Man.—Yes—no—that is, I daren't undertake—

Emmeline.—And yet you say you are frank!

Young Man.—No matter what the picture, the original is a thousand times more precious.

Emmeline.—Even where it is a cabinet photo?

Young Man.—Why mock me? Are not this pure complexion, those braids of dead gold hair, those ruby lips—?

(Aside) I'm going it, decidedly.

III.

Emmeline (as a waltz strikes up).—Isn't that just lovely? Doesn't it set your feet going? (Sighs.)

Young Man.—Will you do me the gigantic pleasure of dancing it with me?

Emmeline.—I would dearly like to, but ma won't let me dance. (Sighs again.)

Mme. de C. (appearing at the door).—What, Emmie, not waltzing?

Emmeline (jumping up with alacrity).—Yes, ma, this gentleman had just asked me to. (Aside) You know you were going to! Oh, jolly, ma hasn't any objections. (They waltz.)

Young Man (before relinquishing his partner).—Mademoiselle!

Emmeline.—Sir?

Young Man.—Do not listen to what I am going to say!

Emmeline.—Why?

Young Man.—Because the audacity of my declaration might offend you.

Emmeline (trembling).—What declaration?

Young Man.—I love you, darling; I love you!

Emmeline (with a little scream, and putting her hand to her heart).—Ah!

Young Man.—You are angry with me—
Emmeline (whispering).—Angry? Ah, no, because—because, you see —! Oh, there's ma! (Quits his arm and embraces her mother with effusion.)

Mme. de C.—Well, how do you like him?
Emmeline.—Oh, ma, he's just too nice, and I love him, and he loves me.

Footman (loudly).—Mme. la Baronne de Luc! M. de Grandclos! (Tableau.)

IV.

Emmeline (first to emerge from the stupefaction in which she has been gazing on her mother).—Oh, ma, but that young man with her is hideous.

Mme. de C.—But the other one—the one you waltzed with—who is he? Where did he come from?

Young Man (saluting Mme. de Luc).—You will forgive me, Madame, for having ventured to present myself, but your headache being so bad—

Mme. de Luc.—You did quite right, my dear Count.

Emmeline (aside).—A Count!

Mme. de C. (whispering to the Baroness).—What is the Count's name?

Mme. de Luc (astonished).—What, don't you know it? M. de Longpont; a young man, very rich and of an excellent family. Now let me present M. de Grandclos.

M. de Grandclos (bowing).—Madame!

Mme. de C. (bowing).—Sir! (Aside to the Baroness.) But why on earth did you present these two gentlemen the same day?

Mme. de Luc.—I didn't. I pretended I had a headache so as to get the Count out of the way and not have him come at all.

Mme. de C.—Well, my dear, you've done it! See there. M. de Grandclos (to Emmeline).—Will you oblige me by giving me this waltz?

Emmeline (burning her ships behind her).—Thanks, but I can't; ma has engaged me to M. de Longpont—for life! (Tableau.)

The Latest Parisian Bonhous.

L'Evénement thus traces the history of the French Cabinet Minister of the period in a solo and chorus:

"I saw a fine building called a department."

"So did we."

"I went up the staircase."

"So did we."

"I entered a private office."

"So did we."

"And took possession of it."

"So did we."

"There I saw a big portfolio."

"So did we."

"I put it under my arm."

"So did we."

"I was called 'The Honorable the Minister of —'."

"So were we."

"I signed decrees."

"So did we."

"Lot of 'm—stacks."

"So did we."

"And was fired out and down the front steps with a velocity which made my head swim."

"So were we." (Chorus—"He was a minister, for he himself has said it.")

A nephew (in Normandy, of course) assists at the reading of his uncle's will.

"And to the servant who shall close my eyes I will and bequeath," reads the notary.

"Does it say 'who shall close my eyes?'" asks the heir-at-law.

"It does."

"Then the bequest is void. The old cuss only had one eye."

Worthy Magistrate.—What! a man can be cruel enough to maltreat his lawful wedded wife, and even to hurl her a plate at the head?

Prisoner.—But, your Honor, do you know my wife?

Worthy Magistrate.—I have not that honor.

Prisoner.—Then just you go slow.

Mlle R. is of a naïveté few common.

Some one to her was recounting yesterday that he came from the Court of Assizes, where they had condemned to ten years of travels forced a woman who had suffocated her unique child.

"What a chance all the same," said Mlle R., "that I did not have a mother like that!"

In the new ballet at the Folies Bergère, Les Vins de France, some of the danseuses appear clad in vine leaves.

"I hope the piece 'I'll run till autumn,'" says the graceless X.

"Why?"

"Because then leaves have their time to fall."

"That's a mighty nice cane you have."

"I should think it was. You gave it to me, don't you recollect?"

"Yes, and I'm almost sorry I didn't keep it for myself."

"Well, tell you what I'll do; I'll sell it back. What did you pay for it?"

"Eight francs, but then I got it at a bargain."

"Well, seeing it's you, I'll let you have it for fifteen."

M. Robert Mitchell, the Bonapartist Deputy, called at the Elysée recently, and saluting M. Grévy, remarked:

"I am very happy to be able to offer you my congratulations on your accession to the Presidency."

With a smile M. Grévy replied:

"And I am very happy to be able to accept them."

A prisoner who firmly expected that he would get his deserts and be sent up for life, is astonished to hear the jury fix his term of imprisonment at two years.

"Two years only!" he exclaims in delight; "ah, then, gentlemen of the jury, may heaven do likewise unto you a thousand-fold!"

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

There was a man wick had a ole cat wick he liked mity wel, but my mother she likes Franky, thats the baby, and cookies is nuts to me and Billy. The man he was a gredy gut, cos he was always a stuff hisself with vittles, like he was sick, and one day wile he was to town some fellers thay went in his house and coked up a dinner, and wen he cum home there thay was a settin round the table waitin for him, cos it was a sprise party. So the man he sat down, and thay et, and et, and et, partickler him, and wen he got juck full as a tix he sed: "It was mity thotfle for you fellers to git sech a nice rabbit for jest only me, when you dont likem, yes, indeed, I never et a fatter one."

Then the other fellers thay ol got their hats, ready for to run, and then thay sed: "It was yure ole cat, you mizzable gluton, and mebbey it wil be a lesson to you."

The man he was jest hopen mad, and he sed: "You dirty galoots, I wudent took ten dollars for that cat, cos she has supplide my table with kittens for five yeers, but the feller wick lives on his capitle wil be a beggar, and hav to eat butchers meat long as he lives."

The cat wick he had fore we got Mose was yeller, and didnt hav no ears, and not any tail, too, cos they was cut of for to make it go a way from were it lived, for it was so ugly, so it come to our house. One day my mother she sed wudent my father drownd it, cos she new were she cude git a nicer lukin one. So my father he put it in a bag, and a brick in the bag too, and threw it in a pond, and went to his office, my father did. But the cat busted the bag string, and wen my father he cum home it was lyin under the stofe, but cum out to look at him. So thay looked at one a other for a long wile, and bime by my father he sed to my mother: "Wel, you are a mighty poor hand to go a shoppin for cats. Thisn is a gum dasted site uglier than the other!"

Wen you lay cats down for to muggle em in the belly thay only jest bite your fingers a little tiny bit, and then you say: "Look here, Uncle Ned, at this joker makin beleve to be sabbadge," but jest then it ups with its hine feets and rips the skin of off the back of yure hand, and wocks a way like it had forgot you, and sets down and looks at you, much as to say: "Bub, do you kno eny boddly bout here wick wude give a pore, hard werkin cat a bite of bred?"

But wen you fire the famly bible yure uncle Ned he says the bred of life aint the kind that cats and sinners likes.

And now for a little story. Mister Gipple he says one time a ring tail racoon got after one of his little chickens, and a ole hen, wick was the chickens mother, she got after the ring tail racoon. The coons tail it stuck out strate be hind, and the hens hed it stuck out strate be fore, and thay went so fast that the rings flu off of the coons tail and was strung onto that ole hens neck like thay was beads.

Jest as Mister Gipple got done a tellin me a bout it, Mister Pitchel, that the preecher, he cum in, and he sed: "Thats rite, brother, thats rite, you hav ben in so many countrys that you are wel qualifide to instruct the yung by relatin incidents of travel, and it is better that our little friend shude listen to the confensation of truffe and pious persens than to read story papers, wick is mostly wicked lies. I ony herd the last werds of wot you was tellin. Wot was it wick was strung onto the hens neck?"

Mister Gipple he got mity red, like he was hot, and he sed he gessed mebbey the pigs was in his garden, and if his whifes close line was broke it wude hav to be fixed rite a way, and it was a bout time for his little girl to fall in the walg in, and he must go home to once. So Mister Gipple he went, but wen my sisters yung man is here it is leven oh colock Sundy nite.

One day the yung man was to our house to dinner, and Missis Dobby, wick has got the red hed, she was, too, and she has got false teeth. My sisters yung man he had sum green wax and he made it up like a olive, and wen no boddly was lukin he put it in the plate with the rest, cos Missis Dobby likes em, and he thot we wude hav sum fun with her teeths if he cude git her to take the rite one. But she took a veel one, and passt em to my mother, and she got the whax one, and hern dont cum out, and the whax wudent cum out neether, and sech a circous peformance wasent never saw, but not any ephelent. Wen it was ol over, Uncle Ned he seen wot was up and he sed to my sister: "Missy, them imitation olives wick the wicked grocers sel is pizen, and it was mity thotfle of yure yung man to run for his stummick pump, but Ime a frade fore he cums back the pashent wil be ded of ole age."

There was a feller wick wanted to marry a ole mans dotter, and she wanted to marry him, so he went to ast her father mite he hav her for his whife. The ole man he sed: "I dont never see you doin any thing, wot is yure bisnis?"

The feller he spoke up fore he thot and sed he was a dockter. Then the ole man he sed a other time: "Wel, thats a mity onable pefession, but you dont pear to hav much practis."

The feller he sed: "No, I aint got no custom yet, thats a fack, but thats cos I haint had a chance for to sho my strong pintis. Ime a speshlist, and I only treat fokes wick has got my peticular disease, no use me wastin my time on eny thing else."

The ole man he sed wot was his speshalty. The feller he scratcht his hed a wile, and then he sed: "Ole age."

Wen Mister Jonnice, wick has got the wuden leg, come home from Santy Cruze he tole ole Gaffer Peters that wile he was down there 3 Ingens had dide of senility. Gaffer he shuke his hed wise, and sed: "I ges thay brot it on thei selfs a drinkin wisky, tho its a mity mean, onhelthy climt down there, eny how."

My father he says that a dockter was sent for for to cure a woman, and he cudent quite make out wot was up with her. So he sed had she any fever, and she sed no. Then he sed of course not, be kanew that, cos wen fokes was took like her the chils kep off the fever, but she sed she didnt have no chils, and the dockter he sed that was on a count of her bein jest the right age not to have em, how old was she? The woman she sed none of his bizoes, find out. Then the dockter he got mad, and he sed: "Very wel, jest as you pleas. Ide like to know wots the matter with you fore I begin, but I got plenty time, so Ile jest rap you in flans, and tie a peece of led unto the stummick of yure belly, and give you soothn surp for a week or too, and if that duzent pull you throo I gess its old age."

T. W. SHERMAN—REMINISCENCES.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—The late Major-General Thomas W. Sherman, of the regular army, who died at Newport, Rhode Island, the 16th instant, was a West Point graduate of the class of 1835. He was my First Lieutenant of Company D, Third Regiment of Artillery, and served with me about two years from the month of September, 1832, till about the middle of 1844. My Second Lieutenant during the same period was George H. Thomas, who died at San Francisco March 28, 1870, while in command of the Division of the Pacific. These two officers were men of rare merit, and both devoted their talents and shortened their lives in the public service. Sherman injured his health while in Florida, and afterward lost a leg in the war of the Rebellion. Thomas exhausted his vital powers by an uninterrupted devotion to duty in all climates, but continued his work till the hour of his death.

It is seldom that two men have differed more widely in disposition than the two of whom I am speaking, and yet the harmony which for high two years subsisted between them and me was never for a moment interrupted. Sherman was a New England man of a marked type, and he seemed inclined in his youth to a certain degree of morbid sullenness. He made known his sentiments on all occasions, and appeared to shun, rather than to court, popularity. He was assigned to my company in orders before I had ever seen him, and, in the interval before he joined, the officers around me undertook to forestall his character. They told me that in Florida he had been put in Coventry, and that no officer would associate with him except on duty. All spoke in his disparagement except Thomas, who said nothing.

At length the postman came in one day while the mess were at dinner, at the New Orleans Barracks, and reported to me that Lieutenant Sherman was at the gate. Being caterer, and carving, I dropped the knife, and sprang up, saying: "Gentlemen, I am going with outstretched arms to clasp my First Lieutenant." I almost ran to the gate, and, seizing him by both hands, said: "Mr. Sherman, if the whole army list had been open to me for choice I should have selected you the first for my subaltern." I brought him immediately to the mess table, placed him next me, cut off the best morsels to load his plate, and so eager was I to ask him questions and to assure him of the joy I felt at making his acquaintance and having him with me, that the others had scarcely an opportunity to put in a word. His instructions were simply to report to me in person at New Orleans, and afterward to join me at Charleston, for which place I and my company were then under orders.

Arriving at Fort Moultrie in advance of Sherman, I found all the officers there alike unfriendly to my new assistant. Parson Field (so we dubbed the tall, straight-haired lieutenant of that name who was swept into the sea and drowned from the deck of the steamer San Francisco in 1853) said to me: "Captain, you've got a hard nut to crack now." Captain Myers, a South Carolinian, who was afterward high in rank in the Confederate service, asked me if I was going to take Sherman into the mess. "Of course I am," said I. "Well," said he, "you'll not keep him long, for the devil himself couldn't live him."

Time rolled on. Sherman reported for duty. I was very cordial, and showed my confidence in him by often asking his advice. George Thomas received him kindly, and as soon as Sherman discovered that his commanding officer and associate lieutenant could not be influenced against him by vague reports, his sullenness seemed to melt away. Under a cold and often repellent exterior I discovered a veritable treasure, a man of heart, of sterling sense and integrity, and one whom no allurement could turn away from his duty. Sherman joined the mess, which was at that time quite numerous, and ordinarily very jocular and noisy. For a few days his presence produced a dead calm. Judd intermitted his disquisitions; Bragg was silent, and his eye showed a more ardent glow than usual; W. T. Sherman, the present General of the Army, who was then as bright as the burning bush, ceased talking; George H. Thomas told none of his humorous stories; Parson Field looked anxious; Churchill and Ayers, the two beaux of the mess, related none of their adventures, and I stopped quoting from Boswell's Life of Johnson, which I was then reading. About that time Parson Field bought a marsh pony, and paid for him the price first demanded by the jockey. The parson was very tall and lank, and his quadruped very low; and the silhouette of the two when seen galloping on the beach was, beyond all power of description, ludicrous. We jeered the parson, and the hilarity of the mess was restored. T. W. Sherman took a sensible part in all our discussions, and it was soon discovered that he was not only a man of good judgment, but that he was also companionable. He and Parson Field grew fast friends, and were often seen walking arm in arm; add, the strangest of all, Myers, the South Carolinian par excellence, who lived outside the Fort, established a table of his own, and invited Sherman to mess with him. He accepted the invitation, and during many months the Puritan and the Huguenot fed together in harmony.

Toward the end of May, 1844, I was detached from Fort Moultrie to return there no more. I often met T. W. Sherman afterward, but never heard again of his being unpopular. What it was that had first brought him into disfavor I could never learn precisely. I inferred, however, that he had, while serving in Florida, done, or left undone, said, or omitted to say, something to bring his courage into doubt, notwithstanding he was, without question, one of the bravest men in the regiment. The blasts of sectional hate had already commenced to rage, and with a few southern men it was only necessary to say of a New England officer that he had gone into the battle and come out alive to stamp him a coward. Thomas W. Sherman was of that stubborn mould that never quails under detraction, and he would never seek to evade its effects by concession or explanations. He devoted all his talent with unflinching constancy to the service of his country, and when the toils of war had consumed his strength he gave his maimed body to the grave.

The mess of Fort Moultrie in 1843-4 was composed wholly of officers of the Third Regiment of Artillery, and it resembled a garden in which there were many young trees covered all over with blossoms. I was the oldest of all, and highest in rank, being a captain, and consequently called old. Of the eleven members, Wm. T. Sherman afterward became General and Commander in Chief of our army; Braxton Bragg, Lieutenant-General of the Confederate service; myself, Thos. W. Sherman, George H. Thomas, and John F. Reynolds, became major-generals; Henry B. Judd rose to lieutenant-colonel; Geo. W. Ayers was killed in the assault on Molino del Rey, Mexico; and Wm. H. Churchill died at Point Isabel, Texas, in consequence of disease contracted in the Mexican war. Horace B. Field was drowned at sea; and William Austine, although he rose to be a colonel by brevet, suffered much from ill health. Of all that company which thirty years ago was so full of health and hope, Wm. T. Sherman, myself, Henry B. Judd, and William Austine only remain alive. The ruthless sickle of death has clipped in all the others. E. D. KEYES.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 27, 1879.

BUTTERICK'S PATTERNS—SPRING STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

ELOCUTION, ORATORY, AND THE DRAMA.

MARY J. BRADLEY, 510 ELLIS Street. Ladies and gentlemen fitted for the Platform, Stage, or Teaching.

922 POST STREET.

MME. B. ZEITSKA'S FRENCH, German, and English Institute for Young Ladies—with KINDERGARTEN

For children from three to six years of age. The next term of this well known Institute (established since 1863) will commence on MONDAY, March 24th, 1879. For catalogue and particulars, address MME. B. ZEITSKA, Principal.

PRESIDENT COFFEE, PURE MOCHA COFFEE, PURE JAVA COFFEE,

Ground to order at

LORING'S

Dealer in choice

JAPAN AND BLACK

TEAS

922 Market St.,

Between Stockton and Powell Streets, near the Baldwin.

JENNINGS S. COX.....OLIVER TRALL.

COX, TEALL & CO.,

REAL ESTATE AGENTS AND AUCTIONEERS, 303 Montgomery Street, under the Nevada Bank, San Francisco.

Auction Salesroom, H. M. NEWHALL & CO., 309, 311 and 313 Sansome Street.

J. O. ELDRIDGE, Auctioneer. ANDREW ONDERDONK, Civil Engineer.

RARE ENGRAVINGS, MODERN ETCHINGS.

VISITORS WILL BE ALWAYS

welcome to inspect collection. W. K. VICKERY, 22 Montgomery Street, opposite the Lick House.

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark),

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11 A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST, removed to 200 STOCKTON ST., cor. Geary, S. F.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

NOOK FARM.

THIS PLEASANT COUNTRY HOME is now open for the reception of visitors. Important additions and improvements have been made since last season, which add greatly to the comfort and pleasure of guests. The same good cheer and home surroundings will be found in the future as in the past. Remember that the pleasantest part of the year in the country is the spring and early summer. E. B. SMITH, For particulars, address Rutherford, Napa County.

ELECTRIC BELTS,

A sure cure for nervous debility, premature decay, exhaustion, etc. The only reliable cure. Circulars mailed free. Address J. K. REEVES, 43 Chatham Street, N. Y.

COMMERCIAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA, FIRE AND MARINE.

Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco. JOHN H. WISE, President. CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT

—AND— INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE

CASH ASSETS.....$450,000

Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS: A. J. BRYANT, President, RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President, CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary, H. H. WATSON, Marine Surveyor

P. J. WHITE, President. JOHN FAY, Vice President. GEO. O. SMITH, JR., Secretary.

WESTERN FIRE AND MARINE INS. CO.

OF CALIFORNIA, 409 California St., San Francisco.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS. GEO. H. SANDERSON, WM. WILLIS, W. W. DODGE, MICHAEL KANE, WM. M. LENT, J. MACDONOUGH, HENRY CASANOVA, JOHN F. BOYD, P. J. WHITE, JOHN FAY, P. ALPERITZ.

ALASKA COMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 SANSOME STREET,

WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.

THE VERTICAL FEED.

THE ONLY POSITIVE SUCCESS IN all departments of sewing. Lightest running shuttle machine in the market. The NEW DAVIS VERTICAL FEED SEWING MACHINE, 130 Post Street.

MARK SHELTON. P. S.—Howe, Florence, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover & Baker, Domestic, Weed, Willcox & Gibbs, for sale at $10 each.

MULLER'S OPTOMETER! The only reliable instrument for Testing Defective Vision. 135 Montgomery Street, Near Bush, opposite the Occidental Hotel.

MILLER & RICHARD, SOLE MAKERS OF

EXTRA-HARD METAL SCOTCH TYPE.

SPECIAL AGENTS FOR

THE CAMPBELL, HOE, AND PEERLESS PRESSES.

No. 529 COMMERCIAL STREET.

And 205 Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

The Best and Cheapest Advertising Medium.

THE NAPA DAILY & WEEKLY REGISTER NAPA, CALIFORNIA.

FRANCIS & SPALDING, Publishers and Proprietors.

THE REGISTER—Daily and Weekly—

is unsurpassed as a Local and County Newspaper, both in the quantity and quality of reading matter, and in value as an advertising medium. THE DAILY REGISTER is the only daily paper published in Napa County, and both Daily and Weekly have a large circulation. Daily $5, and Weekly $3 a year. G. M. FRANCIS.....H. S. SPALDING.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco. THOMAS O'SULLIVAN, plaintiff, vs. JOHN LICENS, in signature and acknowledgment JOHN LINUS. Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JOHN LICENS, in signature and acknowledgment JOHN LINUS, defendant. You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court, adjudging that a certain debt executed by defendant to plaintiff, on March 4th, 1868, be reformed and amended in the description of certain real property particularly described in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby expressly made, and for costs of suit.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded therein.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 22d day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

By W. STEVENSON, Deputy.

JOHN J. COFFEY, Attorney for Plaintiff.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco. MARY A. WOOTEN, plaintiff, vs. JOHN WOOTEN, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to John Wooten, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby made, and for costs of this suit, counsel fees, and alimony; also for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 15th day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

By W. STEVENSON, Deputy.

R. THOMPSON, Plaintiff's Attorney.

GOULD & CURRY SILVER MINING

Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the eleventh day of March, 1879, an assessment (No. 35) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 65, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the sixteenth day of April, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the seventh day of May, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with cost of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

ALFRED K. DUBROW, Secretary.

Office—Room 65, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

HALE & NORCROSS SILVER MINing Company.—Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the twelfth (12th) day of March, 1879, an assessment (No. 61) of one ($1) dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 65, Nevada Block, northwest corner Pine and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the sixteenth (16th) day of April, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on THURSDAY, the eighth (8th) day of May, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JOEL F. LIGHTNER, Secretary.

Office—Room 58, Nevada Block, northwest corner Pine and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.—NOTICE

is hereby given by the undersigned, Administratrix of the Estate of JOHN A. MAY, deceased, to the creditors of, and all persons having claims against, the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administratrix, at 432 Montgomery Street, Room 3, the same being her place for the transaction of the business of the said estate in the City and County of San Francisco.

MAGDALENE M. MAY,

Dated at San Francisco, March 10th, 1879.

PAUL NEUMANN, Attorney for Administratrix.

G. O. DEAN, D.D.S.....E. M. HACKETT.

HACKETT & DEAN,

DENTISTS, Latham's Building, 126

Kearny Street, San Francisco.

Office hours from 8 A. M. until 5 P. M.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS,

REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.

No. 510 S.

INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 5, 1879.

MY DEAR MADGE:—I was struck as I walked up street the other night with the immense comprehensiveness of our pleasure tastes. The bill-posters on the walls flashed out the news in brilliantly illuminated letters, and with appropriate illustrations, that a tan-colored princess, with tights to match, awaited an audience at the Bush Street Theatre. Annie Louise Cary's strong, resolute face looked out from the lithographs in the shop windows to let us know that in a short fortnight we are to have that blossom of civilization, grand Italian opera. Rose Eytinge was having a little cessation of hostilities, and resting after her last round in Led Astray. We were en route for the California, with its cozy, comfortable interior, its Eastern and Western reputation, and its Buffalo Bill. He had selected the Knight of the Plains as the title of the play, but, as you may have noticed, whatever the play may be he is always Buffalo Bill—this literally, for the bills read in this way every time: "Buffalo Bill, Hon. W. F. Cody." I like to look at this superb Antinous of the plains, with his harmless vanity and his theatric instinct. He is the incarnation of the boys' ideal of a hero of the dime novel. What would not Frank Mayo give for this genuine frontier accent which hangs upon the lips of Buffalo Bill, and will not away. You can follow his observation of men and manners with every trick of the stage drawing-room which he assumes. You can know just how he was first stage-struck by the roll of his r's. You can tell the sort of men he likes by his cultivation of imperturbable sang-froid. It is odd to watch how transparently the consciousness of the man shows through it all. When he shakes his head like a young bison, you feel that he is conscious of his Absalom locks; when he sits on his horse and strains his eye to look over the prairie, you can realize that every detail of the costume, every pose of the figure, has been studied. In an actor this is well and right. In Buffalo Bill perhaps this is well and right, too, but you have an odd feeling that, being as he is a genuine child of the prairies, this homeliness, this playing up to a curtain, this pattering to a shouting, screaming, whistling gallery, make him an apostate of nature. But the gallery likes it, the people like it, and I know Buffalo Bill likes it. He is a big, handsome, strong young fellow, and he has many accomplishments. He can snap a whip in such a way that every one jumps and thinks an Alcatraz cannon has gone off. He handles a bowie-knife like a Corsican. A heavy revolver is simply a gleaming toy in his hands, and he swings a rifle around as if it were a ribbon. How the boys' eyes gleam and shine from the gallery; how their young hearts swell and long for Injuns and highwaymen, and the punishment of villains; how, in fact, they all yearn to be Buffalo Bills. And what a wonderfully bad actor he is, to be sure. You should see him play the English swell. It is not half so funny as a Cockney trying to play "Asa Trenchard," perhaps, but it is quite as far out of the way. However, the character was introduced, as I take it, by Colonel Prentiss Ingraham, who, I must premise, dear Madge, is the author of this wonderful play, to give the hero a chance for his usual speech, for it is his custom to close each scene with the formidable but superfluous announcement that he is Buffalo Bill. If he can first yank off a disguising wig or hat, the effect is all the more electric. The simple statement that he was Buffalo Bill brought the house down no less than four times in one evening. The boys cheered to the echo. They whistled, and screamed, and shouted with mad delight. It was so awfully funny that all the Indians and stage-drivers, and dandies, and all the queer and impossible parties who congregate on stage prairies should not have suspected it, when we, the deep, the far-seeing audience, penetrated the scrutable mystery at a glance every time. Ah, Madge, you should see the California Company now. Every created thing has its uses, and if

"great Cæsar's clay Shall stop a hole to keep the wind away," less valuable pottery may easily be utilized. You should see Miss Lottie Cobb in her great stagecoach scene. It has the pathos of the Two Orphans and the tragedy of Lucretia Borgia. Miss De Forrest is announced in the bills as "Wild Nellie, a frontier heroine and a dangerous woman." I am bound to say that, in a boy's suit of blue the De Forrest looked really well, and quite as dangerous as the text called for. In fact, everyone had such an exceedingly warlike appearance that it was quite terrifying. In glancing over the bill I find that the author has made them all out to be either villains or knaves, excepting Buffalo Bill and his sweetheart. And the troubles and difficulties which accumulate around them, in consequence, apparently, of their virtue and high moral character, are something bewildering in number as they are extraordinary in variety. We had looked on many a play and player on the boards of the California Theatre—on McCullough in Virginia and Coriolanus, on Booth in Hamlet and Richard II., on Barrett in Rosendale and the Man of Airlie, on Adelaide Neilson in Fuliet and Imogene, on Janaschek in Medea or Lady Deadlock, on Modjeska in Adrienne and Camille, on Mrs. Waller in the Duchesse of Malfi, on Mrs. Bowers in Elizabeth or Myra, on the Lingards in the Two Orphans, on Dion Boucicault in Kerry and The Shaughraun, on Montague in Diplomacy and The Romance of a Poor Young Man, on Lydia Thompson in Sinbad and Ixion, on John Owens, and Raymond, and Southern, and Florence, and many, many more, but we all came to the conclusion that we had never met with such a wealth of incident in any one of these plays as in The Knight of the Plains, nor any actor who so thoroughly played con amore as Buffalo Bill.

It is with considerable effort that one pulls one's shattered feelings together after such an experience and goes to the Bush Street Theatre to see a mild little fairy story like Urlina, the African Princess. I did not find that Urlina was any nicer for being an African than if she had been a British blonde. To say truth, people have been blacking themselves up so these years past that it very rarely occurs to the observer that the Hyers combination is composed of the genuine article, and yet it looked odd enough to see these two girls' dark race-stained faces rising out of the spangles and colors of the accepted burlesque costume, but with no rouge on their cheeks, no black on their eyes, no blonde on their heads. They are an earnest pair, but really dead earnest is not exactly the spirit in which to approach burlesque, and one wearies of waiting vainly for something to laugh at. They sing fairly, but one does not dance at all, and the other only a step or two, and neither step particularly involved. The little soprano is the most serious young person I ever saw on the stage. I should think that the soprano and tenor occupied their leisure hours with the "anatomy of melancholy," for the tenor played the king's jester and almost moved us all to tears by the deep depression of his spirits. Lyle and Kersands lifted the audience temporarily out of the slough of mournfulness into which it had been permitted to fall, but even Kersands outwitted himself by undertaking more than he could do. He is the only negro I ever saw who could play the comic negro, but he wrecks himself on the Protean reef as others have done before him.

In point of fact Urlina is not interesting in itself nor is it beautifully interpreted. Burlesque is something essentially foreign to the negro character as it is to the negro art. It is, in fact, exclusively proper to the Englishman. The spirit of it eludes the American actress, as the spirit of French opera bouffe eludes her. An English actress, and sometimes an actress of English training, can play a burlesque with positive refinement. The American seems to seize only its grosser elements. As an offset the American woman can interpret Sardou and Feuillet and d'Ennery & Co. as no Englishwoman can. She is emotional, vivid, which the Englishwoman is not. She scornfully rejects the trammels of art when it will not serve her purpose, which the Englishwoman will never do, if she have any art. The Englishwomen are finer comedienness than the Americans, because comedy is most artificial. As for tragedienness we have none in either of the English-speaking countries to compare with the great foreigners, Ristori, Janaschek, and Bernhardt. England has a Neilson and America a Mary Anderson; but Neilson's tragedy is baby tragedy, and Mary Anderson is a diamond in its charcoal state. Had she been born and bred in England, she would be a greater actress than she is to-day, for they do not accept genius run riot across the pond as we do. She would still be in training. Think of Clara Morris, if she had the soft liquid cultivated English accent with all her genius and emotion. But such a combination could never be. Like the stone in the hands of the lapidary, what she gained in one way she would be sure to lose in another. Think what Mary Anderson would be with that old Englishman to coach her, who has all the traditions of the last hundred years at his finger-ends. Yet we are doing pretty well in America. They grow in New York that their theatres are flooded with the overspill of the English stage; but Rose Coghlan and Ada Cavendish are the only English ladies of any note in America to-day. Fanny Davenport, Sara Jewett, Clara Morris, Rose Eytinge, Rose Wood, Maud Granger, Rose Osborne, and a dozen others of lesser fame are all Americans. But, Madge, where have I drifted to, and what has all this got to do with the Hyers sisters? I think they must have gone over into English ground, and that I followed them. At all events their burlesque is very bad, and very badly played. The characteristics of any race are interesting, and Out of Bondage was infinitely preferable to Urlina.

On dit that the peppery Rose Eytinge has had another little unpleasantness. Why does not some one write an Amazonian drama for her, and let her fight it out? If all superfluous temper could be worked off in this wise managers and leading men might have comparatively smooth sailing during an Eytinge season. What a pity that she will give herself such a reputation when she plays "Armande Chandoco" beautifully enough to melt a heart of stone, and closes her engagement with flying colors after all.

We are to have the opera at Baldwin's—the only place for pretty toilets, and where one can so easily hear and see everything. I fancy it will be a gayer season than we have had, coming, as it does, just upon the close of Lent, when pious people will be so glad to burst through the religious restrictions of six long weeks. They will put an extra penny or two on their Easter bonnets, to make them serve both purposes. What a crush there will be to see Marie Roze, who is beautiful, but fat. But then who ever saw a lean prima donna that amounted to anything. How oddly impressarios settle up their differences. Not many weeks ago it was war to the knife between Strakosch and Mapleson, and to-day Mapleson flies eastward on the wings of the wind, while his bird-throated wife comes West under convoy of Max Strakosch. Marie Roze sings first in La Favorita, although the season opens with Lucia di Lammermoor. We are to have Carmen, too, but without Minnie Hauk. Litta, however, is said to be very nice. That's a safe, easy term to use in speaking about anything, from a prima donna up, or down, as the case may be. There is any number of signors advertised, one of them called Pantaleoni. Queer name, isn't it? I see Conly returns with the troupe, but he and Annie Louise Cary will be the only familiar faces. They are, in fact, almost the only members of the old troupe that people care to see again. Yours as ever, BETSY B.

A keen man of business sends his son—a chip of the old block—on a trip round Europe, charging him to note his impressions of the different cities he visits.

From Madrid the young man writes:

"The river, the Manzanarès, is always dry. No money in the milk biz."

NASBY ON THE CHINESE QUESTION.

[From the Toledo Blade.]

Petroleum V. Nasby writes from Confedrit X Roads to the Toledo Blade: A delegate uv the Anti-Chinese Assosiasun uv San Francisco hez been with uz, and hez departid. He organized us into an Anti-Chinese Assosiasun, wich we did all the more redily ez the arguments he urged agin permittin the Chinese to settle among uz wuz so exceedingly similar to them we alluz urged agin lettin the nigger hev any rites. The Corners hailed em ez its natural meat and drink, and we accepted em to-wunst, without question. The representative uv the Anti-Chinese Society uv San Francisco wuz a Amerikin citizen named O'Shaughnessy. He wuz a flood talker, and a statesman uv the first water. We called a meetin to receive him and hear his vews, wich wuz wat he wanted. Mr. O'Shaughnessy commenst by sayin that he kum to us ez an Amerikin citizen and an advocate uv the Amerikin idee. When he left Ireland a year ago, and landid in Noo York he to-wunst assumed the highest dooty uv an Amerikin by votin the day after he landid, for wich he wuz rewardid by bein put on the police force uv that city. He hed a repetashen ez a speech maker, and an assosiasun of Amerikins in San Francisco, hedid by that troo Amerikin, Dinnis Karney, sent for him, to assist them in resistin the encroachments uv the heathen Chinese, wich wuz overwhelmin the servant girls uv the Pacific coast, by doin washin cheaper and better than they did it. He to-wunst obeyed the call. It wuz his dooty. And beside the pay for speeking wuz better than servin ez a policeman, and the work wuz much easier. Mr. O'Shaughnessy wuz opposed to the Chinese for several reasons—

1. They wuz heathen, and bleeved in a god wich he didn't. So terrible wuz Mr. O'Shaughnessy's emoshun when dwellin on the heathen aspek uv the question that he made the sign uv the cross more than twenty times. He wood never consent that heathen shoold rool Ameriky. Ameriky belonged to the pope uv Rome, and not to Joss, wich he wuz informed wuz the title uv the Chinese god.
2. They never votid. Wat kind uv a citizen is it that comes to this kentry, and never organizes clubs, and assoms the rool thereof? Ther had never bin a instance uv a Chioaman askin for a place ez skool commishner, or to be put onto the police force. No Chinaman had ever bin a alderman, nor hed ever asked for it.
3. They wuz a sly, underminin people. They took work wherever they cood git it, and went about doin it with a regularity and pashense that wuz disgustin. They never hed the manlinis to strike for higher wages, and never sed a word about eight-hour laws. He hed know em to his brief experience, to work twelve and fifteen hours and never say a word.
4. They knowd nothin about the dignity uv labor. He never saw one uv em in a bar-room, complain uv bloated aristocrats, and never see em at his meetins where he wuz denouncin the encroachments uv capital agin labor. They hev no sensibilities.
5. They wuz of no yoose to the bar-rooms uv San Francisco. The money they earn they spend in cloze and things uv that nacher, or board it. There is 65,000 of em in San Francisco alone, and they take the place uv 65,000 Amerikins from Ballyough, wich wood spend at least fifty cents a day each for the native Amerikin beverage, whisky, addin that much to the revenoos uv the colighted noo bar-keepers wich sent him East.
6. Ez they don't vote, and never take no part in Ward politix, our liberties is endangered by hevvin em here. Sich a mass uv heathenism is a blotch onto Amerikin civilizashen, and can't be endoored.

We immedjitly adopted a series uv resoloosheens, indorsin Mr. O'Shaughnessy and his mishin, and took him over to Bascom's, where he imbibed the raw likker uv the seckshun till he sunk back into the virchus sleep that a great Amerikin organizer only knows. He left the next mornin feelin that he had done a proper work in preventin the Heathen Chinees from obtainin a foothold onto this continent. I ant eggsackly shoort, tho, that we did a good thing in this matter. I see great possibilities in these Chinese. Suppose that we, the Dimocrisy, shoold champion their cause, and get 'em into our harnis! Suppose that we cood yoose 'em to take part in politix, and cood git 'em all to be Dimocrats! Suppose that that we cood yoose 'em ez we hev the Irish, and cood make 'em do our biddin' ez faithfully! Suppose that we shoood give 'em the minor offises ez we alluz hev the Irish, and make 'em the backbone uv our organization! Suppose that we add to the O'Briens the Ah Sins, and build up a party on that basis! I see a lite! I see all over the kentry a Chinese party, with Joss at the hed uv it, insted uv the Pope, with unlimited chances of expanshun. I see the little brown man going to the poles, and holdin small places and controlling ward organizations, and bein considered. Every low element in the country gravitates naterally to the Dimocratic party, and why not the Chioese?

The Chinaman don't deserve no considerashun, for he is an idiot. Ef he had only knowd how much we wantid him he wood not be in the shape he is to-day. Ef he hed, in the beginnin, refoosed to work, and got nateralised, and organized hisself into ward committees, and made hisself felt into politix, Mr. Blane would not hev bin opposin him. Mr. Blane wood hev bin biddin for his vote, and wood hev had him in custom bousis and on the police force, and wood hev insistid onto his bein policeman and school commishner, and wood hev made ez much uv him ez the average Irishman. But the poor cuss paid no attention to governin the kentry, but simply went to work and attendid to it mightly close, and consequently aint uv much account. It aint too late, however. The Chinaman kin hev a chance yet. We, the Dimocrisy, want him, ef he will be reasonable.

On the whole, I don't agree with Mr. Blane. I am uv the opinyun that the Chinese shoold be allowed to come and stay—that is, ef they kin be indoosed to take a part in politix and act with us. Ef Wan Lee shoold organize the Chinese in Califory in the interest uv the Dimocrisy, and shoood vote the Dimocratic ticket, we cood organize ez big a steel ez Tweed did in New York with the Irish, and I cood wunst more know wat wine tastid like, instid uv of the raw whiskey I am compelled to drink here. On them condishuns I am willin they shel come and stay. But ef they continyoo ez they hev done, to grovel and work and take no part with us, then I shel jine Mr. Blane and insist that they shel be compelled to leave. The spectacle uv a furnier which don't control no ward eleckshuns is disgustin to the Dimocratic mind. Ef they do as the Irish do, all right—ef not, they must go. I won't consent to no competishun with the backbone uv the Dimocracy. PETROLEUM V. NASBY.

For or against the Chinese, ez the case may be.

A sign before a Boston grocery reads as follows: "Wooden pails, 6 cents each. Notice—We did not steal these pails, but we think the man we bought them from did."

Now that the picnic season is commencing we commend all the various societies to consider where they will go for a day's pleasure. Not, we should hope, to the sandy parks of Oakland. A summer day beneath their dusty oaks is not our idea of a picnic in God's groves, nor are they in our judgment fit places except for drinking lager. The North Pacific Coast Railroad offers an excursion to what we regard as the most picturesque and romantic part of the State. The county of Marin is a rural paradise, and there are in it all along this railroad a thousand beautiful places for family and society excursions—sea and bay views, mountain glens and running streams, groves and grassy hillsides, mountain peaks and charming valleys. The man who takes his family to a larger beer garden, and calls it a day in the country, is practicing a miserable cheat. The lover who plays it on his girl ought to lose her.

There is as much style in a photograph as in a dress or a suit of clothes, and as much dependent upon the artist of the camera as upon the artistic dressmaker or the stylish draper. Styles of pictures also, like those of dress, change, and in seeking for the new-fashioned counterpart of yourselves it is always the best policy to go to a photographer who keeps close up to his business and who is even a step beyond the progress of his art. Such an artist and photographer we recognize in Mr. T. H. Boyd, whose Yosemite Art Gallery, 26 Montgomery Street, has a world-wide reputation, and where those desirous of a pretty, stylish, and durable picture will be sure to be satisfactorily accommodated.

An elegant assortment of gold watches and chains at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

Dr. E. O. Cochrane, Dentist, No. 850 Market Street, corner of Stockton (over drug store), San Francisco. Office hours, from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M.

CONSUMPTION CURED.—An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for consumption, bronchitis, catarrh, asthma, and all throat and lung affections, also a positive and radical cure for nervous debility and all nervous complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it this recipe, with full directions for preparing and using, in German, French, or English. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. SHERAR, 149 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

STERLING SILVERWARE.—A large assortment of elegant designs at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

"AMONG THE MORMONS."

THE SPICIEST BOOK OF THE Season. Marrying seven wives in two months. By RING JEPSON. 30 cents, post paid.
S. F. NEWS COMPANY.

A CARD.

THE FIRM OF DALY & HAWKINS
having been compelled to suspend payment, have made an assignment of all their property, real and personal, for the benefit of all their creditors. This was, in the judgment of the firm, the only honest and manly way to extricate themselves from what they hope will prove but a temporary embarrassment. This card is to assure my creditors and friends that our property is ample to liquidate all demands against us, and to pay in full every dollar we owe. An honorable business career of seventeen years justifies me in demanding the confidence of both friends and creditors in this statement, and asking their indulgence while we are faithfully endeavoring to arrange our business affairs.
MICHAEL HAWKINS,
Of the firm Daly & Hawkins.

TABER, HARKER & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE
GROCERS, 108 and 110 California St., San Francisco.

STORAGE.

Furniture, Pianos, Pictures, Trunks, Carpets, etc., carefully stored in large, airy-locks.

Families leaving the City,

Or declining Housekeeping, are requested to call. Facilities the best possible. Terms moderate. Advances made. J. H. MOTT & CO., 647 Market Street (Nucleus Block).

BERLIN COLOGNE FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 21, 1879.—I have this day appointed Messrs. Hutchinson & Mann, 322 and 324 California Street and 302 Sansome Street, General Agents of the above named Company.

F. HENNINGS, Special Attorney for Berlin Cologne Fire Ins. Co. of Berlin.

We invite attention to the above notice of our appointment as General Agents of the Berlin Cologne Fire Insurance Company of Berlin, Germany, and solicit a continuance of the liberal patronage heretofore extended to this popular Company.

HUTCHINSON & MANN,

322 and 324 California Street, and 302 Sansome Street.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—OFFICE OF
the Standard Consolidated Mining Company, San Francisco, Cal., April 2, 1879.—At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, Dividend No. 2, of fifty cents (50c) per share, was declared, payable on Saturday, April 12th, 1879, at the office in this city, or at the Agency of the Nevada Bank of San Francisco, in New York.

WM. WILLIS, Secretary

Office, Room 29 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, third floor, San Francisco, Cal.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

GRAND ITALIAN OPERA.

MR. MAX STRAKOSCH has the honor to announce that a short season of Italian Opera will open under his management

ON MONDAY EVENING.....APRIL 14TH.

The Operas to be produced will include II Trovatore, Aida, Rigoletto, Martha, Mignon, Lucia, Sonnambula, Faust, Don Giovanni, Favorita, Ballo in Maschera, Huguenots, and George Bizet's new Opera,

CARMEN,

Which has met with great and brilliant success in London and all Eastern cities.

The season will open with Donizetti's Opera, in three acts,
LUCIA DI LAMMERMOOR.

NOTICE.—A subscription list for the season of TWENTY-FOUR NIGHTS will be opened on Monday morning, April 7th, at 9 o'clock, at Sherman & Hyde's Music Store, corner Kearny and Sutter Streets.

Full particulars in future advertisements.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER,
F. LISTER.....ACTING MANAGER,
CHAS. H. GOODWIN.....TREASURER.

BRILLIANT SUCCESS OF "A SCRAP OF PAPER."

This (Saturday) afternoon and evening, April 5, and every evening until further notice, will be acted the last great success in London, now running at Wallack's Theatre, New York, to crowded houses, a

SCRAP OF PAPER.

Friday, April 11, first appearance of the

HON. THOMAS FITCH,

As Cardinal Richelieu.

Sunday, April 13, Benefit of Mr. C. B. BISHOP.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLOR.....MANAGERS,
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

WILL BE CLOSED

During the week commencing April 7th, 1879, for redecoration, renovation, and general improvements.

Grand Reopening Easter Monday, April 14, with the eminent author and actor, Mr.

DION BOUCICAULT,

As CONN, in his great Irish play, the

SHAUGHRAUN,

Produced with new romantic scenery by Voegtlin, novel mechanical effects by Stackhouse and Assistants, realistic properties by Greenlock and Assistants, and a brilliant cast of characters. The improvements to the theatre will be as follows: Frescoing by Morretti and Trezzini; drapery and upholstery by F. S. Chadbourne & Co.; painting and gilding by J. S. Swan; joiner work by Rorer and Aldrich; lobby pavement by the Diamond Cement Faving Co.; and new drop curtain by Wm Voegtlin.

Seats may be secured at the box office on and after April 7.

BUSH STREET THEATRE.

CHARLES E. LOCKE.....PROPRIETOR.

Commencing Monday evening, April 7, 1879, last week of

THE HYERS SISTERS

Combination, who will appear in their successful and beautiful Oriental Extravaganza,

URLINA,

THE AFRICAN PRINCESS, presented with Beautiful Scenery, Entirely New Music, Startling Situations, and Gorgeous Costumes.

MATINEES WEDNESDAY AND SATURDAY.

STANDARD THEATRE.

Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.

M. B. LEAVITT.....MANAGER.

MATINEE TO-DAY AT 2 P. M.

This (Saturday) evening, April 5th, another new programme. First time of the great sensational sketch,

WILD DUCKS.

First appearance of REYNOLDS AND COGILL.
The racy sketch,

THE FEMALE BATHERS.

Reconstructed version of the CAN-CAN, introducing the Blondes' Trial in Court.

Monday, April 7th, LAST WEEK OF

MME. RENTZ MINSTRELS

—AND—

MABEL SANTLEY'S BEAUTIES.

MATINEES WEDNESDAYS AND SATURDAYS.

WILLIAM M. PIERSON,
ATTORNEY AT LAW, 616 SACRAMENTO STREET.

WM. F. SMITH, M. D.,
OCULIST, 313 BUSH STREET.
Office hours, from 12 M. to 3 P. M.

THE ARTISTS'

FIRST ANNUAL BALL

WILL BE GIVEN AT THEIR ROOMS,

NO. 430 PINE STREET,

ON THE EVENING OF

Tuesday, April 29, 1879.

UNDER THE MANAGEMENT OF the following Ladies and Gentlemen of the San Francisco Art Association:

Hon. Wm. Alvord, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Babcock, Mr. and Mrs. H. D. Bacon, Mr. and Mrs. L. L. Baker, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Beard, Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Bancroft, Colonel and Mrs. W. H. L. Barnes, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Barroillet, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Beaver, Mr. D. P. Belknap, Mr. John Benson, Mr. and Mrs. David Bixler, Mr. R. J. Bush, Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Bland- ing, Mr. James T. Boyd, Mr. and Mrs. H. J. Booth, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel M. Brooks, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Bradford, Mr. and Mrs. Thos. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Cahill, Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Coleman, Mr. and Mrs. W. T. Coleman, Mr. W. J. Collins, Mr. and Mrs. B. H. Coit, Mr. Seth Cook, Mr. Daniel Cook, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Crocker, Hon. Eugene Casserly, Mr. and Mrs. Fred. L. Castle, Mr. and Mrs. M. Castle, Mr. and Mrs. James Coffin, Mr. and Mrs. P. B. Cornwall, Mr. and Mrs. Jennings S. Cox, Mr. and Mrs. Isaac E. Davis, Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Dean, Mr. G. J. Denny, Mr. and Mrs. S. P. Dewey, Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Dodge, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Dodge, Mr. and Mrs. J. O. Eldridge, Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Eldridge, Mr. and Mrs. John A. Fall, Mr. and Mrs. James Flood, Capt. and Mrs. R. S. Floyd, Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Forbes, Mr. and Mrs. Jas. Freeborn, Col. and Mrs. J. D. Fry, Mr. G. G. Gariboldi, Mr. and Mrs. Louis A. Gar- nett, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Gibbs, Mr. and Mrs. O. F. Giffin, Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Glazier, Mr. and Mrs. Adam Grant, Mr. and Mrs. Robert N. Graves, Mr. and Mrs. A. S. Hallidie, Judge and Mrs. John S. Hager, Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Haggin, Mr. and Mrs. Edward F. Hall, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. John R. Ham- ilton, Mr. A. K. P. Harmon, Mrs. and Mrs. A. E. Head, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Hearst, Hon. S. Heylenfeldt, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. C. Hickox, Mr. Horace L. Hill, Mr. and Mrs. Thos. Hill, Mr. R. Hochkoffler, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. F. Hooper, Mr. Jabez Howes, Col. and Mrs. J. P. Jackson,	Mr. Henry Janin, Mr. and Mrs. J. R. Jarboe, Mr. and Mrs. H. J. Johnston, Mr. and Mrs. N. G. Kittle, Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Seelye, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Keith, Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Kunath, Hon. and Mrs. F. F. Low, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. A. Low, Mr. Thomas P. Madden, Mr. Charles Mayne, Mr. and Mrs. D. O. Mills, Mr. and Mrs. Louis McLane, Mr. and Mrs. Pietro Mezzara, Mr. and Mrs. F. P. McLen- nan, Gen. & Mrs. John F. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Norris, Mr. and Mrs. Edw. Norton, Mr. and Mrs. Frank J. New- lands, Mr. and Mrs. E. Narjot, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Pres- cott, Gov. Samuel Purdy, Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Requa, Mr. and Mrs. C. D. Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Antone Roman, Mr. J. W. Rix, Mr. Robert C. Rogers, Mr. L. S. B. Sawyer, Mr. and Mrs. Henry T. Scott, Mr. and Mrs. Irving M. Scott, Hon. Wm. Sharon, Hon. W. J. Shaw, Mr. and Mrs. John Skae, Mr. and Mrs. S. W. Shaw, Hon. and Mrs. Leland Stan- ford, Mr. J. H. Stearns, Mr. and Mrs. Prentiss Selby, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Sillem, Col. and Mrs. W. R. Smed- berg, Mr. and Mrs. S. M. Smith, Mr. S. V. Smith, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. John D. Spreeckles, Mr. and Mrs. Edward L. G. Steele, Mrs. and Mrs. M. Straus, Col. and Mrs. J. Stuart, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. C. Talbot, Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Tevis, Dr. and Mrs. H. H. Toland, Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Tubbs, Mr. and Mrs. D. J. Tallant, Mr. and Mrs. Jos. Tilden, Mr. and Mrs. Stuart Taylor, Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Tippet, Mr. and Mrs. Jules Taver- nier, Mr. and Mrs. V. Tojetti, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Wallace, Mr. Raphael Weill, Mr. J. C. Wilmerding, Judge and Mrs. E. D. Wheeler, Mr. and Mrs. H. B. Will- iams, Mr. and Mrs. Russell J. Wil- son, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel M. Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Wandes- forde, Mr. and Mrs. Virgil Williams, Mr. and Mrs. R. B. Wood- ward, Mr. and Mrs. R. D. Velland.
----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------	------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------

Executive Committee.

Jennings S. Cox,
Wm. Alvord,
Daniel Cook,

Wm. Babcock,
Tiborcio Parrott,
Silas Selleck.

Treasurer.

Henry Barroillet.

Committee on Decoration.

G. G. Gariboldi,
Jules Tavernier,

M. Straus,
Wm. Voegtlin,

Virgil Williams.

Committee on Music, Printing, and Floor.

Chas. F. Crocker,
E. F. Selleck,
H. A. Plate,
Walter Turnbull,

Russell J. Wilson,
Lieut. G. G. Greenough,
Wm. P. Dewey,
Raoul Martinez,

Col. W. R. Smedberg.

Committee on Reception.

Wm. Bradford,
R. J. Bush,
G. G. Gariboldi,
H. J. Johnston,
Oscar Kunath,
E. Narjot,
E. W. Perry,
J. W. Rix,
Samuel M. Brookes,
G. J. Denny,
W. F. Jackson,

Thos. Hill,
Wm. Keith,
Pietro Mezzara,
Arthur Nahl,
S. W. Shaw,
Jules Tavernier,
Wm. Voegtlin,
Virgil Williams,
J. J. Woodman,
Fred'k Yates,

Chas. A. Hamilton.

Committee on Refreshments.

J. D. Rix,
G. J. Denny,

Joseph Tilden,
D. L. Beck, Jr.

By Order.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

NEW BOOKS

The Final Philosophy. Chas. W. Shields, D.D., LL.D. $3.00
Lanot's Elementary Treatise on Physics. 5 00
English Actors from Shakespeare to Macready. 2 vols. 3 50
Baker..... 5 00
Baroness Bunsen's Life and Letters. 2 vols. Aug. J. C. Hare..... 5 00
The Secret of the Andes. F. Hassaurek..... 1 50
Joan, the Maid..... 1 50
Bismarck in the Franco-German War. 2 vols. De Moritz Busch..... 4 00 Mail Carrier. (Boy Trapper Series.) Harry Castle-man..... 1 25
Dress. (Art at Home Series.) Mrs. Oliphant..... 1 25
Greek Hero Stories. E. G. Niebuhr..... 1 00
Aids to Family Government. Bertha Meyer..... 1 00
Libraries supplied at Special Rates. Send for Catalogue.

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO.,

BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,

NOS. 3 AND 5 MONTGOMERY STREET.

OFFICIAL.

ROOMS OF THE REPUBLICAN STATE CENTRAL COMMITTEE,
San Francisco, March 6, 1879.

The next Republican State Convention for the nomination of a full State Ticket, and for such other business as may properly come before it, will be held in the City of Sacramento, on TUESDAY, June 17th, 1879, in the Assembly Chamber of the State Capitol, at 3 o'clock P. M. The apportionment of the delegates is as follows:

Alameda.....19	Plumas.....4
Alpine.....1	Sacramento.....21
Amador.....7	San Benito.....3
Butte.....10	San Bernardino.....4
Calaveras.....6	San Diego.....6
Colusa.....4	San Francisco.....75
Contra Costa.....8	San Joaquin.....15
Del Norte.....1	San Luis Obispo.....5
El Dorado.....9	San Mateo.....6
Fresno.....2	Santa Barbara.....6
Humboldt.....8	Santa Clara.....15
Inyo.....3	Santa Cruz.....8
Kern.....3	Shasta.....4
Lake.....2	Sierra.....6
Lassen.....2	Siskiyou.....4
Los Angeles.....15	Solano.....13
Marin.....4	Sonoma.....10
Mariposa.....3	Stanislaus.....8
Mendocino.....4	Sutter.....4
Merced.....4	Tehama.....4
Modoc.....2	Trinity.....3
Mono.....1	Tulare.....5
Monterey.....8	Tuolumne.....5
Napa.....6	Ventura.....4
Nevada.....14	Yolo.....7
Placer.....11	Yuba.....8

Making the Convention to consist of 406 members.

County Committees are requested to make provision in their respective counties for the election of delegates in accordance with such apportionment, holding primary elections for the choice of such delegates; and the State Central Committee recommends that the delegates chosen to the State Convention be empowered to act as delegates to the Congressional Conventions of their respective districts.

The State Central Committee recommends the following text:

"At the election to be held in September next, I will vote the Republican ticket."

By order of the Committee.

ALEX. G. ABELL, Chairman.

M. D. BORUCK, Secretary.

SAN FRANCISCO AND NORTH PACIFIC R. R.

Commencing on Sunday, April 6th, 1879, and until further notice, Boats and Trains will leave San Francisco: (Ticket Office, Washington Street Wharf.)

3.00 P. M., DAILY, Sundays excepted.
Steamer "James M. Donahue" (Washington Street Wharf), connecting with Mail and Express Train at Donahue for Petaluma, Santa Rosa, Healdsburg, Cloverdale, and way stations. Making stage connection at Lakeville for Sonoma; at Geyserville for Skaggs Springs, at Cloverdale for Ukiah, Lakeport, Mendocino City, Highland Springs, Bartlett Springs, Soda Bay, and the Geysers. 2 P. Connections made at Fulton on the following morning for Korb's, Guerneville, and the Redwoods. [Arrive at San Francisco 10.30 A. M.]

SUNDAY EXCURSIONS AT REDUCED RATES.
8.00 A. M., SUNDAYS ONLY, VIA
Donahue, for Cloverdale and way stations.
Fares for round trip: Donahue, $1.00; Petaluma, $1.50; Santa Rosa, $2.00; Healdsburg, $3.00; Cloverdale, $4.50. 2 P. Connections made at Fulton for Laguna, Forestville, Korb's, Guerneville, the Russian River and Big Trees. Fares for round trip: Fulton and Laguna, $2.50; Forestville, Korb's, and Guerneville, $3.75. [Arrive at San Francisco 6.55 P. M.]

Freight received from 7 A. M. to 2.30 P. M. daily (except Sunday).

TICKET OFFICE, WASHINGTON STREET

Agents at Healdsburg, Sonoma, Manager, JAS. M. DONAHUE, Gen. Pas.

THE GREAT UNLOADED.

He called himself the Reverend James Johnstone, M.A. There are some grounds for believing that his Christian name was James; on the other hand, there are the strongest grounds for doubting whether his surname was Johnstone. It matters not; he lives in my memory as "The Great Unloaded."

My eldest brother, Tom, has a property in Scotland called Bogmore, not of great extent, but with very good mixed shooting. Personally, he never cared much for shooting, and when he took actively to politics a few years ago, he practically handed over the charge of the game to his younger brothers. I usually appeared at Bogmore in the end of July or beginning of August, and remained until the middle of October. But in 187— I spent the whole of August on the Continent, and the first fortnight in September with a friend in England, and so did not reach Bogmore Castle until the 17th or 18th of September.

I arrived in time for a late dinner. On entering the drawing-room I found that its sole occupant was standing at one of the windows. The evening was dark, and I could only see that he was tall and bulky. He turned toward me, and I bowed, and said something about just arriving in time for dinner.

"Mr. Francis Douglas, I feel sure by the voice," said the unknown. "How like your good brother's it is!" and he wrung me warmly by the hand.

Further conversation was prevented by the arrival of the rest of the party, and in a few minutes we were in the dining-room. "Mr. Johnstone," said my brother, and the unknown waved a hand over his glasses, muttered some words inaudibly, and we all sat down.

It was plain from the outset that dinner was a serious thing with Mr. Johnstone. He adjusted his napkin as a man who has a long cold drive before him adjusts his rug, and at once possessing himself of the nearest menu, read it diligently from beginning to end. After a minute's anxious reflection he raised his head, and then for the first time I had an opportunity of examining his face. It was massive and well shaped, and of a uniform red, with the exception of the brow. The eyebrows were shaggy, and the eyes, so far as visible (for he wore enormous spectacles), were large and brown. He was clean shaven; the lower part of the face was broad and somewhat sensual, but when he smiled his expression was very winning. He appeared to be between forty and fifty years of age. He conversed little during dinner, but ate incessantly, but with great discrimination.

Dinner over, on the motion of Mr. Johnstone, instead of joining the ladies we adjourned to the billiard-room, where I was formally introduced to him. In the course of conversation I mentioned that I had been at Trinity College, Cambridge.

"Why, you're a Cambridge man, Johnstone, are you not?" said Tom.

"Ah! those Trinity swells know nothing of poor little Corpus, I suppose."

I was forced to admit that I did not know a single man in Corpus, whereupon he began to enlarge upon his university exploits. By his own account he must have been in the university eleven, and one of the best racket and tennis players of his day. He spoke by name of several dons, whom I knew, and asked if they still kept up their tennis. That he could play billiards I was left in no doubt, as, during our conversation, he gave me thirty in one hundred, and beat me easily.

"Do you shoot, Mr. Johnstone?" I inquired, to exhaust the list of his accomplishments.

"Ah! there," he said, laying down his cue, "you boys have the pull of the old man. I love it, but I can't do it. Never can get my gun off in time; and if I could, there's usually nothing in it. I'm a heavy man, and slow at my fences; I draw my cartridges and forget to replace them. But, Douglas, I must be off, or Linton and John will be dragging the Tay for me." And with these words he took his leave.

"And now, Tom," I said, "who is your friend?"

Tom thereupon made a somewhat disjointed statement to the following effect: He first met Mr. Johnstone in the beginning of August at a table d'hôte luncheon in the hotel of S—, a neighboring village which is rapidly being converted into a fashionable summer resort. Mr. Johnstone, in the course of conversation, explained that he was in holy orders, with a living in the south of England (the name of which was never revealed), and that, following high academic example, he had come into the wilds for the purpose of coaching or grinding one young gentleman (who sat next him) for his matriculation at Cambridge in the following October. He told Tom that this young fellow's name was George Linton, and that he had a considerable fortune, and was extremely well connected, so highly and irregularly, indeed, that he (Mr. Johnstone) dared not whisper the quarter. Mr. Johnstone further stated that he was in search of suitable lodgings, but could find none in the overcrowded village. Now it so happened that at this time there was standing empty a cottage belonging to Tom called "The Nest." It had until recently been always occupied by a watcher; but its last occupant having watched the game more on his own account than that of his master, was in respect thereof dismissed, and Tom, who was very dilatory, had not filled up his place. Before the end of luncheon "The Nest" was let for an indefinite number of weeks to Mr. Johnstone and his "beloved charge," as he was pleased to call him. How the watcher's place was filled the sequel will show.

On cross-examination Tom admitted that he had seen a good deal of his tenants since the beginning of their lease; that he had given young Linton (who did not care for shooting) unlimited permission to fish for both salmon and trout; and that, in addition to frequently asking Johnstone to shoot, he had given him leave to roam at large, with or without his gun (his "toy," he called it—it was as large as a howitzer), over the moor adjoining "The Nest." At this statement I, as head-keeper in vacation, gave a whistle of dismay.

"You need not be alarmed," said Tom; "he can't hit a haystack. As he said himself when he asked leave, 'My toy is company to me, and can't hurt a living thing.' Poor old Johnstone! you would have laughed if you had seen him to-day, with his gun at half-cock and unloaded, hanging a bird till it went leisurely out of sight. But you can judge for yourself to-morrow; I asked him to come and go out with you."

And come he did, and again and yet again; and proved himself to be first-rate company, but the worst of shots. He perpetually drew his cartridges, and forgot to replace them. It was this ridiculous habit which earned for him the title of "The Great Unloaded."

To Tom he had become indispensable. He was a good talker, and, when it suited him, a better listener. He allowed Tom to hold forth to him for hours upon his hobby for the time—politics, agriculture, the relations of capital and labor, or whatever it might be—and just spoke enough to show that he was listening intelligently. These conversations were utter destruction to shooting, as not a bird within earshot would sit; but then neither Tom nor his tenant cared much for shooting.

While the return of October brings in pheasant-shooting, it sends undergraduates (and their coaches) back to their labors; so, to accommodate Mr. Johnstone, Tom good-naturedly agreed to shoot his best coverts in the second week of October. The autumn shooting at Bogmore is of a most enjoyable kind. The bags are not enormous, but there is a chance of getting all kinds of game, including blackgame, woodcock (which breed there), and occasionally roe.

On the 10th of October "The Great Unloaded" arrived punctually, accompanied by his man John (surname unknown), his "toy," and a sack of cartridges, loaded, it may be here mentioned, with sawdust-powder. This same sawdust powder, which was at that time on its probation, Mr. Johnstone preferred to the powder of commerce, because (as he explained) it caused less concussion and less smoke, and also (as he did not explain, but as I now believe) because it made less noise. The beat before lunch was one of the best in the day's work; and special pains were taken to post the best guns in the best places, and, of necessity, the bad shots in the worst. Mr. Johnstone, accordingly, was relegated to a spot of great natural beauty, which was usually unprofaned by a shot. He was not told this, so he went to his post blithely. To punish us for thus grossly deceiving a good man, no sooner were the beaters well off, than it was seen that, contrary to their usual custom, the inhabitants of the wood; both furred and feathered, were, with one accord, flocking to the "Great Unloaded's" corner. It was necessary to reinforce him at once.

"Run, Frank," shouted Tom; "run on to the gate and head them! they are breaking away in scores. Poor old Johnstone is being mobbed."

As I rapidly approached the scene of the reverend gentleman's labors, I heard the incessant report of the sawdust-cartridges; and, on coming within twenty or twenty-five yards of the spot, a remarkable sight met my view. The "Great Unloaded" was transfixed; he was spectated and unloaded no longer; as he would have said himself, "Spectacles was out, cartridges was in!" He stood with his back toward me, at one side of a ride, with his great eyes, unobscured by glasses, raking the covert opposite. The ground around was strewn with game. Just as I arrived a cock-pheasant came rocketing over his head; he took it as it came, dropped it neatly at his feet, and reloaded in an instant. I was about to compliment him on his success, when, to my astonishment, his man John, who had picked up the bird, proceeded to put it into an enormous inside pocket in his coat. His master at once objected to this, but not on the ground I should have expected and hoped. "Not him, John—not him; how often must I remind you; he's as tough as old boots! No, no; give Mr. Douglas his dues. Oh, the florid taste of the uneducated and unrefined! Ha! my young and artless maiden, my white-fleshed darling!"—and, oh, shame! down came a young hen-pheasant—"this is sad; here to-day, in the pot to-morrow. Pouch her, John; she's worth ten of her worthy old sire."

And so he ran on, speaking partly to himself and partly to John, and killing everything that showed itself with rapidity and accuracy. No protracted aim, no empty harrels here. After killing a pheasant and an old blackcock right and left, he exclaimed:

"James! James!" (this is my authority for believing his name to be James) "this is imprudent, but I must let out to-day. Nothing more in your line, thank you. Monsieur le vieux Alphonse may proceed to the bosom of his family."

The last remark was addressed to an old hare which had hobbled on to the ride, and sat up listening. At this point a cry of "woodcock" arose. If Mr. Johnstone was excited before, he was electrified now. He waited with admirable patience while the graceful bird wound its way through the tops of the young trees; but, as it darted across the ride, he dropped it tenderly on the turf. The sawdust seemed scarcely to whisper, as it slew the delicate morsel. John stepped forward to pick it up.

"John! John! leave that bird alone; lay not your sacrilegious hand upon it!"

He then advanced, picked it up, stroked its feathers admiringly, and (oh, wonder!) carefully deposited it in one of his pockets, apostrophizing it thus, as he did so: "You feathered joy, you condensed pleasure of the table, so succulent yet so portable, so young yet so thoughtful, flying from the rash ignorance of youth to the experienced palate of age!"

I stood speechless with astonishment; by degrees my bewilderment yielded to indignation, and that again, as I took in the true meaning of the scene, to a feeling of intense amusement. Neither Johnstone nor John had observed me—they were too much occupied—so I cautiously withdrew and returned to my old post. The beat was soon over, and lunch appeared, and with it Mr. Johnstone, spectated once more, and radiant from exertion and triumph. He had slain the roe; the news did not much surprise me.

"A game-bag for Mr. Johnstone," cried Tom; and Johnstone lowered himself on to it with a restful sigh, taking care, I observed not to sit down on the pockets which contained his spoil.

"Well, how did the 'toy' work to-day, your Reverence? There were not many pauses in its discourse," said Tom.

"I blush," said Mr. Johnstone, "from the novelty of the situation; a few thoughtless birds and beasts have positively come against my gun and hurt themselves."

"Did you see any woodcock?"

"You make me blush again, Douglas, but from another cause; I admit with shame that I not only saw but fired at four."

This was indeed playing with fire; but I think that, notwithstanding his reckless effrontery, I should have spared him, had he not gratuitously attacked me at random upon a sore subject.

"By the way, Master Frank" (how familiar he had become), "were you the inhuman creature who shot off an old cock's tail? He wobbled past me, and he looked so miserable without his rudder, that I put him out of pain!"

Now I had had a snap-shot at a cock-pheasant, and I had shot off his tail; but I hoped to escape exposure, and this was too much for my temper.

"It's a pity you killed him," I said; "he's not worth picking up—he's as tough as old boots."

At the moment I used these suggestive words Mr. Johnstone's mouth was full of something good. He looked reflectively at me, and swallowed his morsel very deliberately before he replied.

"Well, that is the strangest reason for not shooting a bird I ever heard; how far does your prejudice extend, Frank?"

"I draw the line at woodcock."

"At woodcock, you young sybarite! Why, I don't believe you know what trail is."

"As I was saying, Mr. Johnstone, I draw the line at woodcock. They are such feathered joys, so succulent yet so portable—"

Mr. Johnstone here dropped his plate and started to his feet. What had happened? Mr. Johnstone had, he said, been sitting unawares on an ant's nest. He shook himself, flicked himself, and mopped himself all over; and then, shifting his game-bag nearer Tom, plunged into a political discussion which lasted until lunch was over. His were "fast colors," and as he could not blush, so was he incapable of turning white or green. He showed no further signs of agitation or discomfiture.

No sooner had I allowed the unmistakable word "succulent" to escape me than I repented; I had (as I still have) a sneaking liking for "The Great Unloaded," and from that moment I determined to screen him if I could. Nothing worth recording occurred during the afternoon; and as the last beat finished near "The Nest," we bade Mr. Johnstone good night there. A long good night, as I have not seen him since.

I was not much surprised when, next morning, Tom received a note from "The Nest" to the following effect:

MY DEAR DOUGLAS:—By the time this reaches you I shall be in Edinburgh on my way south. That disobliging ass, Vickers, has telegraphed to say that he can not take my duty next Sunday. So "ceci est arma togæ," down with the gun, on with the surplice. My affections remain with you and your birds and bunnies. With many thanks for a most enjoyable summer from my beloved charge and myself, I remain yours faithfully,
JAMES JOHNSTONE.

P. S.—Remember me kindly to Frank.

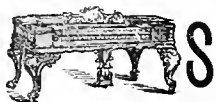

I frequently found myself during and since that day trying to form a dispassionate estimate of this great man's character. I firmly rejected the idea that he had acted from any criminal motive. Indeed it would not have been easy to frame a charge against him. He was neither trespasser nor poacher; he had Tom's express permission to walk over his ground and shoot his game if he could. And as to his appropriation of the game when shot—why, from a legal point of view, the birds were, strictly speaking, his by right of capture, not Tom's. Turning, then, with relief from the at first sight criminal aspect of the case, what remained? I could not disguise from myself that there was a pretty perceptible dash of moral obliquity in the conduct of "The Great Unloaded." He had beyond doubt pretended that he could not shoot, while he could shoot like a Walsingham. What was the motive for this duplicity? At one time I was afraid I should have to answer this question in a way very discredit-able to my reverend friend. In the course of a cautious investigation which I instituted, I ascertained from the station-master at S—that packages labeled "perishable" were frequently dispatched southward by Mr. Johnstone during his tenancy of "The Nest." Mr. Johnstone had been good enough to explain that these mysterious consignments were Scotch delicacies for the consumption of his aged mother. There was no further evidence of their contents; and of this at least I felt sure, that if they did contain game, no "leathered joys" found their way into the London market, or into the mouth of the dowager, Mrs. Johnstone.

And this leads me to the only conclusion for which there seems to be some solid foundation—namely, that even if profit formed a factor in Mr. Johnstone's little game, his leading motive was to provide constant material for the pleasures of the table in which his soul delighted. And was he to be severely condemned for this? Suppose, reader, that you shot a woodcock unobserved; what would you do? Tell about it, no doubt, and to every one you saw. Moved thereto by honesty unadorned? Has not vanity a little to do with it? To test the matter, say, did you ever shoot one, and allow it to be supposed for one moment that any one else shot it? Probably not. It comes, then to this—which is the meaner vice, vanity or greed? But perhaps I am rather a partial advocate; or perhaps, after all, the fault lay in the woodcock being so portable.

In the course of my investigation I made a few inquiries in other quarters concerning "The Great Unloaded's" mode of life during his tenancy of "The Nest;" but little transpired that did not redound to his credit. His rent and his tradesmen's bill were paid in full through a local solicitor. It may be mentioned parenthetically that while his grocer's bill for sauces and condiments was considerable and constant, his butcher's bill was small and intermittent, especially from and after the 12th of August. I tried to draw his late cook, a remarkably shrewd old Scotchwoman; but her deafness when I trenches on delicate ground was that of the nether millstone. I honor her for her loyalty, and I only trust that she was not under the spell of a more tender passion. She and her master had been thrown much together, as he spent a large portion of each day in the kitchen; and to see much of Mr. Johnstone was to love him. Fortunately love and admiration of a worthy object bring their reward with them. So great was Mr. Johnstone's fame as a good liver, that Kitty M'Isaac has ever since commanded her own price as a cook.

But was he the Reverend James Johnstone, M.A., of Corpus College, Cambridge? Surely this admitted of easy ascertainment. Well, I have not examined the books of Corpus or the clergy list, and I cannot tell. But if that name is to be found therein, I think I can safely say to its lawful owner, non de te fabula narratur.—Blackwood's.

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F. MILLER CELEBRATED

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.
WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

PIANOS

NO. 12 TYLER STREET, S. F.
These Pianos are all three-stringed, with ivory keys, not imitation.

THE HERRMANN HATTER
336 KEARNY ST.
& 910 MARKET ST. S.F.

SPRING STYLES
ALL IN NOW!

Send for Illustrated Catalogue.

STOVES

FOR PARLORS, OFFICES, HALLS
BED-ROOMS, CHURCHES,
STORES, ETC., ETC.

THE LARGEST STOCK AND
the greatest variety on the Pacific Coast.

500

DIFFERENT SIZES, STYLES, AND PATTERNS to select from.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, & 120 BATTERY ST.

INDEPENDENT LINE

—FOR—

ASTORIA AND PORTLAND, OREGON.

The splendid Low-pressure, Side Wheel American Steamship

GREAT REPUBLIC,

3882 TONS,

JAMES CARROLL.....Commander

Will sail from Spear Street wharf, for the above ports,
On WEDNESDAY, April 16, at 10 A. M.

Steorage Passage.....$2 00
Cabin Passage.....7 00
In Bridal Rooms.....10 00
Freight.....at Lowest Rates

FREIGHT RECEIVED DAILY.

For freight or passage apply at the office on Spear Street wharf. Tickets also for sale at No. 3 New Montgomery Street, under Grand Hotel.

P. B. CORNWALL.

FLOWER POTS AND VASES.

A house without flowers is not homelike.

FLOWER POTS of all sizes,
GARDEN VASES at
the Pottery Depot,

22 California Street, S. F.
JOHN B. OWENS.

THE Automatic

SEWING MACHINE STANDS PRE-EMINENT.

A machine that delicate ladies can run as well as the strong. So simple in construction that no experience is required to operate it perfectly. Makes the strongest seam, there being three threads in every stitch. A machine that will sew leather or lace, woolen, or cotton goods without any change. POSITIVELY NO TENSION. The only machine in the world based on AUTOMATIC principles. Thousands now in use, giving the most entire satisfaction.

WILLCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.
C. L. HOVEY, AGENT,

124 POST STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, AND 361 TWELFTH STREET, OAKLAND.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH

FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

NICOLL THE TAILOR

BRANCH OF NEW YORK,

Begs to inform his numerous patrons (and their name is Legion), that he employs only WHITE LABOR, and that the reason he is able to sell cheaper than any other Tailor is that, having Sixty Stores all over the United States, and a London House, he is able to buy and import in immense quantities direct from the Mills at home and abroad, thereby saving all the intermediate profits which other Tailors have to pay.

Gentlemen, before ordering elsewhere, will do well to call and inspect my immense stock at any of my branch stores, and their daily arrivals of New York and Paris fashions. Also, of French and English Goods from my London House.

Pants in Six Hours. Suits to order in One Day, if required.

TO ORDER:

Pants, - - - $4
Suits, - - - 15
Overcoats, - 15
Dress Coats, - 20

Genuine 6 X

Yours Truly, James Nicoll

TO ORDER

Black Doeskin
Pants, - - - $7
White Vests, fm 3
Fancy Vests, - - 6
Beaver Suits, $55.

The Trade and Public supplied with Cloth and Trimmings at Wholesale Prices.

Any length cut, and all kinds of Cloth kept in Stock. Samples, with Instructions for Self-measurement, sent free.

A small stock of uncalled-for Goods to be sold at a great reduction.

CLOTH AND WOOLEN BROKER.

FINEST STOCK OF WOOLENS IN THE WORLD.

NICOLL THE TAILOR'S GRAND TAILORING EMPORIUM,

727 Market Street, 505 Montgomery Street, 18 Kearny Street,
And 853 Broadway, Oakland.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,

FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.

QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE

for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. 22nd Entrance south side of Court.

A. D. SHARON.

NEW STORE

McDONALD

& WILLIAMS

MERCHANT

TAILORS.

We have recently opened the fine large store at No. 14 MONTGOMERY STREET, opposite the Lick House, with a large stock of the most fashionable English, French, and Domestic Cassimeres, Cloths, Worsteds, Beavers, Doeskins, Piqués, Ouatines, Meltons, Kerseys; in fact, full lines of all the materials necessary to conduct a first class tailoring establishment, which we propose offering to the public at the following low prices:

Pants, from$5
Suits, from20
Overcoats, from15
Usters, from15
Dress Coats, from20
White Vests, from3
Silk and Wool Vests, from6

Uniforms of All Kinds Made.

Boys' and Children's Clothing.

Money returned if goods prove not satisfactory. Work made on the premises by White Labor.

Short Time Orders Carefully Attended to.

PUNCTUALITY GUARANTEED.

Samples and Self-measurement Rules sent postage paid.

Measures for future reference cheerfully taken

FAMILIES

LEAVING THE CITY.

FURNITURE, TRUNKS, PIANOS,

Pictures, Carpets, etc., stored and taken care of (not necessary to pack them). Parlor Sets, Carpets, and Blankets aired once a month. Trunks stored separate, for parties to have free access to them. We have the best facilities for storage, having built our warehouses expressly for it. Don't pay rent or interest, and can afford to store goods low. Advances made, insurance effected, and reference given. Please send postal card, and we will call and give estimate for storage, etc.

H. WINDEL & CO.,
Principal Office, 310 Stockton St., bet. Post and Sutter,
Corner Stockton Place, San Francisco.

S. B. BOSWELL & CO.,
STOCK BROKERS,

No. 318 California Street,
SAN FRANCISCO.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.
SHIPPING

—AND—

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Agents for the

SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET LINES.

204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST. - - - San Francisco.

The Argonaut.

VOL. IV. NO. 15.

SAN FRANCISCO, APRIL 12, 1879.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

ADDRESS TO THE ELECTORS OF CALIFORNIA.

As I had much to do with originating and urging for many years the calling of a Constitutional Convention; and as I was not permitted by the people, nor by the delegates they sent, to be a member of it, nor consulted in any manner as to any provision it contains; and as I feel deeply the disappointment at being obliged to oppose the new Constitution, which is the final outcome of all the efforts that have been made by the people for so many years in behalf of a better constitution of government, I deem it not inappropriate, and I hope my fellow-Californians will not deem it invidious under all the circumstances, to venture to address to all of them some of the many reasons why I find it impossible to approve of the new Constitution—for the production of which I could be, in some unfair way, and I am sometimes most inconsiderately and unreasonably, held to some accountability.

W. J. SHAW.

The people of the United States do not order Constitutional Conventions, nor elect delegates to them, nor adopt Constitutions, for the purpose of performing acts of legislation of any kind. Their Constitutions are the frames of their governments, under which the people themselves, not the framers of their Constitutions, must and will reserve the right to pass such laws as they please without any dictation, pro or con, concerning any private matters or any affairs of merely local or private interest—such as the regulation of private corporations, of mechanics' liens, of students' books in schools, or the repairing of streets, or specifically fixing the wages of public employes, etc., etc.—of which kind of pure legislation this new Constitution is filled to a degree never before seen or heard of in the United States. We depart from all experience and from every principle of prudence; we depart from every example of our forefathers; we depart from every valuable opinion of every jurist possessing a competent knowledge of the proper office of a Constitution of free government, when we attempt to make the very frames of our government the vehicles for settling disputed questions of mere legislative policy.

When we shall pervert the solemn act of swearing men to support the Constitution into swearing them to support some incised act of mere legislation that may be justly abhorrent to them, and having nothing to do with the question of supporting the Constitution itself; or when we pervert our Constitutions into instruments wherein any man or any set of men can fix some mere statutory provision to gain some advantage, or some imaginary advantage, just or unjust, by any one portion against any other portion of our fellow-countrymen, we will soon plant and sprout the seeds of anarchy.

If this be true, it is important that all should see plainly the ready and correct distinction between what is the Constitution, or organic law, and mere legislation. All acts which are for the organization of the frame of government—such as fixing the names, tenures, duties, and liabilities, and limiting the powers of public office—properly form the Constitution, or organic act. All laws regulating the business transactions of any private natural persons, or the business transactions of any private artificial persons called corporations, are legislative, and are most properly left to the necessary and appropriate duties of a Legislature expressly created under our plan of government for that purpose only. In principle, it would be as erroneous for our Legislatures to undertake to make new Constitutions, as for constitutional conventions to engage in doing what they may create a Legislature to do, to better advantage. If our State government were supplied with a supreme Legislature like the Parliament of England, then the Legislature would pass all constitutional laws as well as all the statute laws. But we have a totally different system, and we test all our laws by seeing if the power is given in our Constitution to pass them. And for this very reason upon which our plan depends, the pernicious habit or trick has been resorted to, in recent times, of placing purely legislative matter in the Constitution; for the reason that when found in the Constitution itself, no court can decide it to be contrary to the Constitution, no matter what it may be.

If it so happen, as it certainly often does happen, that the Legislature is wholly unreliable, and will not follow out the public will respecting any corporations, or any other matter or thing whatever, that only proves, that the Legislature is not properly organized.

Unquestionably, any attempts made in any Constitution for a free and equal government—to create, encourage, or permit, unfair discriminations between the rights, privileges, or burdens of the common citizenship of men of the same race, and same authority under the government, and same obligations to stand by it and defend it in case of necessity, and to the full extent of all their property and their lives—would be a proceeding as much to be reprobated as deplored by all right-minded American citizens, whatever may be their conditions in life. Owing to recent and still continued, and heated and expensive, and widespread efforts to create dissatisfaction at their lot in life among the most sober, industrious, faithful, and deserving of all the citizenship of our country, it may be well to consider for a moment how well founded or ill founded, how reasonable or unreasonable, all such mere efforts as these really are, or plainly appear to be.

Certainly there are seemingly the greatest diversities and differences in the situations and conditions of all the men and women of our State, in all its cities, towns, villages, and neighborhoods throughout its entire extent, and without any exception anywhere. The uninformed imagine that these differences are attributable in some degree to the government of the country, or that the government could in some manner prevent their continuance if it would earnestly set about it. Nothing, almost, could be more unfortunate, or productive of more unavailing discontent, than to teach or indulge such merely foolish and unsatisfying notions. Government has really no more power to prevent such great diversities of position amongst us, than it would have to prevent like diversities among the animals of the woods or the fishes of the sea. Government neither does nor can make them nor unmake them. In all the human governments that have ever existed—from the simplest to the most interfering, from the worst to the very best—there have always remained under them the same like diversities in the employments, conditions, and situations among all men under them, just such as we see here in our own State to-day, and as have always continued in every human state upon the whole face of the earth. No teaching, no philosophy, no doctrines of positivism, no pleasing brotherhoods of communistic government, no religion, no irreligion, no plans, nor theories, nor practices of any government that now exists, or has existed, or can exist, ever has been able, or ever can be able, to do away with these universally diverse and endless divisions in the human beings of the State. For some must plant and some must reap; some must buy, some must sell; some must horde, some must squander; some must do the low work, some must do the high work; some must obey, some must direct; and all the endless rounds of differences in all the different sorts and conditions of men, now, and here, and in all past times, and everywhere, are not things to be changed by government, nor things any true thinker, no matter how high or low his own condition, could desire to have changed, even if it were in his power to change them. Because it is certain that any great forced changes in this respect would necessarily result in making everything much worse for everybody, and nothing really or permanently any better for anybody. Because such differences are natural and indispensable to the life, and continuance, and advancement of States. And the greater the diversity in our proper conditions and employments, the greater appears to be the advancement our States have made. Probably no Pope nor philosopher has uttered a truer word than the present Pope when he said, of such differences as are referred to: "They are the acts of God; they exist among the very angels in heaven, and as universally as among men on the earth." It is not a thing of will, it is an affair of nature. It is not a thing of choice, it is an affair of God; or, as the Asiatic would express it, an affair of fate. Whether I have been brought into the world a man or a woman has not depended on my will, but on God's, or more understandingly speaking, on Nature's laws. And the condition of life into which I am forced into the world no more depends on my will, and I can not be rationally blamed nor praised for it, be it good or bad, high or low, than I can be praised or blamed for the sex which was given to me. All that God, or nature, or justice, or reason, can or does ask of me, and all my State or neighborhood has any right to ask of me, or expect of me, is, that I faithfully do my duty to my country, and seek to find contentment wherever and however it shall please God, or the will of the State, or the will of fate, to place me.

It is, or plainly appears to be, one of Nature's own wise laws that differences, in both mental and physical strength, and in the associations, wishes, preferences, and employments of all men and women, must exist in order that the State itself can exist. If our hod-carrier becomes something else, somebody else must be at hand to take his place at the hod, for there must be hod-carriers just as necessarily as there must be governors. It is true, our education in the past and at the present is most disgraceful to all of us, and to its most gross shortcomings are perhaps attributable, one way and another, nine-tenths of all our unhappiness and discontent, and false notions of the State and its proper government. When "Abe Lincoln" was energetically engaged in splitting rails to the best of his ability, he was fulfilling his whole duty to the State just as honorably and just as completely as when His Excellency Abraham Lincoln was performing the duties of Chief Magistrate to the nation. The only difference consisted in the extent, not the fact of his usefulness. But if he had not in the meantime qualified himself to be a Chief Magistrate, but had been made a Chief Magistrate when he did not know how to do any other work well except to split rails, then the change in his position would have been a curse to himself and to the nation, no matter how honest and patriotic or enthused he might have been. Just as every false change from a low to a high position—occasioned by no fitness, but by vanity, ignorance, selfishness, or connivance of unthoughtful friends—continually brings unthought of and often most serious losses, and not too rarely even wide spread calamities and civil war itself upon the people. In any case, when ignorance of that which ought to be done is put forth, or thrusts itself forth, to advise what should be done, it seems too plain to admit of any doubt that the people have great reason to apprehend danger, and to recall afresh the lessons of experience: "For the leaders of this people cause them to err, and they that are led of them are destroyed." Which lesson is appropriate for every year, and for every party, existing now or heretofore existing in our midst and in our nation for now fully thirty years last past. "Look to your leaders, O ye people."

Our Governments, State and local, do, and always have enabled certain kinds of citizens to control them for purely selfish purposes, and through purely selfish and other dishonest means; and because there is nothing in our constitutional plan save office-holders. And when you see office-holders, you see all there is in our present plan of government. And when you touch our office-holders, you touch every fibre of power that is vested under the entire provisions of our Constitution. This new Constitution does not create an official less, nor add anywhere to the people one finger's weight of power more, either over the officers, or the policy, or management of the government. Why did our new so-called Workingman's party, or some claiming leadership over it, determine by resolution that every man who votes against the new Constitution shall be deemed their enemy? Is it because the new Constitution is certain to produce any better, cheaper, or safer plan of government for them, or for anybody than the present Constitution affords? They do not say so, nor pretend so, I suppose, because they who can read can see for themselves that this new Constitution actually continues over them and over all of us, the very same expensive, heedless, corrupting, bungling, and mere office-holders' State government which we have already. Let us reflect with candor, and examine with careful attention, and see for ourselves how lamentably or how successfully it has met the intelligent expectations of the people; and respecting some vitally important matters that have been provided for, and that have not been provided for in this new Constitution; and which have not been already discussed or pointed out by others, and which affect every one of us alike, and whether, poor like me, or rich, like Croesus. And let us adopt something of the Socratic mode in making our inquiries.

This address makes no allusion to scores of valid objections to the new Constitution, because fully presented by others. The judicial system is worse than we have already, which costs at least double what it should, but not at all in the direction in which it has been unintelligently reduced. And the profusion of sheerly speculative and champertous lawsuits, one of the most infamous public abuses in the State, is not prohibited. Its provisions respecting the very first and highest duty of all government, public and private—that is, education—are, like two-thirds of the entire instrument, filled with childish provisions which would have been utterly needless had proper provision been made for the creation of a proper Legislature. By a proper Legislature, I mean one less troublesome and expensive than the present, and at the very least incapable of ever being one-twentieth part as bad as Constitutional Conventions can be. The provisions respecting revenue and taxation prove a majority of the Convention did not possess the ordinary intelligence of our times on that subject.

The present Constitution needlessly prevents a proper system of taxation being provided by the Legislature; this new Constitution needlessly contains one that would disgrace the worst Legislature that ever assembled in California or elsewhere.

Local government is more directly important to every neighborhood in the State than even the State government itself; and this, also, fell into incompetent hands. There seems to have been some correct ideas of its importance, and of the proper principle of local independence that should control it, but none at all as to the proper way of accomplishing it. The plan pretends to be under the control of the people, but is very careful to provide that they shall not control it, and, as usual, that scheming and hired office-holders may. As to their contracting debts, it appears plain to me that they should be treated as the assisting minor children of the State government, always naturally inclined to extravagance so long as they have a credit that enables them to contract debts at all. Therefore I would deny them that privilege absolutely, and in the proper way have the State itself ready to promptly enable them to do so if required to meet some misfortune not under their own control. In fact, I would have State and local government a harmonious, simple, and honest people's system—not a mere office-holders' useless jumble.

Carlyle with rude candor said, most of the people of England are fools. Perhaps all ought to admit that a majority of all of us in every country under the sun are acting like fools respecting two things, and perhaps the most important two things under human control—namely, religion and public government. If you and I wished to promote some new system of pure theology, would we select persons ignorant of the subject to prepare our articles of faith and our church constitution? Or if we desired to prepare a new Constitution for the better government of a vast State like California, would we not be acting as though we were fools to select some foreigners or other persons ignorant of the subject of our State government, to prepare our State Constitution for us? If we actually did so, could we reasonably deny that as to that matter we had acted like persons not governed by intelligence nor common sense? Do we go to tailors' shops to get our horses shod; or to blacksmiths' shops to get ourselves shod; or to shoemakers' shops to get steam-engines made? If we do not so behave respecting our small affairs, would we evince any more intelligence by so thoughtlessly behaving respecting our most momentous affairs? How many members did we select to construct the machinery of a successful constitution of public government, for a vast State like California; who had the trouble to acquire any actual knowledge of the subject, or who had ever attentively studied for even the period of one whole year? A period ten times too short for any man to acquire a really competent knowledge of it. Were there fifty? forty? twenty? Were there as many out of the 152 as would at last have sufficed to have saved Sodom and Gomorrah? And even if that many; how many of them had previously performed the thankless labor of making a long and loving and careful examination, into the nature and operations of all, or even of one-half of the most important defects in our present Constitution; and ascertained, with certainty, just where and how, and how far to apply all the many, and important, and long most seriously needed remedies?

How many of all those members could then or now correctly answer even the very first question about State government; which (as Aristotle said over two thousand years ago) must first be correctly answered, before any attempt to frame a proper State government can be intelligently commenced, namely, What is the State?

How many of those members realized, the true condition of California, and had ascertained, of a certainty, that in the fullest sense of the word no constitution at all had ever, at any time, been devised for California; but that she has been heedlessly left to wear the mere constitutional swaddling clothes, in which, plain, honest, simple-minded farmer Iowa was born thirty-five years ago; and from which, even that State, bearing no resemblance whatever to this, was relieved twenty-two years ago; and which never was at any time any more fit or capable to plant a proper government for great California than for great France?

How many of those members realized, that this State of California is larger in area, and larger in possible productive power, than all Switzerland, all Denmark, all the Netherlands, all Belgium, all Ireland, all Wales, all Scotland, and all England, all combined into one, and having altogether a population of 47,000,000 of people?

How many of those members realized, that the most distant of all the "Northern States" is not further away from the "Southern States" on the other side of this continent, than the most Northern portions are distant from the most Southern portions of this single State; and that the "North" and the "South," in all the States of our Eastern Union, no more differ from each other in soil, scenery, climate, or the modes and means necessary for supplying the comforts and necessities of life, than do the most Northern from the most Southern counties of California; and that, from its very nature and magnitude, it is indispensably necessary it should have a government of its own, to successfully meet all its own varied necessities, and to enormously and speedily increase the homogeneity of its entire population; unless, with even more than vandal indifference, we would have it known within five more decades, that this magnificent State had lost all its greatness and been divided into pieces?

How many of those members realized, that it is no more possible to govern great California with any such Constitution as we now have, or which they have decided to continue against it, than it would be to govern all the States of our entire Atlantic seaboard, from Maine to Georgia, under the same pusillanimous Constitution as they now re-offer to us unimproved?

How many of those members realized, that our public governments over California, State and National, are not as harmless as would be a mere personal robber or torturer, when they, or either of them, hold out inducements or encouragements, or even permit without warning, newly arriving farmers to attempt to maintain their families, or themselves, by their labor in cultivating lands which require irrigation, to produce any crop one-quarter or one-half the time, and which the government has neither first supplied nor caused to be first supplied with the necessary means of irrigation?

How many of those members realized, that irrigation is practicable in this climate and State; that by a proper (and if proper, a State-wide, never burdensome, and enormously profitable) system of irrigation and forest culture, the sustentation power of this State, can be raised to forty-five millions of people within two or three centuries; whilst without that its sustentation power can not probably, and with permanent safety, be raised to above ten or twelve millions, and possibly not one-half that number in seven centuries; and that it is not impossible, if government does not enter wisely into the performance of this duty, that even a population of two or three millions, distributed as now throughout the State, will be likely to bring home to the citizenship that may then live, a periodical knowledge of widespread impoverishments, sufferings, and even famines, produced by drought?

How many of those members realized, that there are probably over twenty millions of acres of land in this State which, if not irrigated, are now and forever agriculturally worth nothing at all, and which could be supplied with abundant irrigation, if this State government were under a proper constitutional organization and necessary guarantees, affording the safe opportunity for a permanent management; but which it is an absurdity, and a practical impossibility to ever attempt under any such system of government as we now have, and is proposed to be made only worse, for any such purpose, under this new Constitution? And that, if this be so, this State could, under a proper public government, earn for its people, by its people, a direct increase of property by this means alone, and in addition to what could be otherwise earned, not any less than two thousand millions of dollars within a single century? That irrigation alone supports today at least two hundred and fifty millions of people, where fifty millions of them, if unassisted by others, could not live six months without it? That irrigation culture, when perfectly understood, is the most picturesque and beautiful, and the most reliable and profitable land culture in the world? That irrigation culture began around the Paradise named in our Bible; that it is as old as farming, and familiar to all great States, except ours, inhabiting the world touched by the broad expanses of our Pacific Ocean? That the reliable estimates just named should alone be sufficient to indicate its enormous profitability? That it enables three crops to be raised on the same land every eighteen months, and for a thousand years in ceaseless succession? That probably the estimated acreage of worthless arable land, unless irrigated, has been stated much under the true quantity when we remember that our State contains 120,000,000 of acres? That if a proper plan of irrigation were carried out it would be literally like creating a new world for us from the face of the waters" of our ocean?

Yes, I hear your laughter. I hear you screaming back to me, "What do we care what happens a hundred years from now?" If you have any prudence, if you have any patriotism, if you have any fitness to understand such subjects, you do care. A hundred years is but the longest length of one man's life. It is but a small space of time for a State. Vital statistics prove that of all who are born here to-day, one thousand out of every ten thousand will be alive seventy-nine years from now; and ten of them will be alive one hundred years from now; and one of those ten may be your own child. It is also by no means to be forgotten, that in ten years after the system is properly inaugurated its beneficial effects would begin to be felt throughout the State. And from then, if properly undertaken, its slow and steady progress would bring continual increase of prosperity for centuries.

How many of those members realized, that all private attempts at irrigation for so vast a State as this are as trifling, and as merely interfering with the proper undertaking of so widespread a necessity, as would have been private enterprise in Holland to keep out the ocean from the Netherlands? And that the undertaking to keep out the ocean from the Netherlands was never wiser, nor more necessary, nor more profitable, nor more glorious for Holland; than is the necessity, the profit, and the glory awaiting the proper constitution of government, and united action of the people of this State, with the benign concessions of the United States, to bring in upon its millions of parching acres, along its millions of tree-bordered channels, from its millions of forest reservoirs, the waters of our Pacific Ocean, heaven lifted, and descending purified along our vast chains of California mountains: And thus make California truly the paradise, the sanitarium, the granary, and the glory of the whole world?

How many of those members realized, the bitterness, the viciousness, the folly of trying to benefit the most meritorious portion of our fellow-citizens by aiming their constitutional straw, and clubs, and stones at the rich; as if that were the way to do favors for the poor and hard-working? Aiming their new Constitution to hurt some classes of our own citizenship, and probably intending to benefit the others, who most need and best deserve the favors of the State; nevertheless, it would, if adopted, and as they would have known had they understood their business, operate (from the very nature of society) as such attempts must operate, that is to the mere injury of every citizen. Because, it is as certain in social as in natural science, that whatever injures, disturbs, or impairs any parts of the same body, injures, disturbs, or impairs the whole of it. Stones thrown at the tallest heads to be seen in the ripe grain-field, at best, but hurt or destroy a part of the crop of the field, without in the slightest degree benefiting even one single spear within all its boundaries. And he is ignorant of the teachings of nature, of humanity, of States, and of every principle of social science, who does not see and know of a certainty, that what is said of a field of ripened grain is equally true respecting the living and moving fields of men and women, constituting the same citizenship of the same commonwealth.

How many of those members realized, that in proportion to the representation of the supreme Legislatures of countries, just in that proportion is the supreme difference to be ascertained between their different kinds of governments? By examining the representation of the people in the applied law-making force of States, certainly can be arrived at as to whether the government is despotic, democratic, republican, or oligarchic.

How many of those members realized, that the present Constitution of this State and the new one they have prepared for it, on exactly the same plan as the present one, establish and would continue over us a pure oligarchy—nothing else whatever but a pure oligarchy of office-holders, and even more absolutely a pure oligarchy than is the oligarchy of England? That through our ignorance, not our superiority, either in the knowledge or practice of government, our people are still deprived of anything equaling or approximating, in practical steadiness and importance, even the English constitutional right; that compels their supreme Legislature to stop, and to stop as frequently as occasion requires, and go before the electors of the people and ask their advice, and obey them, not itself, respecting any proposition, as to the adoption of any law, any new provision in the Constitution, or any question of public policy, respecting which the administrators of the government shall at any time differ from the majority of the direct representatives of the people in the Legislature?

How many of those members realized, that the Constitution they offered us does not anywhere add one finger's weight to the power of the people under the government it creates; but it actually takes away from the hands of the people, where it now reposes, a vast range of power, and does not even distribute it among the existing oligarchy, but creates a new one, of only three men? It is an astounding attempt to create a political trimorphism crystallizing the railroads, the Legislature, and the people into an Imperial Triad, to be composed of somebody's three office-seekers, and to illustrate before us the mystic action of the armorial device of the Isle of Man, having three legs to stand on, but needing only to be sure of two at a time. The people possess few legislative rights so important as this. It involves the proper control of the entire transportation business of so vast a State as California, and all the transportation business of every other company in this State, as well as the railroad companies. They can not afford to voluntarily and totally surrender such vast legislative power as this, for the sake of reposing it in such a tripod experiment as this new Constitution compels them to do. If the whole people of this State can not govern their corporations except by surrendering absolutely and entirely all their own control over them, merely to vest it in three fellows to be picked up by politicians, then they had better cease at once trying to govern anything or anybody. If the people have heretofore failed to do it, and if one hundred and twenty of their own chosen representatives in the Legislature have failed to do it, what kind of common sense would they evince by agreeing to the ridiculous proposition that three men can do it.

There can be no proposition plainer, or that ought to be plainer to every elector of common sense and common observation, than that the people of this State have failed in this particular, and in many other particulars respecting legislation, because their vast legislative power is already vested in too few hands; and that there is nothing more important to them and to the proper government of this State than that the people should take the whole government of it, and of every part and portion of it, more fully into their own hands. Already under the existing Constitution the people are almost without any governing powers at all in their own hands, and if they adopt this new Constitution they will have greatly less. Already any one can see, who will look, that our entire government everywhere in the State, in every county in the State, in every city, town, and village in the State, from the Oregon to the Mexican lines, is everywhere reposed in nothing at all but some office-holders. The people are nothing in this new Constitution. They appear nowhere. They are treated with mere contempt as to all management of their public government, and by the very constitution of government which they themselves are to create and permit to exist. They have already recklessly placed all their power, and intrusted their entire authority, and actually reposed the whole performance of all their own government duties, in mere hired office-holders. And this new Constitution goes further in taking power out of the people instead of placing more in them, and goes further to show contempt for the people and more confidence in mere hired office-holders, than even the present Constitution; and goes further in that utterly false, utterly unprincipled, utterly needless, and completely perilous and corrupting direction of taking power away from the people, and away from their own representatives, than has ever before been seen or attempted in all American political history. If our political history in this State has proved anything at all during the last thirty years, it has proved (admitting all honorable exceptions) that as a rule office-holders can not be trusted. Yet look here at this new Constitution; examine and read it for yourselves; take no newspaper partisan's, nor talking partisan's opinion about it; see for yourselves what it actually proposes, and proposes, too, in spite of all actual human experience. To me it seems incredible that such a proposition has actually been made to the people of an American State. It seems incredible that it has emanated from Sacramento instead of Stockton. But incredible as it must appear to every California elector, who can remember anything or see anything respecting office-holders left to do whatever they please—in short, incredible as it must appear to every intelligent human being in the whole world outside of Turkey and Russia—this new Constitution actually proposes to us Californians, to us American citizens, that two office-holders shall be absolutely empowered, and without any appeal, or any power anywhere to change, modify, or at all interfere with their will, to fix the only wages which can be lawfully demanded or received for the transaction of the largest, most extended, and actually the most important of any one kind of accommodation business existing in the whole State. It is not confined to railroads. It includes every kind of transportation business, whether of passengers or freight, and whether in boats, or sloops, or ships, or steamers, or any other kind of vessels, and whether on railroads, wagon roads, or in any way, and whether anywhere upon the waters or anywhere upon the lands of all this vast State of California, which kind of business shall be carried on by any company.

The absurd provision even trenches on the natural right of private individuals to make such lawful bargains with each other about transportation as they may please. It prohibits any "individual" agreeing to carry any passenger or property at greater charges for any one mile than for any two miles. If any "individual" in this State should carry any thing or anybody at a less charge for any one mile than he would make for going "in the same direction" any more than one mile, he would violate the Constitution, which he always should—and, perchance, he may have taken an oath that he would—support. Read the second sentence of Section 21 of this Article 12.

And please now read with me, and just as the courts will be obliged to read it if you adopt this new Constitution, the pith and marrow, and tiger's claws sticking out under the heap of mealy verbiage, in Section 22 of that same Article 12. All the words here in quotation marks are the exact words of this Article, and the meaning here given, with brevity, is the legal meaning of that long section, so far as its greatest materiality to us is involved. There are to be three commissioners, "and the act of a majority of said commissioners shall be deemed the act of" all three of them. "Said commissioners shall have the power" and are required "to establish rates of charges for the transportation of passengers" or "freight by" any "railroad or other transportation companies," or company; which "rates of charges" shall be only "such charges as they," the two office-holders, "shall make." "And they"—the two men—"shall have the power" to "enforce their decisions," as to such rates of charges as "they shall make," "through the medium of the courts." And "any railroad or transportation company, which shall fail or refuse to conform to such rates" as said two men "may make," "shall be fined not exceeding twenty thousand dollars for each" and every time they do not "conform to such rates." And "every officer, agent, or employé of any such corporation or company," "who shall in any manner" disregard "such rates" "shall be fined not exceeding five thousand dollars, or be imprisoned in the county jail not exceeding one year." And in case such commissioners receive bribes from every railroad corporation and from every "other transportation company" in this State, or in case they should willfully fix "such rates" so high as to ruin every business man dependent on transportation companies or prevent every poor man traveling on them; or so low that no railroad or other transportation company could possibly do business without being ruined; or in case such commissioners should perform acts of official infamy transcending any infamous official acts ever perpetrated in this State or any other State or country, none of them could be touched for it by any court of justice, nor be lawfully interfered with by any grand jury, or tried by any petit jury or court in this State or any court of any other State or Government. They are not only "empowered" to do exactly as they please about so vastly important a matter, but they are also clearly and unquestionably placed above all liability to punishment of any kind whatsoever for any of their official acts. And not only this, but they are also almost placed actually beyond all power of removal. The Legislature is only to be assembled once in two years, and then for only sixty days; and all this new Constitution will permit the people, or the courts, or the Legislature to do with these absolutely sovereign Triumvirs, if they be once insensately fastened on the people of this State, is simply to remove them from office when the Legislature meets, provided "two-thirds" of "all the members elected to each house" shall agree to it, and not otherwise. Any lawyer will tell you that when the Constitution itself prescribes exactly what shall be done with officials in a case like this, it makes void all other provisions of law as to their official liabilities.

Unquestionably this provision contains the most infamous proposition against the people that has ever before been made, in such a form as this, to any American State. Any person who thinks or imagines that any objection I raise against it is owing to any interest or any friendship I have in any railroad or other transportation company, or for any man or any set of men connected with any of them, is grossly mistaken. I have no interest in any company whatever of any kind. And I am under no obligation whatever, political or social, to any man or set of men connected with any railroad company whatever, and whether in this State or any other State. I speak of the matter only as a citizen and an American. I do confess the shame, if it has come already to be a shame, that I love my country sincerely; and hate still as I have always hated in the past, all kinds of such monstrous attempts as this, to fool, to mislead, to rob the people; and under specious pretexts, falsely pretending or claiming that they are the people's own measures, and that they are gotten up in their interests and for their benefit. It seems to me too plain to be fairly doubted for one moment, that the very cat under this meatub must be the carefully concealed monster railroad itself. For it is plain that it is a creation to be made for the very purpose of being controlled and kept alive, by the very means and the too easy means of bribery, in some form or other. And as the people never do nor can accomplish things by bribery; and as others can, and, it is said, frequently do accomplish their ends by bribery, why should any of us be so silly as to imagine, no matter how loudly the utterly fooled or willfully vicious are screaming in favor of it, that it has been contrived for no other purpose whatever by its carefully concealed concoctors, but to effectually accomplish what it will effectually accomplish, if carried out, the placing of the power of the State over railroad fares exactly where the railroad wants it to be; that is, completely beyond the reach of the people, so long as such a new Constitution as this could be kept in existence. For the credit of the members of the Convention, it is certainly not to be credited that a majority of them, and I certainly do not believe that many of them, even if any of them, actually know themselves what serious, what alarming departures their new Constitution really contains; and how completely such provisions as this strike in the face all our prudence and our knowledge of human nature and experience, and every principle on which a Constitution of popular government depends.

But we can not even stop here with some of the specifications not before made against this new Constitution; and our charge, accompanied with the Constitution itself as the proof, that it is not a Constitution in the interests of the people, but is opposed to the people, except as to some of its mere legislative enactments. Instead of providing for us, as it was easy to have provided, a cheaper, a safer, and better Legislature, with a proper or even half-way proper representation of the people in it, they actually propose to continue over us exactly the same old legislative contrivance, against which our people have been continually, and almost unanimously and bitterly, complaining for now nearly thirty years. They have actually dared to present to us for our approval exactly the very same old legislative mill, that on occasion is said to be reasonably expected to do custom work for hire.

The only absolute difference in the power it can exercise is, that the legislative affair is not to be required to run longer than sixty days; and that is a grave mistake. Because, if we must continue to have such a Legislature and do not know how to contrive at least a hundred times safer and cheaper one, then it would, perhaps, have been better to have provided in this new Constitution that the affair we now have should never be allowed to run at all oftener than once in sixty years, nor than for a longer period than sixty hours, instead of the sixty days to which it is now scarcely more ridiculously limited. Candor requires the admission, however, that the new Constitution has provided against the destructive movements of this old legislative machinery—some spokes, and shoes, and stays; and here and there some of iron, some of basswood, some of good wood, and most of them of mere straw and putty, considering other provisions on the same subjects in the same Constitution. And some of them would make the machine less useful than it is now. And from the long and solemn list displayed of words, words, words, and still more words, for three and thirty portentous paragraphs; many a verdant mind will, no doubt, be led to imagine that a good State Legislature could be made out of a plentiful use of forcible words, to be held up before politicians for a bow of the head and an uplifted hand; and that in that brilliant way the necessity might be avoided of really requiring hardly anybody in either House. Aside from this very cheap attempt to improve the worthless plan of a Legislature by the use of words of restraint only, not so much as a single change is proposed in our legislative machine, either in its organization, or in securing a decently large representation of the people to attend within it. In short, if there was any one defect in our present Constitution greater than all others, and for which more than any others the Constitutional Convention was so earnestly urged for so many years by its warmest advocates, it was, without at all increasing the expense, to thoroughly reorganize and enormously increase the representation of the people; in the plan for exercising their inalienable right, to have their own laws passed according to their own consent and their own will, and not according to the mere will or wishes of any two men, or any sixty-two men, or any company or corporation, or any man or set of men.

But what does this new Constitution propose for increasing the power or representation of the people in their Legislature? Absolutely, it prohibits any increase or improvement at all. Read section six of article four. Forty Senatorial and eighty Assembly districts, and one member for each. Exactly as it is already in the present Constitutional limitation, and exactly as it has continued to be for years past. It should be apparent to the common sense of every man that nothing whatever is, or can be, so important to a free people, or an honest people, or a people who desire to insure honesty in respect to the administration of popular government, as a full and fair number of representatives in their legislature—such a representation, in fact, as would completely put it out, and keep it out, of the heads of every man that it could possibly be hired, either to perform or to prevent any legislation. And in a vast State, like this, to completely ignore the question of inhabited territory, and pay no attention at all to any populations anywhere unless there are enough in numbers to constitute one of some small number of districts (as is most injuriously and foolishly done in Texas), is wholly inexcusable.

The basis of representation afforded by our present Constitution permits only one Assemblyman to every two thousand three hundred and sixty-two square miles of our State territory, and one Senator for every five thousand seven hundred and twenty-four square miles of our State territory. For our present population, if but a million, it permits every twelve thousand five hundred citizens to have one man for an Assemblyman, and every twenty-five thousand citizens to have one Senator. A State containing 188,981 square miles is thus to be forever confined, according to the present and this new Constitution, to eighty Assemblymen and forty Senators, and not another one is to be tolerated in either house though we should gain a population of five million or ten million. The constitutional monarchies of Europe, which do not pretend to be the friends of the people, are more their friends than our ignorant or designing Convention was. John Adams, "the Aristocrat," and the only man in our history to whom was given the opportunity to draft an entire State constitution to suit his own opinions, so framed the Constitution of Massachusetts that it soon had five hundred representatives of the people in its Assembly, one branch of its Legislature. In his opinion the representation of the people in their Legislature, not mere words in the Constitution, seemed to mean something. He seems to have supposed that a fair representation of the people in their Legislature was one of the things they had been fighting for in the Revolution, and which the people ought to have. Under John Adams' Constitution Massachusetts had five hundred representatives in its Assembly alone, and when it was twenty-four times smaller than California is, and had less population than California now has. And Massachusetts never was better governed than it was then, and never will be again. New Hampshire, another State where we hear nothing of habitual legislative corruption or scheming outrages, constitutionally guarantees to every town in the State having one hundred and fifty voters one Assemblyman, and an additional one for every three hundred more voters it may ever contain. It takes more Legislators to pass any law, or to elect a United States Senator, in Rhode Island than it does in California, and Rhode Island has one-quarter of our population and one hundred and forty-five times less territory than this State has. The British imperial monarchy has 650 members in its Assembly, and 503 members in its Senate. The Imperial German Legislature has 59 royalists in its Senate, and 379 members in its Assembly, all elected by universal suffrage. The aristocratic republican government of France has 300 members in its Senate and 532 members in its Assembly, all elected by universal suffrage.

If it be wise, as only pretenders among us assert, to trust power to a few men, "so as to hold them to a more close and direct responsibility," why is it that all actual experience, and all the uncorrupted Legislatures in America, or elsewhere, as a rule, are composed of great numbers? What need is there that we should so persist in not only disobeying but in actually defying all the past government experiments of the world; and even the very maxims of wisdom, based on knowledge of what human nature really is, and approved by the actual experience of all ages, and expressed in books we venerate and disobey? "In the multitude of counselors there is safety," but "Where no such counselors are, the people fall."

It is said, if we will adopt this new Constitution, most unfortunately so much worse than the present one, that we can almost immediately amend it. In the name of common sense, why should we adopt it so as to amend it? If we are only to have the same old Trojan horse filled with hired officeholders that has so continually threatened our destruction for a whole age, without ever at any time having afforded us anything approximating actual protection and good government, why should we now bring in this new horse only stuffed still fuller of mere legislative straw and hired office-holders? Many of you very naturally suppose it is entitled to be adopted because it has so many really good laws in it. My countrymen, when we take action respecting the propriety of adopting a new Constitution of government, we must not suffer ourselves to be occupied about the good statutory laws that be in it; but about the Constitution itself, and the officers it creates; the powers it confers upon them, and wherein it properly increases the constitutional rights and powers of ourselves, the People.

It is greatly to be desired, for the good of all of us now and for years to come, that this new Constitution should be defeated, and, if possible, by an overwhelming vote, so that no such affair will be re-offered to us; and I assure you of this after having devoted the requisite time to have some knowledge of the subject of constitutional laws and governments. It is the first effort that has ever been made by organized California to obtain a proper plan of constitutional free government, but it should by no means be the last. If you electors but will it, the Legislature next winter could, prepare and submit to you a State Constitution in every way better, cheaper, safer, more efficient, and with less officeholders and more of the people in it. And to do so properly it would only be necessary for previously popular action on the subject to indicate clearly and satisfy the Legislature beyond all question of doubt, that it is or would be the general will of the people to have the Legislature adopt that course; for the Legislature only could do so with the reasonable excuse that it was your will that it should be done.

Mr. Albert Rhodes has attained the honor, not only of the publication of a story written by him in French in the Revue des Deux-Mondes, but also a republication of it in Figaro, with an editorial compliment to the effect that in Figaro's opinion he is one of the better American writers, that he handles the French language with grace, and has portrayed for French eyes in a very original way the character of la jeune fille Américaine.

OUR OWN POETS.

The Flower Soul.

Sometimes amid the ups and downs,
The hours of mirth and grieving,
An odd, quaint fancy comes to me,
Right pleasant, if deceiving.

It is that every flower that dots
The garden and the meadow
Bears, locked within, some woman's soul
In fragrant, dreamful shadow.

This rose is Alice—red and rich,
Voluptuous, overbearing,
Which one would hesitate to pluck,
So hardly worth the wearing.

Though soft its petals, sweet its breath,
And fair its full completeness,
An hour would see its beauty fade,
And vanish all its sweetness.

This orange lily, tall and bold,
Is Julia. At the soiree
She's one to dance with and admire,
And flirt with—not to marry.

Von heliotrope is odorous,
But tiresome. Somehow, Mabel,
I think it held that soul of thine,
If aught lies in my fable.

This morning-glory, sweetheart Anne;
No perfume crowns that beauty.
Like you it lends the garden grace,
But as a thing of duty.

Ah, little May, this primrose brings,
Just peeping o'er my shoulder,
Thy dimpled face, so young, and yet
With something so much older—

Some lines of an experience
Caught when a primrose growing
On banks, where o'er you morn and eve
One Zephyr loved was blowing;

And when the winter chilled his breath,
Some fairy queen's insistence
Gave you this curious trace to mark
The old time flower existence.

Some women wear about them still
This flower, like fragrance cherished;
In some, alas! this essence sweet
With stem and petal perished.

But still behind there lingering lies
A faint trace of the story,
When sun and dew toward heaven brought
Their purity and glory.

OAKLAND, April, 1879.

DANIEL O'CONNELL.

At the Top.

We have climbed by the cañon to the top
Of our very highest hill;
And away far down is the little town,
And the city farther still.

We trace through that cañon the winding path
Which, following, led us here,
And the rough, steep place that we dared to face
Seems less than a cause for fear.

We found in that cañon the brightest flowers;
We picked and have them still;
But the poison oak and the staff that broke
Are far away down the hill.

SAN FRANCISCO, April, 1879.

A.

A Passion Picture.

Your little mouth glows like a rose most rare,
And ringing melody the words it saith;
Your eyes outshine those Queen Elizabeth
Hated because they were than hers more fair;
The purple darkness of your lustrous hair,
Its subtle fragrance, rich as lily's breath,
Whose royal sweetness swoons the bee to death,
Clings round your brow and makes an aureole there.
In perfumed damask flushes your round cheek,
Where dimples flutter like kiss-luring charms,
And dainty lips reward the spirit's fire.

This is he one great empire that I seek,
The fond enthrallment of your clasping arms,
And love that thrills me with its great desire.

NEW LONDON, CONN., March, 1879.

THOS. S. COLLIER.

Society's Belle.

The earth, when winsome May has crowned
Its hills and dales with wreaths of flowers,
That spring to life from wakened ground,
Transforming this cold world of ours
To something fair to see;
The highly tinted thought that gleams
Through Fancy's magic, golden halls,
Filling man's soul with heavenly dreams,
And lifting him beyond its walls,
Are not more fair than she.

The honey hidden in the rose,
The pearl beneath the ocean's wave,
The tinkling, trickling stream that flows
From some deep hidden mountain cave
Toward the distant sea,
The tears that angels weep in heaven
When sin-crowned man, forgetting God,
Yields up that which to him was given,
And, cursing, sinks beneath the sod,
Are not more pure than she.

The patient martyr's iron band,
The slab 'bove life's most cherished dream,
The glittering steel in maddened hand
That, falling, leaves a cruel gleam
And sets the spirit free,
The crystal ice in frozen zone,
The cruel wind in wintry night
That fiercely howls o'er sculptured stone
Where slumber loved ones still and white,
Are not more cold than she.

SAN QUENTIN, March, 1879.

HOWARD R. JOHNSON.

To M. B.

I know thee not—I never heard thy voice;
Yet could I choose a friend from all mankind,
Thy spirit high should be my spirit's choice,
Thy heart should guide my heart, thy mind my mind.

I know not if I e'er shall list thy tones,
Or trembling thrill beneath thy thrilling tone,
Thy song, thy fame, is all my heart hath known,
And knowing these alone, it knows thee.

SAN FRANCISCO, April, 1879.

THE TYPICAL OAKLANDER.

Meeting my strange acquaintance on Broadway a few days ago, I saluted him, and ventured to inquire if his pursuit of the typical Oaklander had been crowned with success. He bowed gravely, and handed me a roll of manuscript. "I have pored over these for many hours," he said. "Would you, who appear to take an interest in this subject, which is one of such importance to the scientific world, read this, and give me, when next we meet (naming a time and place), your opinion of its merits?" The first paper read as follows, and at the opening reminded me of Wilkie Collins, being written in that peculiar style in which some of his novels are introduced:

Narrative of Jonas Emerald, clerk of — Hotel, April 6, 1879.—I am in my twenty-second year, and two months ago to-day commenced the wearing of paste diamonds. I have been at the Palace Hotel, and have taken notes; that is, I have modeled my conduct, manner of speech—stern or otherwise, as the case may demand—on the stout gentleman who stands behind the ledger in that noble institution. I have carefully borne with me the recollection of that deportment, and consequently expect to succeed in the noble profession of my choice. Some days ago a strange gentleman came to our place and demanded a room. As he was completely destitute of jewelry, and had no scent on his pocket handkerchief, I intimated that the money in advance would be required. This I announced with much hauteur. He took a handful of gold and silver from his pocket and paid me. After the fashion of my illustrious model, I immediately changed my tactics and became humble and descriptive of the charms of the climate on this side of the bay. He looked very hard at my diamonds. I feared he was in the jewelry business, and blushed. He handed me two-and-a-half, and said, in a mournful tone: "I want your assistance." I thought he might be in love, and smiled a knowing smile (also after my illustrious model), but he gazed at me in blank disappointment. "I am a member of the Academy of Sciences," he said; "and as you are brought in daily contact with the natives of this village, the result of your observations in a condensed form would be of value to me. I want to find the typical Oaklander." My first impulse was to summon the bell boy, for I thought he was crazy, but he waved his hand (there was a ring on it) and continued: "Jot down your ideas, my good lad (what cheek! A lad, indeed!), and I'll pay you well for them." Getting paid for ideas being something entirely new to me, I did not know just what to say, but managed to gasp out, "All right!" and then he was gone. Now, I suppose he means by the typical Oaklander (I have hunted out "typical" in the boss's Webster) some fellow that has got all the vices and virtues of this place. I'm blessed if he ain't a rum one, and if all the Academy of Sciences are like him, I don't want to belong to that crowd, you hear me. But as it is a question of coin, I suppose I'll have to go ahead. A young man came here the other day, took a room, and left word at the desk that his baggage should be called for at the express office. He didn't have any baggage, but he had the nicest whiskers that ever bloomed on the face of mortal. He wasn't a day here before he knew all the ladies in the hotel, and the way he'd abuse the beef-steaks and chops, and talk of the cooking at the Paris Exposition, made him, I tell you, no end of a swell. I was going to make out his bill one day when he handed me as fine a cigar as was ever smoked, and I didn't have the heart to do it. He's here yet, and don't do anything but smoke cigars, play billiards, and talk to all the pretty women about Paris and Saratoga. He's a typical one, I tell you, be is. But (confound the job that scientific fellow has given me) what's he typical of? That's what I can't get hold of. When Oaklanders go to Paris and Saratoga, they generally keep them there for their "cultyaw," for I've heard travelers say that there's enough of that sort of thing here to double discount Boston. Well, that's one typical fellow anyhow, and if my friend don't like him, he can pass on to the next. Here he gets me again. Why didn't he say how he wanted his typical, married or single? There's lots of married ones here that stay, and, you bet you, I have the studying of them, if working out their accounts and sending 'em piles of bills is study. I know the old staggers, the tough ones so to speak, and Lord! they are tough. Why, one fellow will grab up the stock list in the morning and fetch a groan that you can hear clear down in the pantry, and I know he don't own a share of stock. Then he comes up to me, and hits his breast a thump, and says, "Emerald, me boy, Flood, Fair, and Mackey are trying to ruin me; but I'll get even with them yet, I will, if I have to blow the Nevada Bank as high as Haman's kite. Just let that little bill go over till next week, will you?" Well, now, if he ain't a "typical," I've got none in this house. I guess he'll do as well for my friend as any I can pick out. Now, there's another one, a she "typical," and a stunning one she is, I bet you. She is a widow, she says, and I believe her. (Here occurs a great blot in the manuscript, which I conjectured was the result of Mr. Emerald being suddenly interrupted in his literary work. I shall endeavor to decipher the rest of those interesting observations for next week.)

ENTRE NOUS.

We do not believe there can be found beneath the blackest browed so ugly a mug, with so mean a nose, that its owner would desire to bite it off in order to spite the face that it does not adorn. Yet we heard a German at Duncan's Mills charge one of his fellow workmen with doing that same thing. He said: "I have not read dot Constitution. I work in the Tyro Mill. I makes lumber. I am a poor man, but I don't makes my money out of poor men. Rich men in San Francisco builds fine houses dot buys lumber, dot makes the mills go, dot makes the railroad go, dot makes business go, dot makes wages go, dot makes money go. Ven money goes I get some, ven no money goes I got none. You go for Kearney. You bite your nose off to sbite your face. Ain't it?"

Margaret and Arthur, Duke and Duchess of Connaught, have cost England a pretty penny. It is reported that the price of fitting up anew the royal yacht Osborne for their trip is about $100,000. And trade is bad, and work is on the verge of starvation. Some virtue in a republic.

ARCHERY NOTES.

"There is no royal road to archery." This remark fell from the lips of a very pretty young lady at the Merry Foresters' range, on last Saturday, after she had missed the target three times in succession. She had been paying too much attention to one bow to the exclusion of the other (perhaps the spelling should be different, but you can catch the joke all the same). Ladies can't expect to shoot well unless they practice constantly, and when they do practice, they turn out just as good and perhaps better shots than gentlemen. Miss H. understands this thoroughly, and is becoming very expert, being able to hit two onions at sixty yards now, whereas one was the extent of our skill some weeks ago. The practice matches last Saturday showed steady improvement, particularly in the case of the Merry Foresters, Mr. Hunt, Mr. Eyre, and Mr. O'Connell making good scores at the fifty-yard range. Mr. James Ireland, an experienced archer, has joined the Foresters, and will be a valuable addition to the team at the tournament. The Bow Club are systematic workers. Mr. A. Havens is doing better every match, and Richard Bush, "than whom a steadier archer never drew string," is getting over his spasmodic phenomenal scores, and settling down to a steady average. Mr. George H. Hutchins, who for many months sneered at the long bow, pronounced it a weapon fit only for women and children, and altogether useless when the hide of a panther or a grizzly bear came in question, is now converted to the bending wood, and has indeed become a perfect enthusiast. Mr. Hutchins is fond of roving archery, and shooting the other evening at a squirrel which browsed on a portion of his domain, very nearly terminated the existence of a valuable bantam cock, a breed for which Mr. Hutchins is justly celebrated. Miss Ida A. made as good a score at the thirty-yard range as has come under my notice since the opening of the season, marking twenty-one in nine consecutive arrows, that is each shot scoring seven. Mr. Frank Havens made his best score at thirty yards last Saturday, and Mr. Ghiradelli, who, though he has not had much practice, has good aptitude for the sport, marked a goodly row of fives and sevens, with a few golds wedged in at forty yards at the Merry Foresters' range. The Pacific Archery Club is not idle. Mr. Darneal, Mr. Maxwell, and indeed all the members—ladies and gentlemen—never omit their Saturday practice. As the final arrangements for the tournament are now under discussion by the Executive Committee, those clubs throughout the State, and individual archers, who have not yet corresponded with the Secretary, Mr. Dan. O'Connell, are requested to address him at Oakland, so that an estimate of the number of clubs and archers competing may be obtained. Every one who can pull a bow should come in, for there yet remains two months in which to practice, and great things may be achieved in archery in two months. A party from Virginia City tried their skill at the Oakland targets last week. Mr. D. E. McCarthy, of the Virginia Chronicle, who is used to stretching things, pulls a good bow, and made a very fair score for one so long and so much out of practice. Mrs. McC. and Mrs. W., of Virginia, took their first lessons, and left California with the firm resolve of starting an archery club in Virginia without delay. QUIVER.

The Artists' First Annual Ball.

On Tuesday evening, the 29th of this month, we are promised the Artists' First Annual Ball, under the management of the San Francisco Art Association. We presume from the announcement that this is to be the initial entertainment of a series, to be given one each year. It is customary in the Atlantic cities to have one grand annual assembly, known as the society ball of the season—such, for instance, as the charity ball of New York—managed by well known ladies and gentlemen, and bringing together, as a sweet Vassar graduate would say, "just the nicest people in town." A double purpose is served by these pleasant gatherings—they furnish an evening's enjoyment, and contribute substantially to some worthy object. Heretofore San Francisco, although a city much given to gayety, has never boasted any single entertainment which could be looked forward to, and remembered, as the most elegant and enjoyable affair of the fashionable season. The artists' ball, as we understand it, is intended to fill this "aching void." The Association rooms, with the addition of those of the Bohemian Club—the use of which has been so kindly tendered—are admirably suited for this purpose. To the large collection of paintings and statuary, with which they are at present adorned, will be added such appropriate decorations as the combined artistic taste of Messrs. Garabaldi, Voegtlin, Tavernier, Williams, and Straus may suggest, and the saloons, when ready for the guests, will doubtless present a most fairy-like and enchanting appearance. The invitation tickets are being engraved from a drawing by one of the artist members, and will be ready for delivery on Monday, the 21st inst. In the meantime, those who intend going should leave their names as soon as possible with Martin, the assistant secretary, at the rooms of the Association, 430 Pine Street. The number of invitations will, under no circumstances, exceed five hundred, and already about half that number have been subscribed for. Supper, which is included in the cost of the ticket, will be furnished by the Maison Dorée—verbum sap. But it is hardly necessary to go into particulars. The names of the gentlemen comprising the various committees are a sufficient guarantee that every detail will be fully and properly looked after, and the ball in all respects a grand success. The object—to aid in building up and advancing the Association—is one we can heartily recommend. Our School and Gallery of Art now fill an honored niche among the noble institutions of the city, and it is the wish of their managers to make them second to none in the United States. All who have visited the School of Design, or attended its annual exhibitions, will bear witness to the interest shown and progress made by the pupils, and realize the good which must result from such culture. In addition to the artists' spring and fall receptions, it is designed to make the rooms a place of resort at all times for those who love the beautiful in art and feel disposed to encourage native talent. In conclusion, we have only to say that the artists' ball will undoubtedly be the handsomest entertainment ever given in San Francisco, and no one with any society pretensions or artistic appreciation can afford to stay away.

MEETING OF ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA.

[After the death of Caesar, was formed the second Triumvirate, of which Mark Antony was the greatest. Having firmly established his power, he hastened to display its pomp. Passing over to Greece, and making some stay in Athens, he thence proceeded to Asia, journeying from kingdom to kingdom, attended by conquered monarchs and giving away crowns and states with lavish hand. To exhibit now his glory, and render more brilliant still his triumph, he summoned Cleopatra, Queen of Egypt, to appear before his tribunal at Tarsus, to answer the charge of conspiracy against Rome; that she who had held Caesar captive in her chains, might bow to his power. In all the splendor of her beauty, most gorgeously displayed, the Semiramis of Egypt approached. Scorning the very appearance of homage the haughty Eastern syren came with the sole intention of captivating Antony. He, fascinated by her charms, forgot his ambition and became her willing slave.]

The arms of the proud Roman had triumphed over all. His eagle flew, victorious, o'er vanquished tower and wall; The chiefs of the Athenians, the sovereigns of the East, Honored his haughty progress, his stately train increased. While tribute here he levied, a crown he there bestowed, What wonder that this Consul with pride of conquest glowed? What wonder, then, forgetting that I, whose proud blood came From Cheops and Cephrenes, of Ptolemy's great name— That I, upon whose bosom Love lay with pinions furl'd, Had but to raise my eyelids to subjugate the world! What wonder, then, forgetting that I, of Pharaoh's line, Unconquered monarch, reigned by right yet more divine— By right of woman's beauty, than crown far higher power! Forgetting this, he summoned, and set apart an hour When I to him should answer at Tarsus, on the plea Of treason 'gainst the city—'gainst Rome, conspiracy. O Isis and Osiris! I heaped your altars high; I fed the black bull Apis, laughing at triumph nigh. And swore, by sacred Nilus, by Typhon, and each god, To measure with the Consul my smile against his sword, To make him feel that Egypt was queen in more than name, And Cleopatra's sceptre more potent than his fame. For, as in arms of Venus the fiery Mars lies still, So knew I that this Roman would bow him to my will. In galley bravely gilded, with sails of Tyrian dye, And oars of silver sweeping to sound of melody, Reclined I on rich cushions, spangled with stars of gold, Whose gleam my eyes' dark splendor outshone a thousand fold, While rose and sank my bosom, e'en as the swelling tide, In languid, soft pulsation; loose tresses, ebon-dyed, Fell heavy o'er the pillows, as drapery o'er me fell, And veiled the curves voluptuous, which Caesar loved so well; Rare fragrance of burnt incense, with breath of cassia blend, Perfumed the airs that fanned me, with passion eloquent. More fair than Trojan Helen, I, Egypt's Empress, came In all Astarte's glory, the Roman's pride to tame. The head of the Triumvir, he, proudest of the three, Gazed on me but one moment—then bowed he down to me. Like as the soons on Atlas down to the heated plain, Beneath the rays of Phœbus, in torrents rush amain, So, melted by my beauty—the radiance of my smile— He poured his soul before me, Enchantress of the Nile! And, as that Nile upriseth and floods the thirsty field, So did I, Ethiop's sovereign, love to the Roman yield. The blood of all the Pharaohs leaped through my veins like fire When to my conquered captor I granted his desire. As doth the amorous sunbeam the dewy flower-cup sip, Within his arms he held me, and feasted on my lip; Draining Love's sweet elixir, I sank in his embrace; Theo, with moist lips half-parted, I gazed upon his face! Lips breaking into laughter, blood-red with passion's fire, Now, curved with scornful triumph—now, warm with strong desire; Laughing that Roma's proudest lay captive in my arms, Reveling in the lover won by my woman's charms, Exulting that though Caesar above his queen loved fame, This more impetuous soldier my kiss alone could tame; So, lighting flames far brighter than e'er on altar shone, Till he, the world's great Tribune, knew but my will alone. No stern, ice-blooded Caesar, no calculating lord Weighing 'gainst Cleopatra his honor and his sword— But Antony, a hero, for whom my crown and throne Were doubly worth the losing so that his love were won! Like very gods we feasted, the sparkling wine outpoured; Still sacrificed to Bacchus, as Eros we adored. Wrapped in his warm embraces, while Sirius lit the dome, What cared I then for Egypt, or what cared he for Rome? He held—Rome's haughtiest Consul—this, every boon above, By my rich kiss made royal, immortal by my love. My fragrant breath inhaling, which e'er inflamed anew, The frenzied blood sent molten his throbbing pulses through. Half maddened by the rapture, his touch's magic charm, I clasped, and kissed, and held him, to fire, delight, and calm. So lay we, steeped in pleasure, till dawn had veiled the stars, I yielding love like Venus to him, my Roman Mars, Until the war-note's summons did 'mid soft music rare, While breath of lotus-blossom grew faint on odorous air; Till he, who came to conquer, lay conquered by my side— Gave up for Cleopatra, the world, his fame, his bride. Of all my glorious triumphs, this shall their lustre dim: He, Latium's conquering Consul—I, conqueror of him!

SAN FRANCISCO, April, 1879.

NOTE.—A few evenings since, as a party of ladies and gentlemen sat discussing the somewhat tropical Cleopatra verses of Story, Olive Harper, and Mary Bayard Clark, one of the gentlemen banteringly said to an icicle of a young poetess present: "Now, if you could write—as you certainly can not—such verses as these, you would make an impression." The icicle thought she could write such verses. A wager was made to the contrary, and the lines above resulted. This bit of history concerning the production will make its reading the more interesting.

On Sunday last we visited Duncan's Mills, taking our trip from San Rafael, returning by Sausalito. We believe there is no more picturesque railroad ride in the world than this. Along the margins of San Francisco and Tomales Bays; through beautiful wooded glens with sparkling streams; through highly cultivated farming lands; through a dense primal forest, with foliage almost tropical; a soil fruitful beyond anything; climate agreeable, lands cheap, markets convenient, game and fish abundant—and all within three hours ride of a great commercial city. As we went whirling through this most attractive country, almost unoccupied—not one-fifth of its acreage having ever been vexed with the plow, and any portion of which can be purchased at a low price; splendid lumber forests, saw mills abounding for cheap houses houses and fences—we could not realize the fact that at that moment hundreds of broad-shouldered, well-muscled, stalwart foreign laborers were crowding around an elevated pig pen in San Francisco to hear an ignorant, beetle-browed Irishman, or a low, blasphemous plug-ugly German, curse God and America that their lives had not fallen in pleasant places. There is not a man of health and youth, with temperate, industrious, and economical habits, who has brains, that may not go out into the interior of this State, and who, dying at reasonable age, may not leave to his children the heritage of a good education and a landed estate, which in their native lands would rank them with the influential and the governing class.

If you do what you should not you must bear what you would not.

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

The repertoire announced for the first week of the opera is as follows: On Monday night, Lucia, with Litta (who has made her most marked success in this part) as the heroine, Pantaleoni and Lazarini; Wednesday, La Favorita, for which only Madame Roze is announced, but which will probably introduce Mr. Adams, who, it seems to me, has at least as much claim to mention as the prima donna, since he has more reputation, and is, from all accounts, an artist of equal, if not higher, rank; on Friday, Il Trovatore, with Cary as "Azucena," and, presumably, Roze, Lazarini, and Pantaleoni, and on Saturday evening, Mertha. This opera, besides Litta and Cary, will probably bring Mr. Westberg, the tenore di grazia, who is reported to have a very pure and beautiful voice, and excellent style. The prospects for a respectable chorus and orchestra have been seriously impaired by the announcement that the Passion is to be revived at the Grand Opera House; the forces that will be required for this rechauffé will undoubtedly be missed at the opera. It seems a little singular, indeed, that a manager who is perfectly familiar with the available material should undertake to carry on at the same time two performances, either of which, to be at all satisfactory, requires a chorus and orchestra that can only with difficulty be collected in this city. The result will probably be the usual one of opera with fairly good principals, scrub orchestra, scrub chorus, insufficient rehearsal, shaky ensembles, and liberal cuts. To be sure, we are pretty well accustomed to this sort of thing; but in this instance it seems as though it were to be needlessly dealt out to us, and at a pretty high figure at that.

The concert to be given in aid of the Musical Fund Society at Woodward's Gardens, on Monday next, promises to be an affair on a grand scale. A military band of two hundred performers, conducted by Messrs. Herold and Wetterman, will be assisted by a large male chorus; the programme is selected in a most catholic spirit, and ranges from Beethoven (Egmont overture) and Meyerbeer (selection from Roberto and Fackeltanz) to Zikoff and Stubbe, whoever they may be. The grand feature of the concert is announced as a musical representation of "The Battle of Sedan," by the grand orchestra, chorus, drum corps, a company of fusiliers, a monster drum, and more than monster born, cannon, etc.

I can not conceive a more pitiable object than a writer who, undertaking to criticise matters of art, finds himself so hopelessly ignorant of his subject that he is compelled to eke out his allotted space with mere drivel and personal gossip about artists—who, not being suffered to sit at the art-table as the peer of those who surround it, is forced to be content with a place underneath, where he can pick up the crumbs that fall, to carry into the columns of his Daily Bread in proof that in some sort, at least, he has "been there." Every art community, in every time, has been annoyed with pests of this species—vide Goethe; but in every such community they have eventually come to be estimated at their true worth.

That which is best in art is not always to be bought in open market, even as nature does not always disclose her choicest beauties to the first comer. The passage from the ear to the soul is often hopelessly narrow.

If, as Grant White says, there is nothing in music beyond what is appreciable by the most feeble or uncultured intellect—his own, par example—and no altitude of musical thought that may not be attained at a bound—a single hearing—by the untaught youth of musically-receptive quality, how are we to account for our Bachs and Beethovens, who, starting from the standpoint at which Mr. White finds the musical intellect already at its perfect fruition, spent their entire lives in the study, not only of their art, but of the works of those composers who had preceded them? One smiles to think of Mr. White taking in—"completely," as he says—as a youth of sixteen, the fifth Symphony of that Beethoven who was still occupied at the close of his life in "studying" (his own word) the oratorios of Handel.

Of musical annoyances besides the late arrivals and early departures, of whom I spoke last week, the chatters are one of the most dreadful pests of the concert room. These consist partly of enthusiasts who can not contain themselves, and gush into audible delight or irrepressible criticism, and partly of stupidities who, not caring about the music, are profoundly indifferent as to whether any one else hears it or not, and who must gabble or die. If they only would die—before coming to the concerts! It is at the better concerts that one suffers most from this class of nuisance: the gushers affect the good music, and can never await the end of a movement in order to point out the beauties of it to the sympathizing neighbor, and the better the music the worse the infliction to the majority—that after all goes mostly either because it is the proper thing or because somebody else goes—and the greater the need for a little conversation to help them through it. A bundle of Rigolot's Cinapisms in the hands of a set of discriminating ushers, to be incontinently applied on the appearance of the first symptoms, would be a positive blessing at most concerts, and would at the same time have the charm of novelty.

One of our young San Francisco musicians, Noah Brandt, who has been for the past four or five years studying at Leipzig, with Röntgen and Richter, seems to be making considerable headway, especially in composition, and has lately sent home a number of songs that are full of bright promise. One of these is to be published shortly by Mr. Gray, with the title-page illustrated by an original drawing by Mr. Toby Rosenthal.

There has been no way yet devised by any civilized nation by which a money-lender could be compelled to lessen his rates of interest for the use of money, and take upon himself any of the burdens of the borrower. Money can hide and land can not. England has her money laws, but if Lord Beaconsfield was a borrower he could not go into the money market and bring away a pound sterling for which he did not pay the rate fixed by the lender. His note might read six per cent. per annum, but he would be compelled to purchase something he did not want, and pay for it a value it did not possess.

AFTERMATH.

These Bank Commissioners are making hasty trips about the country certifying to the solvency of the banks. The Commissioners are honorable men, but the Commission is at once a farce and a sin. Everybody knows, who knows anything about it, that to ascertain the condition of a bank is an extremely difficult and tedious matter. In the larger institutions, like the leading ones in this city, it would be necessary to make a secret "descent" upon the bank, seal up its vault, capture and guard its books, stop its business, and consume several weeks in the examination of its affairs by a corps of experts. Nothing of the kind is done, or can be done; the whole business of examination is got through in a few hours, the Commissioners, knowing precisely as much as they did before, tell the public exactly what the directors had previously told it, the bank gets a "first-rate character," and is thereafter enabled to more securely and effectively complete whatever frauds it may happen to have in hand. A "Commission" of this kind is the "natural" and "obvious" "check" upon incorporated companies. It has the double merit of being the first thought of the reformer, and the first love of the thing to be reformed.

We are not concerned to deny that "irregularities" may be so awkwardly practiced that the Commission may by chance light upon their traces; the manager who is harmless as a serpent is not always wise as a dove; but we assert without hesitation or misgiving that the man who is morally competent and intellectually worthy to undertake a swindle of respectable magnitude has nothing to fear and much to hope for from this impotent device of the self-educated legislator—a Bank Commission. Whenever in his tackings and doublings to escape detection the bank mismanager comes to a soft place where his tracks would be visible he mounts the Commission and is carried across to firm ground as securely as the Saviour on the shoulders of St. Christopher. The difference is that the Commission thinks itself the Saviour and its rider the saint.

The State Supreme Court decided that under the present Constitution ex-Governor John G. Downey was not entitled to a bonus (in addition to interest) for loaning money of the Farmers' and Merchants' Bank, Los Angeles, of which he was president. And now the present Constitution is not good enough for ex-Governor John G. Downey.

The present Constitution is not good enough for Gen. Volney E. Howard. Of what bank, pray, was he the president?

Dun war-clouds staining all the blue
Affect the far horizon—
Chile, Bolivia, Peru,
Fight, and their hands in blood imbue;
The south wind brings their cries on.

"O sea-bird of the southern sea,
Tell me, with scream or gobble,
Whom do these heroes fight to free?"
Gravely the bird replies to me:
"For my discharge they squabble."

The Government having appropriated money for a harbor of refuge on the Oregon coast, every citizen of that commonwealth whose land runs down to the sea has taken a spade and gone to work making a suitable location. The shore line of Oregon has now some five hundred thousand indentations, and resembles a panorama of an apple pie pretty well sampled. Pending the decision, the engineers who are to make it are having a tolerably lively time of it, and think it rather hard that they should have to hunt a harbor of refuge for others having none for themselves, with the mountain counties yet to hear from.

"Two children of William McCallan, of Berry Creek, Butte county, were lost while out hunting a cow on Wednesday last. They were afterward found, but the younger had died of exhaustion."—Exchange.

Ye that without an inner sense,
Alert, attentive, and intense,
Have scanned these words with careless mien,
Nor heard the sound of sobs between—
Ye that without a pang have read,
Nor felt upon your hearts the tread
Of little feet that strove to gain
Familiar ground in vain, in vain!—
Pray thus: "O Father, thanks ad praise
For loveless nights and dreary days.
Thy bounty's great, exaction mild—
I thank thee for my neighbor's child."

It is pretty clear what is going to be made by the Republican party a "leading issue" in the next Presidential campaign. It may be stated thus: "Shall the negro be driven from his hearthstone?" All of a sudden, as by a preconcerted arrangement with some central authority, he has begun to leave "de folks on de ole plantation" and "cross de mountain" into Kansas in multitudes that darken the earth. The crowds behind push on the crowds before, and still successive ranks of shining faces appear above the southern horizon to gild the hopes of the Republican editor. For as yet the movement is visible to no eye but that of the journalist; this interminable host is too sacred a mystery for any but the priesthood of the party, who minister "behind the veil." Mississippi has not seen it leave, nor Kansas arrive, but to the New York Tribune and Times the "Exodus" is a very rousing reality indeed, and the crocodile tears that these estimable journals shed for the wrongs of the exiled blacks may be regarded as the first big drops of the political storm that shall anon drown the Democrats out of their holes.

That the negro tears himself away from the scene of his early struggles and final triumph rather than not be in a position to vote for General Grant is a proposition not yet definitely formulated and enounced; it is reserved for a later stage of the "campaign." Enough for the present to say, as one journal elegantly does, that "they are fleeing from political ostracism." That is the body-color of the picture; the outline can be drawn, and the harrowing details painted in with more sombre pigments, hereafter; when the completed canvas will show a bedraggled and blood-hounded black (with an emaciated female of his species and a pickaninny bearing an inconsistently beetling stomach) clasping the knees of the protecting Ulysses in an orgasm of gratitude, while the Goddess of Liberty, fearfully and wonderfully bestarred-and-striped, scowls defiance at a pursuing band of slouch-hatted bulldozers, balked of their prey and brandishing the impotent revolver and the baffled bowie. We should not be surprised if Mr. Nast were to foreshadow something of this kind in the next Harper.

On the other hand, it is increasingly apparent that the Democrats are going to enter this fight without a suitable "slogan." They have not a decent grievance themselves, and were never known to adopt the grievances of others. Moreover, they have "captured the capital," where they have not only their own way but their own way of having it. True, they can, and probably will, revive the cry of "Fraud," but that cock won't fight; we shall cheerfully admit that the man with whom we have done, and who did not meet our wishes, was illegally elected. Hayes is a grape-stone spit out; we stole the grape, if they will have it so.

"Shall there be Federal supervision of elections?" "Will freemen endure the presence of soldiers at the polls?" These are spirited and stirring conundra, and would serve a campaign purpose admirably, but with blind and improvident precipitancy the Democrats have them already in process of solution by another method than the defeat of a Republican nominee for the Presidency—the subjection, that is to say, of the actual incumbent. The Democracy is exhausting its ammunition before joining battle—like the savage who uttered his war-whoop until he was too weak to fight.

Altogether, the Presidential canvass that is already begun bids fair to be rather uninteresting. We fatigue already of the sempiternal nigger, and feel for his grievances (Kansas included) only that smallest unit of solicitude, a continental damn's worth. The Democrats may eat him if they like; he has ceased to vote the Republican ticket where he is, and we can elect our man without him. If parties again divide on the nigger we shall have nothing to do with either their antipathy or their infatuation, for we can excel them in both, and shall straddle the blind of Democratic prejudice by persecuting our Chinese, and go one better than Republican liberality by befriending ourselves.

Chronicle Charles Warren Stoddard
"Supped full of horrors" and foddered
On leprosy, then
Down his throat thrust his pen,
And the vial of plague was unsoldered.

An officer of the detective police testified, the other day, that Spiritualists gave the force a great deal of unnecessary trouble by volunteering information; and it is only after their "clews" have been proved worthless that they confess the information came from the "over the river." We wonder if it has occurred to the head of the department to kill these miscreants. The suggestion is made with a diffidence which we hope is characteristic; it is not impossible that a sufficiently good effect could be produced by maiming them. Harsh measures should be avoided if admonition will serve.

Oakland proposes to fine and imprison persons who visit opium dens, and Brown, who neither lives in Oakland nor smokes opium, avers that if the ordinance is passed he will leave his lodgings and go to Mexico. He will there meet Smith, who, in the event of the new Constitution being adopted, and all property imperiled, will also go to Mexico if he can borrow money enough to get there. It's a bad outlook for the future of free institutions when the Browns and Smiths begin to sacrifice at the shrine of Principle—the former breaking up the lodging-houses for altar-fuel and the latter raiding their neighbor's pastures for victims.

We warn the gluttons and gourmets, who in their devotion to the great Belly-God neglect their political duties to the State, that when the new Constitution has shut up the markets and restaurants they will not find its provisions very good eating.

The man whose name was not mentioned in the "society" columns of last Tuesday's Call is hunting for the editor with a gun. He says the omission is without excuse; he is a man and brother, and was in town. We are sorry to suggest an explanation that may prevent the effusion of blood, but—hasn't he recently had his hair cut, or something?

A caviling contemporary complains of "the law's delay," resulting from the postponements of trials for convenience of counsel. A lawyer commonly has charge of a good many cases, and he can not be in two courts at once. If he can have but one client at a time we must have more lawyers. Is our contemporary prepared to face that alternative?

By the way, we observe that those persons complain most of the law's delay whom the law has most frequently overtaken.

"The asses throughout the State are expected to kick against the new Constitution."—San Diego Union.

What monstrous fallacy is here—
Truth topsy-turvy on its ear!
This fundamental law of things
Itself is purely asinine;
The world, good friend, will not be tricked,
For asses kick not, but are kicked.

Mr. Ernest Rénan has been elected a member of the French Academy. They have rewarded him because he wrote the life of Jesus. Ah, what would they not have done for him if he could have taken it?

"O Pred!" exclaimed a pretty woman to her husband the other day, after a fit of coughing during which she rattled from her mouth to the sidewalk—"I'm my teec!" "Well," said her brute of unrepentant husband in again." Now, obviously, she couldn't.

AN ARTISTIC INFATUATION.

"Mademoiselle Velours" was the name Fanny Stanton gave to a certain young lady, the first time he saw her sitting in a corner of Mrs. Rob Roy's parlor.

When I say "the first time," I must explain that she came to Mrs. Rob's musicales, etc., very often, and always sat in the same place, which came after a while to have the meaning of a throne.

And when I say Fanny Stanton, I don't want you to be so stupid as to mistake the sex of the name, for Francis Stanton, Esq., had only caught that pretty sobriquet from his comrades, because of a ladylike gentleness which they rather revered after all.

Fanny had just returned from Europe, which he had been "doing" in company with some energetic Californian families, among them two or three young girls of the "Daisy Miller" type. He had picked up a score of little affectations that called forth a good deal of "chaff" from his young stay-at-home friends. He was an amateur artist, a fickle dilettant who raved more than ever over the technique of his would-be profession. He had an amateurish studio, where he played at painting, and had little dabs of landscape and portraiture stuck round in favorable lights. But beyond and above his airy art devotion he took a keen pleasure in picking to pieces new people, not after the orthodox gossip-method, but in a dreamy analytic fashion, which was as well known as his other weaknesses, for he was in turn dissected by half a dozen or so faisant acquaintance. He had been immensely bored since he came home, and found nothing to please him, so he went to Mrs. Rob's because he was at liberty to growl there as much as he pleased. But he forgot his grievances when he saw Mademoiselle Velours.

"No, thank you, I don't care for an introduction just yet," he said, lazily, when his dovelike little hostess noticed his interest, and thought to promote it.

She looked at him an instant, and then laughed softly. "Very well; just as you like. Come to me when you are ready."

Mrs. Rob's was one of the houses which you find only once or twice in a lifetime. People seemed to leave their malformations outside her door as devout Mussulmans do their shoes, and though nobody made conversation, there was always plenty of it. Everybody did as he pleased, and was not made to pay a mental tax, so there was always any amount of nice people doing the nicest possible things for the benefit of the non-accomplished, and, master marvel of all, they were appreciated.

You will not find Mrs. Rob's name in the Elite Directory; indeed, it is doubtful whether she knows there are such "helps to society." So, while a jolly little girl with a fresh young voice sang some breezy ballads, Mr. Stanton put himself into a convenient chair and watched Mademoiselle Velours. He wondered if she would purr if he stroked her. He thought she had not moved since he first caught sight of her, except to lift the heavy lids of those purple black eyes. Her hair was the same shade, and the sultry brunette skin was just touched with an underglow of red in her cheeks and lips. She had on a velvet dress of the tint of a falling leaf; a gold brown—how else can I describe it? And if she were rather over dressed for so small a party, nobody but a surly critic would have dared to say so. Her careless attitude, her tropic beauty, her complete repose in the midst of the gay sparkle about her, touched the young man with the same swift pleasure one feels in drawing his finger-tips over the silky fur of some beautiful animal; it is a fascinating magnetism, a purely physical delight.

After a while Mr. Stanton remembered his duty to the world at large, and went around making himself agreeable, as he very well knew how, but by and by he came back to his first position.

Two or three young men had approached his lazy beauty, and were evidently urging some request, but she only turned her head slowly and said something to one of them, which Stanton could not hear, but which seemed very decisive, for the discomfited cavaliers moved away soon after with an aggrieved expression on their faces.

Fanny did not seek his introduction that night, but he made his appearance at Mrs. Rob's very promptly the next Thursday. He did his society salam to his hostess mechanically, and with a curious flutter of impatience made his way into the next room. There he drew a long breath of satisfaction. Mademoiselle was there.

An hour later Mrs. Rob heard a soft voice behind her murmur: "If you please, I am ready."

She laughed. "So soon," she said, without looking round, "you are impatient." But she presently excused herself to the gentleman with whom she was talking and laid her hand lightly on the young man's arm. She was rather astonished at his grave silence, for she was accustomed to his rhapsodies over every new whimsey, and enjoyed them immensely, but now she made no comments, only presented him gracefully to "Miss Sunderland."

The young lady changed her position a trifle, and her head drooped like a flower; it would have been high treason to call the movement a bow.

"Mr. Stanton is an artist, Judith," Mrs. Rob said, with a comical expression, "and if he stares at you you need not be either complimented or vexed, for he is only studying you from a professional point of view."

Stanton dropped into a low chair as she moved away, and glancing up to see what effect her speech has produced, looked straight into Miss Sunderland's dark eyes.

"That was very kind of our hostess," he said gently, "but she did not know I had been staring at you for an hour already. That is a sin for which I must get absolution myself."

She looked at him with a strange expression. "I will give you absolution," she said at length, in the low, rich voice Stanton had been waiting for. He had a theory about voices, which he clung to bravely, in spite of its frequent upsetting, and it made him quite happy to find it firm in this instance. "Thank you," he murmured; "you make me brave, you make me audacious. Some day I shall be wanting something more than absolution."

She smiled a curious, shadowy smile, but it encouraged him. He knew he was not following the regulation routine of conversation, but a womanly instinct, and the crepuscular interest in the girl's face lured him on.

He was going to be specially audacious this instant, and tell you something about myself. Mrs. Rob Roy did me wrong when she called me an artist. I am only a dauber. But then I have so many fancies that if they were shaped visibly I should be immortal. Isn't that better than being an artist?—or is it being one? And sometimes I find a reality which is so much fairer than my fancies that I forget which is earth and which cloudland. If we could only keep our fingers from tingling with that desire for reproduction there would be no more studios, my fair realities would remain the wonders of the world, and I should not be asking you to let me put you on canvas."

Miss Sunderland had followed him intelligently enough at any rate, and at this impulsive climax she smiled again—the same intangible, untranslatable smile.

"I always wanted a picture of myself," she said slowly.

"But if it should turn out to be a travesty. I am brave, but not brave enough to promise anything akin to perfection."

"I am not afraid," she murmured, looking at him sleepily from under her long lashes.

To a vain man there might have seemed a tinge of coquetry in her manner, but our friend Fanny had a certain humility which was proportioned to the glory of the idol he happened to be worshipping. His conceit took a different turn from that of most men, and spread itself out into numberless little mannerisms, rather agreeable than otherwise.

"I don't believe you ever have seen Mrs. Rob's pet picture," and as she looked uncomprehending, "may I show it to you? And if you do not like it, why—I will turn my back on it for ever."

Miss Sunderland rose slowly, and, ignoring Stanton's proffered arm, walked at his side with a careless grace which was another satisfaction to this fastidious young gentleman.

As they moved away, a lady rose from a seat near by and followed them. A pale, correct-looking woman, with black hair and eyes. She was severely simple and precise in her dress—so much so as to seem almost old-fashioned; and she had the close-set lips and the anxious face-lines which are the mask of care.

"I think we must go home now, Judith," she said, touching the girl.

"I am not going home," said Miss Sunderland, in a tone which was not indifferent, not careless, not defiant, and yet perhaps was all three; and the two voices startled Stanton as the likeness between the women had startled him. They were the same and they were not the same, but one jarred against the other; he could not quite tell which was out of tune. "I will come back presently," his companion added, and they passed on, only to encounter Mrs. Rob in the doorway.

"I am going to show Miss Sunderland your fetch in the gray room," said Stanton, by way of explanation. "She has never seen it."

"No. I was afraid she would admire it too much," said Mrs. Rob, drily, and looking not over-pleased; then she glided swiftly away to look after a belated guest, leaving Stanton to wonder what she meant.

Their "presently" covered so much time that he thought it necessary, when they returned, to ask for an introduction to Miss Sunderland's anxious guardian—who was, of course, her mother—and to apologize for having detained the young lady so long. Mrs. Sunderland looked at him earnestly, or, as Stanton expressed it, "looked into him," and was apparently satisfied, for she thawed out a little, talked to him some time, and finally permitted him to put them into their carriage.

Some unpleasant business and some unfulfilled engagements caused two weeks to pass before he presented himself again in Mrs. Rob's parlor. When he came in he glanced eagerly round, even while he chatted to that clear-eyed little woman; and, by way of revenge, she let him wander about for some time before giving him the final douche. She came upon him in a corner, a trifle cross, and more than a trifle bored.

"How did Miss Sunderland like my picture?" she asked, sitting down beside him. "She is not here, so you can express yourself freely."

His countenance fell.

"Poor boy, had you been hoping? You must not be too greedy; is it not enough that you are known as the Pygmalion who has wakened our magnificent statue? I'm sure I'm quite proud of you."

"She has promised to sit to me," said Stanton, dreamily.

"When?"

"There was no time arranged."

"Now, I wonder," said Mrs. Rob, meditatively, "what touch of nature there is to make a kinship between you and Judith Sunderland. She is like no girl I ever met. She has had dozens of offers in spite of her indifference and rudeness, and she—"

"Pardon me," said Stanton, artfully; "I am sure that your judgment of her is perfect. Let me see how nearly I can come to perfection. We will exchange opinions when I have had a closer acquaintance with the young lady."

"Which is a polite way of telling me to hold my tongue. You don't want your artistic study tampered with? Well, so be it. But am I not good-natured to submit to this?"

"You are the cleverest woman, the most delightful friend, the most—"

Here Mrs. Rob laid her pretty fan softly across his lips; and, lest somebody may think her a flirt or indiscreet, let me tell you there was a Mr. Rob Roy who would have indorsed the suppressed eulogy and applauded the author of it, if he had overheard his speech; and Stanton's was the purest homage that could be offered to a woman. He bade his hostess good night soon after this conversation, and she did not see him again for several days.

One night at the theatre, when she was making the tour of the house with her opera-glass—to avoid weak tear-shedding over Clara Morris—a hand pushed back the curtain of a proscenium box opposite, and Stanton's serious profile appeared above Miss Sunderland's Parisian bonnet. Mrs. Rob would have whistled had she been a man; as it was, she only gave her husband's arm a little pinch and said: "Look there!"

"Well, that's nothing to do high tragedy about. I hope this sort of thing isn't catching. You shan't come any more if it is. I must say they make a rum pair. Miss Judith will lead poor Fanny a fine chase," and Rob Roy chuckled.

His wife looked at him compassionately: "That's all you know about it."

"Well, that's enough to know, isn't it?" But she only shrugged her shoulders and turned away.

Stanton came round after a while to speak to them.

"You are pursuing your studies with a good deal of vigor," said Mrs. Rob.

"Miss Sunderland came yesterday for her first sitting," he answered, with a kind of subdued triumph.

"Truly, I shall believe in you hereafter," she laughed, looking at him admiringly.

"My dear fellow," interrupted Rob Roy, "do you know what you are doing?"

Stanton shook his head. "I don't want to know. I enjoy being deluded."

Rob Roy stared. "Well, you're frank at any rate. I just wanted to warn you, but if you like it, why it's all right;" but he continued to stare at this amiable lunatic for some time.

"Come down in two or three days, and tell me how I am doing," said Stanton when he went away. "I can't do Miss Sunderland justice, of course, but I have the right feeling about it, I am sure."

As the door closed on him, Rob Roy touched his forehead significantly. "Nonsense," said his wife; and just then the drop curtain ran up, and they surrendered themselves to the delights of the emotional drama.

Stanton was too prim to be a painter; the disorder of his studio was always an affected—an arranged disorder, a concession to the traditions of his trade. If he had followed his own inclinations, his painting would have been merely a decorative day-dream, but there was a lurking talent in him somewhere which make him a fair artist in spite of himself, and his big bump of approbation led him into some hard work, "just to please his friends."

Mrs. Rob was so curious that she could not wait long to make her visit. She found Mrs. Sunderland sitting in a noble, old Gothic chair, with a severe-looking book in her hand, and an expression of extremely tried patience on her face. She looked like one of Cotton Mather's congregation dropped into the city of hoodlums.

On a pile of cushions near by, her hands clasped above her head carelessly, Judith lay, or rather reclined, her eyes closed, her whole attitude expressive of luxurious rest. In her rather fantastic Turkish dress, with a circlet of tiny, gold coins crossing her low forehead and gleaming among the masses of her dusky, loosened hair, the wide, white sleeves falling away from her gold-fettered arms, she made so startling a picture that even Mrs. Rob caught her breath.

Stanton was sitting opposite, painting away as eagerly as if his life depended on it. He looked up and nodded as Mrs. Rob came in; Mrs. Sunderland slowly opened his eyes, and her mother closed her book and folded her white, lace-hung hands at mathematical angles. The intruder went over and sat down beside her. "Isn't this very tiresome for you?" she asked.

Mrs. Sunderland shut her thin lips a trifle closer. "Judith is very peculiar," she said with a sidelong glance at her questioner; "I have to humor her whims. I suppose this young man is perfectly harmless."

"Oh, quite so," and Mrs. Rob's eyes twinkled.

"I don't know a more innocent amusement for your daughter than this," she said cheerfully. "What effect Judith may have on Mr. Stanton is another matter, I presume."

Mrs. Sunderland bowed gravely. "I think," said she, "young gentlemen never suffer much from such associations. Their amour propre saves them from pain even if they become interested. Everybody admires Judith, but Mr. Stanton's admiration seems purely artistic."

Mr. Stanton, in the meantime, had left his work, and with his head thrown back, was contemplating his subject, apparently oblivious of everything else.

Mrs. Rob was obliged to confess that Mrs. Sunderland was right. No man in love ever looked at a woman like that, but then Mr. Stanton was not exactly like other men.

She went over and stood behind him. He started and smiled: "You see I have only made a beginning. I did not know it would be so difficult. It is easy enough to get her features, but there is an expression, a—something that baffles me completely."

"Was that dress her own caprice?" He nodded.

"I thought so; she is very beautiful," said his friend sincerely.

"Oh, yes, she is the realization of all the superlatives in the language," he exclaimed impatiently, "but I can't paint her."

"You will have to try, now that you've begun."

Stanton frowned. "She's very patient, I assure you, but I have a conscience."

"Well, I won't disturb the seance," said Mrs. Rob, who was rather bored; but she loitered around the room and tried to rouse Judith into something like animation, noticing, meanwhile, how deferential, how devoted Stanton was to the elder woman.

"I wish Rob could have gone with me," she said to herself as she walked down the street at last. "It is like a chapter out of a novel." And that evening she talked her patient husband into desperation on the topic uppermost in her mind. "Judith is magnificent," she said, "but she hasn't any soul. She treats her mother with the same abominable indifference she gives to every one else. She is as lustreless as a black pearl. I think Mr. Stanton looks at the daughter and talks to the mother. He told me she was remarkably intelligent. You see it takes the whole family to amuse him. You can't quite imagine, Rob, what a queer trio they make." And Rob laughed and said yes, he could just imagine it.

Mrs. Rob's "queer trio" came to her regularly every Thursday evening. Miss Sunderland always sat in the same corner, and Stanton monopolized her. She treated him with a sort of gentle toleration, and though she was as "lustreless" as ever, seemed to take a certain pleasure in having him near her. Mrs. Rob Roy always asked about the picture, and was always told that it was going on slowly. Once she inquired if Stanton was ready to compare character-notes, but he slipped away from the subject adroitly. "Which shows," said Mrs. Rob to her conjugal confidant, "that he is more interested than I supposed." By and by she noticed that her protégé was getting haggard and pale. "Fanny can't be dissatisfied," she thought; "I wonder what is the matter with him." He no longer dropped in to see her at odd hours, or came to a friendly dinner with them. But one dismal, foggy day, when she had barred the door to "company," he walked in without warning. She knew the Sunderlands were out of town, and somehow felt a thunder-storm in the air, but she only said, carelessly, "This is a novelty. Where have you been for the last week or so?"

"In the inferno," said Stanton, gloomily.

For a wonder Mrs. Rob did not laugh. I think she was a little frightened. "Tell me all about it," she murmured in her silkiest tones, which nobody ever tried to resist.

"There isn't anything to tell except that I've been a fool. I don't think I quite understand it myself. Do you believe in witchcraft?" and then, without waiting for an answer, he threw himself on the lounge and buried his face in his hands. Mrs. Rob waited patiently. By and by he sat up again. "What is the matter with Miss Sunderland?" he asked, abruptly.

"Well, she is very odd, but I don't know that there's anything special the matter with her," and Mrs. Rob opened her gray eyes very wide.

Stanton rubbed his hand over his own eyes wearily. "I can't shut her out," he muttered. "At first she rested me. It was perfect content just to look at her, and she was good enough not to drive me away. But after I began that cursed picture I seemed to lose my identity; I could not think of any thing else. I was wretched when I was away from her. If I shut my eyes I saw her as she looked the day you came into the studio. Do I love her? I swear to you I don't know. I only understand that I can't eat, or drink, or sleep till I see her again. You see what this infatuation has done for me. You can laugh as much as you like," but Mrs. Rob did not look as if she had the slightest desire to laugh. "Two days ago she got up abruptly before I had been painting half an hour, and said she was going home. When I remonstrated, she said, coldly: 'I am tired of the whole thing. I am tired of you.' That was all. You know how she would say it. Her mother seemed very much annoyed, very much disturbed. She begged me not to say any thing to Judith, and they went away. Wait," as Mrs. Rob tried to speak; "you would have thought that was conge enough for a modest man like me. I am modest, am I not? Well, it wasn't. I went to the house last night. The servants have been so used to my coming and going that one of them showed me directly into the room where Miss Sunderland sat, alone. I never had seen her alone before. She was dressed just as she had sat for her picture; she was in the same attitude. Well, she looked at me as if I had been a complete stranger.

"What do you want?" she said, softly.

"I don't know what I said. I think I must have acted like a madman; but she never moved, she never spoke until I stopped my raving. Then she lifted her head and looked at me eagerly. 'Do I make you suffer?' she said. Then I burst out again with my idiocy. She laughed a low, musical laugh—I had never heard her laugh before. It made her a thousand times more beautiful, but it made me angry; it gave me a little dignity at last. I turned away and went to the door, but she called me back. 'Come near,' she said; 'come nearer.' She looked at me steadily a long time. At last she murmured: 'I am glad I have made you suffer. I am glad you came to-day. I did not think you had it in you to suffer so,' and she laughed again. I turned away bewildered and dizzy. 'Good-bye, good-bye,' she called, and as I closed the door a sort of chanting echo of the words followed me—'good-bye, good-bye.' How could a man bear such insults? This time I did not look back, but I met Mrs. Sunderland on the stairs. What she saw in my face I don't know, but she pushed me aside and sprang past me like an arrow. I heard her go into the room I had just left and shut the door. Then I came away.

"That's a nice story to tell, isn't it?" continued Stanton, running his fingers through his fair hair, and rolling his head from side to side as if it pained him. "You would think I'd hate her now, but I don't. I don't hate her, I don't love her, but I want to see her again—I must see her again, and you must help me."

Mrs. Rob turned very pale. "It would do you no good. You must conquer this feeling some time," she said stoutly. Stanton got up and stood looking at her with an unpleasant smile.

"Do you think I haven't tried to conquer it? Do you think I enjoy this sort of thing?"

"I think it's of no use to reason with you now," said his mentor.

"Of course it isn't," he answered recklessly, "no more than it's of use to ask a man to steer for land when he falls overboard some dark night at sea. I don't want to be reasoned with. I want to see Miss Sunderland just once," he added coaxingly; "just once."

Mrs. Rob's heart yearned over her favorite. He looked so wretched. She deliberated, and was lost.

"I will try to manage it," she said at last, hesitatingly, "but I—"

"You are an angel!" he interrupted, and kissing her hand once, twice, thrice, was gone.

But before this much-abused woman had an opportunity to fulfill her promise she had a call from Mrs. Sunderland. It lasted two hours, and Mrs. Rob never told anybody but her husband all that passed between them.

The next morning the Sunderlands left on the overland train for New York.

When Stanton came in that evening Mrs. Rob met him with a guilty air, which he immediately detected.

"I could not help it," she began.

"Oh, that's all right," he said carelessly, "I saw her after all."

"When?"

"This morning when she went away," and then he sat staring at the wall a long time. Finally he broke out with: "Mrs. Sunderland said you had something to tell me."

His hostess' face flushed hotly. "She is very cruel, and you are foolish. It will do you no good to know."

"Go on," he said sharply.

"You must not blame Mrs. Sunderland," she stammered, offering defense, woman-like, before any accusation had been made; she felt very unhappy about the whole affair."

"Mrs. Sunderland is very kind," with sarcastic politeness. "I don't know why it should be supposed that I intend blaming anybody. You were about to say—"

"Oh, dear, you must let me tell it in my own way," exclaimed Mrs. Rob piteously.

"Well, in God's name, tell it in your own way," and he shut his eyes and threw his head back in the most exasperating fashion.

Mrs. Rob was indignant, but she remembered how sorely he had been tried, and began her story as stiffly as if she had been a witness in court.

"I've known the Sunderlands a year or two, but I never was very intimate with them; they had no very close friends. I always thought Judith very eccentric, but her mother told me they came of an eccentric family, and then her marvelous beauty and the homage she received from everybody were enough to account for that insolent indifference of hers. Any woman will be spoiled by such treatment. You know how even her mother indulged her whims. At one time it was Judith's pleasure to shut herself up and see no one; then for a while, she went everywhere. People raved about her when she first came out, and she chose to be very gracious, totally unlike the Miss Sunderland you knew. Finally, just before you came home, she relapsed into that indifference, and poor Mrs. Sunderland was so delighted when you roused her into something like interest that she did not think of the consequences. She implored me to tell you how highly she esteemed you." Here Mrs. Rob hesitated, and Stanton made a gesture of impatience and opened his eyes, which disconcerted her more than ever.

"They are going East to consult some eminent physician," she said, looking down and fumbling with her work, then abruptly—"can't you understand? Their family eccentricity means nothing less than hereditary insanity and Judith is—"

"I don't believe it!" shouted Stanton, jumping up.

Mrs. Rob was silent.

"And you don't believe it, either," he added.

"I don't know what to believe," she said, rather nervously; "her own mother ought to know what ails her."

"Is that all?"

"She loved you," said Mrs. Rob gently.

A dark-red flush rose to Stanton's face. "You have no right to tell me that now," but she went on:

"Mrs. Sunderland thought she was doing it for the best. She told Judith something—I don't know what—that you had been only pretending; that—well, that was enough."

Stanton groaned. "Judith Sunderland is no more mad than I am," Mrs. Rob pursed up her lips and looked very queer.

"You think we are birds of a feather, don't you?" he said with a harsh laugh.

She shook her head. "No, I was thinking of—something else," she said slowly.

"Well, it's no matter. I'm going away where I can think it all out by myself. Some day I hope to show you that I appreciate your patience and goodness," and then he went out into the night, and stumbled around the streets helplessly until morning.

In spite of his excited denial he did believe Mrs. Sunderland, and suddenly a good many things became clear which had always puzzled him. He was no longer haunted by Judith Sunderland's face, but the cessation of the unnatural excitement that had nourished him for weeks left a dull pain in its stead. It was as if he had come to a dead wall. He was no longer restless but lethargic. He tried to paint, but his fingers had lost their trick of touch. Mrs. Rob Roy was very good to him, very tender with him, and nobody but themselves ever knew why the romanza—which had been much commented upon in certain circles—did not end in a wedding march.

Stanton turned his picture to the wall, but one day I think it will see the light again; and if at some future art exhibition, sandwiched in between "A Sunset in the Foothills" and a monotonous "Fruit Piece," you should notice "The Oda-lisque," you can say that you know its history. Q. T.

SAN FRANCISCO, April, 1879.

Serious Reflections on the Taxation Subject.

If A loans B one hundred barrels of flour, and B gives a due-bill promising to deliver to A one hundred barrels of flour on demand, is A taxed for the due-bill as a solvent debt? If so, it is a correct principle that A, who loans $100 in money and takes his note, should be also taxed for the note, as well as B for the money. If A happens to owe Horace Davis for the flour, he can deduct amount from value of his due-bill; but if he owes it for Eastern flour, he is obliged to pay the tax. This is not equal taxation. If A does not owe anything on his $100 in money he has got to stand the tax on the note. As a swell capitalist, serves him right; no business to have the money. If A owns the flour free from debt, he has got to stand the tax on the due-bill as a solvent debt. This is simply double taxation, and is all fair enough if it is agreed, except that in the case of a poor fellow who deals in goods not produced in this State—he has got to stand more than his share. There is one thing I don't understand: how professional gentlemen can be made to pay their share of the running expenses (their stock in trade being invisible) without an income tax. A physician may realize $10,000 a year, and spend it all and not be taxed, while a merchant under the same arrangement has to come down on whatever he has in the shape of goods. A tax on brains should be levied and gauged according to the results. How will you reach the stock sharp? Say, take a mine in Grass Valley worth $500; tax it for $300. Now, one hundred people are interested in that mine, and have paid their money to help it along. Each one of these one hundred men own $1,000 worth of the stock, and it sells in the market for $14.50 per share. The question is, would you tax it again for $1,000, the amount the one hundred people paid, or the market value; and in either case would it be fair? Isn't it wading into deep water to tax anything beyond actual property? What is property? Gold, silver, bank bills—when they represent money not in the State—merchandise, houses, lands, sheep, and cattle—everything tangible and substantial. What good to go outside of this? Tax them once; isn't that enough? and saves a heap of bother. It isn't the unfortunate individuals who own the money or property which we wish to spite, but to raise the necessary money to meet current expenses, from property, whether owned by Tom, Dick, or Harry. The poor devil who has nothing pays nothing; if he should be so unfortunate as to get hold of anything, or have credit enough to borrow, it is right he should pay. If he don't want to pay, let him remain poor and escape the difficulty. J. S. G.

LITTLE JOHNNY ON THE NEW CONSTITUTION.

Ole Gaffer Peters he was to our house and he sed to Uncle Ned, ole Gaffer did: "Edard, them fellers wich made the new Constitution is mity smart men, yes in deed, jest like George Washon and Danuel Webster."

Uncle Ned he sed: "Yes, Gaffer, I dont think ether of the men you mention is to-day one bit smarnern them."

Then Gaffer he begun for to laugh, and he sed: "I never seen sech a igned feller like you be for to not kno they ben dead a long time."

But Uncle Ned he sed: "There's jest were you are mistook, cos Genel Washon is comander of the 2 Brigade of Milishia, and Danl Webster is Presdent of the Workmen."

Wen Uncle Ned he had sed that, Bildad, thats the new dog, he blank his eyes like the lite hurt em, and Mose wich is the cat opened hisn real wide, like oxes eyes, much as to say: "Wot a wopper?" But Gaffer he ony jest sed he bet them book riters and paper fellers wudent fool him agin in a hurry, and went off a shaken his hed. But next day he cum back and ast Uncle Ned was Geul Washon and Danl Webster aginst the new Constitution. Uncle Ned, he jump up and cracked his heels zgether like he was shot ded and sed: "Agin it, Gaffer, agin it? Wy, dum bust it all, dident thay fite ole King Gorge til the British Lion was jest sick and cudent thro it up? And dident thay draw up the Decoration of Injependence, and sing Yanky Doodle til thay was black in their faces? And wasent they took prisners at—at San Rafel; and dident Congres write a letter to King Gorge sayn if he didnt let em out there wude be trubble?"

Gaffer he sed: "Yes, yes, Edard, I kanew that, evry boddly kanows it wich has ben edecated at the deestrick schule. But wots it got to do with the new Constutution?"

Uncle Ned he thot a wile, and scarched his hed, and bime by he sed: "Yure sure you understude me, are you, Gaffer?" Gaffer he sed he did, and then after a other wile, and more scaratchin of his hed, Uncle Ned he sed: "Johnny, aint it curous he cant see the pint, aint it xtrounery how that Caronicle has drowd the wull over his 2 eyes?"

Then Bildad, thats the new dog, wich was lyn onto the Sundy Caronicle, he got up and slank away sideways, and Mose, wich is the cat, made a back and blew his tail up like a bloom, but Gaffer he ony sed he cudent see wot the wor of injependence had got to do with the new Constutution.

Jest then my father he cum in, and he sed, my father he did: "Its got this to do with it, thats wot. The man wich means to vote for it is unfit for to be a gest in this abode of perenel and pliticle virchue, and has got to cleer out mity lifely fore I sick my dog onto him. The feller thats in favor of taxin me out of house an home may call his self mity lucky if he gets out of it alife his ownself, cos Ide tackle him if he was a hundred years old jest evry bit as quick as I wude if he wasent only but one!"

Then ole Gaffer he sed he gest it was gittin on tord milkin time, and mabby Missis Doppy, wich is his dotter and has got the red head, you never seen sech a redn, had cum over to see him, and he had to git a patch sode onto the seat of his trousers fore the nite air cum on. Wen Gaffer was gon, and Bildad, thats the new dog, and Mose, wich is the cat, had got back from follern him, my father, wich had been laughin like he was a circus, he busted out, ol to once, and sed: "You may laugh, Edard, you may laugh til you make yurself sick a bed, but I tel you it aint no laughn matter. By onable industry and selfe denile, by the swet of my brow, by the practis of fair deeln by tween man and man, and by sech assistance as I have had from keepn up yure margins on mining stox, I have ben able for to git to gather this house and home as a pervision for my ole age, and for my whife an childern. Now dont tel me—dont you do it, Edard—that a lot of fellers wich has drank their up in wiskey, and plade it out in pitch 7 up, and fuled it a way on the poor, and wasted it on their brothers ded shure pints in stox, can send a lot of uther fellers jest like em to Sackramento for to rob me of this and divide it among theifselfs, and I must call it a pliticle question! Dont tel me, Edard, of onnest diffences of opinon a bout wether I shal be taxed out of all this, and a lot of slimy scaly wags taxed into it, jest cos there is 2 of them to any one of me. I tel you polittics has got nothin for to do with it, and the dad gommeed theef wich votes for the Constutution aint no better than a Demmycrat, and Ile lick him accordin'!"

Wen my father was a sayn it he got so xcited that he stamped a round the room like he was horses, and Bildad, thats the new dog, and Mose, wich is the cat, thay had for to keep a dodgin and a runin under things for to git a way, and wen he got dun he shuke his fist in Uncle Neds face, which started for to leave the room, but Bildad fassend onto his leg to once, and Uncle Ned he fassend onto Bildads neck, and then it was wich cude hold out the longest and make the most noise a bout it. Then my father he come to, and wen he see wot was up he tuke that new dog by the tail and flang him rite thru the windo into the hedge, and sed: "There must be harmny inside the party," and kicked Mose reel cruil, which hollered wild!

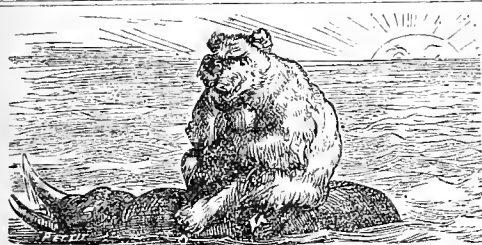

Then Uncle Ned he rubd his leg a wile, and then he loked at my father reel sollem out of his eyes, and bime by he sed: "Owin to the unfortunate state of yure pliticle under standin this mornin, and the divided counsels to wich it give rize, I spose I got to have hiderphoby, so I gess Ile jest make a clean brest of it fore I me past tockin. Ive ben a figgerin up our stock accounts, and, Henry, my dear feller, you are busted better nor a bilier, yes, my brother, you are gone innern than a fish werm."

Then my father, wich was wite like a sheet, he sed he wud bedam. And after a wile he sed Jerusalem. And then he spoke up a other time and sed hoppity Moses. Bime by he got up and woked a cross the flore 2 or three times, and then he sed: "By the jumpin jeeswax, the new Constutution wil put a end to this stock gamlin, and the contwisted robbers wich has got the pore meus munny wil have to disgorge like a eruption of horses and saddles from a Arizona buzzerd. Yes, in deed, ittle make the thing troppickle for em, and I me in for it like an ole maid for free love, you bet you."

Uncle Ned he ast him wude he reely vote for it, and he sed: "Do you spose I me sech a gum dasted gowk as to want to keep the Constutution that has busted me up? Ide vote for the new one if I had to hammer my ticket out of a cake of nitro glissereen, and the feller wich is bettern a dam Demmycrat!"

PUBLISHERS' NOTICE.

The Argonaut is published every Saturday, at No. 522 California Street, by the Argonaut Publishing Company.
 Subscription, $4 per year; six months, $2.25; three months, $1.50—payable in advance—postage prepaid. Sample copies free. Single copies, 10 cents.
 News Dealers and Agents in the interior supplied by the San Francisco News Company, No. 413 Washington Street, to whom all orders from the trade should be addressed.
 Address all communications to "The Argonaut, 522 California Street, San Francisco."

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 12, 1879.

As one of the editors of this paper, I am in daily receipt of personal and anonymous communications, some couched in the language of approval, some breathing the cowardly menace of threats and insult, and some like the extract herewith printed, indicating a doubt lest I have changed my relations to the working poor. I quote from the letter, omitting many flattering allusions, agreeable to receive in one respect, but not perhaps interesting to the general reader:

"In all your earlier career in California you were esteemed as the champion of the working class. You were looked upon as the workman's friend. Once—and well do I remember the occasion—in eloquent language you expressed your sympathy for that class, and loudly proclaimed yourself as identified with it. You were among the first to champion the rights of the oppressed slave. You fought manfully with that early band of eloquent Republicans in the cause of freedom, when it required both physical and moral courage to oppose the extension of slavery. You were among the first to pronounce against the policy of Chinese immigration. You were sent as ambassador to Washington. You gave your time, your services, and your talents before the Congressional Committee. On your return from Europe you were called a Communist, and yours is the only American journal in which I ever read a defense of the acts of the Paris Commune. Now, none so bold as yourself in opposition to the Kearney movement, no journal so audacious as yours in denouncing it. You stamp upon it as if it were a criminal conspiracy against the law, and not a reform within it. Have you become alienated from the working class? Have you lost your sympathy for the working poor? Is it generous in you to revive prejudices against the foreigners because this movement is largely under the control of adopted citizens? Have not all foreigners the same rights to agitate for reforms as I who you know am a native born?"

I have quoted enough to show the not unfriendly animus of the writer, and to indicate the tenor of its purport. It comes from an honest man whom I have long and favorably known. It demands a frank reply. I would not write my autobiography, nor would I omit the admission that I came from the loins of a Western farmer. Born upon not a large farm, I was one of those boys who did chores at morning and evening to earn the privilege of school—school, not in the summer, for the harvest-field demanded toilers; a fall and winter term was compensation for the spring plowing and summer harvest; a school where rudimentary branches of an English education was acquired, and in which the fiddle was not heard, nor was German and French taught; a school in which the wrestling match, the game at ball and bat, and kite, and marbles were our calisthenics. A later course in higher mathematics, in languages, and classics was not at the expense of a tax-ridden community, nor from the coffers of the State. So much is necessary to explain that I have no shame of birth nor pride of pedigree. Mine was the experience of the boys of the period. There were no rich men in my country. Our village had no millionaires. There was not a fortune of half a hundred thousand in all the country round. There were no servants in our family. My mother had "helps" in the kitchen, and my father had "hired men" upon his farm. There were no "class" distinctions in those days. We were all upon a common level. We had no rich nor poor, no social rank that came from family or coin. We all worked, and by the sweat of our daily labor we earned our daily bread. We had few, very few, foreigners in the rural districts when I was a boy. We were Americans born. I recall the first active foreign immigration. I remember the famine in Ireland. My father helped load the first ship of Genesee wheat for the starving Irish, and every kernel of it came back a full-grown Irish American politician. I remember the German inundation. I have seen the incursion as it poured in upon us, and I have never till now begun to feel how unfortunate it was that in the enjoyment of the unbounded plenty of a continent we could not have been more patient of development. Thus was I born to be in sympathy with labor; but it was labor, and not idleness, that demanded my sympathy. I was educated to be in harmony with working men; but they were working men, and not idle, vicious tramps. It was to American freemen that I gave my feelings, and not to insolent foreign agitators. I sympathized with the African slave because I thought he was wronged and injured—because he was not to be freed from enforced labor by the hand of a legalized crime.

I sympathized with the Commune in Paris because it was composed of honest and oppressed laborers; because it was tyrannized over by a profligate and corrupt dynasty; because the men who made Paris, and made France, could not vote, nor bear arms, nor make laws, nor earn money sufficient for their daily bread, and because they did not steal when they had power, did not murder when they held bayonets and cannon, did not plunder, and divide, and rob, and steal, when for five weeks they held that great, rich emporium of wealth and fashion in their grasp. I sympathized with them in their wrongs, I admired them for their moderation, and I wept with them when, seized by the ruthless military arm, they were fusilladed like dogs, and sent in exile to a distant penal settlement. I opposed the influx of Chinese because I saw in them an element that would interfere with our white laborers. I recognized that as workers they would work injury to our workers, and because I loved my white family better than this alien race, I was selfish enough to desire it to remain where God placed it, and to prevent it from coming to our coast. I was the friend of the African because he was in America as a captive of war; had been for generations; had rights equal to our own; and while I would protect all negroes in America, I would prevent any more Africans from coming if I could. I am the friend of the Chinese now here under the protection of an international treaty, and by virtue of an invitation of our laws; but I will have no more Asiatics come to our coast if I can prevent it. I would fight for the negro if oppressed or wronged. I would fight for the Chinese if oppressed or wronged. The black and the black-and-tan have the same right to be in the country as any foreign race that has found shelter under our flag. I resent, as the very height of foreign insolence and audacity, this Irish-Dutch-French-Italian-Scandinavian cry, that the "Chinese must go." The Irish, English, or German agitator that gives voice to it is an insolent and impudent varlet, and as cowardly as he is insolent. I was indignant when this ignorant mob of unwashed immigrants undertook by violence to dictate to us American citizens the treatment we should accord to the Chinese. I was mortified for my country when this festering pimple of the sand-lot burst into a running sore, and on a day set apart for thanksgiving to God for his abundant blessings overrun our streets with male and female tramps, following an ignorant Irish agitator upon a sorry dray horse, and he surrounded with a vile-breathed mob of foreign scum, to overawe and intimidate respectability. I was more surprised, more indignant, and more appalled when our own demagogues, our own and foreign politicians, our own and foreign criminals, idlers, tramps, prison birds, and their dupes, crystallized into a political party; and I was profoundly mortified when this gang of foul-mouthed agitators, and their dupes, could poll thirteen thousand votes in this first commercial city of the Pacific, and send its cooks, hair-dressers, corset-makers, spittoon cleaners, police court pettifoggers, and political demagogues, to make for us an organic law. Under the influence of a convention thus composed, I have seen the trade of our city paralyzed, commercial prosperity arrested, enterprises brought to a standstill, real estate values depreciated, money creeping to its hiding-places, confidence gone, credit destroyed, and every man who has anything to lose looking into his neighbor's face and asking him under his breath, "Where is this thing to end?" Is this fight of the ballot to end the conflict of agrarianism, or is it to be supplemented by the struggle with bayonets? Is American liberty lost, and the experiment of republican government a failure because of this incursion of foreigners to our shores, and by reason of the fact that they enjoy the elective privilege? Is this generous hospitality of ours to destroy our government, and are we to be overwhelmed in our own house because we have invited to it the oppressed and homeless of other lands? Is the prophecy of Macaulay and the forebodings of our early Fathers to be realized? And must we acknowledge that a democracy like ours must in the end look to a change that demands a standing army and a military leader to protect property, and save life from the assaults of the idle and the criminal? I am opposing this class. I do not believe in their necessities. I do not accept it as true that they are suffering from want of labor. I declare that it is my opinion that their opportunities are as good as mine were, and that if they are provident, industrious, and willing to labor there is no country in the world like ours for them, no place like this western coast of America. From the waters of Alaska to the Gulf of California, there is a broad empire of fertile soil for their occupation. There are unlimited primal forests for the ax, like that which my father swung, to clear his then western acres for the farm upon which I was born. There are inexhaustible quarries, mines of precious metals, coast and inland fisheries—wealth awaiting labor everywhere. Oregon is an empire in and of itself—grazing lands there for innumerable herds. Our western Sierra offers its broad belt of fruit lands to the toiler who will take them. Arizona is the treasure-box of the continent with its virgin mines of unexplored and illimitable wealth. These men are not poorer than I was when, on foot and on mule back, I tramped a continent in search of a place to work. They are not better than I was when, with pick and rocker, I lived beneath a tent of boughs during two rainy winters working in gulch and cañon for gold. They are a beer-drinking, whisky-soaking, good-for-nothing, idle set, who delight to hang about gin-mills and corner groceries, to plot in politics some mode for stealing the accumulations of my early toil. I have no sympathy with men who will not work, and women who, as domestic servants, bring insolence and idleness into our homes. I have nothing but contempt for the threats of this vicious mob and indifference for all its pangs arising from voluntary idleness. I distrust its promises of reform, and I repudiate the idea that any change is intended that does not rob me and enrich them. I demand no other reforms than come from intelligent legislation. I fear the gift of this Trojan horse. I believe there is anarchy, violence, and armed misrule in its belly. I distrust this new Constitution made in this atmosphere of vicious discontent, and I do not believe that harmonious, consistent, just, and equal laws can come from ignorant foreigners or from uneducated and vicious Americans. I believe it demands some law learning to make laws. I believe in men who by thrifty industry have accumulated property, and I have no compliments for a class that, having enjoyed the same opportunity that I have, now endeavor to create sympathy for their poverty in order to make laws that will steal the earnings of my labors. I resent the attempt of this band of foreign miscreants, who meet in beer saloons and sand-lots to devise some mode of stealing. They are not laborers; they are idlers. They are destroying labor; they are injuring the working class; and I never struck a more honest blow in defense of workingmen and working women than in warning the real workingman against the sham agitator. And now, let me be most distinctly understood, that I have not lost my sympathy for the working poor. The men and women, foreign or native-born, who, by birth, misfortune, lack of education, or lack of opportunity, are compelled to labor for maintenance of themselves or of families dependent upon them, have my most earnest good wishes, and, if honest, I honor them. The man who goes out with dinner in his tin pail to labor for ten hours, six days in a week, and on Saturday night—avoiding the snare of the gin mill and the temptation of the corner grocery—brings his twelve dollars home to his wife to expend for rent, food, and for clothes and education for his children, I honor as I honor the best achievements of the highest culture and the keenest intellect. I would furnish that class with constant labor if I had to be taxed to the last dollar of my accumulations and till I was compelled to go out and work beside them. I would aid to educate their children in the rudiments of my English tongue. I would provide for them in sickness; I would furnish them with free books; I would give them cheap and innocent amusements; I would protect them from Chinese immigration; I would guard them against the tyranny of wealth and the insolence of power; I would regard them as my equals, my friends, my brothers; I would do them justice in every relation of life. But, because I sympathize with the honest poor who toil, I will not submit to the insolence of the criminal and ignorant poor who do not toil. The ignorant and vicious idler and beer-guzzler from Germany, or the low-browed, whisky-drinking Irishman, or the demagogue American, shall not dictate to me my politics, or instruct me in questions of political economy, or prevent me from a perfect freedom of writing or speaking. They shall not make laws for me if I can prevent it; they shall not intimidate me; they shall not divide my property among them if I can successfully defend it with my life. I will endeavor to enjoy all the privileges of an American citizen until I am defeated either in battle or at the ballot-box. This Constitution means the triumph of Kearneyism, and Kearneyism means the destruction of everything that is dear to Americans. The character of this conflict is indicated by the character of the opposing forces. For the adoption of this Constitution, we have Kearney and the sand-lot; every native-born American tramp and loafer in the State; every idle, vicious foreigner that is stranded on our coast; every criminal; every political demagogue; every desperate Catiline in politics; every agrarian and communist, that defines agrarianism and communism to be the opportunity of the vicious, idle, and desperate poor who have nothing to steal from those who have something. On the other side of this controversy we find arrayed the honest intelligence of the State; the accumulations of honest toil; commercial, manufacturing, and mechanical industries; the men who are willing to labor, who want no office; the farmer who tills the soil he owns. The cry that millionaires and corporations and monopolists favor the old Constitution and are opposed to a change of organic law, should cut no figure in this controversy. The same law that affords the best protection to large accumulations is the best one to encourage small savings. There is no legal method of robbing the very rich that does not justify stealing from the well to do. The man of forty acres is justified in demanding the same law to protect him as the man of larger domain. The same tax imposed upon square leagues as upon quarter sections would equalize the burdens of government. Let the assessor place equal value upon small farms as upon large estates, and the land reformation is accomplished. This Constitution can not be honest and intelligent work, because it was not done by honest and intelligent men; and as for me, I would not vote for it because it is the work of demagogues and foreign agitators;

because it is intended to be a blow at the accumulations of industry; because it is agrarian, and its avowed purpose is to take from those who have something and give it to those who have nothing. I would suspect the Decalogue if written by such hands. I would not love God at the bidding of the irreverent and sacrilegious teachings of the sand-lot. Freud, the corset-maker, should not be authority for me against worshiping images. I would be loth to work six days at the admonition of a tramp that I might rest on the seventh to hear Wellock sermonize. The injunctions, "Thou shalt not kill" coming from Judge Terry, "Thou shalt not commit adultery" coming from Clitus Barbour, "Thou shalt not steal" coming from Dr. O'Donnell, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor" coming from Denis Kearney, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's ass" coming from Larkin of El Dorado, "Love thy neighbor as thyself" coming from Volney Howard, and "Do unto others as ye would have others do unto you" coming from men who conspire to overthrow law and authority in order to put property in a condition where they may steal it, would carry no weight with me. The force of these laws was not only in their truth, but in the hand of the living God that penciled these commandments upon the enduring rock. A Constitution can not be perfectly written by the hand of ignorance under the inspiration of hate. I spit upon the vile knave and demagogue that endeavors to array the poor against the rich. It is more cowardly and more contemptible in this State than elsewhere in the whole of God's earth. Here we were all poor men. In all the circle of my acquaintance I have no friend who inherited a fortune. We all came from the common level. We inherited poverty, a common education, and the opportunity of carving out our own fortunes in a free republic. We simply inherited the opportunity of work. Those who had brains and sense worked and succeeded, and are now the objects of hatred and jealousy because they have economized. Every poor man and every honest mother who has a boy to rear ought to stone to death the orator or editor who would excite this mean and groveling passion of narrow and contemptible class jealousy. There are no poor in California except the criminal, the unfortunate, the idle, the profligate, and those who have experienced sickness and misfortune. P.

It will be remembered that when the labor agitation first began it had the incentive of hard times. There had been a dry winter, a not prosperous summer, and a large number of improvident persons for the first time in their lives felt the pressure of real poverty. Enterprising gentlemen raised a working fund. Generous ladies gave meals publicly, and charity privately. This exigency was seized upon by certain designing men as an opportunity to push themselves into prominence, and to circulate the hat for their personal maintenance. Among them arose some men of desperate counsels, who would destroy and burn and hang. Some had the evil disposition, but lacked the nerve. Some of these men were earnest in their sympathy for the poor, and honest in their efforts to work reform. The two most prominent in the work of organization were H. L. Knight and Denis Kearney. Kearney was the tongue and cheek of the movement; Knight was the brains. Kearney was hot, impetuous, and, like all utterly ignorant and unprincipled persons, rash and designing. Knight was cool, self-poised, and had plans of operation; for Knight was educated, and, though a foreigner—all these people are foreigners—had the judgment to know that in the end Americans were too brave to submit to the insolent acts of a foreign mob. He contemplated reforms through the ballot box; Kearney through sticks, and stones, and fagots, and hemp. Curious, too—Knight, who counseled moderation, is a brave man; while Kearney, who blustered, is an arrant poltroon and a coward. When he was first in prison he whined and bellowed for mercy; he drooled at the mouth in abject personal terror; he begged and promised, and wrote a card of humiliation. When Rule walloped him at Santa Ana he ran, with pistol in hand, tail between his legs, jumped fences, and, when overtaken, lay down like a cur and received his beating. Of course two such men could not get on together. Knight despised Kearney for his ignorance, his cowardice, his cheeky Irish insolence, and for his selfishness. Kearney feared and hated Knight. The unthinking and idle followed Kearney; Kearney could talk. The sensible and decent followed Knight, for Knight could counsel. Kearney went East, made an ass of himself, disgusted the workingmen of Massachusetts, came home, and, strangely enough, our sand-lotters were not all of them disgusted with the drayman. Those who could not read still believed in him, and he had a following. And, stranger still, in his country tour he impressed some American farmers that this new Constitution—that comes from the confusion of a riot and the counsels of a mob—would reduce taxation; that the unprincipled slum of the town, having failed to destroy government by force, could destroy the organic law and give the State a better one. Kearney, having made his southern tour, filling the air with his blasphemous and ribald denunciations of everybody and everything, is now being followed by Knight, who has formulated his points in answer to Kearney, and in opposition to the new Constitution, in so complete and modest a way that we print it and give to him the benefit of our cir-ulation. With such sentiments the wealthy, the intelligent, the industrious and provident classes have little to find fault. Between these classes and the honest working poor there is the kindest sympathy. Individuals in these classes are continuously changing places. Those who are poor to-day are rich to-morrow; the rich of to-day are poor to-morrow. The workingman of this generation gives from among his boys the millionaires of the next. It is from the working class that science, commerce, learning, and wealth recruits itself. We commend the perusal of the annexed formula as worthy of consideration for its truth, force, and moderation:

"I demand a policy that will restrain the rich, and keep the poor from poverty, ignorance, degradation, and crime. This is to be accomplished kindly, calmly, loyally, with due regard to the rights of all.

"The National Union is the greatest blessing, to be upheld and obeyed with utter devotion. The Federal Government has a thousand smiles for every frown.

"The people with ballots in their hands have no need of violence. Their will is law.

"The new Constitution is not a step in progress. It is not as good as the old. As it stands, it would need more amendments to make it what we want than the old.

"It is a poor, miserable patchwork of declamation, argument, statute law, and constitution, neither logical, scientific, nor compact.

"It contradicts itself. It violates the Constitution of the United States.

"Its system of taxation is monstrous, doubling and trebling taxes, multiplying officers and expenses, and altogether silly and unpractical. It would lay an embargo on loans and credits, and lock the wheels of commerce.

"It does nothing to benefit the poor, not even exempting $100 from taxation, when it will not pay the cost of assessing and collecting.

"It does nothing to discourage land monopoly. Its railway policy is uncertain, and most likely to be mischievous. It will not make one Chinaman go. It will cost millions of dollars to put it in operation and determine its meaning. It is not worth the cost or the trouble.

"The opinion of Denis Kearney upon it is not worth a cent. He is ignorant of law, and even of the meaning of words. He is an empty brawler, who accuses without evidence, slanders without knowledge, and threatens what he has no intent or courage to carry out. He is not a reformer, but a fraud, who has destroyed the party of the workingmen, disgraced their cause, and driven good and sensible men from their ranks. He and Wellock want the new Constitution, because it will paralyze business, depreciate property, impoverish the people, and give more force to the vile harangues, disorderly meetings, destruction of property, and shedding of blood.

"The Constitution must be defeated. The demagogue must be remanded to private life.

"The workingmen must be calm, firm, law-abiding, and win by wise votes what they never can by riot and insurrection. When the party had law and order it won elections. Since the misrule of Kearney it has lost them.

"The unjust, the false, the brutal, the tyrannical, the overbearing, the man who will not be investigated, can not be a reformer. Those who support him and suppress free speech can not be reformers.

"A triumph for Kearney would mean the dictation of ignorance, more calamitous to the State than plague, famine, or earthquake.

"The workingmen will triumph when they are ruled by reason, free speech, equality, and fraternity."

If Mr. ex-Senator Cole said to the Chronicle reporter that he favored the new Constitution because it "protects the poor from the rich," he said a foolish thing. The poor need no more protection from the rich than do the rich from the poor. An organic law should lay down certain governing principles applicable to all—especially favoring none, and discriminating against no class. All the Chronicle's stilted and sophomoric nonsense about the arrogance of Louis XIV., the days of Simon de Montfort and his Magna Charta, the mediæval kings of England, the oppressive barons, the feudal wrongs, comparing the free workingmen in this great sparsely populated empire, where land costs nothing, and where laws are made by all to equally apply to all, with that period of fearful destitution that generations of wrongs had brought to France, and preceded the revolution of 1789, is unadulterated bosh. Here is a State, every white male inhabitant of which is an elector, clothed with sovereign power. The complaining class to-day is the class that makes the law. It is the sand-lot that votes at primaries and at general elections, that votes early and often, that organizes clubs, that sends delegates to nominating conventions, and that sends its own class to the Legislature. It is the rich men and the business men who neglect their political duties, and shirk the responsibilities of party management. We are suffering because this ignorant sand-lot mob have too much political power, because they exercise it ignorantly, and now the same mob rise up and demand a new organic law to correct the laws they themselves have made, and to cure the evils they themselves have produced; and they say let us overturn now the whole government, let us turn everything topsy-turvy, and make a Constitution that shall better protect the poor. We can stand these things from a low, ignorant foreigner whose beer and gin may be increased in event of political chaos, but we are justly indignant when ex-Senator Cole and ex-Governor Downey give utterance to such nonsense. We distrust their sincerity; we suspect them of demagogism; we question their integrity.

We are often asked, "Is the ARGONAUT prosperous? Is it a success?" We answer: Yes, the ARGONAUT is a permanent institution. It can not be money-making, like a commercial journal; it can not be newsy and sensational. It may become a paper of influence, of opinions, of literature. It can be dignified and respectable, and with the talent of this coast it can be made a very acceptable and influential journal. This is where our ambition tends. To make a paper in the interest of good government and social order; one that will uphold the rights of property, and will maintain the authority that rightfully belongs to the intelligent and property-owning class; that will favor neither the arrogance of wealth nor the abuse of political power, nor pander or submit to the insolence of the empty-headed mob; according every privilege under the law to the respectable, and intelligent, and well-disposed citizens of foreign birth, who are content to enjoy equal rights, accumulate property, and participate in our political affairs, yet discouraging the political prominence of all ignorant men of foreign birth, or, indeed, ignorant men of American birth, who make politics a profession, who look to office as a means of livelihood, and who undertake to implant upon the stock of our tree of liberty the grafts of their imported discontent. Against demagogism, socialism, agrarianism, nihilism, misrule, social disorder, and all that kind of agitation growing out of crime, idleness, dissipation, and politics, we shall war with all the earnestness of conviction. While the ARGONAUT will not become in any sense a party journal, it will reserve to itself the privilege of becoming an active worker with or for any party, or any wing of a party, that is fighting in the open and for the right. It will advocate no religion, and it will avoid offense toward any who hold conscientious religious convictions. It will seek not to offend good taste or cater in its stories, its wit, or its advertisements to the vile. If a journal of this description can live in California, the ARGONAUT will make the honest effort to do so. If it can not, it will pay all its debts and decently die. It will live honorably, and act bravely while it does exist. Now, if its friends can aid it to circulate, can give it advertisements to fill the few pages we set aside for this purpose, we shall be grateful. We shall never bore any one for support. We shall blackmail no one if we are not sustained. We feel that we are entitled to sell our small advertising space to those men and institutions of large business and large wealth as a legitimate means of supporting our paper. We are making a fight for the higher and better interests of the community. We feel that we are entitled to place our journal upon the reading table of every family of culture in this State. For many purposes the ARGONAUT is a good advertising medium. Any business or article of merchandise that finds encouragement or purchasers among families can profitably make the ARGONAUT its medium of announcement. We print this issue 12,000 papers; we are steadily and surely advancing our subscription list in this city and in the States of the Pacific. We have as yet made but small endeavors with the East, but in May, by an arrangement with the American News Company, we shall send 5,000 copies to New York and Chicago for Eastern distribution. We have now building in New York a press that will give us better mechanical work than anything this coast has ever before seen. Our readers will excuse this first reference to ourselves. We do not often offend in this regard, and would not have done so now, if we did not think the many inquiries propounded to us are from those who sincerely wish that the ARGONAUT may have a prosperous and permanent career, and if we did not think it was proper for us now, after two years of endeavor, to remind our friends that not even a weekly journal can extend its circulation and business and influence on mere compliments.

The Morning Call type and presses are assessed upon a valuation of $13,000; the Bulletin type and presses, $7,000; the Chronicle type and presses, $9,000. The above are the official figures of last year's assessment. The real value of this journalistic property is not less than $1,000,000. The earnings and profits of these three concerns pay an interest upon that amount. There is no reason why they should not pay upon the larger figures instead of upon the paltry sum of $39,000. When these or any other journals contend that railroad, water, gas, and other corporate properties should pay taxes upon the value of their franchises—as, indeed, they ought to do—let it be borne in mind that these newspapers are themselves shirking their just share of the public burden, and are avoiding their just proportion of the public tax. In answer to this suggestion, these journals will say they ought not to be taxed upon their earnings any more than the lawyer or physician. The reply to this is that professional earnings depend upon personal talent and individual exertions, and as the consolidated talent of the gentlemen owning these three properties would not secure their names a place on the Assessor's books, they would escape taxation altogether. If we were the Assessor of San Francisco, we would assess newspapers upon a valuation that would make their proprietors less boastful of their value.

If the article in the Alta on Wednesday, entitled "A Losing Fight," in which it charges those opposing the adoption of the new Constitution with want of ability, lack of honest purpose, and, by implication, dishonest appropriation of funds, and predicts defeat, does not mean "backsheesh," then what the devil does it mean? If the Alta is not the oldest, and latest, and most debauched specimen of the journalistic horse-leech that, like the cherubim and seraphim, does continuously cry "give, give," then we are a hebdomadal.

Is it not time that our Federal officials should bestir themselves to work up a reception of General Grant. He will be in San Francisco some time during the summer. The politicians of Philadelphia and New York are alive to the necessity of inaugurating the Presidential campaign, and are organizing an overland tramp to San Francisco of and butter brigades that can beg, borrow, or enough to make the transcontinental trip.

THE LATEST PARISIAN BONBONS.

With the first rays of spring the deaf and dumb beggars reappear, and silently write petitions on their slates, which they present to the charitable and credulous.

"It's curious," said some one to Aurélien Scholl, "but you never see those deaf mutes out in the winter. How do they pass their time in the cold season?"

"Oh, in talking."

X, assaulted by his tailor.

"I really can not understand why you do not pay me my little bill. You had a good salary, and it has been raised."

"Yes."

"And you promised me faithfully that you would pay me out of the amount you saved from your extra allowance."

"Precisely."

"Then you have lied to me, for you haven't paid me the first red centime."

"Not at all—I haven't saved anything from my extra allowance. When I do I'll pay you."

When, just ten years ago, Hector Berloiz came back from St. Petersburg, suffering severely from his disease, he went to Nelaton.

The great physician examined him and asked: "Are you anything of a philosopher?"

"Yes," said the patient.

"Then you had better get all the consolation out of your philosophy you can—you will never recover."

The Count of B. perceives himself that a box of cigars which he has tapped all recently is to the half empty.

Addressing himself then to his domestic, with good humor:

"It is truly not reasonable, my brave Baptist—we smoke too much!"

At court:

Eminent Counsel.—Yes, gentlemen of the jury, you will—oh, I know you will restore my persecuted client to the arms of his wife and little ones, who—

The Court.—Your client is a bachelor.

E. C. (with reproach).—Your Honor would even deprive my unhappy client of the pure joys of home and the family. (Weeps.)

Lawyer X. is ugly as—uglier than—in fine, there is no finding any adequate simile.

A case in which he is engaged is called in court, and another lawyer rises and says:

"Brother X. is unable to appear in this case to-day, and has asked me to apply for a postponement."

"Sick, eh?" says the judge.

"No; gone to get married."

"Married—oh, come now, what is my learned brother giving the Court? Well, postponement granted for one week. Married, eh? Well, I'll be—but—call the next case."

Two hackmen run into each other at night, and one, whose horse is killed, cites the other before the tribunal.

"When you had run into the complainant's horse and knocked it down and run over it," says the Court, sternly, "why didn't you stop to see if any damage had been done?"

"Oh," replies the caddy, "I didn't know it was a horse I'd hurt—I thought it was only a man."

A Bohemian, who is over head and ears in debt, sees no way out of it but to marry, and accordingly betakes himself to a matrimonial agency and asks if they have any wives in stock with from 20,000 to 100,000 francs.

"I have just your article," says the agent. "Pretty—pretty amiable."

"That'll do—never mind the age."

"All right," says the agent; "be so good as to hand me over fifty francs—the fee is payable in advance—and then we will arrange for a first interview."

"Fifty francs!" exclaims the Bohemian, with a frightful sneer; "fifty Erebus! Blister your stupid soul, sir; do you think that if I had fifty francs I'd be ass enough to go and get married?"

The unhappy man who had been run over was carried into the police station, where the surgeon examined him and said: "It's a mercy the wheels passed over him as rapidly as they did, for if the carriage had been going slowly there would have been no hope of his recovery—none whatever."

"Precisely," cries the radiant hackman, desirous of backing up this favorable opinion as strongly as possible; "when I saw the gentleman crossing the street a little in front of me, instead of pulling up the horse I just gave him a clip with the whip and yelled 'Get up there!' and that's how I saved the gentleman's life."

When Pius IX. was Pope, Fanny Elssler visited Rome, danced, and set the public crazy. In forty-eight hours the gilded youth, her admirers, had subscribed 12,000 francs and bought a splendid crown to be presented to her as a testimonial.

When the time came for presenting the danseuse with it, one of the subscribers, an excellent young noble, obtained an audience of the Pope and asked if there would be anything wrong in the presentation—if the Pope had any objections.

"I have neither objection to make nor advice to offer," said His Holiness, "but it does seem to me that you might have pitched upon a more appropriate gift. In my simplicity as a priest, I have always thought that crowns were made for heads, and not for legs."

The crown was duly given to the danseuse, who meanwhile had heard of the Pope's saying, and promptly sent the value of the gift in money to the parish priests for their poor.

Pius IX. heard of this in his turn, and when next he met one of the subscribers to the testimonial, said to him:

"You were quite right in giving that woman that crown—has just proved that there is more sense in her legs than in your heads."

PRATTLE.

From the death of Mr. Chester Hull by apoplexy to that of Mr. Sam Davis, of Virginia City, by hanging, the transition is natural and easy. When Mr. Davis was brought out upon the scaffold to suffer the extreme penalty of the law for the many hoaxes he had wrought upon the reading public, and the Sheriff was about to mount a step-ladder and pin together the tips of the criminal's ears in order to adjust the fatal noose, "Wait a bit, pardner," said Sam, "I want to try that drop before standing on it with a rope round my neck. I've known such things to give way." So Mr. Davis stepped cautiously upon the drop, and the Sheriff, perceiving it to be a fine opportunity to test the thing in his way, drew the bolt and Sam "tumbled to it" nicely. Satisfied with the rehearsal, he reappeared upon the stage, limping awkwardly. "Hurt you much?" carelessly inquired the Sheriff, putting the rope where it would do the most good. "I'm a cripple for life, you devil's-domestic!" said Sam. "I am very obediently your humble servant," was the officer's valediction, as he again sprung the trap—"and don't you forget it!" Samuel fell through, the multitude cried out: "Pull down your vest," a solemn Cornishman sententiously remarked: "She's drappit summit," and the thing commonly known as Mr. Davis's soul stood (with its hat on) in the presence of its maker.

One loves to linger on every detail of a death like that, and it is with a satisfaction as deep and serene as the reflection of the dome of a Virginia City restaurant in a plate of soup—a satisfaction so perfect as to resemble a sinful pleasure—that I record the fact that in Mr. Davis's last moments he had a chance at the consolations of religion: his father, a Carson clergyman, was with him on the scaffold. "Samuel," said the good man, choking with emotion, "would to God I could die for thee!" The erring son was deeply touched. "Would to God you could," he murmured. "But no," continued the pious father, pointing upward, "it can not be; your only hope lies there." Sam cast his considering orbs aloft, then shook his head despondently, remarking: "That kind of knot doesn't give"—presently adding, mechanically, from force of habit—"a damn." "Betcher life!" assented the Sheriff. When his hands were being corded behind his back he was informed that the Governor had definitely refused to commute his sentence. "I think we shall elect a Democrat next time," said Sam.

On the night preceding the execution the doomed man was visited in his cell by Mr. Dan de Quille, who felt the deepest dejection, but attempted to lead Mr. Davis's thoughts away out of the shadow of the gibbet by asking him where it would be most agreeable to him to be buried. Without a word Davis took out his reporter's note-book and pencil, and began writing. In less than half an hour he had produced the following striking and, may it please the Post, original lines:

"Whether beneath the gallows high,
Or in the miller's dam,
The noblest place for Sam to lie
Is where he lied for Sam."

Since this touching quatrain was published in the Enterprise every newspaper proprietor on the coast has written, making a tender of his office for the repose of the great humorist's remains.

The Germans will not permit the importation of Russian caviare, for fear of the plague. This is absurd; caviare is too toothsome a comestible to be excluded needlessly from any Christian country. It would be sufficient if each keg of caviare crossing the frontier should meet a keg of sauer-kraut. If the plague had infected the caviare, the sauer-kraut would tackle the plague.

I dare say few readers will assent to my opinion of caviare as toothsome. Those who have eaten it only here certainly will not, for a more noxious and offensive black paste than is called caviare in San Francisco I never did see. But caviare that is caviare is ravishing; each gray-mottled globule hath uberty of gustible virtues, as the opal is impregnated with fire. Caviare is not a viscous abominableness to be guttled of hoodlums in beer-cellars, but a dainty fare to be reverently manducated as a sacramental rite—a nurture wherefrom are evolved the sanest of bodily bloom, the delicate wisenesses of judgment, and a circumspect morality that escheweth all evitable vice. When caviare shall have taken the place of pious precept, and Stilton cheese shall have supplanted religious example, we shall become as the sons of gods; and the young lions of Science may scabbard their nails and still the thunder in their hairy throats, for their natural enemies, the parsons, will have gone fishing for sterlet in the Caspian.

Now that I have mentioned cheese I may as well confess my steadfast belief that the appetizing flavor of that made in my beloved country—which may Heaven bless and prosper: Dominus Rempublicam fac salvam.—consists of one part relish and three parts patriotism. One of the most amusing discussions I ever had was with some gentlemen for whose superb gastronomical taste, judgment, and erudition, when unaffected by patriotism, I have the deepest veneration. Yet the purpose of their argument was the apotheosis of American cheese—the exaltation of its horn over the horn of the European—including the Roquefort and the incomparable Stilton! Now, I ask in all seriousness—Is the love of country a virtue if it enslave the palate, sophisticate the gustatory nerves, and warp the judgment? If one love the land of the dinner of herbs better than the land of the stalled ox, that is his affair. But if he love better the herbs than the ox he is hostis humani generis; and shall we not kill him? For my part, I am willing to die for my country, but may I be cursed if I praise—as I shall assuredly be damned if I eat—its cookery.

As to Stilton cheese, I ought to say that, like caviare, the best is not to be had in this country. Corpo di Baccho! it comes over in piece-of-pie-shaped hunks plastered with tin-foil!

During the cold weather in Paris the police found a man frozen solid, and they thumped him until they made him holler.

ABOUT WOMEN.

Why is a true woman like a hinge? Give it up. Because she's something to adore.

She had an eye on the main chance, but lost her grip on the side-saddle all the same.

In the race for matrimony it isn't always the girl that covers the most laps that wins.

An exchange asks: "What is nicer to hold than a pretty woman's hand?" Answer: "A pretty woman."

The great beauty of being engaged to a girl in a boarding-house is that you don't have to carry a night-key.

This is the season of the year when the Boston girl of culture alludes to the bare ground as the nude earth.

What makes most women wild is to wait for the postman half an hour, and then see him walk by indifferently.

An Illinois girl, with a pitchfork, kills scores of gophers every day. You ought to see her gopher the gophers.

The woman who is ambitious to make the bosoms of her husband's shirts shine resplendently must have an iron will.

A woman never finds half as much satisfaction in the sermon as she does in a grease spot on the back of the woman's dress in front of her.

"Men are what women make them" is the title of a new book. If that's the case, there are women who feel as the Lord did in Genesis vi, 6.

"Jane," he said, "I think if you lifted your feet away from the fire we might have some heat in the room." And they had not been married long.

"I want one of those long, felt hats, papa," said a Toledo girl to her father. The indulgent father forked over the money, and her head now fills the long felt want.

A Jersey City woman was recently arrested for smashing her husband across the nose with a red and yellow worsted motto bearing the words, "God bless our home."

When a lady by accident discovers that her photographer has put her picture in his showcase, she goes home and makes a terrible time over it, but doesn't order it to be taken out.

Lady Anne Blunt, a courageous traveler, visited, with a companion, the Euphrates and the Bedouins, and she says that one day while in the desert she met a native who approached her and said, "Starboard, port, Goddam."

A young lady in Hartford, Conn., has been badly poisoned by the aniline dye in a new blue veil that she wore. If she was a homely girl she has our sympathy, but if she was handsome and wore a colored veil it served her right.

A London girl says that most of the "men" met in the ball-room, and who dance, are "creatures" who can't talk, although they are preferable to the persons who tell about their personal likes, the kinds of shoes and socks, etc., they fancy.

A lady in New York worked hard for a year to support a worthless husband, and at the end of that time discovered that he was a beautiful carver. She rented him out for dinner parties, and has thus made money and a position in society.

A year ago a band of young ladies in Buffalo pledged themselves never to associate with young men who drank intoxicating viands. Now, these young ladies say they think the perfume of cloves is far more delicate and pleasant than heliotrope.

Two sisters in Edinburgh have lived for many years in one room without speaking to each other. Neither is deaf or dumb, and no one knows the reason of their silence. They have a chalk-line on the floor, and do not encroach on each other's domains.

The day before a Turkish girl is married, she is taken to the bath by her lady friends and lumps of sugar are broken over her head as a forecast of the sweets of matrimony. A year or so afterward her husband breaks the whole sugar-bowl over her head.

Boston Transcript.—Scene—A South End horse-car. Enter an elaborately-dressed lady, diamond solitaires, eight-button kids, etc. Car crowded. At first no one moves. Soon a gentleman offers his seat. "Thank you; you are the only gentlemen here. The rest is hogs."

If there is ever a time in the life of the washerwoman when her heart is made to beat with joy, it is when she finds a diamond stud in the unwashed shirt of the young man who owes her a year's wash-bill. And the young man laughs and says to himself, "There's a ten-dollar wash-bill paid with a twenty-five-cent diamond."

Old maids who have passed safely over the line can congratulate themselves upon the scientific discovery that "most people become insane between the ages of twenty-five and thirty." Some people may imagine that old maids can find consolation in this fact—but the hardest thing to find is an old maid over thirty.

Hugging sociables are popular in rural parts of New Jersey. The prices charged are given for benevolent purposes. It costs ten cents to hug a girl between fifteen and twenty, but you have to pay twenty-five cents for a young widow, thirty-five cents for a girl between twenty and thirty, and a dollar for hugging a married woman.

A Mrs. Peter Miller, of Helena, Ark., has arrived in Louisville, and though but four feet six inches high, is asserted to weigh four hundred and three pounds. She measures three feet nine inches across the back, and is thus nearly as broad as she is long. Her age is 68. She married at 16, and then weighed but one hundred pounds.

A female book agent caused the publication in the Sacramento Bee of the death of George W. Bruff. Now, Bruff was not dead, and appealed to the Bee to restore him to life. The Bee found the woman, who explained that Bruff owed her and had fixed a day when he would pay if he was alive; as he did not pay she concluded he was dead, and so published him in the Bee. Bruff and the Bee people are angry; everybody else laughs.

The contradictory testimony of experts as to the existence of poison in the bodies of dead persons has puzzled many a jury. Now comes Prof. Selmi, of Bologna, with the discovery that in the decaying bodies of persons who have died a natural death he finds a substance so closely resembling well known poisons as to be readily mistaken for them. In his explanation he shows how similar these animal alkalies are to the vegetable poisons used by criminals. His tests to distinguish between them are hardly less valuable than the discovery itself, and if all that Prof. Selmi pretends to have found be true, a change in the manner of conducting a certain class of criminal trials may follow, and every dissatisfied wife can now with put styrene in her hubby's coffee.

An exchange describing the presentation scene at the last "Court Day" at the Canadian capital, says that a volume would not suffice to describe the variety of bows given. A smiling miss and an aged lady with elaborately-prepared coiffure, to atone for lack of the sprightliness of youth, each showed, by the formal and deliberate manner in which they made their obeisance, that they were a dancing-master's pupils. Gentlemen also offered scope for amusement. Many advanced and, spreading their hands, gave the Eastern salam as nearly perfect as European attire permitted, whilst others bowed their head and peered from beneath the eyebrows at the face of royalty.

A Kentucky paper lately published a card signed by Fontaine F. Bobbitt, and reading: "First Monday in April I will proceed to fire the heart of economy and precipitate the cohorts of retrenchment and reform upon the redoubts of extravagance, and if I have more than one opponent I shall on that day impale each upon a fork, and take an alternate bite, first of one and then the other, to the infinite delight of the excited audience." A Kentucky Kearney without a doubt.

BUTTRICK'S

PATTERNS--APRIL STYLES.

Send stamp for catalogue. AGENCY, 124 POST ST., San Francisco.

ELOCUTION, ORATORY, AND THE DRAMA.

MARY J. BRADLEY, 510 ELLIS Street. Ladies and gentlemen fitted for the Platform, Stage, or Teaching.

922 POST STREET.

MME. B. ZEITSKA'S FRENCH, German, and English Institute for Young Ladies--with KINDERGARTEN

For children from three to six years of age. The next term of this well known Institute (established since 1863) will commence on MONDAY, March 24th, 1879. For catalogue and particulars, address MME. B. ZEITSKA, Principal.

PRESIDENT COFFEE, PURE MOCHA COFFEE, PURE JAVA COFFEE,

Ground to order at

LORING'S

Dealer in choice

JAPAN AND BLACK

TEAS

922 Market St.,

Between Stockton and Powell Streets, near the Baldwin.

R. C. MOWBRAY, M. D., DENTIST, removed to 200 STOCKTON ST., COR. Geary, S. F.

J. J. BIRGE, DENTIST, 313 Kearny Street.

ELECTRIC BELTS,

A sure cure for nervous debility, premature decay, exhaustion, etc. The only reliable cure. Circulars mailed free. Address J. K. REEVES, 43 Chatham Street, N. Y.

THE VERTICAL FEED.

THE ONLY POSITIVE SUCCESS IN all departments of sewing. Lightest running shuttle machine in the market. The NEW DAVIS VERTICAL FEED SEWING MACHINE, 130 Post Street.

MARK SHELTON, P. S.--Howe, Florence, Wheeler & Wilson, Grover & Baker, Domestic, Weed, Willcox & Gibbs, for sale at $10 each.

MULLER'S OPTOMETER!

The only reliable instrument for Testing Defective Vision.

135 Montgomery Street, Near Bush, opposite the Occidental Hotel.

THE ARTISTS' FIRST ANNUAL BALL

WILL BE GIVEN AT THEIR ROOMS,

NO. 430 PINE STREET,

ON THE EVENING OF

Tuesday, April 29, 1879,

UNDER THE MANAGEMENT OF the following Ladies and Gentlemen of the San Francisco Art Association:

Hon. Wm. Alvord, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Babcock, Mr. and Mrs. H. D. Bacon, Mr. and Mrs. L. L. Baker, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Beard, Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Bancroft, Colonel and Mrs. W. H. L. Barnes, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Barroilhet, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Beaver, Mr. D. P. Belknap, Mr. John Benson, Mr. and Mrs. David Bixler, Mr. R. J. Bush, Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Bland, Mr. James T. Boyd, Mr. and Mrs. H. J. Booth, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel M. Brookes, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Bradford, Mr. and Mrs. Thos. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Cahill, Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Coleman, Mr. and Mrs. W. T. Coleman, Mr. W. J. Collins, Mr. and Mrs. B. H. Coit, Mr. Seth Cook, Mr. Daniel Cook, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Crocker, Hon. Eugene Casserly, Mr. and Mrs. Fred. L. Castle, Mr. and Mrs. W. Castle, Mr. and Mrs. James Coffin, Mr. and Mrs. P. B. Cornwall, Mr. and Mrs. Jennings S. Cox, Mr. and Mrs. Isaac E. Davis, Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Dean, Mr. G. J. Denny, Mr. and Mrs. S. P. Dewey, Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Dodge, Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Dodge, Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Eldridge, Mr. and Mrs. John A. Fault, Mr. and Mrs. James Flood, Capt. and Mrs. K. S. Floyd, Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Forbes, Mr. and Mrs. Jas. Freeborn, Col. and Mrs. J. D. Fry, Mr. G. G. Gariboldi, Mr. and Mrs. Louis A. Garrett, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Gibbs, Mr. and Mrs. O. F. Gibbs, Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Glazier, Mr. and Mrs. Adam Grant, Mr. and Mrs. Robert N. Graves, Mr. and Mrs. A. S. Hallidie, Judge and Mrs. John S. Hager, Mr. and Mrs. J. P. Haggin, Mr. and Mrs. Edward F. Hall, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. John R. Hamilton, Mr. A. K. P. Harrison, Mr. and Mrs. A. E. Head, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Hearst, Hon. S. Heynfeldt, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. C. Hickox, Mr. Horace L. Hill, Mr. and Mrs. Thos. Hill, Mr. R. Hochkoffler, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. F. Hooper, Mr. Jabez Howes, Col. and Mrs. J. P. Jackson, Mr. Henry Jan, Mr. and Mrs. J. K. Jarboe, Mr. and Mrs. H. J. Johnston, Mr. and Mrs. N. G. Kittie, Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Keeney, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Keith, Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Kunath, Hon. and Mrs. F. P. Low, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. A. Low, Mr. Thomas P. Madden, Mr. Charles Mayne, Mr. and Mrs. D. O. Mills, Mr. and Mrs. Louis McLane, Mr. and Mrs. Pietro Mezzara, Mr. and Mrs. F. P. McLennan, Geo. and Mrs. John F. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Norris, Mr. and Mrs. Edw. Norton, Mr. and Mrs. Frank J. Newlands, Mr. and Mrs. E. Narjot, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. W. Prescott, Gov. Samuel Purdy, Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Requia, Mr. and Mrs. C. D. Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. Antoine Roman, Mr. J. W. Rix, Mr. Robert C. Rogers, Mr. L. S. B. Sawyer, Mr. and Mrs. Henry T. Scott, Mr. and Mrs. Irving M. Scott, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Sillim, Hon. W. J. Shaw, Mr. and Mrs. John Skae, Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Shaw, Hon. and Mrs. Leland Stanford, Mr. J. H. Stearns, Mr. and Mrs. Pentiss Selby, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Sillim, Col. and Mrs. W. R. Smedberg, Mr. and Mrs. S. M. Smith, Mr. S. V. Smith, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. John D. Spreckles, Mr. and Mrs. Edward L. G. Steele, Mr. and Mrs. M. Straus, Col. and Mrs. J. Stuart, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. C. Tabbot, Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Tevis, Dr. and Mrs. H. H. Toland, Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Tubbs, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Tilden, Mr. and Mrs. Jos. Tilden, Col. and Mrs. Stuart Taylor, Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Tippet, Mr. and Mrs. Jules Tavernier, Mr. and Mrs. V. Tojetti, Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Wallace, Mr. Raphael Weil, Mr. J. C. Wilmerding, Judge and Mrs. E. D. Wheeler, Mr. and Mrs. H. B. Williams, Mr. and Mrs. Russell J. Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel M. Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Wandesforde, Mr. and Mrs. Virgil Williams, Mr. and Mrs. R. B. Woodward, Mr. and Mrs. R. D. Veland.

Executive Committee.

Irving M. Scott, Jennings S. Cox, Wm. Alvord, Daniel Cook, Wm. Babcock, Thibaud Parrott, Silas Selleck.

Treasurer.

Henry Barroilhet.

Committee on Decoration.

G. G. Gariboldi, Jules Tavernier, M. Straus, Wm. Voegtlin, Virgil Williams.

Committee on Music, Printing, and Floor.

Chas. F. Crocker, F. F. Selleck, H. A. Plute, Walter Turnbull, Russell J. Wilson, Lieut. G. G. Greenough, Wm. P. Dewey, Raoul Martinez, Col. W. R. Smedberg.

Committee on Reception.

Wm. Bradford, R. J. Bush, G. G. Gariboldi, H. J. Johnston, Oscar Kunath, E. Narjot, E. W. Perry, J. W. Rix, Samuel M. Brookes, G. J. Denny, W. F. Jackson, Thos. Hill, Wm. Keith, Pietro Mezzara, Arthur Nahl, S. W. Shaw, M. Straus, Jules Tavernier, Wm. Voegtlin, Virgil Williams, S. J. Woodman, Fredk Vates, Chas. A. Hamilton.

Committee on Refreshments.

J. W. Rix, G. J. Denny, Joseph Tilden, D. L. Beck, Jr.

By Order, EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

COMMERCIAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF CALA.

FIRE AND MARINE.

Principal office, 405 California Street, San Francisco.

JOHN H. WISE, President.

CHAS. A. LATON, Secretary.

THE STATE INVESTMENT

— AND —

INSURANCE COMPANY, FIRE AND MARINE

CASH ASSETS.....$450,000

Principal Office, 218 and 220 Sansome Street, San Francisco

OFFICERS:

A. J. BRYANT, President, RICHARD IVERS, Vice-President, CHAS. H. CUSHING, Secretary, H. H. WATSON, Marine Surveyor

P. J. WHITE, President. JOHN FAY, Vice President. Geo. O. SMITH, Jr., Secretary.

WESTERN FIRE AND MARINE INS. CO.

OF CALIFORNIA.

409 California St., San Francisco.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS.

Geo. H. SANDERSON, Wm. WILLIS, W. H. DODGE, MICHAEL KANE, Wm. M. LENT, J. MACDONOUGH, HENRY CASANOVA, JOHN F. BOYD, P. J. WHITE, JOHN FAY, P. ALFENITZ.

STORAGE.

Furniture, Planos, Pictures, Trunks, Carpets, etc., carefully stored in large, airy lofts.

Families leaving the City.

Or declining Housekeeping, are requested to call. Facilities the best possible. Terms moderate. Advances made. J. H. MOTT & CO., 647 Market Street (Nucleus Block).

THOMAS BOYSON, M. D.

(University of Copenhagen, Denmark).

PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. Office

and Residence, 112 Kearny Street. Office hours, 11 A. M. to 1 P. M., 6 to 8 P. M. Sunday 11 to 1 only. Telephone in the office.

JENNINGS S. COX.....OLIVER TEALL.

COX, TEALL & CO.,

REAL ESTATE AGENTS AND AUCTIONEERS, 303 Montgomery Street, under the Nevada Bank, San Francisco.

Auction Salesroom, H. M. NEWHALL & CO., 309, 311 and 313 Sansome Street.

J. O. ELDRIDGE, Auctioneer. ANDREW ONDERDONK, Civil Engineer.

RARE ENGRAVINGS, MODERN ETCHINGS.

VISITORS WILL BE ALWAYS

welcome to inspect collection.

W. K. VICKERY, 22 Montgomery Street, opposite the Lick House.

NOOK FARM.

THIS PLEASANT COUNTRY

HOME is now open for the reception of visitors. Important additions and improvements have been made since last season, which add greatly to the comfort and pleasure of guests. The same good cheer and home surroundings will be found in the future as in the past. Remember that the pleasantest part of the year in the country is the spring and early summer. For particulars, address E. B. SMITH, Rutherford, Napa County.

ARMY AND NAVY GOODS,

REGALIA AND LODGE SUPPLIES.

A. J. PLATE & CO.,

No. 510 SACRAMENTO STREET.

NEWTON BOOTH, C. T. WHEELER, Sacramento, J. T. GLOVER, W. W. DOUGL, San Francisco

W. W. DODGE & CO.,

WHOLESALE GROCERS,

Northwest corner Clay and Front Streets, San Francisco

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARY A. WOOTE, plaintiff, vs. JOHN WOOTE, defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to John Wooten, defendant:

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons--if served within this country; or, if served out of this country, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days--or judgment by default will be taken against you according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony heretofore and now existing between the plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds set forth in the complaint on file herein, to which reference is hereby made, and for costs of this suit, counsel fees, and alimony; also for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 15th day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine.

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk. By W. STEVENSON, Deputy.

(SEAL.) R. THOMPSON, Plaintiff's Attorney.

GOULD & CURRY SILVER MINING

Company.--Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the eleventh day of March, 1879, an assessment (No. 35) of one dollar ($1) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 69, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the sixteenth day of April, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on THURSDAY, the seventh day of May, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with cost of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

ALFRED K. DUBROW, Secretary.

Office--Room 69, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

HALE & NORCROSS SILVER MINing Company.--Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the twelfth (12th) day of March, 1879, an assessment (No. 61) of one ($1) dollar per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room 58, Nevada Block, northwest corner Pine and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the sixteenth (16th) day of April, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on THURSDAY, the eighth (8th) day of May, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

JOEL F. LIGHTNER, Secretary.

Office--Room 58, Nevada Block, northwest corner Pine and Montgomery Streets, San Francisco, California.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS.--NOTICE

is hereby given by the undersigned, Administratrix of the Estate of JOHN A. MAY, deceased, to the creditors of, and all persons having claims against, the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said Administratrix, at 432 Montgomery Street, Room 3, the same being her place for the transaction of the business of the said estate in the City and County of San Francisco.

MAGDALENE M. MAY.

Administratrix of the Estate of John A. May, deceased.

Dated at San Francisco, March 10th, 1879.

PAUL NEUMANN, Attorney for Administratrix.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.--OFFICE OF

the Standard Consolidated Mining Company, San Francisco, Cal., April 2, 1879.--At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the above named company, held this day, Dividend No. 2, of fifty cents (50c) per share, was declared, payable on Saturday, April 12th, 1879, at the office in this city, or at the Agency of the Nevada Bank of San Francisco, in New York.

W. M. WILLIS, Secretary.

Office, Room 29 Nevada Block, No. 309 Montgomery Street, third floor, San Francisco, Cal.

NOTICE.--THE CHOLLAR MINING

Company and the Potosi Mining Company are prepared to receive their new stock. On surrender of each share of Chollar-Potosi Mining Company's stock, the holder is entitled to four (4) shares of Chollar Mining Company's stock and four (4) shares of Potosi Mining Company's stock.

W. E. DEAN, Secretary.

San Francisco, April 4th, 1879.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.--OFFICE OF

CONSOLIDATED VIRGINIA MINING CO., Room 27, Nevada Block, San Francisco, April 27, 1879.--At a meeting of the Board of Trustees of the above named Company held this day, a Dividend (No. 47) of fifty cents per share was declared, payable on Tuesday, 15th inst. Transfer books closed until 15th inst.

A. W. HAVEN, Secretary.

ALASKA

COMMERCIAL CO.

No. 310 SANSOME STREET,

WHOLESALE DEALER IN FURS.

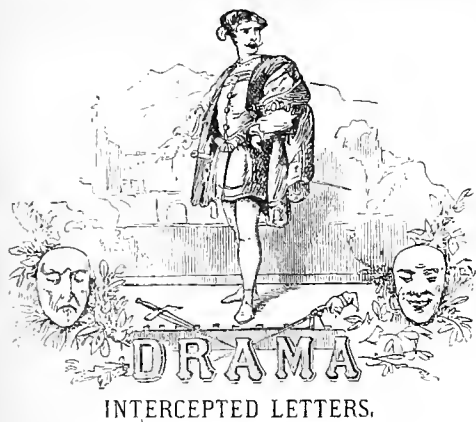

G. O. DEAN, D.D.S.....F. M. HACKETT.

HACKETT & DEAN,

DENTISTS, Latham's

Kearny Street, San Francisco

Office hours from 8 A. M. until

SAN FRANCISCO, April 11, 1879.

DEAREST MADGE:—Those absurd and inapplicable lines of Edgar Allan Poe have been running in my head ever since Monday morning of this blessed week dawned:

"Thank Heaven, the crisis,
The danger is past,
And the fever called living
Is over at last."

I haven't the ghost of an idea what he meant, and I don't think he had either; but, at all events, the lines intimate that something or other which was very much of a bore is out of the way, and Holy Week in this instance is the crisis of a most rigorously observed Lent. People must be sitting at home in sackcloth and ashes, for there has literally been no one anywhere except at the milliners' openings. Unluckily for the managers, Passover time is on the heel of Lent, so that if one does stray into a theatre one meets only a bewildering lot of strange faces, which seem to belong to "the interior." It is odd that, under the circumstances, that sparkling bit of airy nothingness, A Scrap of Paper, has been doing really well. I wonder if it would be rank heresy to say that its success is due not half so much to Sardou himself as to—well, really I can not say to whom, Madge. Somebody was called out every night when the curtain rolled up on the bric-a-brac collection in the second act, but whether it was the man who owned the furniture, or the man who owned the curios, or the man who lent the stuffed birds, or the man who put them all together in one charming room, I can not say. Each and every man gets individual mention and credit on the bills in an advertising list, where their addresses are set forth in a guileless appeal to public patronage. Perhaps no stage-setting could possibly be so attractive in these days, when every one either is, or desirous to be, a collector in a small way, as this bric-a-brac den of "Colonel Blake's," the hero of the tale, who has been a traveler in many lands. It differs from most Californian collections of this class in that it is not so essentially Japanese. To be sure, the inevitable fan and umbrella are seen, and Japanese ladies appear on the wall in odd perspective here and there, while a giant vase holds a monstrous umbrella somewhere in the background. But besides all this there are valuable bronze monsters crawling, so to speak, on the floor. A walrus' long tusks curve down over the main doorway; a buffalo's head glowers over the main window; some crossed spears and a helmet fill a front panel; a tiny Eastlake what-not sets forth a jaunty display of porcelain rare enough at least for stage uses. There are screens and books, and stuffed animals; there is a case of butterflies, and a lot of stuffed birds; there are Chinese embroideries, and African stuffs (this last, of course, with a reservation; it would really be too much to expect a real Algerian table-cloth). Among other quaint things, I observed a singular looking pair of boots, which might come from one of the snowcountries. At all events, they depended from the wall in bold relief with all the charms of oddity. There are a dozen such trifles quite out of the ordinary. One rarely meets a real room half so attractive. There is of necessity such an awful lot of cloth and paper in our ordinary collections. Fine pottery, quaint carvings, old furniture, do not easily find their way out West, with all the bric-a-brac manias east of the Rocky Mountains to stop them. Yet visitors tell of one house which we all pass on Saturday afternoons—rather a queer, bungalow-looking place—where one gives warning on the outer door with a knocker two hundred years old. There is the clang of armor on that quiet hillside when the housemaid swings her dust-brush, and the clatter of swords when she rattles the modern "inside blind" against the oddly lined wall. There are strange costumes from strange lands, and queer bits of household furniture, picked up on out-of-the-way pilgrimages; in these latter there are relics of all the ages, dating, of course, from Queen Anne's time. There does not seem to have been any furniture in the English world before that time, or, if there was, no one ever mentions it. It is always safe to look back upon good Queen Anne as a furniture landmark, while the great Elizabeth must be regarded from an architectural standpoint. No one ever heard or read of an English manor house without an Elizabethan wing, did they? Speaking of collections—what a vague, useful term that is by the way—how many were familiar with Harry Edwards' tiny cottage, crammed from floor to ceiling with interesting things, quite apart even from the scientist's Paradise in the little back room overlooking the bay? One could not even touch a scrap of paper with a simple lead pencil sketch upon it but that thereby hung a tale; and the tale was of such interest, and the host was such a delightful raconteur, that rummaging among his treasures was a delight. Talking of Harry Edwards and of scraps of paper brings me back from all this collector's chatter to the theatre, to Sardou. What a fancy have these superficial philosophers for these trifles upon which "enterprises of great pith and moment" do hinge. Now and then we come across the adventures of a pin, or we follow the career of a shilling. Did not some one write a whole book, full of valuable matter, called The Tour of My Room? As for Sardou's identical scrap of paper, it is very small and very pink—that reads more like the description of a new item in the census list, doesn't it? Its vicissitudes are many. It is first deposited in a bust of Shakespeare, which becomes for the nonce a lover's post-office; it is taken thence by the quondam lover many years too late, and when the writer wants it back, as writers of letters frequently do; it is secured by his friend and committed to the flames, but only partially consumed; it is thrown out of window, and picked up by a naturalist to wrap a great, ugly beetle in; this curious parcel is deposited in the gun for safe-keeping, without any regard for the fact that it is a gun for the beetle should the gun commit an involuntary explosion; the beetle is eventually fired out, and the scrap of paper taken possession of by an ardent young swain who does not keep much pocket stationery on hand; his billet doux finds its way to the wrong party, of course; there are countless and most ridiculous mistakes, jealousies, re-creations, and misunderstandings. In fact, there are all sorts of funny incidents, with a clear weather sky at the end, and it plays, as all well-regulated plays should, in two hours and a half. This, with an unexceptionable cast; for who so charming as Rose Wood in comedy? One can object only to a soupeon of hysteria in her stage laugh. As for O'Neill he is becoming versatile. Nature did not make, and art never will make, a thorough comedian of him; but he has a keen sense of the ridiculous which serves, and as the self-possessed "Col. Blake" he did not relapse half so frequently into the extravagance to which an over-grave man sometimes inclines, as he has been wont to do in comedy. Truth to tell, it is an agreeable part, and easily made interesting. Kate Corcoran is always well enough, and Willie Seymour is such a nice, neat, trim, well-dressed little lover, especially when "He either fears his fate too much, or his deserts too small," that Mrs. Farren and the non-protean Mr. Jennings just filled the group out admirably. Yet, for all that everything went off charmingly, I still think that that master-constructionist Sardou was abundantly assisted to success by the furniture man. I had intended to tell you something of Uncle Tom's "Richelieu," but my letter will be stamped, and superscribed, and in Uncle Sam's box on its way to you before he has donned the red gown of the great Cardinal. Strange what victims this stage-fever seizes for its prey when it will wreck even greybeards upon the reef of inexperience. On dit that the silver-tongued orator intends to discard the dull and plodding mazes of the law should it chance that he electrify the public with his "Richelieu," and embrace the stage. Under such conditions it is safe to predict that the Arizona bar and Legislature will know him again. Next week, dear Madge, is to be gala time. We are to have both the opera and Dion Boucicault, and bow people are to divide their attention remains to be seen. Max Strakosch has so arranged it that we are to have a prima donna at a time—Litta on Monday, Roze on Wednesday, and Cary on Friday. Litta they have very carefully abstained from saying much about. That argues well. Roze they have said too much about. That argues ill. Cary we all know, and she needs no recommendation. Some night soon, for a grand coup, Max will give us the three in one night, and he will stand in the lobby and rub his palms together with satisfaction, and roll up his eyes in ecstasy, and tell us that they are the three greatest singers the world ever saw, and we will all bow our heads, and believe him—unless we are fooled the first week. For all the reams, and reams, and reams of advertising paper, all the photographs, all the puffs, will not make a prima donna a favorite in these kind of times unless she can sing. Have you seen the Marie Roze pamphlets, with a picture of the pretty Roze on the first page, and a large assortment of newspaper puffs following? I observe that a few inimical to Miss Kellogg have been carefully scattered among them. Not a pretty thing for a great singer to do, is it? I hope she will sing well enough to dissipate the impression this little drop of venom will give to the most disinterested. On off nights we shall go to the California in crowds. They have been having a spring clearing up there, and they have new paint, a new drop curtain, a new leading lady, pro tem., and a really new soubrette. For these last two Allah be praised. The first we could have done well enough without, but then really that picnic in the foreground was rather a light looking affair. It made me hungry to see those poor, painted, impossible looking people, month in and month out, dining on watermelons and grapes. For a steady diet I know of nothing less alluring. That is all past, and Vesuvius will replace it in the coming time—the design of the curtain I mean, not the diet. Those pretty colored girls, the Hyers sisters, take flight after Saturday night. I suppose opposition to the opera would hardly pay them, notwithstanding that the Miserere is one of their trump cards. Some very indifferent music will sometimes pass current at a pinch, but every one is on the tiptoe of expectation now for something really good. Will it be a disappointment? Nous verrons. Yours, BETSY B.

According to the New York Tribune the Lotus Club was nicely snubbed the other day by these singing women. It says: "Yesterday was Ladies' Day at the Lotus Club. The Committee of Entertainment had in view no variation from established precedents. The cards of invitation conveyed the information to the guests that the latter would 'meet the lady members of Her Majesty's Opera Company.' This seemed to hold out the prospect of hearing Madame Etelka Gerster, Miss Minnie Hauk, and Madame Marie Rozesing. Two o'clock was the hour named, and long before three the parlors were crowded with ladies and artists and gentlemen of leisure. Even the steps of the broad stairway was made to serve as seats. Three o'clock came, but no 'ladies of Her Majesty's Opera Company.' Soon after a message was received from Madame Marie Roze, saying she regretted being unable to come at the hour named, but would be present at four o'clock. This hour flew by rather more leisurely than usual at a Lotus reception, Dr. A. E. Macdonald stated to the company, on behalf of his committee, that they had received assurances from the members of the Opera Company which fully justified them in making the announcement in the invitations. His hearers smiled good-naturedly and absolved the club. But Dr. Macdonald will probably want to hear from Colonel Mapleson, who, it is said, accepted the invitation to the reception on behalf of the ladies of his company, and with his usual tact and modesty urged that the committee make no other preparations for music, as the ladies of 'Her Majesty's Opera Company' would much prefer to have the musical field all to themselves." Clara Louise Kellogg, it will be remembered, served the Bohemian Club in the same way during the last operatic season, and served it right, for the invitation to be snubbed should never have been given.

English papers are puzzled about Miss Kellogg's future movements. The Figaro says, "Miss Clara Louise Kellogg will sail on the 12th of April for London, to undertake, it is said, a European opera tour, under the direction of Mr. Maurice Strakosch. It is difficult to quite understand what this means. Miss Kellogg is not engaged at either of our opera houses, and it is clearly unwise to begin an opera tour either in the English provinces, or on the continent in May."

It is remarked in New York how unfortunate to the Warde-Barrymore players Diplomacy upon its travels has proven. First, Mr. Montague died; then Miss Granger fell ill; next Mrs. Georgiana Drew-Barrymore was obliged to leave through illness; and now its stage manager has been killed, and one of its leading members wounded.

Competent Eastern musical critics are audacious enough to assert that Marie Roze can not sing—that is, sufficiently well to justify the title of prima donna.

NEW YORK CORRESPONDENCE.

UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK, April 3, 1879.

The close of Lent, now rapidly approaching, promises to bring a revival of theatrical business here, and the notes of preparation are sounding loud and constant at most of our city theatres. On Easter Monday The Banker's Daughter will be withdrawn, after its phenomenal run of something like five months, and will be succeeded by Lost Children, an adaptation by Cazauran of Les Orphelins de Notre Dame. Lost Children is far from a literal transcript of the French play, and is indeed scarcely even an adaptation, containing as it does scenes and ideas interpreted from Ruy Blas, Wandering Boys, The Foundlings, and other pieces. It is closely written, and exceptionally powerful in situation. It is almost certain to score a success among a people who so keenly appreciated The Two Orphans, a play which it greatly resembles. Barton Hill has failed to secure The Banker's Daughter for California, and I do not think it is probable that your people will have an opportunity of seeing it this year. There appears to be a growing indisposition on the part of the Union Square authorities to do business with San Francisco managers. Whose fault that may be you may probably be better able to surmise than I am. Mr. Palmer said the other day that he was willing to sell the California right of production to the highest bidder of any of the Union Square successes, but he has sent his last company across the continent. Time will show whether that is an exhibition of pique at some theatrical sharp practice, or a fixed resolve which will be adhered to. Mr. Hill, who returns next week, has made only two unexceptionable engagements, and the terms of both are necessarily high. Mr. Wallack will be pretty sure to play a good engagement. He brings with him a repertoire of seven plays, of which Ours, Rosdale, and Les Pattes de Mouche will form the pieces de resistance. The other engagement is Aimée, and though she brings nothing new (you have seen Le Petit Duc in its English dress), she will probably have tractive power enough for her short engagement. She will also have, in all probability, the advantage of playing during the week of the Grant visit, when San Francisco will be filled with strangers by the great trans-continental excursion. An addition of fifty thousand pleasure-seekers—which is the number that is estimated will embrace the opportunity of seeing California for $25—will give a great stimulus to business of every kind, and the theatres will take their share of profits with the rest. I saw Aimée in a box at the Lyceum last night. She is looking well, but grows somewhat matronly. We are none of us so young as we used to be. The occasion was the reopening of the theatre under the management of J. H. Haverly, and the attraction was the Oates party in The Little Duke. If this be the performance which ravished San Francisco—as I have been given to understand it did—I can only blush for the degenerate taste of the Pacific public. The acting was coarse, the score was cruelly mutilated, and the vocal powers of the entire troupe, including the prima donna, were overtaxed by the music. It is certainly not as well rendered as it has been at Booth's for the last two weeks by a semi-amateur company, and such was the expressed verdict of Aimée herself, who attended both performances, and who opens at Booth's herself next week in the same part, and, as far as she is personally concerned, will probably give us an idea of the music as Lecocq wrote it; but I am told by those who ought to know that her company is less than mediocre—quite the lightest following she has brought with her to this country. However, we shall see. Her ultimate destination, taking California en route, is Mexico and South America. Widows, a translation from the German by Stanley McKenna, was given at the Fifth Avenue last week, and proved a fiasco. Ellie Wilton assumed the leading female rôle. That lady has not been fortunate in her engagements of late. On the opening night she was too ill to attempt to do herself justice, and on the second night she was unable to appear, and her part was read. Perhaps, though I know there was no malingering in the case, Miss Wilton regretted this less, inasmuch as her part admitted of no elaborate toilets, in the absence of which, as we all know, half the force of her acting and all the force of her appearance are lost. The Fifth Avenue has not scored a success this season, and it is a marvel in theatrical circles how Harkins manages to keep the doors open. Its future is still involved in the mists of doubt. Alice Harrison is another ex-California member, who is here walking about and involuntarily taking her ease at her inn. Duffengaged her to play the "Little Duke," in his production of that opera at Booth's; but when Alice arrived, three days before the opening, she was ambitious to direct all subsequent rehearsals on the strength of having played the part in Boston. As an objection was raised to having all the business patiently learned in three weeks' rehearsals by a large caste and chorus upset this way at the eleventh hour, Miss Harrison gracefully stepped down and out, in compliance with a message more intelligible than polite from Mr. Duff, and she has remained out ever since. Probably she will not be so much "on the boss" in future. Her part was taken on short notice, and creditably filled by Miss Florence Ellis. After finishing the season at Booth's the party goes on the road, and I understand dates for California are under consideration, so you will probably have an opportunity of seeing the performance and judging of its merits for yourself. Pinefore has subsided except at two theatres—the Standard and the Broadway; and the company of the latter, recruited from Philadelphia church choirs, though amateurish in acting, are decidedly the best vocally we have had among the many that have attempted New York. They go to Boston shortly. In the country, however, the craze continues unabated. Last week there were eighty-six Pinefore combinations on the road, but it is impossible to keep track of them. Every day we hear an account of some wretched Pinefore wrecked and stranded more or less disastrously; but, all undeterred, fresh ones are fitted out to take their place. It reminds one of the perseverance of the Athenians in keeping up their navy, in spite of countless losses and reverses during the Peloponnesian war. Considering that no small percentage of the officers and crews of these Pinefore have to walk back to New York or Boston, without the price of a piece of soap to cleanse themselves from the savor of the over-ripe eggs to which they have been treated occasionally, the confidence with which they re-ship at the first opportunity is sublimely touching. Daziel, of Mail fame, essayed the venture at two city theatres, and failed at both. The proprietors of the Olympic and the Globe would now be glad to hear from him with a remittance on account for rent, and two vengeful Pinefore crews are thirsting for his blood or their salaries in the vicinity of Union Square. The astute Daziel, however, is safe in Toronto, whither he has—heaven knows how—induced a timid Pinefore company to accompany him, and of his Canadian gains or losses I have received no record. A. C. Gunther, an ex-Californian, who came on here with plays for production last spring, has a contract from Wallack for the production of a really strong society drama next season, entitled Two Nights in Rome. Another play of his, Cuba, was accepted at Union Square, and would have been produced this season but for the exceptionally low, but whether definitely or not does not appear. Clay Greene is also here, but he has done nothing in the dramatic line of late, and returns to California in May.

A LOOKER ON.

HISSING AT CONCERTS.

What is the value of approval, when disapproval is never expressed? What is the value of applause, when hisses do not exist?

In reviewing the reasons for the slow advance of music in America, we have come to the conclusion that the absence of the expression of disapproval is a more important factor in its tardiness of growth than would at first be imagined.

The hiss has only fallen into discredit on account of the excess with which it has been employed. In Italy the merest caprice on the part of an audience causes a storm of the sibilant sound that often causes a performance to end with an unanticipated degree of abruptness. Often, too, this judgment of the populace is pronounced so hastily that it has to be recalled at later representations, and changed into applause. This is what occurred with Rossini's Barber of Seville, and (to some extent) with Wagner's works, when performed in Italy.

But this is no more than has happened to critics of more educated character than the general public. We believe that popular judgment, even in art, is seldom so far wrong as to be timid of expression; and that that expression, to be at all valuable, must not consist solely of applause. Until recently, in Boston, the right to hiss was denied. A person who, better able perhaps to judge of the merits of a performance than the applauding (or silent) majority, ventured to express decided censure by a hiss, ran the risk of being ejected by the police. "Served him right," say a few weak-minded adherents of Boston (or other) mutual admiration societies, whose only idea of a concert is that it gives a field for a few favorite acquaintance (or pupils) to air themselves; but we scarcely think that the general public shares the opinion.

We are the last who desire to pain or insult a performer on the concert or operatic stage, but there is something in this matter which goes beyond mere respect to individual feelings. Something is due to art; and sometimes, too, the expression of decided disapproval is really a greater boon to the singer than false applause would be; just as the expression of an honest private opinion is more valuable than mild flattery.

Let us take an instance: A lady possessed of a tolerable voice for parlor use, infatuated by the cheap applause of an admiring circle of friends, decides upon adopting the concert (perchance even the operatic) stage for her profession. Other paths in life are open to her, but none seems so glittering as this. The chance of a debut is not difficult to obtain; influence and money soon achieve that. The evening arrives, and before the pretentious aria is half over, all feel that the attempt is a failure; every moment spent in pursuing this career will be lost. The friends vehemently applaud; the "outsiders" hold their peace. Flushed with the first taste of manufactured applause, with flowers and meaningless compliments, a profession is entered upon which is to be ever after a pathway of thorns. The critics of the press may, perhaps, raise a warning voice (more frequently they will join in the meaningless compliments), but she does not heed. A few hisses (blunt and uncompromising) would have told all; painfully, to be sure, but still truthfully.

The complaisance of American audiences has more victims to account for than the capricious whistles, hisses, and baste of France and Italy.

Music has been kept in ruts years after it might have left them, the American stage has been made a hospital for vocalists who could no longer brave the disapproval of European audiences, leaders in musical centres have foisted incompetent scholars upon the programmes, for their own benefit, and every audacity has found its way into American music, and some of these abuses are due only to the fact that all are pretty certain of gaining some applause, and absolutely sure of not being hissed.

We do not advocate harshness in any degree; but desire to record our belief that singers and musical managers are the servants of the public, and ought to receive praise and blame just as other public servants do—from the public.—Vox Humana.

Spring.

What a beautiful time is spring,
When the woodchuck begins to sing,
And the bumblebee and chickadee
Carry their heads around in a sling.
When the black and tickling ants
Crawl up the young man's pants,
And the straddlebug and mosquito hug
While the spiders engage in a dance;
And the bird gets drunk on dew,
And offers the robin a chew,
While the great owl blinks and the sparrow winks
At the wife of the gay cuckoo;
And the coon goes off on a spree
Along with the chipmunk and flea,
The odorous skunk gets thundering drunk
And tries to make love to the bee.

—Old City Derrick.

If Madame Gerster declares at 9 A.M. that she is unable to sing at the matinee, her manager persuades her to try and show herself at least to the public, which, of course, has been left entirely in the dark as to the prima donna's indisposition. After she has complied with her manager's wishes, and the house is sold out, Madame Gerster withdraws quietly, the gallant manager addresses the audience in well-chosen words, a few acts of another opera are substituted, and they call that in England the "new era of operatic management." How much more striking and forcible the "American" language is?

He dropped his teeth in the flowing tide,
As he feebly leaned o'er the vessel's side,
His troubles internal and mental.
"Quite a misfortune," they said to him.
But he answered coolly, with visage grim,
"Oh, merely an in-sea-dental!"

—Boston Journal.

Since the Spring opening at Mrs. Skidmore's Millinery Establishment, 1114 Market Street, there has been a constant crush of the fair ones to see the display of beautiful goods imported direct from London and Paris. The place is a feminine paradise. Beautiful bonnets, pretty and picturesque hats, buds and blossoms, and sprigs of heather bloom, and rolls of ribbon shimmering over every shade and tint of color imaginable. As a triumph of art, and an achievement of human ingenuity and taste this stock is well worth an examination, even by those who over give millinery a thought. To ladies who do interest themselves in such affairs the opportunity to make first purchases from such a segregation of the beautiful is something they certainly have too much sense to neglect.

A ROMANTIC BEGGAR.

While Ethelberta De Vere was sitting at the bay-window reading the latest novel, last week, a bronzed, thick-set man entered the gateway, walked up to the window, and tapped gently on the pane. He was very undomestic in appearance. He had on a coat which had faded to an original color, his shoes stayed on his feet by accident, and his hat, which was several sizes too small for him, was kept in place by means of a piece of hay rope, which was tied in a hard knot under his chin. As the lady looked up from her book he waved his hand in melo-dramatic style and said: "I just wish to have a few words with you. I am an extensive traveler; yea, verily, I have been over every square inch of this glorious country on foot. I have smoked cigarettes at the Golden Gate; I have seen the buffalo skip fandangoes on the boundless prairie; I have written my name on the sands of the majestic Mississippi. I am a peripatetic gazetteer, and I should be greatly obliged to you if you will furnish me with a pair of supernumerary moccasins, a pair that you contemplate depositing in the ash barrel shortly."

"We have none to-day," she replied, and went on reading.

"I see," he continued, "you have some rare exotics. I always had a characteristic weakness for exotics myself, and I should be happy to step in, make an examination, and give you some valuable advice. I am a skilled botanist and floriculturist, and can tell you the peculiarities of any plant under the sun, from the sweet-scented hyacinth to the night-blooming cucumber. What do you say, shall I step in and regale your sensitive soul with a verbal history of flowers?"

"You can not!" was the emphatic rejoinder.

"Well, if you won't let me say it to you, will you let me come in and sing it in Italian? I have a fine baritone voice."

"I don't want to hear it, you filthy thing!" she screamed, angrily.

"Filthy, filthy! that's always the way. When a man travels around in the cause of science and polite information, he is snubbed and rebuked in this unseemly manner. I was just hinting around at what you have now given me the opportunity of asking. That is, that you will let me go up stairs and take a bath. I'll be satisfied with cold water and common soap."

"You'll get no bath here."

"Then will you let me lie down on the sofa and take a nap—a kind of siesta, as it were?"

"No, sir."

"Will you let me bring up some coal from the cellar?"

"No, sir."

"Will you let me walk in and tune your piano?"

"It doesn't need tuning."

"Will you give me an old shirt?"

"We have no old ones."

"Well, give me a new one."

She took no notice of him, but a few minutes later he whimpered:

"Can't you give me something? I'll take anything, yes, anything. I'm not proud."

"Yes," she said, reflectively, "there is one thing you can have."

"What's that?" he inquired, breathlessly.

"Why, that ice around the edges of the flower-beds."

Then he walked off utterly disgusted and considerably crestfallen.—New York Star.

The ruling passion strong in death. At a funeral down town, the other day, the minister had just reached "we shall miss his cheerful presence in our midst," when the corpse sprang up and shouted, "and so will his sisters, his cousins, and his aunts." Upon investigation it was learned that the deceased had been scratched with a Pin-afore he died.

Those desiring a pleasing and perfect portrait of themselves will bear in mind that the old and reliable firm of Bradley & Rulofson is still in existence, and prepared to furnish its patrons with photographs that, in style and beauty of finish, can not be excelled in the United States. This is no empty assertion, but an accomplished fact. The best facilities, the best operators and finishing artists, always give the best results. If this is what is wanted by purchasers of photographs, the gallery of Bradley & Rulofson, corner of Sacramento and Montgomery, can accommodate them.

On and after Tuesday, April 15th, applications of non-members for tickets to the Artists' Ball will be received by Mr. Martin, assistant secretary, at the rooms of the Art Association, 430 Pine Street. Members of the association desiring tickets should secure them prior to that date.

An elegant assortment of gold watches and chains at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

Dr. E. O. Cochrane, Dentist, No. 850 Market Street, corner of Stockton (over drug store), San Francisco. Office hours, from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M.

Artistic novelties, manufactured from California quartz, at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

Modern Artists' Etchings, 22 Montgomery Street.

STERLING SILVERWARE.—A large assortment of elegant designs at Anderson & Randolph's, corner Montgomery and Sutter Streets.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE.

BARTON & LAWLER.....MANAGERS.
BARTON HILL.....ACTING MANAGER.

Grand Reopening Easter Monday, April 14, with the eminent author and actor, Mr.

DION BOUCAULT,

As CONN, in his great Irish play, the

SHAUGHRAUN,

Supported by Miss JEFFREYS-LEWIS (who has been specially engaged), Miss ADA GILMAN (her first appearance in California), and a brilliant cast of characters. The play produced with romantic scenery by Vogtlin, novel mechanical effects by Stockhouse and Assistants, realistic properties by Greenlock and Assistants, and a brilliant cast of characters. The improvements to the theatre are as follows: Freescoring by Morretti and Trezzini; drapery and upholstery by F. S. Chaddbourne & Co.; painting and gilding by J. S. Swan; joiner work by Romer and Alrich; jobbing by the Diamond Cement Paving Co.; and new drop curtain by Wm. Vogtlin.

Seats may now be secured at the box office.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

GRAND ITALIAN OPERA.

MR. MAX STRAKOSCH.....DIRECTOR.

Opening night, Easter Monday, April 14, 1879, Donizetti's Opera in three acts,

LUCIA DI LAMMERMOOR.

First appearance of Miss MARIA LITTA as Lucia, in which she has made a profound sensation in all the Eastern cities. Sig. LAZARINI, the young and distinguished Tenor, as Edgardo. Sig. PANTALEONI, the world renowned Baritone, as Ashton. Sig. BARBERES as Arturo.

Wednesday Evening, April 16th—

LA FAVORITA.

First appearance of Mlle. MARIE ROSE.

Friday Evening, April 18th—

IL TROVATORE.

First appearance this season of ANNIE LOUISE CARY.

Saturday Evening, April 19th.....MARTHA.

Reserved Seats in Balcony, $2 50; Reserved Seats in Orchestra and Dress Circle, $3; Mezzanine Boxes (4 persons), $15; Stage Boxes (6 persons), $20.

BALDWIN'S THEATRE.

THOMAS MAGUIRE.....MANAGER.
F. LYSTER.....ACTING MANAGER.
CHAS. H. GOODWIN.....TREASURER.

This (Saturday) afternoon, April 12, last performance of the great success, a

SCRAP OF PAPER.

This (Saturday) evening, April 12, second appearance of the

HON. THOMAS FITCH,

As Cardinal Riebelieu.

Sunday evening, April 13, Benefit of

MR. C. B. BISHOP.

OURS, a Musical Olio, and the Drama of the FLYING DUTCHMAN.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE,

Mission Street, between Third and Fourth.

EASTER TUESDAY, APRIL 15,

And every evening (including Sunday) and Saturday afternoon,

THE PASSION.

2d Sale of seats commences on Thursday, from 9 till 4.

GRAND OPERA HOUSE,

Mission Street, between Third and Fourth.

BENEFIT OF F COMPANY,

2d REGT., N. G. C.,

MONDAY.....APRIL 14,

OURS!

Cast to the full strength of

THE BALDWIN THEATRE COMPANY.

STANDARD THEATRE.

Bush Street, between Montgomery and Kearny.

M. B. LEAVITT.....MANAGER.

LAST MATINEE TO-DAY AT 2 P. M.

This (Saturday) and to-morrow (Sunday) evenings, at 8 o'clock, positively last two performances of

MME. RENTZ MINSTRELS

—AND—

MABEL SANTLEY'S

Burlesque Company. The greatest bill of the season. First time in this city of the sparkling burlesque,

PARIS,

Or the Apple of Discord. Also, for the first time, the racy sensational extravaganza,

THE TURKISH HAREM.

Revival of the beautiful Minstrel Scene and for the last time the reconstructed CAN-CAN.

DIVIDEND NOTICE.—THE STATE INVESTMENT AND INSURANCE COMPANY.—Dividend No. 71.—The monthly dividend for March 1879, will be paid on April 10, 1879, at their office, Nos. 21 and 22 Sansone Street.

CHS. H. CUSHING, Secretary.
San Francisco, April 3, 1879.

NEW STYLES STATIONERY.

Just received, a large stock of NEW style Correspondence and Visiting Cards.

BILLINGS, HARBOURNE & CO.,
BOOKSELLERS AND STATIONERS,

NOS. 3 AND 5 MONTGOMERY STREET,
MASONIC TEMPLE.

JONES, RULOFSON & CO'S

STUDIO,

838 Market Street,

Makes the finest Photos at Lowest Prices.

MILLER & RICHARD'S

EXTRA-HARD METAL

SCOTCH TYPE

Is used upon the ARGONAUT exclusively.

Address No. 529 COMMERCIAL STREET.

And 205 Leidesdorff Street,

San Francisco.

THE PHOTOGRAPHER.

914 Market Street, near the Baldwin.

S. B. BOSWELL & CO.,

STOCK BROKERS,

No. 318 California Street,
SAN FRANCISCO.

J. C. MERRILL & CO.

SHIPPING

—AND—

COMMISSION MERCHANTS,

Agents for the

SANDWICH ISLANDS AND OREGON PACKET LINES.

204 AND 206 CALIFORNIA ST.

San Francisco

FAMILIES

LEAVING THE CITY.

FURNITURE, TRUNKS, PIANOS

Pictures, Carpets, etc., stored and taken care of (not necessary to pack them). Parlor Sets, Carpets, and Blankets stored and dusted to keep out moths. Trunks stored for twenty-five cents per month. We have the best facilities for storage, having built our warehouses expressly for it. Don't pay rent or interest, and can afford to store goods low. Advances made, insurance effected, and reference given. Please send postal card, and we will call and give estimate for storage, etc.
H. WINDEL & CO.,
Principal Office, 310 Stockton St., bet. Post and Sutter,
Corner Stockton Place, San Francisco.

TABER, HARKER & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND WHOLESALE
GROCERS, 102 and 110 California St., San Francisco.

PALACE HOTEL RESTAURANT,

FIRST CLASS IN ALL RESPECTS.

QUIET AND DESIRABLE PLACE
for Ladies, Gentlemen, and Families. Entrance south side of Court. A.

JAPANESE FABLES FOR LITTLE FOLKS.

Translated for the Argonaut by T. E. Hallifax.

XIV.—HACHI KATSUGI HIME.

[A tale of a maiden whose features were concealed by a large wooden bowl.]

In the olden time there lived in an out-of-the-way place of Yamato, an old couple who had a pretty little daughter. The father died while she was yet young, leaving her and her mother in great poverty and distress.

Originally of noble family and high position, political troubles had driven them to seek a home in this retired spot; for pride prevented the father from humbling himself to his opponents, and to improve their condition they knew not how. When the maiden was only thirteen years old the mother fell sick, and, fearing she would not recover, was in great distress of mind at the thought of having to leave her lovely child alone in this rude world without protector or friend. She therefore charged the maiden to procure a large, deep wooden bowl, and bring it to her bedside. She then directed her daughter to turn it upside down and place it on her head, so as to conceal her features, and, after becoming an orphan, on no account to remove it until after she was married of her own free will to the man of her choice.

The old mother died that night, and the maiden found that she could not remove the wooden bowl from her head, and there it remained for years. As the young girl approached the period of womanhood, so did her beauty become more marked, and her perfectly formed figure attracted the notice of all the young men of the neighborhood; but she firmly repelled their advances, and the peculiar, immovable head-dress made them chary of offering her honorable marriage. Meantime she worked in the neighboring fields, and contrived to earn a precarious and scanty living; but her hereditary pride made her refuse all offers of charity of a doubtful character, until at last the rich man of the district, having observed her exemplary conduct, undertook to protect her from her persecutors. For three years she served this kind man faithfully and honestly, helping his wife, who was in delicate health, and soon was treated as one of the family.

The eldest son of the family, who had been to Kiyoto to be educated, returned to his home, wearied of the follies and pleasures of the city, and its painted and heartless "light o' loves," and noticing the real beauty and sterling worth of his mother's hand-maiden, soon learned to look upon her with a feeling of more than common regard, and determined to possess her as his wife. At first his parents endeavored to dissuade him from such a foolish act, but their opposition and unjust criticisms on the poor maiden only fanned the flame of love, and made him more than ever anxious to become her lawful protector. Her elegant figure, aristocratic bearing, and refined manners were the cause of much jealousy among the women of the neighborhood, who used all their arts to make our heroine appear at a disadvantage to the rich young heir; but his city experiences had taught him how to value the maiden at her true worth. After much opposition, his parents eventually agreed to the union, but it took some time before the young girl would consent. However, she dreamed one night that her mother visited her and gave her sanction to the marriage, promising that if the young man were faithful and kind, they should be very happy and prosperous. Accordingly the next day she made her lover happy by consenting to become his.

Great preparations were made for the wedding of the rich man's heir with the girl who wore the wooden bowl, and many were the curious and spiteful remarks made. But the faithful lover heeded them not, and set to work heartily to lay out the gardens and fish pond opposite the rooms his father had newly fitted up for the reception of the young people.

On the morning of the wedding day great efforts were made to remove the unsightly bowl, but they were all in vain, and were abandoned as they caused the maiden great pain; but in the evening, when the hymenial wine cup had been passed round, the bowl suddenly split assunder with a great noise, and disappeared, leaving a shower of precious things heaped up on the train of the dutiful and chaste maiden's robe.

They were now both happy, and continued so to a good old age, the husband never regretting his choice of a partner whose countenance he could not behold until he had actually made her his wife; nor did she ever have reason to repent her choice of a husband.

MORAL.—True worth and modesty gain their reward in the end; while they who marry for a handsome face alone usually repent bitterly when too late.

An Italian claims to have made a valuable discovery. He says he has learned how to tune up nerves, like the cords of a violin, and bring them into harmony. The nerves lose their tone, he thinks, like any musical instrument, and if they all run down alike, it is of little importance, as they will still act together. But when the general harmony is destroyed, by accident or uneven strain, the whole system is disturbed, and health suffers. This difficulty he claims power to rectify, and calls himself a "nerve-tuner."

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Easter Sunday, April 13, 1879.

Eastern Oysters.
Vegetable Soup.
Fried Brook Trout, with Sliced Lemon.
Lamb's Tongues, with Tomato Sauce.
Breaded Veal Cutlets, Green Peas.
Asparagus, Spinach.
Roman Punch.
Roast Turkey, Cranberry Jelly.
New Potatoes.
Cauliflower Salad, French dressing.
Cheese.
Strawberries. Ice Cream. Fancy Cakes.
Fruit-bowl of Bananas, Pears, Apples, and Oranges in sections, Nuts and Raisins.
Wines—Sauterne, Claret, Sherry, and Champagne.
Black Coffee.

To COOK LAMB'S TONGUES WITH TOMATO SAUCE.—Take half a dozen fresh tongues, and boil in some salted water. When nearly cooked take them out, trim, and cut in half lengthwise. Have a frying-pan with two table-spoonfuls of melted butter; put in the tongues, with three or four sections of shallot, a bunch of parsley, and one small green pepper, all finely minced. About an hour previous to cooking take half a can of Lusk's tomatoes, stew them with a little minced onion and some salt; add two cupfuls of beef stock, and strain over the tongues; cover them, and let all cook about half an hour. They may be served with lettuce. We say Lusk's Tomatoes, as we have tried several brands, and find Lusk's Tomatoes, as well as their Pork and Beans, preferable to others.

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAVORITES.

The River.

A woman stood by the river—
At night by the brink of the river;
She was still young, and she had been fair,
But deep on her brow was the brand of care,
And rain-drops fell from her tresses bare,
Into the depths of the river.

Hold her back from the river—
Angels of grace! from the river
That writhes like a serpent beneath her eyes,
And claims to whirl her along as its prize.
Away, body and soul, for ever.

Count her not with the victims of lies and passion and gold;
Pity we have for the fallen—she is but hungry and cold.
Think of her not as a human moth, scorched in ambition's lure;
She is no heroine of a romance—only one of the poor—
Only one of the suffering poor, for whom no tears are shed,
Whose life is a sigh,

Who faint and die
For want of a morsel of bread.

Hold her back from the river—
Angels of grace! from the river;
A sound like a wail
Passed into the gale
That rippled the tide of the river.

"Cold! black! deep! in thy water's icy flow;
Cold! black! deep! in the gurgling stream below.
O thou deep rushing river,
Let me find repose in thee,
And the ills of my life would flow away
As thy waters ebb to the sea.

"There is the peace for a stricken heart,
For a life without pity or love;
Lulled to rest on the gold-bright sands
By the murmuring wave above.

"Cold! black! deep! give me at least a home;
Cold! black! deep! rock me to sleep with thy moan."

Still she stood by the river—
Close to the brink of the river—
When the city was still,
And the night was chill,
And clouds, like the wings of Spirits of Ill,
Were hiding the stars from the river.

Hold her back from the river—
Angels of grace! from the river
That writhes like a serpent beneath her eyes,
And claims to whirl her along as its prize,
Away, body and soul, for ever.

Count her not as a rebel against the Lord Most High;
She follows not the coward's creed that it is brave to die.
Oh, she would work on cheerfully for what to your dogs you give,
Grow nappy and old if hunger and cold did not make it such pain to live.

See, she kneels by the river—
Gazes on high from the river;
And the hand of the merciful Lord of all
Parted aside the night's black pall,
And the lights of the hosts of heaven fall
Bright on the glittering river.

Rivet her gaze on the river—
Angels of grace! on the river;
A sound like a soul's redeeming prayer
Falls hushed and low on the morning air,
As the tide flows back in the river.

"Cold! black! deep! if I give my soul to thee,
Cold! black! deep! for the dread eternity,
Have I the hope that with mortal life
Will cease immortal pain?
Have I no hope that of happiness lost
Some wreck may return again?

"O deep and rushing river,
I am not fit to die;
Grace on my soul comes streaming
As the light on thy waves on high.

"There is the home for the stricken heart,
By the heavenly throne above—
Ne'er to be sought at my own weak will,
But won by the Saviour's love.

"Cold! black! deep!
Flow on with thy ceaseless moan;
Cold! black! deep!
Glide on thy course—alone!" —Anonymous.

Civil War.

"Rifleman, shoot me a fancy shot.
Straight at the heart of yon prowling vedette;
Ring me a ball in the glittering spot
That shines on his breast like an amulet."

"Ah, captain, here goes for a fine-drawn bead;
There's music around when my harrel's in tune."
Crack! went the rifle, the messenger sped,
And dead from his horse fell the ringing dragoon.

"Now, rifleman, steal through the bushes, and snatch
From your victim some trinket to hanceel first blood;
A button, or loop, or that luminous patch
That gleams in the moon like a diamond stud."

"O captain, I staggered, and sank on my track,
When I gazed on the face of that fallen vedette,
For he looked so like you, as he lay on his back,
That my heart rose upon me, and masters me yet.

"But I snatched off the trinket—this locket of gold;
An inch from the centre my lead broke its way,
Scarce grazing the picture, so fair to behold,
Of a beautiful lady in bridal array."

"Ha! rifleman, fling me the locket! 'Tis she,
My brother's young bride—and the fallen dragoon
Was her husband. Hush, soldier, 'twas heaven's decree;
We must bury him there by the light of the moon.

"But, hark! The far bugles their warnings unite;
War is a virtue—weakness a sin;
There's a lurking and loping round us to-night—
Load again, rifleman, keep your hand in!" —Anonymous.

Stop up your ear with your finger. You hear a roaring as of a miniature Niagara. Remove your finger and put in its place a wad of cotton or anything else you choose. The roaring which you hear is the sound of the circulation of the blood in the tip of your finger.

A COMMOTION IN THE SCHOOL DEPARTMENT.

There is intense dissatisfaction in the School Department at the proposed reduction of salaries. The male element is particularly distressed, and its latest effort was the editing of a petition to the Board of Supervisors against the reduction of the levy for the next fiscal year. Copies of the petition, with the approbation of the Board of Education, were sent to the different schools, distributed among the teachers, and they strenuously requested to canvass the city for the signatures of tax-payers. It was a noticeable feature that, while dozens of the lady teachers might be met scouring the city, not one of the agitators was visible. Having by their representations aroused alike the fears and enthusiasm of the female members of the department, they quietly shifted the responsibility of the canvassing business on the shoulders of their weaker colleagues, and spent the day in blissful indolence speculating on the probable success of the signature business. While tax-payers favor and strongly urge that measures be taken by the Board of Education to economize, and recommend an application of the pruning-knife to the exorbitant high salaries of some of the employés, they think that in our primary schools, where the salary is $60, a sweeping reduction would be a gross injustice. Primary teachers are faithful, hard-working, painstaking women, whose salaries should be left intact so long as there are other quarters in the department where retrenchment could and should be effected. Some of the male members hold two and three positions, with a salary attached to each—no glory business there. Joseph O'Connor is principal of day school, principal of the evening schools, and a member of the Board of Examiners, $300 the monthly compensation; Mr. Herbst, a German importation, is principal and member of the Board of Examiners, $225; Mr. Wilson is a principal and member of the Board of Examiners, $250; Mrs. Du Bois is a principal and member of the Board of Examiners, $225—this lady's ability to fill either position has been strongly questioned, but then she is a "Daughter of Rebecca," and the protégé of the oldest member of the board; John Swett, for the onerous duty of supervising the Girls High School, $333; W. T. Reid, who was induced by a former board to leave the Athens of America (Boston) and take charge of our Boys' High School, $333, which sum may not be quite up to Athenian standard, but certainly is too much for the overseer of a cramming and copying institution. There are a number other principals on high salaries, and a host of vice-principals at $150. It there is a position in the entire department that should be abolished it is that of vice-principal, with its $50 extra salary for simply submitting to the opprobrious title. Another imposition our taxpaying citizens have had practiced upon them for years is the accomplishments of music, drawing, and the languages. The mass of children attending our Common Schools never enter a grammar grade, and can a greater outrage be imagined than to oblige such children to waste time and attention on drawing-room accomplishments? The School Department has no right to encourage national distinctions. If our French and German residents wish their children taught their mother tongue, let them do so, but not at the expense of the city treasury. The next quarter where retrenchment might be managed is in the general office of the Board of Education, with its superfluous sinecures. A. L. Mann, City Superintendent, is the nominal head, and this representative of the city government does literally nothing, for the entire duty devolves upon his deputy, D. Stone, and yet Mr. Mann accommodatingly pockets $333 per month, with carriage hire, and his wife also holding a position as teacher in the department. The deputy receives $250 salary, and he has two daughters teachers. The secretary, or rather incubus of the office, George Beanston, whose duties are of a negative character, receives $200 of the city's money. C. A. Clinton, the voluble assistant secretary, gets $175. George Wade, the clerk, manages to draw $125. His duties have always been a mystery, and investigators have failed to discover anything more onerous than strutting about the office, and occasionally assisting in some heavy flirtation. The janitor gets $125, and he has charge of the supply department; is the particular friend of President Heister, the member of "$4,000 lot commission" fame. An errand boy revels in $40, all messages being distributed through the mail. The office is provided with every luxury, telegraphic apparatus, telephones, district telegraph boxes, the latest phase of wanton extravagance being the supplying of the different schools with "call boxes," and the American District Telegraph Company with $125 per month. Then, there is the purchasing of school lots for no purpose other than to expend the funds, favor a friend, and receive a "divi" of the commission money. The Department of Supplies is another vulnerable quarter. What in the name of common sense can be the object of laying in supplies (and by contract) sufficient to run the department for years, where there is a sum set apart and expended every year for that purpose, the old stock remaining on hand to tempt the cupidity of some unscrupulous janitor, as in the case of James Duffy. The janitorial, carpentering, and general jobbing departments are the political capital of the different members who appoint and control the compensations, all of which are up to the "fancy" salary standard. We think the public can not fail to see where retrenchment could be effected without detriment or crippling the Primary Department.

Yours, etc.,

R. E. M.

A young woman whose apartments are very nicely furnished undertakes to dazzle a gentleman whose acquaintance she has just made, and ringing out the bell, says to the servant: "I think I will take a drive out to the Bois. Susan, tell John to harness up the horse to the phaeton."

The faithful domestic returns in a few moments and says: "Missus, I can't find any John, or horse, or phaeton at all, at all—shall I go and get a cab?"

A sergeant of Zouaves had, at the battle of Orleans, his thigh smashed by a fragment of shell.

"Well, my poor fellow," said his captain, who visited him in the hospital, "you must find it pretty lonesome work, being laid up here."

"Oh, no, Cap., not at all," was the reply. "I suffer a good deal, and that makes the time slip by."

COMMENCING MONDAY, NOV. 18, 1878.

Passenger trains will leave San Francisco, from Passenger Depot on Townsend Street, between Third and Fourth, as follows:

8.30 A. M. DAILY for San Jose, Gilroy, Hollister, Tres Pinos, Pajaro, Salinas, Soledad, and all Way Stations. At PAJARO, the Santa Cruz R. R. connects with this train for Aptos and Santa Cruz. At SALINAS the M. & S. V. R. R. connects with this train for Monterey. Stage connections made with this train.

10.40 A. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

3.30 P. M. DAILY (Sundays excepted) for Gilroy and Way Stations.

4.40 P. M. DAILY for San Jose and Way Stations.

6.30 P. M. DAILY for Menlo Park and Way Stations.

The extra Sunday train to San Jose and Way Stations is discontinued for the Winter season.

EXCURSION TICKETS to San Jose and intermediate points and return sold on Saturdays and Sunday mornings. Good for return until following MONDAY, inclusive.

A. C. BASSETT, H. R. JUDAH, Superintendent, Asst. Pass. & Tkt. Agt.

SOUTHERN DIVISIONS.

Passengers for points on the Southern Divisions of the road will take the cars of the Central Pacific Railroad via OAKLAND, leaving SAN FRANCISCO via Ferry Landing, Market Street, at 4.00 P. M. daily (Arizona Express Train), and making close connection at GOSHEN for Sumner, Mohave, LOS ANGELES, Wilmington, Anaheim, Colton, Colorado River, Yuma, and Stanwix (85 miles east from Yuma).

SAN FRANCISCO AND NORTH PACIFIC R. R.

Commencing on Sunday, April 6th, 1879, and until further notice, Boats and Trains will leave San Francisco: (Ticket Office, Washington Street Wharf.)

3.00 P. M. DAILY, Sundays excepted, Steamer "James M. Donahue" (Washington Street Wharf), connecting with Mail and Express Train at Donahue for Petaluma, Santa Rosa, Healdsburg, Cloverdale, and way stations. Making stage connection at Lakeville for Sonoma; at Geyserville for Skaggs Springs, at Cloverdale for Ukiah, Lakeport, Mendocino City, Highland Springs, Bartlett Springs, Soda Bay, and the Geysers. Connections made at Fulton on the following morning for Korbels, Guerneville, and the Redwoods. (Arrive at San Francisco 10.30 A. M.)

SUNDAY EXCURSIONS AT REDUCED RATES.

8.00 A. M., SUNDAYS ONLY, VIA Donahue, for Cloverdale and way stations. Fares for round trip: Donahue, $1.00; Petaluma, $1.50; Santa Rosa, $2.00; Healdsburg, $3.00; Cloverdale, $4.50. Connections made at Fulton for Laguna, Forestville, Korbels, Guerneville, the Russian River and Big Trees. Fares for round trip: Fulton and Laguna, $2.50; Forestville, Korbels, and Guerneville, $3.75. (Arrive at San Francisco 6.55 P. M.)

Freight received from 7 A. M. to 2.30 P. M. daily (except Sunday).

TICKET OFFICE, WASHINGTON STREET WHARF.

ARTHUR HUGHES, Gen. Manager. A. A. BEAN, Supt. JAS. M. DONAHUE, Gen. Pass. and Tkt. Agent.

OCCIDENTAL AND ORIENTAL STEAMSHIP COMPANY

—FOR—

JAPAN AND CHINA,

Leave Wharf, Cor. First and Brannan Streets, at noon, for YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG.

Connecting at Yokohama with steamers for Shanghai,

GAELIC, OCEANIC, BELGIC.

March.....22 April.....16
June.....17 July.....15
August.....15 September.....16
November.....15 December.....16

Cabin plans on exhibition and Passenger Tickets for sale at No. 2 Montgomery Street.

For freight apply to GEO. H. RICE, Freight Agent, at the Pacific Mail Steamship Company's Wharf, or No. 218 California Street.

T. H. GOODMAN, Gen'l Passenger Agent.

LELAND STANFORD, President.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP CO.

First-class steamers with unequalled accommodations for passengers will leave San Francisco:

FOR YOKOHAMA AND HONGKONG,
On the 1st of every month.

FOR SYDNEY AND AUCKLAND, via HONOLULU,
January 20, February 17, March 17, April 14, May 12, June 9, July 7, August 4, September 1, September 24, December 22, and every fourth week thereafter.

FOR NEW YORK, via PANAMA, CENTRAL AMERICAN, MEXICAN, and SOUTH AMERICAN PORTS, HAVANA, and all WEST INDIA PORTS, on the 5th and 20th of each month.

FOR VICTORIA, B. C., PUGET SOUND PORTS, and PORTLAND, Oregon, on the 10th, 20th, and 30th of each month.

WILLIAMS, BLANCHARD & CO., Agents,
Corner First and Brannan Streets.

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Steamers of this Company will sail from Broadway wharf for PORTLAND (Oregon), every five days, direct, and for LOS ANGELES, SANTA BARBARA, SANTA CRUZ, SAN DIEGO, SAN LUIS OBISPO, and other Northern and Southern Coast Ports, leaving San Francisco about every third day.

For day and hour of sailing, see the Company's advertisement in the San Francisco daily papers.

TICKET OFFICE, No. 214 MONTGOMERY ST., NEAR PINE.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO., Agents,
No. 10 Market Street, San Francisco.

C. P. R. R.

Overland Ticket Office, Oakland Ferry, foot of Market St.

COMMENCING MONDAY, MARCH

31st, 1879, and until further notice.

TRAINS AND BOATS will leave SAN FRANCISCO:

7.00 A. M., DAILY, VALLEJO Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with the trains for Napa (Stages for Sonoma), Calistoga (The Geysers), and Sacramento. Connecting at Davis (Sundays excepted) for Woodland and Knight's Landing, and at Woodland for Williams and Willows. (Arrive San Francisco 8.10 P. M.)

7.00 A. M., DAILY, LOCAL PASSENGER Train (via Oakland Ferry and via Livermore), arriving at Tracy at 11.30 A. M., and connecting with Atlantic Express. Connects at Niles with train arriving at San Jose at 10.15 A. M. (Returning, train from Tracy arrives at 6.05 P. M.)

8.00 A. M., DAILY, ATLANTIC Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.) for Sacramento, Marysville, Redding (Portland, Or.), Colfax, Reno (Virginia City), Palisade (Eureka), Ogden, and Omaha. Connects at Galt with train arriving at Lone at 3.40 P. M.

SUNDAY EXCURSION TICKETS to SAN PABLO AND MARTINEZ AT REDUCED RATES.

10.00 A. M., DAILY, (VIA OAKLAND FERRY), Local Passenger Train to Haywards and Niles. (Arrive San Francisco 8.05 P. M.)

3.00 P. M., DAILY, SAN JOSE Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry and Niles), stopping at all way stations. Arrive at San Jose at 5.20 P. M. (Arrive San Francisco at 9.35 A. M.)

3.00 P. M., DAILY, NORTHERN Railway Passenger Train (via Oakland Ferry) to San Pablo, Martinez, and Antioch. (Arrive San Francisco 9.35 A. M.)

4.00 P. M., DAILY, ARIZONA Express Train (via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.) for Lathrop (and Stockton), Merced, Madera, Visalia, Sumner, Mojave, Newhall (San Buenaventura and Santa Barbara), LOS ANGELES, Santa Monica, Wilmington, Santa Ana (San Diego), Colton, and Yuma (Colorado River Steamers), connecting direct with daily trains of the Southern Pacific Railroad of Arizona for Gila Bend (119 miles east from Yuma) and end of track. Daily Stages for Maricopa, Phoenix, Prescott, Florence, and Tucson. Sleeping cars between Oakland, Los Angeles, and Yuma. (Arrive San Francisco at 12.35 P. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED, Vallejo Steamer (from Market Street Landing), connecting with trains for Calistoga (The Geysers), Woodland, Knight's Landing, and Sacramento, and at Sacramento with passenger train, leaving at 9.35 P. M., for Truckee, Reno, Carson, and Virginia. Sleeping cars between Vallejo and Carson. (Arrive San Francisco 11.10 A. M.)

4.00 P. M., SUNDAYS EXCEPTED, Sacramento Steamer (from Washington Street Wharf) for Benicia and Landings on the Sacramento River. (Arrive San Francisco 8.00 P. M.)

4.00 P. M., DAILY, THROUGH Third Class and Accommodation Train, via Oakland Ferry, Northern Ry., and S. P. & T. R. R.) connecting at Lathrop with train arriving at Los Angeles on second day at 11.55 A. M. (Arrive San Francisco 9.05 A. M.)

4.30 P. M., DAILY, LOCAL PASSENGER train (via Oakland Ferry) to Haywards, Niles, and Livermore. (Arrive San Francisco 8.35 P. M.)

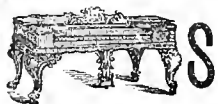

5.00 P. M., DAILY, OVERLAND Emigrant Train (via Oakland Ferry and Northern Railway), to Ogden, Omaha, and East. Public conveyance for Mills Seminary connects with all trains, Sundays excepted, at "Seminary Park Station."

FERRIES AND LOCAL TRAINS.

FROM SAN FRANCISCO, DAILY.

To Oakland.		To Alameda.		To Fremont.		To East Oakland.		To Niles.		To Berkeley.		Delaware Street.		To San Jose.
A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.	A. M.	P. M.
6.10	12.30	7.00	8.00	8.10	7.00	7.30	7.00	7.30	7.00	7.30	8.00	8.30	6.10	7.30	8.00
7.00	1.00	8.00	9.00	9.10	8.00	8.30	7.30	8.00	7.30	8.00	8.30	9.00	7.00	8.30	9.00
7.30	1.30	8.30	9.30	10.00	9.00	9.30	8.30	9.00	8.30	9.00	9.30	10.00	7.30	9.00	9.30
8.00	2.00	9.00	10.00	10.30	9.30	9.30	8.30	9.00	8.30	9.00	9.30	10.00	8.00	9.30	10.00
8.30	3.00	9.30	10.30	10.30	9.30	9.30	8.30	9.00	8.30	9.00	9.30	10.00	8.30	9.30	10.00
9.00	3.30	10.00	11.00	11.30	10.00	10.30	9.30	10.00	9.30	10.00	10.30	11.00	9.00	10.00	10.30
9.30	4.00	10.30	11.30	11.30	10.30	10.30	9.30	10.00	9.30	10.00	10.30	11.00	9.30	10.30	11.00
10.00	4.30	11.00	12.00	12.30	11.00	11.00	10.00	10.30	10.00	10.30	11.00	12.00	10.00	11.00	11.30
10.30	5.00	11.30	12.30	12.30	11.30	11.00	10.00	10.30	10.00	10.30	11.00	12.00	10.30	11.30	12.00
11.00	5.30	12.00	1.00	1.00	11.00	11.00	10.00	10.30	10.00	10.30	11.00	12.00	11.00	12.00	12.30
11.30	6.00	12.30	1.30	1.30	11.30	11.30	10.30	10.30	10.30	10.30	11.00	12.00	11.30	12.30	1.00
12.00	6.30	1.00	2.00	2.00	12.00	12.00	11.00	10.30	10.30	10.30	11.00	12.00	12.00	1.00	1.30
.....	7.00	2.00	2.30	2.30	12.30	12.30	11.30	10.30	10.30	10.30	11.00	12.00	12.30	1.30	2.00
.....	8.10	2.30	3.00	3.00	1.00	1.00	11.30	10.30	10.30	10.30	11.00	12.00	1.00	2.30	3.00
.....	9.20	3.00	3.30	3.30	1.30	1.30	12.00	11.00	10.30	10.30	11.00	12.00	1.30	3.00	3.30
.....	10.30	3.30	4.00	4.00	2.00	2.00	12.30	11.30	11.00	10.30	11.00	12.00	2.00	3.30	4.00
.....	11.45	4.00	4.30	4.30	2.30	2.30	1.00	11.30	11.00	10.30	11.00	12.00	2.30	4.00	4.30
.....	12.15	4.30	5.00	5.00	3.00	3.00	1.30	12.00	11.30	11.00	12.00	1.00	3.00	4.30	5.00
.....	1.00	5.00	5.30	5.30	3.30	3.30	2.00	12.30	12.00	11.30	12.00	1.30	3.30	5.00	5.30
.....	2.10	5.30	6.00	6.00	4.00	4.00	2.30	1.00	12.30	12.00	12.00	2.00	4.00	5.30	6.00
.....	3.20	6.00	6.30	6.30	4.30	4.30	3.00	1.30	1.00	12.30	12.00	2.30	4.30	6.00	6.30
.....	4.30	6.30	7.00	7.00	5.00	5.00	3.30	2.00	1.30	1.00	12.30	12.00	3.00	6.30	7.00
.....	5.40	7.00	7.30	7.30	5.30	5.30	4.00	2.30	2.00	1.30	1.00	12.30	3.30	7.00	7.30
.....	6.50	7.30	8.00	8.00	6.00	6.00	4.30	3.00	2.30	2.00	1.30	1.00	4.00	7.30	8.00
.....	8.00	8.00	8.30	8.30	6.30	6.30	5.00	3.30	3.00	2.30	2.00	1.30	4.30	8.00	8.30
.....	9.10	8.30	9.00	9.00	7.00	7.00	5.30	4.00	3.30	3.00	2.30	2.00	5.00	8.30	9.00
.....	10.20	9.00	9.30	9.30	7.30	7.30	6.00	4.30	4.00	3.30	3.00	2.30	5.30	9.00	9.30
.....	11.30	9.30	10.00	10.00	8.00	8.00	6.30	5.00	4.30	4.00	3.30	3.00	6.00	9.30	10.00
.....	12.40	10.00	10.30	10.30	8.30	8.30	7.00	5.30	5.00	4.30	4.00	3.30	6.30	10.00	10.30
.....	1.50	10.30	11.00	11.00	9.00	9.00	7.30	6.00	5.30	5.00	4.30	4.00	7.00	10.30	11.00
.....	3.00	11.00	11.30	11.30	9.30	9.30	8.00	6.30	6.00	5.30	5.00	4.30	7.30	11.00	11.30
.....	4.10	11.30	12.00	12.00	10.00	10.00	8.30	7.00	6.30	6.00	5.30	5.00	8.00	11.30	12.00
.....	5.20	12.00	12.30	12.30	10.30	10.30	9.00	7.30	7.00	6.30	6.00	5.30	8.30	12.00	12.30
.....	6.30	12.30	1.00	1.00	11.00	11.00	9.30	8.00	7.30	7.00	6.30	6.00	9.00	12.30	1.00
.....	7.40	1.00	1.30	1.30	11.30	11.30	10.00	8.30	8.00	7.30	7.00	6.30	9.30	1.00	1.30
.....	8.50	1.30	2.00	2.00	12.00	12.00	10.30	9.00	8.30	8.00	7.30	7.00	10.00	1.30	2.00
.....	10.00	2.00	2.30	2.30	12.30	12.30	11.00	9.30	9.00	8.30	8.00	7.30	10.30	2.00	2.30
.....	11.10	2.30	3.00	3.00	1.00	1.00	11.30	10.00	9.30	9.00	8.30	8.00	11.00	2.30	3.00
.....	12.20	3.00	3.30	3.30	1.30	1.30	12.00	10.30	10.00	9.30	9.00	8.30	11.30	3.00	3.30
.....	1.30	3.30	4.00	4.00	2.00	2.00	12.30	11.00	10.30	10.00	9.30	9.00	12.00	3.30	4.00
.....	2.40	4.00	4.30	4.30	2.30	2.30	1.00	11.30	11.00	10.30	10.00	9.30	12.30	4.00	4.30
.....	3.50	4.30	5.00	5.00	3.00	3.00	1.30	12.00	11.30	11.00	10.30	10.00	1.00	4.30	5.00
.....	5.00	5.00	5.30	5.30	3.30	3.30	2.00	12.30	12.00	11.30	11.00	10.30	1.30	5.00	5.30
.....	6.10	5.30	6.00	6.00	4.00	4.00	2.30	1.00	12.30	12.00	12.00	11.30	2.00	5.30	6.00
.....	7.20	6.00	6.30	6.30	4.30	4.30	3.00	1.30	1.00	12.30	12.00	12.00	2.30	6.00	6.30
.....	8.30	6.30	7.00	7.00	5.00	5.00	3.30	2.00	1.30	1.00	12.30	12.00	3.00	6.30	7.00
.....	9.40	7.00	7.30	7.30	5.30	5.30	4.00	2.30	2.00	1.30	1.00	12.30	3.30	7.00	7.30
.....	10.50	7.30	8.00	8.00	6.00	6.00	4.30	3.00	2.30	2.00	1.30	1.00	4.00	7.30	8.00
.....	12.00	8.00	8.30	8.30	6.30	6.30	5.00	3.30	3.00	2.30	2.00	1.30	4.30	8.00	8.30
.....	1.10	8.30	9.00	9.00	7.00	7.00	5.30	4.00	3.30	3.00	2.30	2.00	5.00	8.30	9.00
.....	2.20	9.00	9.30	9.30	7.30	7.30	6.00	4.30	4.00	3.30	3.00	2.30	5.30	9.00	9.30
.....	3.30	9.30	10.00	10.00	8.00	8.00	6.30	5.00	4.30	4.00	3.30	3.00	6.00	9.30	10.00
.....	4.40	10.00	10.30	10.30	8.30	8.30	7.00	5.30	5.00	4.30	4.00	3.30	6.30	10.00	10.30
.....	5.50	10.30	11.00	11.00	9.00	9.00	7.30	6.00	5.30	5.00	4.30	4.00	7.00	10.30	11.00
.....	7.00	11.00	11.30	11.30	9.30	9.30	8.00	6.30	6.00	5.30	5.00	4.30	7.30	11.00	11.30
.....	8.10	11.30	12.00	12.00	10.00	10.00	8.30	7.00	6.30	6.00	5.30	5.00	8.00	11.30	12.00
.....	9.20	12.00	12.30	12.30	10.30	10.30	9.00	7.30	7.00	6.30	6.00	5.30	8.30	12.00	12.30
.....	10.30	12.30	1.00	1.00	11.00	11.00	9.30	8.00	7.30	7.00	6.30	6.00	9.00	12.30	1.00
.....	11.40	1.00	1.30	1.30	11.30	11.30	10.00	8.30	8.00	7.30	7.00	6.30	9.30	1.00	1.30
.....	12.50	1.30	2.00	2.00	12.00	12.00	10.30	9.00	8.30	8.00	7.30	7.00	10.00	1.30	2.00
.....	1.00	2.00	2.30	2.30	12.30	12.30	11.00	9.30	9.00	8.30	8.00	7.30	10.30	2.00	2.30
.....	2.10	2.30	3.00	3.00	1.00	1.00	11.30	10.00	9.30	9.00	8.30	8.00	11.00	2.30	3.00
.....	3.20	3.00	3.30	3.30	1.30	1.30	12.00	10.30	10.00	9.30	9.00	8.30	11.30	3.00	3.30
.....	4.30	3.30	4.00	4.00	2.00	2.00	12.30	11.00	10.30	10.00	9.30	9.00	12.00	3.30	4.00
.....	5.40	4.00	4.30	4.30	2.30	2.30	1.00	11.30	11.00	10.30	10.00	9.30	12.30	4.00	4.30
.....	6.50	4.30	5.00	5.00	3.00	3.00	1.30	12.00	11.30	11.00	10.30	10.00	1.00	4.30	5.00
.....	8.00	5.00	5.30	5.30	3.30	3.30	2.00	12.30	12.00	11.30	11.00	10.30	1.30	5.00	5.30
.....	9.10	5.30	6.00	6.00	4.00	4.00	2.30	1.00	12.30	12.00	12.00	11.30	2.00	5.30	6.00
.....	10.20	6.00	6.30	6.30	4.30	4.30	3.00	1.30	1.00	12.30	12.00	12.00	2.30	6.00	6.30
.....	11.30	6.30	7.00	7.00	5.00	5.00	3.30	2.00	1.30	1.00	12.30	12.00	3.00	6.30	7.00
.....	12.40	7.00	7.30	7.30	5.30	5.30	4.00	2.30	2.00	1.30	1.00	12.30	3.30	7.00	7.30
.....	1.50	7.30	8.00	8.00	6.00	6.00	4.30	3.00	2.30	2.00	1.30	1.00	4.00	7.30	8.00
.....	3.00	8.00	8.30	8.30	6.30	6.30	5.00	3.30	3.00	2.30	2.00	1.30	4.30	8.00	8.30
.....	4.10	8.30	9.00	9.00	7.00	7.00	5.30	4.00	3.30	3.00	2.30	2.00	5.00	8.30	9.00
.....	5.20	9.00	9.30	9.30	7.30	7.30	6.00	4.30	4.00	3.30	3.00	2.30	5.30	9.00	9.30
.....	6.30	9.30	10.00	10.00	8.00	8.00	6.30	5.00	4.30	4.00	3.30	3.00	6.00	9.30	10.00
.....	7.40	10.00	10.30	10.30	8.30	8.30	7.00	5.30	5.00	4.30	4.00	3.30	6.30	10.00	10.30
.....	8.50	10.30	11.00	11.00	9.00	9.00	7.30	6.00	5.30	5.00	4.30	4.00	7.00	10.30	11.00
.....	10.00	11.00	11.30	11.30	9.30	9.30	8.00	6.30	6.00	5.30	5.00	4.30	7.30	11.00	11.30
.....	11.10	11.30	12.00	12.00	10.00	10.00	8.30	7.00	6.30	6.00	5.30	5.00	8.00	11.30	12.00
.....	12.20	12.00	12.30	12.30	10.30	10.30	9.00	7.30	7.00	6.30	6.00	5.30	8.30	12.00	12.30
.....	1.30

SCHOMACKER AND HENRY F.
MILLER CELEBRATED

Pianos Tuned, Rented, and for Sale on the Installment Plan.
WOODWORTH, SCHELL & Co.
12 Post Street San Francisco.

CHICKERING
PIANOS AT COST.

336 KEARNY ST.
& 910 MARKET ST. S.F.
SPRING STYLES
ALL IN NOW!

Send for Illustrated Catalogue.

MARBLEIZED
IRON MANTELS.

IN ELEGANCE OF DESIGN, QUALITY of finish, and durability of polish, they are every way superior to slate or marble. In point of economy, also, they cost very much less, are stronger, and certainly far more durable than either.

ALL SIZES AND STYLES

ENAMELED GRATES.
FRENCH COOKING

RANGES

All sizes, suitable for Hotels, Restaurants, Families, and Boarding-Houses.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO.

NOS. 110, 112, 114, 118, & 120 BATTERY ST.

FLOWER POTS AND VASES.

A house without flowers is not a home.
FLOWER POTS of all sizes,
GARDEN VASES at
the Pottery Depot,
22 California Street, S. F.
JOHN B. OWENS.

ROSS'

THE Automatic

SEWING MACHINE STANDS PRE-EMINENT.

A machine that delicate ladies can run as well as the strong. So simple in construction that no experience is required to operate it perfectly. Makes the strongest seam, there being three threads in every stitch. A machine that will sew leather or lace, woolen, or cotton goods without any change. POSITIVELY NO TENSION. The only machine in the world based on AUTOMATIC principles. Thousands now in use, giving the most entire satisfaction.

WILCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINE CO.
C. L. HOVEY, AGENT,

124 POST STREET, SAN FRANCISCO, AND 361 TWELFTH STREET, OAKLAND.

THE CAL. FURNITURE M'FG CO.

HAVE FIVE TIMES AS MUCH FURNITURE

As any other house on this Coast, which has been purchased so low that we CAN and WILL sell at such prices that the poor can gratify their WISHES and the rich their TASTE. At the old stand,

NOS. 224 AND 226 BUSH STREET, S. F.

NICOLL THE TAILOR

No. 727 MARKET STREET,

BRANCH OF NEW YORK,

IS NOW OPENING THE LARGEST AND MOST ELEGANT ASSORTMENT OF

SPRING STYLES

Just received from his London and New York Houses of

FRENCH, ENGLISH, SCOTCH, AND DOMESTIC GOODS,

Of the very newest styles ever seen.

Samples, with Instructions for Self-measurement, Sent Free.

Gentlemen, before ordering elsewhere, will do well to call and inspect my immense stock at any of my branch stores, and their daily arrivals of New York and Paris fashions. Also, of French and English Goods from my London House.

TO ORDER:

Pants, - - - $5
Suits, - - - 20
Overcoats, - 15
Dress Coats, - 20

Genuine 6 X

TO ORDER:

Black Doeskin
Pants, - - - $7
White Vests, fm 3
Fancy Vests, - - 6
Beaver Suits, $55.

Not to be equaled by any house on the Pacific Coast for largeness, variety, or quality of stock, for workmanship or elegance of style, only WHITE LABOR employed, and none but EXPERIENCED AND FIRST-CLASS CUTTERS.

FINEST STOCK OF WOOLENS IN THE WORLD.

The only house in the city that receives fresh Patterns and New York and Paris Fashions weekly. Samples, with Instructions for Self-measurement, sent free. A small stock on hand, of our own make, to select from. Tailors and the public supplied with Cloth and Trimmings, at wholesale prices, by the yard; any length cut.

NICOLL THE TAILOR'S GRAND TAILORING EMPORIUM,
NO. 727 MARKET STREET.

WILLIAM M. PIERSON,
ATTORNEY AT LAW, 616 SACRAMENTO STREET.

WM. F. SMITH, M. D.,
OCULIST, 313 BUSH STREET.
Office hours, from 12 M. to 3 P. M.

MILLINERY EMPORIUM,

SPRING STYLES

Ready for Sale

T O - D A Y !

IF YOU HAVE MADE UP YOUR mind to pay $10, we can please you for $8.

If you think you can afford to pay about $12, we can suit you, we believe, for $9.

If you are proud and rich, and willing to pay $20, we can suit your fancy for $15 or $16.

If you have spent your last half million for four-per-cents, and therefore feel poor, we can sell you a Spring Suit for $8, and we have them for less.

PALMER BROS.

Square-dealing and only strictly One-priced Clothing House in San Francisco.

726, 728, and 730 Market St.

INDEPENDENT LINE

—FOR—

ASTORIA AND PORTLAND, OREGON.

The splendid Low-pressure, Side Wheel American Steamship

GREAT REPUBLIC,

382 TONS,

JAMES CARROLL.....Commander

Will sail from Spear Street wharf, for the above ports, On WEDNESDAY, April 16, at 10 A. M.

Steerage Passage.....$2 00
Cabin Passage.....7 00
In Bridal Rooms.....10 00
Freight.....at Lowest Rates

FREIGHT RECEIVED DAILY.

For freight or passage apply at the office on Spear Street wharf. Tickets also for sale at No. 3 New Montgomery Street, under Grand Hotel.

P. B. CORNWALL.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE

Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

THE MASONIC SAVINGS AND LOAN BANK, Plaintiff, vs. EDWARD MAGUIRE and ELIZA MAGUIRE, Defendants.

Action brought in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to Edward Maguire and Eliza Maguire.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff in the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District, of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein (a copy of which accompanies this summons) within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; if served out of this county, but within this judicial district, within twenty days; or if served out of said district, then within forty days—or judgment by default will taken against you.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment of this Court for the foreclosure of a certain mortgage described in the complaint and executed by the said Edward Maguire and Eliza Maguire on the 4th day of June, A. D. 1877, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note made by said Edward Maguire at the same time for the sum of three thousand dollars gold, and interest, as provided in said note, payable to plaintiff, or its order, and taxes, street assessments, and attorneys' fees at ten per cent. on the amount found due, and costs, all in gold coin; that the premises conveyed by said mortgage may be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of said promissory note, interest, taxes, street assessments, and attorney's fees, and costs, all in gold coin; and in case such proceeds are not sufficient to pay the same, then to obtain an execution against said Edward Maguire for the balance remaining due; and also that the said defendants, and all persons claiming by, through, or under them may be barred and foreclosed of all right, title, claim, lien, equity of redemption, and interest to said mortgage premises, and for other and further relief.

And if you fail to appear and answer said complaint, as above required, the plaintiff will take default against you and apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Nineteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 13th day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

[SEAL.]

THOS. H. REYNOLDS, Clerk.

By J. H. PICKENS, Deputy Clerk.

L. E. PRATT, Attorney for Plaintiff, 230 Montgomery Street.

SILVER HILL MINING COMPANY.

Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California. Location of works, Gold Hill, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the seventh (7th) day of April, 1879, an assessment (No. 6) of fifty (50) cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the company, Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, Cosmopolitan Hotel Building, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the thirtieth day of May, 1879, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before will be sold on TUESDAY, the third (3d) day of June, 1879, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

By order of the Board of Directors.

W. E. DEAN, Secretary.

Office—Room 8, No. 203 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

UNDER THE BALDWIN.

The Argonaut.

VOL. IV. NO. 16.

SAN FRANCISCO, APRIL 19, 1879.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

BORROWERS VS. LENDERS.

How the New Constitution Taxes Money fifteen times to the Borrower, and not once to the Lender.

It is boldly and angrily charged by the friends of the new Constitution—

First, That under the present Constitution money almost wholly escapes taxation; and,

Second, That the rich lenders of money (the bankers) have wrongfully shifted the burdens of taxation upon the poor borrowers of money (the farmers).

In order to cure these alleged evils the new Constitution proposes to tax as "property" certain intangible things called "credits," such as promissory notes and other evidences of debt; thus securing, they say—

(1). The taxation of money. (2). The taxation of the rich capitalists and lenders of money; and (3). The exemption of the poor borrowers of money from the burdens of taxation on their borrowed money. Let us honestly and candidly investigate this question:

(1). Does money escape taxation, and if so, to what extent?—How much money, if any, does annually escape taxation in California? To answer this question we must ascertain how much money there is in the State, and deduct from that sum the amount annually taxed. How much money is annually taxed in this State? About $15,000,000. How much gold and silver coin and bullion is there in the State of California to tax? Do not be incredulous when I answer, only $20,000,000. Do you doubt the estimate? Let us see. How much gold and silver coin and bullion is there in the entire United States? Only $260,000,000. This is the estimate of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics at Washington, and the highest one made by Dr. Linderman in 1877. Now, if California only had her pro rata portion of this sum she would have less than $4,000,000; but gold and silver being one of our chief products as well as our circulating medium, we have (it has been ascertained) from four to five times as much as other States having an equal population. Eastern statisticians give us $25,000,000. None of our best local financiers who have made careful estimates go higher than $25,000,000, and some of them go as low as $15,000,000. About the time of the starting of the Nevada Bank, in 1875, Mr. George C. Hickox, of the late banking house of Hickox & Spear, made an estimate of $17,000,000. Mr. Wright, financial editor of the Bulletin, and Mr. Alexander Del Mar, late Chief of the Bureau of Statistics at Washington (both recognized authority on financial statistics), estimate the amount of money in California at $20,000,000. A tabular statement appearing in the March number of the Coast Review (published by Mr. J. G. Edwards, of this city) shows that on January 1, 1879, the entire amount of cash in all the banks of California was but a little over $12,000,000. Who will say there was $8,000,000 of money outside of the banks in this State? From all these sources, and from a careful personal examination of the bank statements made to their own stockholders, I am convinced that $20,000,000 is a large estimate of the gold and silver coin and bullion in this State (exclusive, of course, of the $15,000,000 of non-taxable money in the vaults of the United States Sub-Treasury of this city). The volume of money in actual circulation is always over-estimated. There is a limit to the amount of money which can find room to circulate in any community. It is a well-known fact that Mr. James Keene, the great stock speculator, left this State, taking his money with him, because the field for speculation was too small, which is simply another way of saying that there was not room enough in this State for Mr. Keene's money. Money is a commodity. Like wheat, it will be shipped wherever it will bring the best price, or exported when it can not be consumed or used at home. It is ignorantly supposed by many people that because Messrs. Flood and Fair are worth $50,000,000 or more apiece that they have great wagon-loads of gold coin (amounting to fabulous millions) stacked up in the vaults of the Nevada Bank, whereas the truth is, that the Nevada Bank at the date of its last semi-annual statement had less than $3,000,000 of coin on hand belonging to the Bank and all of its depositors. All the Bank Presidents and financiers of San Francisco combined could not raise $30,000,000 within twenty-four hours to save their necks, unless they obtained help from the mint or U. S. Sub-Treasury. This is a fact well known to all financial men. Assuming, then, as true (as I have a right to do) that there is but $20,000,000 of taxable money in the State ($15,000,000 of which we know is annually taxed), it turns out that only $5,000,000 of money, or one-fourth of the amount of money actually in existence in this State annually escapes taxation. Now what is the entire amount of the taxable property of this State? About $600,000,000. It will thus be seen how insignificant the deficit of $5,000,000 of money which escapes taxation is, as compared with the entire amount of taxable property in this State—less than one per cent.; and how insignificant, too, as compared with the immense noise and fuss made about it by ignorant demagogues, who do not know what they are talking about.

(2) Do the rich money-lenders of California escape taxation under the present Constitution?—It has been gravely asserted by ex-Governor Downey, ex-Judge Terry, and ex-United States Congressman General Howard, so often that the Daily Chronicle is now ringing the cry in terse italic paragraphs, that from $150,000,000 to $300,000,000 of taxable property belonging to the Reeses, the Lunings, the Parrotts, and other rich and (ostensibly) rascally money-lenders of California annually escapes taxation, which would all be taxed if the new Constitution were adopted. Do these ancient ex-officials mean to tell the people of this State that this $300,000,000 (ex-Governor Downey's estimate) is in money which the rich capitalists of California have loaned out at big interest, and that the poor borrowers have to pay the taxes on it? Yes, that is exactly what they mean, and in making such statements they either intentionally falsify or they are criminally ignorant, and in either event should go back to their retirement and stay there. Where did these rich money-lenders get the $300,000,000 to lend when there is only $20,000,000 in the whole State of California to loan?—and only $260,000,000 of gold and silver coin and bullion in the whole United States? Even if it were true that Nicholas Luning had acquired all the money in the State, amounting as we have seen to $20,000,000, by what system of legerdemain could he loan it out so as to be chargeable with taxes for $300,000,000? How does money receive additional value from being loaned fifteen times, any more than from being loaned once? By what theory of "taxing property according to its value" (a favorite constitutional maxim with General Howard) can $20,000,000 of actual money be taxed at $300,000,000? Upon what system of honest public policy can the State exact taxes on $20,000,000 of gold and silver coin and bullion in this State fifteen times ($20,000,000 \times 15 = $300,000,000) when all other property is taxed but once? "But," you say, "the bankers and money-lenders of this State have actually loaned out $300,000,000 of money at interest, and are now holding bonds, notes, and mortgages to that amount;" and you ask, "how they could do it unless they had the money to loan?" "Easy enough," I answer. It is just as easy for the capitalist of California to lend $300,000,000 and only have $20,000,000 to lend, as it is for the United States Government to owe $2,000,000,000 in gold coin and have only $200,000,000 to pay with. There is not money enough to "go round" in either case. $14 out of every $15 of gold coin loaned in California must be either borrowed or bought by selling property. Whether borrowed or bought it is the same money. Let us look into the method by which these "rascally capitalists" make a small amount of money do a large amount of business:

The Bankers.—What is a banker? In one sense he is a money-merchant who buys and sells money, the same as a grocer buys and sells groceries, except that he does not buy and sell, but borrows and lends money. Like the merchant who starts in business by procuring a stock of goods, the banker procures a "capital stock," consisting of some actual cash, some bonds and other securities which can be readily turned into money, whereupon a thousand men having confidence in him deposit their money with him for safe keeping, with the understanding that they may call for it at any moment, and that whenever they do call for it he must pay it to them on demand. He no sooner gets possession of the money than he proceeds to lend a portion of it to prompt men for short periods, relying on the "probability" that these thousand depositors will not all call for their money at once, and that if some of them do call for it, other depositors will "probably" come in and deposit equal amounts with him. He also counts upon the "probability" that the men who borrow money from him will either not take it away from his bank at all, or that they will only take part of it away; or that if they do take it all away it will not stay long, and will come back soon. The absolute certainty of these "probabilities" is simply wonderful. Just as a Life Insurance Company insures the lives of a thousand men at thirty years of age, relying upon the "probability" that they will not all die at once, but will live to an average age of sixty years—a "probability" which is constantly verified with almost mathematical certainty. Thus the banker, counting upon these or a similar kind of "probabilities," receives and lends—borrows and pays—the same identical money over and over and over again, until the volume of outstanding obligations, based upon a very insignificant amount of coin, becomes absolutely appalling. It is in this way that the same men are at once borrowers and lenders; and it is in this way that $300,000,000 of debts or "credits" is based upon only $20,000,000 of actual coin. The books of the San Francisco Clearing House—which were kindly shown to me by Mr. Charles Sleeper, who has charge of it—shows that over $700,000,000 of checks were drawn on sixteen banks during the year 1878, which were paid through that office by only $150,000,000 in actual coin, which proves that only twenty per cent. of the coin checked out of the banks actually goes out. This illustrates the strength of the "probability" which the banker relies on that his depositors' money will not all flee at once. This emboldens him to loan it for short periods. The interest he receives on these short loans constitutes his commission for taking care of it, and it is not away a lucrative commission either. The banker's bed is not a "bed of roses." If so, the roses are "full of thorns;" for the least doubt as to his financial standing, the least ripple in the stream of money that passes through his hands, the least agitation about "capital and labor," or the adoption of an "agrarian Constitution," the failure of a neighboring bank or business house or manufacturing establishment, or any other sudden or unexpected event which no human foresight could provide against it, is liable to cause a run on his bank and endanger his entire fortune. Now, if some contagious disease should come along and kill off all the people whose lives are insured, what would become of the life insurance companies? So, if every man in this State who has money on deposit in a bank should demand his money at the same time, what would become of the banks? They would pay just fifteen cents on the dollar. (The banks of this State owe their depositors $82,000,000, and they have only $12,000,000 cash on hand.) What proportion of the $300,000,000, which Governor Downey says is loaned out in this State, would the creditors get if they were all to call for their money at once? Just six and one-fourth cents on the dollar. And yet it is gravely proposed to tax this ponderous pile of nothingness called "credits," in order to reach the insignificant $20,000,000 which lies at the base of it all, and three-fourths of which is already taxed under our present Constitution.

The Savings Banks.—The same law of "probabilities," the same geometrical ratio of "credits" to actual cash, obtains in savings banks as in commercial banks, only the results are worked out in a slower manner and more permanent form. The depositors in savings banks agree not to demand all their money at once, but to draw it out little by little; hence it can be loaned for longer periods of time, on real estate security. The savings bank depositors are usually poor people. Mr. Sharon's Irish servant girl draws her monthly salary of $25, and deposits it in the Hibernia Bank. The Hibernia Bank immediately lends it back to Mr. Sharon to help build the Palace Hotel. The money thus goes back and forth until it is alleged as a fact more than "figuratively true," that the Irish servant girls of San Francisco hold a mortgage of $1,000,000 on the Palace Hotel. Unfortunately, it is this very class of "credits" that the new Constitution taxes. The commercial bank "credits" being for short periods between rich men, upon personal security, will usually escape taxation, while the very class of loans made by the poor lenders to the rich borrowers will be taxed.

The Money-Lenders.—If Luning, Parrott, and the late Michael Reese, who seem to have been chosen as the typical modern money-lenders (as Shylock was the ancient), kept a livery stable and hired horses to their customers and made their customers pay taxes on them, I should say it was wrong. I recognize the force of the suggestion that they ought to be taxed as money-lenders on their hired moneys as much as, if they were livery men, on their hired horses; but I at the same time recognize the impossibility of doing it except by committing fifteen wrongs in the doing of one right; for as the amount of money loaned in this State ($300,000,000) as compared with the actual amount of coin in the State ($20,000,000) is as one dollar to fifteen, so would any tax imposed against $300,000,000 tax the actual amount of money in the State fifteen times.

(3). Will the new Constitution exempt the borrower from taxation?—Brett, if ye think it will "ye do much err, not knowing the law"—of trade. Whoever heard of a borrower dictating to the lender the interest on his money? That "villainous smile" which is so much more aggravating than a frown would spread itself over the bland but implacable face of the lender as he would "respectfully decline the loan," and bow you out of his office. Every cent of taxes the lender has to pay will be relentlessly collected from the borrower, with a little more for the trouble of collecting it. "Ah, but," you say (the Chronicle says), "he will be forced to compete with foreign capital." Yes, I answer, in the classic language of ex-Minister Schenck, the great American exponent of draw poker, he will "see you" on that, and "go you one better." He will at once represent "foreign capital." He will have no capital of his own. He would be a fool if he did. The lender is never a fool. That delectable privilege is always reserved to the borrower. Yes, if the new Constitution is adopted all the money loaned in this State will be "foreign capital," just as it is in Iowa and Illinois, where they tax "credits." And right here is where the mischief will commence.

Non-resident capital is exempt from taxation. It has been so decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of State Tax on Foreign Held Bonds, as reported in 15 Wallace, page 300, a case which went up from Pennsylvania. Justice Field, who wrote the opinion, says: "The mere right of a non-resident creditor to receive from a debtor within the State the payment of his demand cannot be subjected to taxation within the State." The farmer of California who has been consoling himself with the reflection that his farm will be exempt from taxation to the extent of the mortgage on it will have the bitter experience of paying enough extra taxes on the unmortgaged portion of his farm to make up the deficiency caused by the escape of the non-taxable foreign held mortgage. This is no mere assertion. It is the logical result of the doctrine that a "credit" is "property." If "property," it follows the person. A promissory note against a California farmer held by a resident of New York, has no situs in this State, and cannot be taxed here. The State of Iowa is a "credit" taxing State, and the Supreme Court of that State (12 Iowa 539) held that "mortgages held by non-residents can not be taxed in this State." Imagine $300,000,000 of "credits" being held by non-resident capitalists on property in this State, upon which as the Chicago Tribune says of the Illinois mortgage tax system, "We do not collect $10,000 a year." David A. Wells, who is recognized as the greatest American financier, said of us after the decision of our Supreme Court in the Hibernia Bank case overthrowing our mortgage tax-law, that we were the advance State of the American Union on the question of taxation. Let us, in the name of reason and common sense, not take a backward step in mere obedience to the voice of ignorance and class prejudice.

The ultimate truth is that money ought never to be taxed. It should be permitted to pass the gates of the tax-gatherers unchallenged. Webster said of Hamilton: "He touched the dead corpse of the Public Credit and it sprang upon its feet." Such is the magic power of money as applied to the undeveloped resources of a country. It is the instrument for the production of wealth. It is not itself wealth. To tax money is to add to its cost. To add to its cost is to put it out of the reach of the poor but enterprising man who wants to open a farm, start a factory, or develop a mine. In short, to tax money is to tax enterprise. And yet, as I have shown, the new Constitution (if enforced) would tax it fifteen times; which, at the rate of two per cent. (the rate in San Francisco), would be equal to thirty per cent., thus hanging a huge chain around the neck of the circulating medium of the State.

Conclusion.—I have no love for rich men. I have never found my most congenial companionship among them. They are too often cold, austere, and selfish. If I have defended them in this paper it is because I recognize in the accumulation and protection of wealth a necessity to the permanence of our institutions. Neither do I love fighting men, and yet we must have soldiers to defend us in time of war. I believe with the scholarly Senator Bayard, of Delaware, that we have too many laws and too much legislation. I have more confidence in the common law of custom which crystallizes by time

H N

A HERO OF BRUSH CAÑON.

Joe Brown was a good engineer, and knew his engine and the crooked road through Brush Cañon as well as if it had been a wheel-barrow he was piloting through his own door-yard; yet, as the early darkness descended one gray February evening, and the trains approached the little station at the mouth of the cañon, his plain, good-hearted face became shadowed with a look of troubled anxiety.

"Taint so much you I mind," he said, apostrophizing the fireman, who sat in a limp, unhearing sort of way, with his head drooping forward; "taint you I mind; I've learned to get through with you some fashion, an' I can do it always—I shouldn't feel noways right to risk the Company's property an' a good many lives, too, not even for you, old man, if I didn't know I could keep you straight. It's that there conductor that I don't feel noways easy about in my mind."

"What's masser co'ductor?" demanded the fireman, unexpectedly rousing. "Got anything" say to me, I'll let him know. Run all's ol' train over th' hank 'f I like."

He stood up as he spoke, showing himself in the dim caboose, as a thin, dangerously wiry-looking old man, whose stupid, drunken expression was rapidly giving way to one of recklessness and mischief.

"G'f me holt o' that thro'l-val," he demanded, reaching out a thin, nervous hand.

Joe Brown, with a quicker movement than one would have thought the big, lumbering fellow capable of, stretched one of his own great, smutty hands to meet his fireman's, and inclosed it in his capacious grasp. It was rather a gentle grasp; cool and phlegmatic, too; but it felt as if heaven and earth could not loose it.

"Now, look a' here, Zekel Purley," he said. "you know you ain't goin' to do nothin' o' the sort. I'm here to take care o' this engine an' o' you, an' mean to do it. An' when you forget Ruthie and all, I'll remember 'em for you."

The tense, nervous vigor of Purley's clutch gradually relaxed under the influence of Joe's steady hand and voice. He hesitated, wavered, and then dropped sullenly on his his bench again.

"It's always Ruth, and Ruth, and Ruth," he muttered; "a man can't say his soul's his own." He was a little sobered, and his voice growing steadier.

"Which ain't noways a good sign," thought Joe, as he sounded the whistle, and slowed up. "I'll just have to keep close by him at this station," he added, in his mind.

The long freight train, with much clashing together of cars, and many murmurs from the cattle and sheep within, came to a stand-still.

"Ho, Brown," shouted a peremptory voice outside, "come here. I want to speak to you."

"Guess you'll have to come here, then. Can't leave the engine, just now." His emergency compelled him to respond more civilly than was his wont to such a peremptory bidding.

"Why, man, what harm can come to the engine, at a stand-still? Come on."

"Yes, you'd think 'twas harm, if I left a drunk fireman to put on steam and run her like mad up cañon and into the crick, 'fore you knew what was the matter with you," muttered Joe, under his breath. He knew better than to speak loud enough for Purley to hear, and put into his head the idea of thus running away with the train.

A quick, impatient step approached the engine, and the conductor stood near.

"Now, see here, Brown," he said sharply, "I want you to come and explain this switch to me, for the switch-tender's gone, and I can't see how the side-track goes in this blasted dark, and we have to switch off here in the morning; and I supposed every man on this road understood that the engineer is under orders of the conductor."

"We don't side-track here," responded Joe doggedly; "we don't side at all to-night, and to-morrow morning we side at Brush. There's a passenger train sides here in the morning, and that's all the switch is for; the switchman's gone to to bed, because there hain't no need of him to-night, and there ain't no sort o' use in your understanding this switch nor siding."

"Nonsense. What should they have a switchman for, if he's only needed once a day?"

"'Cause we take on a deal o' freight here mornings for the farmers, and he's boss o' that, too."

"I don't believe you know what you're talking about. I'm going to telegraph to the superintendent for instructions at the next office."

"I would," said Joe, with tremendous irony. "Give him a good idee of your sense when you had your instructions to begin with. He'll think you're nice an' careful, an' got a first-rate memory."

There was weight in that, and the conductor was silent a moment or two, and then thought best to change the subject.

"What's the great business that keeps you at your engine? You don't seem so very busy with her."

Poor Joe was not at all facile at lies, so he remained silent. not because he thought it the wisest course, but because he was racking his brains in vain for something to say. The conductor came nearer and leaned into the cab. Suddenly a lank figure started up and clutched him by the shoulders.

"You're goin' to meddle with me, are you? I'll drink what I choose, for all the conductors on this line, and for all old Stanford, or any of 'em. I'll pitch you into the fire; I'll pitch 'em all into the fire. Bring on the whole crowd."

But the steady grip was on him again, as Brown, from behind, held one arm with each hand.

"Now, look here, Zekel Purley," he said again, with his patient doggedness, "you must sit down and keep still, and not make no more trouble. I'm goin' to take care o' you."

He seemed to have acquired a strange influence over the old man, for after a few seconds Purley dropped his hands and sank down again.

"I'm drunk, you see," he said, explanatorily. "Joe here, he can manage me. But you can't, and I'll kill you some time when he ain't round."

The conductor fell back several steps—far enough to bring him into the glare of the head-light. He was a youngish man, with black hair and eyes, and a slightly "buckish" air, not bad at heart, nor hard, but conceited, and, as some expressed it, cut out on a mighty small pattern.

Such was the man—Arthur Fethering—who faced Joe Brown for a passionate moment. Joe, his lonely, troubled face dimly visible in the cab, stood still, trying hard to think what he could do in this emergency.

"Is this an ordinary thing?" demanded Fethering.

"No; 'tain't never happened before," said Joe, unblushingly, "and it never will again. Any way, he can't do no harm. I'm so used to it, you see, I can manage him like a baby, and there never comes no harm to the engine 'long of his spells, 'cause I keep watch on him."

Fethering's contempt for poor Joe's blunder lessened his passion. He looked at his watch, and began to walk back toward the cars.

"It seems you've been keeping up this outrage on the company for some time," he said, as he went. "It's well I discovered it early. You needn't think I shall connive at protecting you for what you've done. You can keep him on till we lay up to-night, and then I'll telegraph for another man in his place, and report you."

"Now, look a' here," shouted Joe after him, "I'd like to know what hurt it'll do the company—"

But Fethering called back, curtly: "We needn't discuss it; start her up," and got aboard the train.

"Well, you've done it now," sighed Joe, putting his engine in motion.

The long, dark train stirred, a jarring thrill went through it, the coupling-bolts rattled, the cars clashed, the cattle lowed, and the sheep bleated; then the train moved slowly on up the steep grade and entered the cañon. Two steep mountain walls rose on either hand, dark as pitch, except where the light from the engine fell on their bushy sides; the track wound along one side, and far below, in the bottom of the narrow gulch, the roar of a stream could have been heard but for the nearer noise of the train. Up grades and down grades, around curves and over bridges, for half an hour, they rolled safely. It was not every engineer who could have taken his train safely through Brush Cañon by night with a drunken fireman, and most men who could have done it would have felt it a great deprivation to be unable to tell of the fact, but Joe Brown never thought of that, dear to his heart as was his professional reputation. He had given up more than the small gratification of boasting to shield this drunken fellow. Before he learned so well how to manage him, he had taken the responsibility of an accident purely due to a drunken freak of Purley's, and had been degraded in consequence from a far more honorable and profitable position on a passenger train to his present one. Not that he ever felt himself either a hero or a martyr on account of that; it was not Joe Brown's way to think much about what he had done. He took his misfortune as one of the accidents flesh was heir to as much as if he had been caught in a shower and taken cold. As to any merit in standing by old Purley, it never occurred to him to do anything else. It was no feeling that he was an ill-used, or an unappreciated man, that overcast his slow, honest features with that troubled look, as the train rolled on between the two dark, solemn mountain walls.

"It's a pity," he said, slowly, his voice losing itself in the engine's roar, "to have kept him agoing for three year, and then lose all the good of it. If I hadn't been such a slow fellow, Fethering needn't never have known. I'd ought to ha' been sharper, and that's a fact. I wisht I was a smarter fellow, so's I could be some good to you, Ruthie. I don't know what I come of it now."

But he did not let his meditations lessen his vigilance, and the train moved on safely. Meanwhile, Fethering entered the emigrant car, which always ends a freight train in California. There were half a dozen passengers there, among the rest a couple of giggling girls who had been chattering with him before the train stopped.

About seven o'clock the train slowed and stopped, with all its jarring and crashing, at "Brush Cañon Station"—distinguished from the cañon itself by calling one "the Cañon," the other "Brush." The head-light showed that the creek here received a tributary stream, causing the mountains to recede a little on the side of the tributary, leaving a small, triangular plateau, perhaps an acre in extent. About the middle of the "flat" was a station of the approved liver-color, but a little larger than usual, for there was a telegraph office here, and a large water tank supplied from mountain springs. On the dark platform stood a small figure, wrapped from head to foot in a water-proof—a girl, plainly. She stood still a few moments, as if waiting for some one; then, as no one came, she stepped close up to the engine.

"Joe?" she said.

"Yes, Ruthie," answered the patient voice. "I couldn't come out to you very well to-night."

"Oh, dear, dear!" she cried (such a fresh, sweet little voice), "is he so again?"

"I've got to run on to the siding and take up those two cars, and then I'll tell you. Its too bad, Ruthie," putting his hand clumsily on her shoulder, with an awkward attempt at comfort, for he had sprung out, and stood by her side. "You might get in here, if you like."

"All right," she said, like a true American girl, and he swung her up, strongly, but most awkwardly.

"Poor old Joe," she thought, straightening her deranged garments, "he takes me like I was a bag of hay."

"That you, Ruth?" said Purley, indifferently.

"Yes, pa," the girl replied, timidly.

"Now, you feel bad, I s'pose," he began, mournfully—but here the conductor gave orders to take up the two empty cars, and the brakeman's lantern glimmered at the top of the train, and Joe's eyes and thoughts were taken up with watching his signals as the lantern waved frantically up and down, back and forth; and the engine moved, slowed, stopped, advanced, retreated, till the manoeuvre was completed and the train ready to move. There was a brief pause then, and Joe told his story, ending with:

"If I wasn't such a slow fellow, Ruthie, I might ha' got out of it and been some good to you."

"Oh, Joe, you're the dearest old slow-coach that ever was. I don't see as there's anything you could ha' done."

"Well, now, what could I ha' done?" demanded Purley, in an injured tone. He was fast becoming maudlin. "Haven't I always been a good pa to you, Ruthie?"

"Yes, he always is good to me, Joe, even when he's so. You know he is," cried the girl, tearfully. "He can't help it, poor pa; and I think the railroad men are so mean to blame him for it. Oh, I hate the new conductor! How good dear Mr. Simpson was about it! Oh, what are we goin' to do?"

"If he could only make up his mind to give up," suggested

Joe, faintly, "I'd manage to take care of you all, somehow, if I had to work nights, an' of my mother an' sister, too. We might manage to be married, somehow; perhaps that'd make it easier," he added, still more timidly.

But she only hid her face and sobbed.

"Oh, Joe, I shouldn't think you'd talk about his giving up, when you know he's just set on working; it'd break his heart, you know it would; an' you know he's this way every single day he's out o' work; an' how can we be married, when he an' your mother can't bide each other, an' you can't leave them?"

Joe, dreadfully penitent, hastened to say:

"Oh, don't think I wanted to hurry you, Ruthie. I don't never mean to worry you; it's more'n I could ha' expected that you'd engage yourself at all to a fellow like me. An' I don't s'pose 't would do for him to give up, for I s'pose when he was this way he'd feel like puttin' stones on the track, an' such like."

"Oh, yes, I know he would. Oh, dear, dear! I don't believe that conductor knew all about it, or he'd never ha' been so mean. Why didn't you talk to him, Joe?"

"I tried to," said Joe, penitently, "but he wouldn't hear me."

"Oh, Joe, Joe! that's just like you. I could ha' made him hear me." There was a pause; then she said in a whisper:

"Joe, I'm goin' to talk to him."

"As scary as you are?" he said, admiringly. "Well, I don't s'pose he could stand out again you; but he ain't no ways nice to talk to."

"But I'll do it for poor pa," she said, shivering. "Let me go quick, Joe, before I get too scared. I'll have just time to get on the car, if I go quick."

He watched the slight figure hurry down the platform; then a call to "start her up" made him turn, rouse the dozing Purley, and put his engine in motion again.

The two girls, who had been parading the platform in the dark, and giggling at brakeman and switch-tender, now scrambled aboard with much haste, and were meditating a descent on the conductor, who still stood in their car. Another girl stood at the end of the car—a slim little thing, with a worn waterproof drawn over her light, curly hair, and a little tin bucket in her hand.

"There's Ruth Purley. She always goes home on this train."

"Poor little thing! What makes her look so scared?"

"Oh, she always looks scared. She don't dare ride in the engine, for all Joe Brown's there. I wonder if Fethering will keep dark about her father. He don't have a spree more'n twice a year, and Joe can manage him so well that there ain't no danger, if Fethering only thinks so."

"Not he. He thinks he's too smart to treat people decent. Marth, look there! She's goin' right up to him. I bet she's goin' to talk about her father. That scary little thing! Don't she look pretty with her big blue eyes! She looks just like a baby getting ready to cry."

Ruth Purley was scary, except with her big, slow Joe, over whom she liked to tyrannize in her womanish little fashion, spending on him all the boldness she did not dare to use to any one else. Her knees shook, and her heart quaked, as she stood before the awful conductor.

"If you please, sir—"

He did not hear her, above the noise of the train.

"If you please, sir—"

He turned sharply, and saw the baby-like, pleading face, under the old hood, the rings of soft hair, the trembling lips, the big blue eyes, and curly, wet lashes.

"What is it, child?" he said gently.

"If you please, sir, my name is Ruth Purley," she stammered, blushing, and dropping her eyes in the prettiest confusion before the handsome black eyes that were bent down on her with such a look of amused and pleased superiority. "And I live in Wheat Valley, and come here on the train every day to telegraph. And—and—you see—it's my father that's fireman; and oh, don't send him off, sir! He don't do any harm, he never did; Joe watched him so, and Joe can manage him. And it'd break his heart to be sent off, sir, and send him straight to the dogs. And there's ma, and me, and Rachel—my twin-sister, that's blind—and two little bits o' ones; and only my telegraphing to support us if pa was sent off, and what Joe could do for us."

Ruthie did not mind crying before Joe, who counted for nobody, but she was dreadfully mortified when the tears would run over before the conductor. But Fethering was not one of the men who can not bear to see a girl cry; it pleased him to be prayed to this way, and he felt really fond of the little thing already. He had no scruples about his duty in the matter of letting her father alone, but he did not mean to let the favor seem too light by easy giving.

"My little girl," he said gravely, "I shouldn't do right to let some one stay who ought not, just to please you."

But general considerations were beyond Ruth.

"Oh, please, please," she begged. "He never'd get over it."

Fethering turned over a seat, took her gently by both arms and seated her, and sat down beside her.

"Now, you frightened child, you shall not talk about this any more to-night, and I promise your father sha'n't be disturbed till we have talked it over, and then I'll see what I can do for him with the authorities. But now you're going to tell me all about yourself, for you are a nice little girl."

Ruth was a very silly little girl, silly enough to think that Fethering was the most perfect gentleman heart could wish. But then she had never seen any more refined men than her father and Joe; and the two things that her dog-like little heart craved most passionately were to be commanded and claims implicitly. Poor Joe could not command her, and dared not pet her; she seemed to him such a dainty little frailty, that he was afraid to put his great, rough hands on her; he worshiped her so that he was all confusion and awkwardness before her, and he had quite succeeded in giving her his own low opinion of his abilities.

When the train stopped at Wheat Valley, about nine o'clock, Fethering lifted Ruth out with a skillful tenderness, very different from Joe's awkward help.

"Since you think you must wait for the engineer to take you home, I'll wait with you till he is ready to go," he said, drawing her arm through his, and beginning to walk the platform with her; "and to-morrow morning, you know, we'll talk about your father. Why, you and I will come and go on the same train every single day, won't we?"

[CONCLUDED IN NEXT NUMBER.]

THE TRUTH OF TAXATION.

California is threatened by the new Constitution with the most iniquitous and oppressive system of taxation which was ever devised in modern times. Double taxation sinks into insignificance when we read the article providing for taxation in the new Constitution, where it plainly shows that treble and quadruple taxation in many instances is not only probable but sure to follow its adoption. The advocates of such a system are principally those who are untaxed. Brooks Adams, of Massachusetts, in an article published in the November number of the Atlantic Monthly, entitled "Oppressive Taxation of the Poor," says: "The most difficult problem of modern times is unquestionably how to protect property under popular governments. For the United States particularly it is growing graver day by day. So long as the large majority of voters are owners of property all goes well; but the moment those who are untaxed outnumber those who pay taxes trouble begins. The direct interest of the untaxed class is to swell public expenditure to the utmost, and there is hardly a large city in the United States that has not suffered more or less from this cause. The whole subject is so old, and has been so often discussed, that there can be no object in enlarging upon it. No one is likely to question the statement, that several hundred million dollars have already been practically confiscated in the interests of the untaxed classes, through State and municipal extravagance and fraud."

Speaking of double taxation, Mr. Adams says in the same able article: "Yet the mortgage tax is only the most striking instance of that vicious system which fetters the enterprise and weighs down the energy of Massachusetts. The injustice and impolicy of that system has often been ably exposed, but hitherto without avail. The whole fabric of tax legislation is based upon a false foundation. Double taxation is not the exception, but the rule, within the commonwealth. The error of the system lies in the proposition that every citizen is to be taxed according to his ability to pay. A mortgage is part of a man's property; hence it must be taxed on the mortgage, otherwise he would not contribute his proportion to the State. All this reasoning is manifestly fallacious. Property is what should be taxed, not men, unless upon their polls. The supposed ability of certain citizens is entirely beside the question. Taxable property is something that has intrinsic value. There is a certain amount of property within the State, such as houses and lands, goods and merchandise, cattle, gold, silver, and machinery. This constitutes the wealth of the citizens. Notes, bonds, mortgages, and the like are simply evidences that the holders have lent money upon the faith of the property having intrinsic worth. In themselves these notes and bonds have no value, any more than paper money has in itself value. The taxes upon these evidences of debt are all necessarily double taxes; since to tax property at all it is worth, and then, if it is pledged, to tax the money raised upon it, is clearly to tax it twice. Moreover, the difficulty with all this taxing of debts is not only that it is absurd in theory, but that it is iniquitous in practice. The borrower always has to pay. If four per cent. is the market rate for money, and taxes amount to two per cent., we have seen that the mortgagor can borrow only at seven per cent. The capitalist will collect the tax for the government, but he pays himself at the expense of the borrower for his risk and trouble in so doing. No statute can change this law of trade. The only effect of taxing loans is to raise the rate of interest. Thus it is that taxation in Massachusetts cramps industry and works injustice. The debtor class is doubly taxed throughout the commonwealth, and the debtors are precisely those who are least able to pay. It is bad enough for a man to have every third dollar taken from him by the State, but when besides he has to pay three per cent. of extra interest above the market rate on every dollar he borrows, the position of the debtor becomes well-nigh desperate. The only hope lies in popular education. Could the people be made to understand the merits of the question, the present tax laws would not disgrace the statute-book one day after the meeting of the next Legislature. The danger consists in ignorance. Workingmen who cannot pay their mortgage interest are wrought upon by demagogues and clamor at capital."

The town of Kingston, in Ulster County, New York, is a small one, but little exceeding 4,000 in population, and consists in large measure of Irish quarrymen and their families, who have readily become the tools of a ring which has been shamefully plundering the taxpayers. In 1876, the attempt to raise a Republican campaign-banner in an Irish quarter was met with bloodshed and had to be abandoned. This year a union of the taxpayers was effected with a view to shaking off the ring and rescuing the finances of the town; and the better to concentrate the respectable class of voters and guard against fraud at the polls, a law was procured authorizing one instead of five polling-places. This appears to have made matters worse instead of better, for the ruffianly element established the poll in "Mackerelville," took early possession of it, and surrounded it with a dense mob which admitted only Democratic voters, and shockingly maltreated honest citizens who persisted in trying to reach the ballot-boxes, or who could not restrain their denunciation of the villainous manœuvre. The Sheriff of Ulster County was on the scene, but would or could do nothing. Justice O'Connors, a Democratic inspector, opened the ballots at pleasure, and occasionally tore them up and rejected them. When he and a brother justice, with the aid of the Sheriff, counted the returns, they sometimes found several ballots folded together, which they laid aside "under the candlestick" until it could be seen how the vote would turn out.—New York Nation.

A very worthy gentleman from the country said to us that the Constitution contained one clause that would justify him in voting for it, if for no other reason: "It prevents lobbying." "Yes," we said, "it prevents lobbying, if you can prevent a crime by simply declaring in the Constitution that it must not exist; but, unfortunately, passing a law does not prevent crime, else the Constitution should have contained provisions against murder, theft, arson, burglary, swindling, libel, and all the other crimes." He was a very nice old gentleman, but he had no brains to think with.

Many are willing to wound who are yet afraid to strike.

OUR OWN POETS.

Love's Messenger.

Hear how my spirit comes sobbing,
Blent with the sob of the rain!
Hear how I call you, beloved,
Out of my passionate pain!
Hear how I cry to you, darling—
Cry for the love that I crave—
Cry for the love that would brighten
My life which is cold in the grave!

'Tis my voice you hear in the sobbing
Of the storm, that is making moan;
'Tis I—I am calling for ever;
"Oh, answer my love with your own!"

Over the mountains and valleys
That are keeping us ever apart,
On the wings of the storm-king, I send you
This cry from my breaking heart.

You are sitting alone, as the night-wind
Bears the message I send to you, dear;
You are sitting alone, and its whisper
Falls soft on your listening ear.

You are sitting alone, and the lamplight
Falls down with a tender grace,
Soft as my lips' warm kisses
Over your kindly face.

I can see with the eyes of my soul
Through the distance, the night, and the gloom,
And I know that you listen with longing
To my voice as it sobs through the room.

Warm with my passionate kisses,
Wet with my tears and the rain,
The wind bears the message I send you
Swift over mountain and plain.

You hear it! You hear it! You hear it!
You feel every kiss that I send!
But, strong in your honor and manhood,
You answer me, "Wait till the end."

You answer, "Be brave in your duty;
Be brave in your duty and wait;
But I love you, my king, and I call you,
Even now, while I bow to my fate!"

SAN FRANCISCO, April, 1879.

O. T. NOSLIH.

Our Lodging-House Maid.

A figure of the willow type,
A well-shaped hand, though coarse with toil;
Lips fit for playing cherry ripe
That even labor can not spoil;
A russet dress whose dingy spots
Shows the bold hand spilled soup can write
Through close communion with the pots,
And a long apron, never white.

Two velvet black eyes looking out
Beneath two arching brows of jet;
A wealth of hair all tossed about,
Or bundled in a tattered net;
A pair of cheeks whose rosy hue
Is marked by frequent sooty smudge.
And thus I introduce to you
Our pretty, dirty household drudge.

Sometimes in fancy I divest
Her face of what is always there;
I see her—still in fancy—dressed
In white, with roses in her hair.
I see the willow form erect,
Not bent by weighty loads of coal;
I light that face with intellect
And place behind those eyes a soul.

Pardon the fancy I employ—
But then, I know not how it is—
Methinks that the fair bride of Troy
Might have been a woman such as this.
Methinks in those dark eyes might lurk
The fire that wrought a city's doom;
Those lips might have begun the work
That ended in a nation's tomb.

Start not, ye stately dames who move
In silken silk and costly furs;
Ye may be fair, have time for love,
Your lots are very far from hers.
But deem her form as yours are deemed—
Ay, far more simply, ere ye judge;
Trust me, your charms would scarce be recked
Beside our pretty, dirty drudge.

But raise her, as a lily crushed
And trampled in the muddy clay,
And be your criticisms hushed
Till you have washed the stains away.
Then place her, ne'er so modestly,
Half out of sight in your parterre;
And men will pause in passing by—
"Was ever flower so wondrous fair!"

Capricious fate, that seem'st to take Delight in thwarting each design
Of Nature, wherefore didst thou make
A queenly star that ne'er could shine?
Why fix a prize that none may win,
A stake which never can be played—
But Mary's bringing dinner in,
And is once more our servant-maid.

NEW YORK, April 6, 1879.

G. H. JESSOP.

A Twilight Song.

Now gently falls the purple light
O'er wooded hill and flow'ry dell,
While dusky grows the birdling's flight
As dully sounds the evening bell.
Faint blushes tinge the mountain height,
The fire-fly glimmers in the vale,
And echoed through the wavering light
The notes of whip-poor-will and quail.

Day toil is o'er; as wanes the light
And shadows fall o'er land and sea,
The boats draw shoreward for the night,
The flock "winds slowly o'er the lea."
The lily sleeps by river brim,
The wood-bird seeks its downy nest,
While twilight sings a vesper hymn,
And lulls the weary world to rest.

Petaluma, April, 1879.

CLARENCE U. THOMAS.

FABLES AND ANECDOTES.

By Little Johnny.

Me and Missy, thats my sister, we was in the gardn, and there was a hop tode, and it hopt a way, but her yung man he stays all the afternoon Sundys. Missy she sed: "Johnny," and I sed: "Wot?"

Then Missy she spoke up a other time and sed: "Did you ever hear that poetry wich Missis Doppy made a bout hop todes, and put it in the paper?"

And wen I sed I didnt she spoke it out, jest like Missis Doppy rote it, wich has got the red head:

"Wen the cole, snoy winter has past,
And the flours is out in the spring,
The todes thay come out in the gras,
And thay hop round like everything,
But its the birds in the trees wich sing."

"Thus we see that the spring of the tode
Is not the same way of advancin'
As the spring of the year; and tis showed Quite as clear that the fiddlin for dancin'
Aint done by the fellers that prancin'."

I ast Missy did she think that was nice poetry, and she sed it was reel sweet, but Billy he says if he was a poet he woud rather be a pirit and sail the ragin deep, and Ide like mity wel for to be one my own selfe, too, cos a pirit can make poetry if he wants to, but a poet cant sail the ragin deep cos it make him be sick and throw it up.

Jack Brily, wich is the wicked sailer, he says one time he was a workin on a ship, and there was a reel slick lukin feller cum on the ship for to be took to Virginny City, and wen the ship saild the slick feller he took out his book and rote:

"O giant waste of heevin blu,
Thou throwest up thine eye to woo
My soul, thow hart-inthraller!"

And wen the slick feller had got it rote, and was goin to rite some more, he was took reel bad in the stumack of his belly, and dropt his book for to go and be sick. Then Jack he picked up the fellers book and rote this for to finish the poetry:

"But I heeves frequenter than you,
And throws up more, I reckon, too,
Considerin I am smaller."

But that aint got any thing for to do with hop todes, xcept hop todes jumps and wen a feller is seezick he jumps too, for to git hissef a basin.

My sister's yung man was jest here this minnit ago, and he sed, "Johnny," and I spoke rite up and sed, "Wot?"

Then he sed: "Johnny, wot are you a dashin off for that gum dasted news paper, as yure uncle Edard wude pofanely say?"

Then I sed: "Hop todes."

Then the yung man he sad: "Lemme se it, and mebbly I can rite sum thing too."

And wen he seen it he sed: "I kano some thing a bout todes my ownself, and Ime a bigger poet than Missis Doppy, wich, as you have remarked somewere in yure works, has got a red head."

So he rote some poetry too, and I hav coppid it out, same as I al ways do bish, but his spein is mity poor yit, and his lies is fritefle!

"In a town that I knew
A toad grew and grew,
For it had other toads to eat;
And when it would jump,
And come down with a thump,
It would shake all the folks off their feet."

"Then the people they said:
'When to-night we're in bed,
'Tucked in snugly, we'll be all right.'
But they found that the shocks
Had stopped all the clocks,
And they couldn't tell when it was night."

"The toad kept a-hopping,
The folks kept a-dropping
And flopping at every leap.
It was all for the best,
But the toad got no rest,
And the people they got no sleep."

"Now the toad, being dead,
Can take breath; and in bed
Lies each man with a stone at his crown.
For the reptile did die
From leaping so high,
And the people from coming down."

If I cudent make better poetry than that Ide go for to be a sojer, yes indeed, Ide blong to the bras band and blo the buggle. And now lle tel you a little story.

One time a man was standin by side a stream of wotter, and he sed to hissef: "Wot a nice place for to bild a mill. lle bild one rite away."

Then there was a feller settin under the bank a fishin, and he had cot a frog for bate, but wen he herd the man say it he jest have the frog up on the bank at the man's feets, and spoke up and sed: "All rite, ole man, lle be the hopper."

That man didnt stay for to bild his mill, but lit out.

Mister Jonnice, wich has got the wuden leg, he says one time he was passin a fellers house, and the feller was a settin outside, a mendin a fishin rod with some glu and a string. Mister Jonnice he went in the house for to git a drink of wotter, and he found the mans wife sick a bed and jest reddy to die for some thing to cat, cos Mister Jonnice had ben a dockter and he kanew. So he giv the man sum money and tole him to go to town and bi some vittles mity quick, but wen he cum back that way a our later the man was jest puttin the glu on his fishin rod. So Mister Jonnice ast him wy in the devil he haddent ben for them vittles. Then the man he woudn the string around the glude place, mity carele, and then he sed: "You see I aint one of them shiffless galoots wich never takes holt and does things to once wen they ot to be done, but wen ever any thing is out of kilter bout this ranch you bej yer life I rassle round mity spritely til its fixt up; cos a family man cant afford to be potterin about wile his fish pole, frinstance, aint strong enuff for to suport his wife and children. Jest you put yer finger on that string wile I tie it, pardner"

But wen Katy, thats the new cook, has busted her lung she dont waste no time with glu, but jest tels "Johnny pocked it of with his lath," and goes a nuss, puttin pizen in the dinner.

OUR BRAVE DEFENDERS.

I should feel that an apology were due our readers for so frequently criticising the daily press of San Francisco if I did not believe it was the primal cause of many of the evils against which we are now contending. It is so utterly debauched, selfish, and unprincipled, that I feel justified in urging the community to make one supreme effort for its reformation. This is done in no unfriendly spirit to the persons who own those journals and control them, for with them all I am upon terms of friendly personal association. The trouble lies in the rivalries of the business in which they are engaged. Our city from its beginning has had a class of newspaper owners scrambling to obtain supremacy, and in their blind madness willing to sacrifice its best interests that the one may triumph over the other. For this time I let the Chronicle pass. It is making a bold and characteristic fight against the wealth, the property, and the business of the State. It has ridden its war charger with its bloody hoofs over this community for years. It has laid its braided thong upon many a bending back. It has carried the menace of its withheld accusations against many a timid pocket. It has achieved a splendid reputation for fearlessness by assailing those who would not pay. In the audacity of its power, it brands the merchants of our city as sneaks, and proclaimed to them, with a recklessness that comes either from assurance of power or desperation of condition, that it would remember and punish long after this fight is ended and forgotten those who should dare to withdraw from it their advertising patronage. It has become the champion of ignorance, vice, and misrule, as represented by the sand-lot. It has accepted the position of banner-bearer to Denis Kearney, and has staked its prosperity, if not its existence, on the side that does not think, and does not live in willing subserviency to the law. I leave this paper to the issue of the conflict it has invited. I think it was an unwise one, and do not believe the Chronicle, with all its genius, industry, and enterprise, can survive it. I am mistaken unless it is bleeding to death from internal hemorrhage. Its columns are pale from the wasting vitality of withdrawn advertisements. To those who do not understand the business of newspaper padding it makes a brave show of paying announcements, but the knife is in the wound.

The condition of the Call is a more anomalous one, and so much more contemptible and cowardly, that, had I to choose the ownership of either journal named, I would take the Chronicle as the lesser infamy. I would compare them as Robin Hood and Jacques Strop. The one, the bold highwayman who meets you and demands your business or your life; and the other the panel thief who steals your pantaloons to search for small advertisements. The one, the bold buccaneer who sails the sea for pillage under the broad pennant of death's head and crossbones; the other the sneaking yawl with muffled oar that steals under wharves for grain sweepings, broken sacks, and bits of coal. For the moral coward I have no respect; for the bully I have at least respect for his courage. I have no respect for the man or the newspaper, the preacher or the politician, who, in time of great excitement, when the community divides in opinions, does not take the one side or the other. No honest man with blood in him ever saw a dog fight that he did not take sides. The blood of the amphibious animal that can live on land or in water is cold and colorless. In this conflict in which I think the safety of the community is involved, and in which the better class is earnestly engaged in fighting for self-preservation, the Call says: In this contest I have no interest; I will look calmly on, making gain from either side, and when the conflict is ended, like the camp-followers at Bannockburn, I will plunder the dead, and then I will march with the living under the banner of the victory they have gained. This is the attitude of the cowardly Call. Its editorial columns are non-committal upon this vital question. Its news columns are crowded with accounts of Kearney's triumphant march, taking its reports from Kearney's secretary, Carl Browne—withholding editorial comment. It is full of sand-lot, ward club, and workingmen's meetings. Not bold enough to utter an opinion, it is audacious enough to crowd its news columns with lying accounts of enthusiasm—numbers that never existed—and by perverting incidents to the protection of Kearney's reputation for courage and decency. This journal does not ride the highway with pistol in hand demanding tribute, but sits by the roadside, as in Hart's picture of the mendicant monkey, with piteous expression, holding up his sore tail in bloody rag, asking alms—the alms of small advertisements. Merchants, bankers, and business men who have the courage to resist the bandit, have not the sense to see through the device of the fraud that practices beggary.

And now, with less of contempt and less of passion, let us consider the Bulletin in its attitude toward the community in which, and upon which, it exists. I pass over its birth and bloody baptism, its bold early career, its faults, its mistakes, its crimes, its accomplishments for good, its services toward the public. I will not endeavor to analyze the motives of its proprietors, or at this late day to question how disinterested they may have been in their public service. Let us guess that in its relations with the community it is at least even in the way of compensation, and that when this Kearney upheaval begun San Francisco owed it for no service unrequited. Its proprietors have grown rich and prospered; they have exercised power and influence; they have been well fed and clothed as the result of their commerce in news, and been well compensated in the sale of their opinions. This sand-storm arose, threatening to overwhelm and destroy the community upon which it had thrived. Alarm was abroad. Men of sense were disturbed at the passionate uprising of this criminal class. Business men, merchants, mechanics, and honest laborers were on guard to protect the city from threatened violence. Out of an organized violence came an organized party of political demagogues, who to the menace of the fire-brand added the menace of robbery by the use of the ballot. At this time, when all was commotion, the writer of this article with a leading banker called upon Charles de Young, G. K. Fitch, and Loring Pickering, and begged them to desist from their course in giving undue prominence to Kearney and his agitators. Our argument can be imagined without entering the details. Our interview failed, but I must do Mr. Charles de Young the justice to say that he was willing, and authorized me to propose to the newspaper enemy an armistice in this direction—one that was in the interest of public welfare and honorable to the parties interested, and one which, if it had been acted upon, would have saved our State and city the scandal of this great disgrace. Messrs. Pickering and Fitch utterly repudiated the proposed armistice, and rejected any terms that would prevent them from making money out of the excitement. They left upon me the impression that they would not forego the sensation and the pay of making the most of the sand-storm if they knew the bursting cloud would destroy the town.

Now, let us regard the attitude of these journals—the Call and Bulletin. They are the property of a common ownership. One proprietor in New York purveys news for both. The other proprietors occupy desks in the same office, use the same place for printing, virtually the same type, presses, agents and agencies. They are copartners in business and friends of thirty years' standing. In the morning issues the Call; in the evening the Bulletin. The Call is the organ of the sand-lot; the Bulletin is the advocate of the extreme class. The Call seeks the small advertisements of servant girls; the Bulletin seeks the announcements of merchants, bankers, and corporations. The Bulletin is engaged in earnest opposition to the adoption of the Constitution; the Call is silent regarding it. The Bulletin announces that "Kearney held his usual sand-lot meeting on Sunday," and then gives a column of condensed sermons from orthodox pulpits; the Call gives two columns to exaggerated detail of the sand-lot business, and epitomizes all the blasphemies and blackguardism of the labor clubs. The Bulletin affects to be independent, leaning toward the Republican party; the Call affects to be independent, leaning toward the Democracy; while the editors and owners of these journals sit back to back to each other, writing from the same room, and pooling the profits of the business. Yet the gentlemen to whom we refer think themselves above the average of good citizens. They are men of courage, good habits, and cleanly lives. The Bulletin is an able and interesting newspaper; the staff of both journals is respectable, and composed of writers of more than average ability. But where is the principle, the moral courage, the unselfish independence, that allows the utterance of bold and manly and honest thought? Where the independence of opinion that makes a journal respected, honored, and influential?

Would such a copartnership be allowed in any other business? Would Mr. McAllister be allowed to take one side and Mr. Bergen the other of a contested suit at law? Would this paper be endured if, by the mere changing of its name, it should issue on Wednesday a sheet in advocacy of the supposed interests of the ignorant mob of the sand-lot, and favor the adoption of the new Constitution, in order to divide with the idle and the vicious the accumulations of the industrious and the provident, and on Saturday issue the ARGONAUT in the interest of society, law, intelligence, and property? Do Messrs. Pickering, Fitch, and Simonton think their heads are so safely hidden under the sand that the more prominent part of their persons are not observable? Do they think that an intelligent community does not weigh and consider these things, and that thereby the real influence of their journals are utterly destroyed? Do they not know that business men look upon them as mere money-makers, and in an unprincipled way, and that their newspapers are mere machines, through which an uncolored fact and an unselfish opinion can not run? And then does not the community fully understand that in this exigency every five-cent piece paid the Bulletin is divided with the Call?—every advertisement paid at the Bulletin counter is halved at the shop across the street? And if it is true, or if it ever should become true, that the exigencies of the business community should compel it to submit to the exactions of the Bulletin, and raise a fund to induce it to oppose the adoption of the Constitution, that just one-half the money would go to the Call, who is fighting for the new Constitution, for Kearney, and chaos? With this conundrum I rest the argument, with the simple inoffensive remark, that a community that will longer endure this thing without making an effort to capitalize an independent, decent, and respectable daily journal, deserves, in the language of the Chronicle, "to be remembered and punished long after this fight is ended and forgotten."

The question seems to be an open one whether oranges can be raised elsewhere in California than in the semi-tropical south. When in Europe in 1869, we spent a winter in Naples. This is an orange country. Sorrento orchards, some twenty miles away, are famous. Sicily is not so far from Naples as Los Angeles from San Francisco. During this winter, and for weeks at a time, we saw the fountains frozen up, icicles formed into great blocks of solid ice, the ground congealed, and vehicles rattling over frozen pavements that did not for days yield to the melting influence of the sun. The wind came howling down from the snow-clad summits of the Apennines, yet no orange trees were injured, nor did the inhabitants seem to regard this cold spell as exceptional. Young orange trees must be nursed through the tenderness of their infantile days. When grown they are hardy trees.

In 1856, when Volney E. Howard, General and Commander-in-Chief of all the law and order forces, was taken prisoner of war by the Vigilantes, he was conducted to the Bastille of Fort Gunny Bags, and there held in captivity till a council of war was held over him. It was unanimously resolved, by some six hundred citizens in council, that, as he was the least capable, the least efficient, and the least formidable person that the Governor could have selected leader of the military forces of the State, he be immediately set at liberty. It was so determined, and General Volney E. Howard was escorted over the sand-bags to his liberty with his side arms and all the honors of war.

When Lavalley, the pedestrian, dropped dead in his tracks at Woonsocket, the other day, a wag approached the body and solemnly exclaimed: "Here rests his head upon the lap of earth." It wasn't a very funny joke after all, but every right-thinking person will be grateful for its occasion. A bad joke is better than a living pedestrian any day.

THE TYPICAL OAKLANDER.

Emerald's Narrative Continued.—I was talking about that typical widow when Mr. de L. rushed in and wanted another batch of those confounded bills made out; and the widow's was among them. Now, I'm soft-hearted, and, bless me, haven't much heart in making out the bills of those lone, unprotected women who come to this side of the bay for change of air. But, Lord! the way our young men take to them is a caution and a mortification to those nice, single girls who wear those nice new turban things on their heads when they come down to breakfast in the morning, smelling just as sweet as new milk fresh from the cow. But it seems to me that I am getting farther and farther away from the thing that scientific fellow wanted me to work out. Hallo! now I've got my eye on a he typical, and I'm blessed if I don't think he'll fit. There's a young man here who wears spectacles, don't drink, don't smoke, and writes for the religious papers. He eats nothing stronger than pie at dinner, and don't know lager beer from Jamaica rum. He suffers from cold feet, and pays four bits a week to the bell boy for hot bottles. He's a book-keeper in a bank I understand, and has a half interest in a Sunday-school in San Francisco. He heard the porter curse the other day, and he took him aside and talked to him about his soul and gave him two bits not to do it again. I saw him treating at the bar with that same quarter five minutes afterward. Now, that's as near a typical Oaklander as I can come. This book-keeper has piety, cultchaw, wears spectacles, has cold feet, eats pie, and gets sick at the smell of tobacco. Why, good Lord! now that I believe I've struck it, I remember that the town is just full of such fellows, and I've nailed the typical right here. His hair is a little short, and the scientific lunatic may object to that, but I can go out into the street any day and pick him out one with straight hair. Sunday at the church door is just the place to trap him.

[This concluded Mr. Emerald's narrative. The next roll of manuscript was written in a neater hand, and the flourish that distinguished the chirography indicated the experienced hotel clerk. It was entitled:—]

Narrative of William Starch, Clerk at the G. C.—I have been twenty-five years in this business, and don't believe in scientific fellows. I go more on brokers. When they come over here for a holiday they think the town belongs to 'em. Anyhow they take possession of the bar of this hotel. I am not nervous about my wages now, though I confess that some month ago I was very timid on that point. But, heaven be praised, the winter is over, and the summer boarder will be accommodated on the most reasonable terms—fires in rooms, and meals served in private apartments, extra. The scientific man, who is making every lady crazy in this town hunting for what he calls the typical Oaklander, has been here asking me to take notes. I can give him lots of typical; why, the bar-room and billiard-room are full of them every night. Most of my typicals wear ulsters and work for small salaries. How those two things happen to go together I don't know; but since the winter began I've never seen a light-salaried clerk that wasn't fond of an ulster, and the more pockets it had, the poorer was the fellow that wore it. Well, of that sort of typicals we have a great plenty. The only time they are out of their ulsters is when they are casting up their accounts or doing errands over in the city, and I'm not so sure but some of them don't sleep in their beloved cases. Here's that old lady's bell in No. —ringing again. Wants the bill itemized, does she? May the —[here Mr. Starch's narrative is much blotted and crossed, as if that gentleman were irritated in no small degree.]

ENTRE NOUS.

We were both amused and indignant at a conversation we overheard between an Irishman and a German upon the California Street cars on Friday morning. The Irishman was eloquent upon the wrongs of labor, the oppression of capital. This was the hardest, worst, and meanest country for poor men he had ever known. In Ireland, he said, he was a slave by reason of class distinctions; he had escaped from that country, to find the same class distinctions growing up here. He prospered here in the early days, but was no longer prosperous. He had a family of grown sons and daughters, able and willing to work, and he would vote for the Constitution in order to bring about a change. Things could not be worse. The German replied to him that he, too, had left his native land and found a home in this. He had prospered, and in his opinion there was no other spot on God's footstool where labor was so well rewarded as in California; that there was no other land so favorable, in all its conditions, for poor men; that the necessities of life were in reach of all, and the luxuries attainable by every person who was able and willing to work; that here he was a citizen and an elector, a freeman, protected by law, and had nothing in the world to complain of; that there was abundant land at nominal price, where any industrious man, with working sons and daughters, could make for himself and family an independent, and in time a luxurious, home. The arrival at the car at Kearny Street terminated the conversation.

Rumor puts it that the Chronicle, ashamed of Kearney, has plotted to get rid of him, has persuaded him not to stump the State, and has made arrangements to send him out of the country. The Chronicle is now running the Constitution alone, and it is the only journal of importance advocating it. It hires Platt's Hall for meetings. Its attorneys do most of the talking. It prints and sends abroad its documents with a liberal hand. If the Chronicle wins, we shall hear the pealing of clarion bells; if it fails we shall hear the sound of its brazen clapper muffled in mournful rags of melancholy flannel. It is life or death for the Chronicle.

Bill of Fare for Six Persons.—Sunday, April 20, 1879.

Sorrel Soup.
Boiled Chicken, Oyster Sauce.
Beef Croquettes. Lyonnaise Potatoes.
Roast Lamb. Asparagus à l'Argonaut.
Salade Sudoise.
Lemon Pie. Strawberries.
Fruit-bowl of Oranges, Apples, and Bananas.

SALADE SUDOISE.—Cut in small cubes and put into an earthen kitchen basin some cooked red beef-tongue, cold boiled potatoes, raw-peeled sour apples, cooked beets and carrots, and the fillets of two salt herrings previously soaked; season with salt, pepper, oil, vinegar, chopped parsley, and prepared mustard; mix well, arrange in a heap in a salad-bowl, surround with stoned olives, and serve. These may be coarsely chopped to answer the same purpose.

PRATTLE.

An ingenious gunsmith of this city has invented, and will patent, a fire-alarm box which can hardly fail to have an important influence on society. This contrivance, which has been exhibited to the Commissioners, and was by them highly commended, is expected to prevent malicious alarms by simply capturing by the arm and holding the person who has the benevolence and hardihood to operate it, only the "designated depositaries" of keys being able to set him free. After all, he will probably, in the confusion, be overlooked, and should the fire master the engines, roasted at his post. The certain loss of liberty and possible forfeiture of life will, it is feared, be reluctantly incurred—a disadvantage imperfectly balanced by the creation of a new and interesting criminal class to lurk about the alarm boxes and plunder the helpless captives who have incautiously braved the terrors of the invention.

The States of Pennsylvania and New Jersey appear to have an anomalous condition of things as regards their laws; some of the most important of which have not a uniform operation, but are limited to certain specified counties. One of these is the law taxing mortgages in the manner proposed by our blessed new Constitution; and concerning its action a Commission of the State of New York to revise that commonwealth's laws of taxation report that "the influence of the exemption has been most beneficial to the districts affected by it." The Commissioners add that they were informed by one conversant with the subject—a bloated brain-holder, doubtless, or a lecherous truth-teller—that "if it were possible to take in, as from an eminence, a view of the whole State [Pennsylvania or New Jersey] the counties in which mortgages are exempt from taxation would be as readily distinguished from the others as would a field of luxuriant wheat or corn from a field of scrub-oak or brushwood." Will Messrs. Terry and Howard have the fairness to confess that, merely as a graphic illustration, this is rather good.

Whether from copious official potations of lemonade, or increased exercise of lung in exemplary psalm-singing, it would be difficult to say, but the fact is apparent and conspicuous that since his installation as President Mr. Hayes is become disagreeably fat. Comparing his pictures of to-day with those of three years ago one is unpleasantly conscious of a change that is not for the better. He was not then pretty; he is now repulsive. He had then an expression of distinguished insignificance; he has now none at all. One does not like to echo the cry of "fraud" against the man seated by one's own party, but really it looks as if Mr. Hayes when a candidate had deliberately starved himself to catch the votes of the charitable by making it appear that he needed the office as much as it needed him. He could hardly have needed it less if his diaphragm had supported ponderous stalactites of fat and his entrails lain in leaves of tallow.

One of the early dispatches regarding the attempt upon the life of the Czar says it is thought that the miscreant is "an employé of the Minister of Finance." Financial questions are burning ones, the world over, but in this country, at least, no Secretary of the Treasury has endeavored to achieve the triumph of his policy by employing a practical politician to assassinate the Executive. There has been times, no doubt, when the European plan might have been adopted with obvious advantage, but our steady and rapid progress in the number of office-holders in the Department proves the general superiority of our milder system.

The Russian Minister's "worker" is thought to have prudently poisoned himself before trying to adjust his employer's difference with his angust master, for poison was found under the assailant's nails. This is a hasty conclusion, the result of excitement: that statesman was doubtless a member of the Russian National Greenback Labor party, and had been scratching himself.

The Government of Chile having a war on its hand proposes to issue ten million dollars' worth of notes having the same character for redeemableness as our own "battle-stained greenback;" and the peace party apprehend commercial and industrial disaster. The lessons of universal experience justify the misgiving, but after all, the evil will be temporary. What is most to be feared is the creation of that permanent public sentiment in favor of a paper currency which these disasters never fail to produce. The inflationist is your only consistent homeopathist: he prescribes the cause of the disease. But he ventures to differ with the medical branch of his "school" as to the quantity of the dose.

"Constitutions are intended to protect the weak against the strong, the poor against the rich, the right against might."—Solano Republican. You are wrong, good friend: what you have said is as pure nonsense as it would have been to say that constitutions are intended to protect the sick against the well, the deaf against those who can hear, the man who rides a horse from the man who rides a cow. In short, no one in this whole controversy—the platitudinarian of the Chronicle not forgotten—has said a stupider thing than this that you have uttered, as the fundamental principle of a fundamental law. Constitutions are intended to protect the people from their representatives, constituents from legislators. Their function is to restrain the men who make the law from doing mischief to the men who make the law-makers. The people whom they are designed to protect and the people whom they are intended to restrain can not be parted by any other line; with the one drawn by you Constitutions have no more to do than with a quail track in the snow.

A Constitution, uninstructed contemporary, is simply a record of those principles of legislation which have passed the stage of experiment, and are known to be of general application and permanent value. It is a compilation of what is settled in the science of government—concerning which further debate is needless, further generalization impossible. A Constitution spares each generation the trouble of traversing ground already traversed by generations preceding. It takes us to the hither limit of the debatable and experimental, and there it leaves us. The provisions of a Constitution are the stakes and signals of the line already surveyed; we reverse our transit instrument not to correct the line, but to prolong it. If there is error we know not whither we go; if there is a doubt, the doubt condemns. This new Constitution is an untraceable confusion of hap-hazard stakes, the guess-work of unaided eyes in uninstructed heads.

Borrowing another figure from the surveyor's science, we may consider a Constitution the base-line upon which the legislator constructs his intricate system of triangles covering the whole domain of human rights and determining the relation of each to all the rest. An error in the base-line is cumulative, and vitiates the whole work. If the Director of the Coast Survey were informed that a base-line suitable for his purpose had been established by a hundred and fifty men unskilled in the use of instruments, selected by a population ignorant of the purpose of a base-line, would he even so much as trouble himself to go and examine their work? Of course not: knowing that it couldn't be right why should he see if it were? Yet the capacity, training, and experience required in this delicate operation are nothing so rare as those necessary to the drafting of a Constitution. Read it? Certainly not! Have you not already read the names of the barbarians who made it?

PASSING SENTENCE.

"Miss Mabel Santley, stand up, naughty lass,
For the sentence this Court deems it righteous to pass."

Miss Santly
Was scanty
Attired, for her parents were poor,
And the hot blood of modesty rushed
To Judge Ferral's fine face; yes, he blushed
At the sight of each pretty contour.

"This Court, Miss, is shocked
By the way that you're frocked—
So very remarkably brief,
As if simply arrayed
In a fig-leaf, you jade,
And the leaf were a skeleton leaf!

"Now, pris'ner, just give us your pas—
The Can-can, they call it, eh! Ah!
The jury was right—
It's unfit for the sight!
(Ho! Usher—more light!)
Now, pris'ner, turn round,
So, it's bad, I'll be bound—
Immoral in outline, in detail unsound!

"Now, Mabel,
If able,
You'll please be so good
As to show how you stood
On one foot
When you put
Up the other. Just so—just like that.
Now try to kick off the Court's hat.
Hey! Brava!—that is, Miss,
It's naughty bad business,
That's flat.

"Now, then, you will please pose like this—
As if giving the Court a kiss—
Oh! Jimminy!—would you?
How dare you?—how could you?
You've not understood—you Should never—no, never!
That is, hardly ever,
Even in sport,
Commit such outrageous contempt of this Court!

"You sweet little,
Neat little—
H'm—ab—exactly—yes—that is to say,
I fine you two hundred, and, minx, you must pay.
This Court is uncommonly moral to-day.
Your show to the devil I sternly devote,
And wish I could fine all the wretches who gloat!"

The Ulyssean journals have already begun to magnify the unquestioned military capacity of their candidate for the highest civic station. Quid ergo? Did not the frankest of the Franks, Napoleon, say, "The worse the man the better the soldier?" He added, you remember: "If soldiers be not corrupt they should be made so," but Generals Babcock and Belknap are of a different opinion.

A PASSION PLAY.

I heard a voice out of Heaven crying—
I heard a voice from the earth replying.

FIRST VOICE:
The Saviour once was made to feel
Men's wrath at His behavior;
And now they look up James O'Neill
For looking like the Saviour!

SECOND VOICE:
What Earth attests let Heaven record,—
Men's wrath at James they level
Because, while looking like the Lord,
He's acting like the Devil!

A Consular Court seems to be about the only tribunal in which to get justice and enough of it. The captain, first officer, and cook of the British bark Guiding Star, having filed charges and counter charges of drunkenness, insubordination, attempt to poison, and general incivility against one another, Her Majesty's Consul at this port, assisted by a couple of sea-faring men, sat for their trial. The court promptly adjudged them all guilty as charged, and severely censured the captain, removed the first officer, and fined the cook, the costs of the court being divided among them. If a dash of this British despotism could be injected into our judicial system the effect would be wholesome and refreshing.

"On the 4:15 train from this city to Alameda yesterday, on the narrow gauge railroad, a vote on the new Constitution resulted in 52 against and 18 for."—Call. So much for the distended aristocrats. At daylight on the same day a purse-proud cattle-grabber near the San Leandro turnpike polled a brotherhood of Nature's roving noblemen who were shaking themselves out of his straw-stack, and the result was 250 for the new Constitution, none against. There were but fifty of the nomadic statesmen, but from force of habit most of them voted six or seven times each. There's a "straw" for you—a whole stack of it, 'egad! And the gentleman who owns it says it will give the same political indication seven mornings in the week.

Says Kearney: "They lick me,
They whack me, they kick me—
I'm failing and laid on the shelf.
Then, lads, for all new Constitutions, hurroo!
For, bedad, I need one for meself!"

Mr. Peter Stevens, of Chicago, may rightly be said to be in a painful position before the public. Mr. Stevens being on trial for murder—the tenor of the dispatches seems to point to Mrs. Stevens, or some gentleman friend, as the other party to the crime—took the witness stand in his own behalf, "reading a number of letters found by him in his wife's trunk, and written by young men in ardent, lover-like strains." This "duty to himself" must have been disagreeable to Mr. Stevens, even if he possesses elocutionary abilities of no common order; for in its performance, with whatever exercise of tact and discretion, he could hardly avoid inflicting pain upon the writers and upon Mrs. Stevens as well, if she is living. It is to be regretted that the judge did not interpose his authority to prevent this grave affront to the feelings of persons not willfully connected with the crime, and not on trial. The sanctity of a private correspondence of this kind can not be violated without seriously imperiling the tenderest social relations that distinguish men and women from the beasts.

Mr. John Hanks, a rather obscure person of no fortune, is walking moodily down Montgomery Street, thinking what it were best to do. For it is the evening of the day appointed for his marriage to a wealthy lady of considerable celebrity; but at the last moment the charmer has eschewed Mr. Hanks, marrying another and a better man. He meets a friend who, according to current custom and local etiquette, says: "Hello, Hanks!" The familiar salutation is at first unheeded; then, with a slight start, the sufferer, lifting eyes of friendly recognition, exclaims: "Ah! you are right—I shall live and die as John Hanks."

School Director Leggett has decided to vote for the new Constitution, but the Election Commissioners have as yet been unable to decide if Mr. Leggett has a right to vote. He is like the man who, being on trial for his life, looked at his watch as the jury retired, and remarked: "I hope they will lose no time disputing; I am going to the circus."

"The detectives are strongly impressed by Mr. Chalfant's story, and are inclined to believe in its truth, the whole manner of the man, in their opinion, showing the most kindly nature, and one which would not entertain the commitment of a cold-blooded murder."—Bulletin. As a matter of form, however, it is probably as well to give the man a trial before a jury of non-detectives; the kindly nature of one who has for some years persisted in the use of another's property without paying for it, invariably absconding without satisfying the judgments obtained against him, being less apparent than a skillful lawyer will be able to make it. It will be more satisfactory to Mr. Chalfant himself to have a formal approval of his action from twelve men less distinguished for credulity and compassion than the truly good of our detective police have the happiness to be.

It is from no desire to prejudice Mr. Chalfant that these remarks are made, but it is not permitted to our detective police to make mischief without rebuke. Their business, so far as it appears, is to receive the surrender of fugitives from justice, and the rewards offered for their capture; the community which employs them can dispense with their opinions as to the guilt or innocence of the persons whom they lock up. Those who have not had the advantage of such ocular evidence as Dr. Chalfant's tears, "fever blisters," and "swollen tongue," can not boast themselves eye-witnesses of his innocence. These think they have a right to know why a man of "kindly nature," incapable of murder, enters the room of a man whom he has most reason to fear and most cause to hate, "enforces respect" by drawing a pistol, and when it has been accidentally discharged walks out of the house without a word to any one about the dead man lying on the floor. It is the misfortune of this bad business to resemble the thing of which a kindly nature can not—as the Bulletin would elegantly say—"entertain the commitment."

Behold two Alaskan savages tried,
For killing a person who afterward died.
Though Kotkowot
Did not go scot
Free, Okkhonot
From the dock to trot
Was told, and kicked out beside.
Now Kotkowot and Okkhonot,
Whiskot, Badlot, and Godknoswhat,
Are sadly watching their several shames.
For the first must suffer the hangman's knot,
And the rest of the gang,
Unable to hang,
Are sentenced for life to their terrible names!

The New York World believes "the silver question" is "coming rapidly to the front" in England. Certainly, and so is the "protection to home industries" question, and a number of others. This simply means that there are great commercial depression and distress among the uneducated. Protection and more kinds of money are the principal remedies for "hard times" invariably prescribed by the "natural man." England, however, has an advantage which we lack. Her ailing industries clamor in the same way as ours for laws that would give them the coup de grâce, but fortunately for her that pale-faced Potawottamie, the self-made man, has not yet occupied her "halls of legislation," and the "intelligent masses" have their noise for their trouble. It's a pretty bad field over there for the political theories of Colonel Tom, Judge Dick, and the Honorable Mr. Harry.

In our own country reform comes from below, and it is pretty much the same kind of reform as that effected by the housemaid who washes a flight of stairs by her bottom.

THE SPRING FASHIONS.

In the face of the shrinkage in the value of real estate all over the country, the fashion openings of this spring season of 1879 have been as numerous, as extensive, and more brilliant in some respects than for ten years past. The noticeable features in the openings of this spring are the profusion of Breton laces, both black and white, used in decorating both millinery and dress confections, the increase of gold and silver and ribbons, brocades, braids, beads, and tinsel in all toilets intended for house and evening wear, or for dress occasions, and the too frequent insistence of this style of ornamentation for bonnets and hats worn in the street as well as to the opera or to receptions. Lace and feather trimmings, and quantities of artificial flowers, are seen on the dressiest evening toilets, and paniers or draperies to produce panier effects appear on nearly all dresses not intended for street wear. But the walking dress proper is as close and clinging as ever in its appearance, and is decidedly short—too short, when in the extreme of mode, for ladies who have not the prettiest of little feet. Some of the short dresses made for garden, lawn, archery, and croquet parties are excessively gay and picturesque, and inexperienced dressers might make a mistake of modelling their walking or street suits after these designs. The most daring latitude in contrasting colors is permitted in a costume intended for an out-door party. For instance, one of the latest designs is in pale French gray camel's hair for the polonaise over a short silk skirt of the same delicate hue. The waistcoat, inserted in lozenge style, is of black silk, embroidered in jardinière effects, with cuffs of the same. The edges of the lozenge that shows the waistcoat is defined by a gray and steel cord galloon, and large bows of satin ribbon, in old gold, rose-colored, and black stripes, loop up the draperies of the polonaise in front, on one side, and in the back. Rhine crystal buttons in silver settings fasten the waistcoat to the throat, where a Breton lace fraise and jabot bow is placed, corresponding with a similar finish in the wrists. In full evening dresses there is not so much tendency to strong contrasts in the colors of the different materials used as in those intended for afternoon, reception, dinner, and carriage dresses. Pompadour gauzes and pékiné foulards are used for parts of such toilets, and these, with their striped grounds, with flower and vine patterns running all over them, give them a gorgeous and picturesque effect when made up with waistcoat and sleeve trimmings of one color, and the rest of the costume of another shade harmonizing the Pompadour gauzes or the pékiné foulards. Rows of contrasting color, and fringes and passementeries or embroideries, combining the various colors of the costume, and enlivened with strands and seedings of crystal, jet, garnet, amber, or gold beads, are used in profusion on such toilets. Gendarme blue is a favorite color in both reception or dinner and short street costumes. With the first it is most frequently combined with old gold or canary color; with the last it appears in combination with beige or écru. Some of the prettiest walking dresses seen this spring are in beige-colored camel's hair or French bunting for the principal parts of the costume, with the waistcoat, cuffs, and revers of striped gendarme blue and beige satin. Rhine pebble buttons, or buttons of colored crystal (glass) matching the colors of the costume, are used on many of these dressiest short costumes. Garnet in various shades is seen in combination with old gold in a similar manner for both street and reception dresses, while bronze green, though diminishing in popularity, is still one of the favorite dress colors, and one that combines equally well with old gold, rose color, or pale blue. Millinery follows the same rules of color for dresses, and it is much more fashionable now than in the winter for the bonnet or hat to match the costume in color and shade. Many of the chips and straws come in shades of gendarme blue, bronze green, garnet, beige, and gray, and in shaded effects of various colors, the braids being shaded to produce the jardinière effects seen in the most picturesque costumes. The shapes are of every imaginable kind; but there is an unmistakable tendency to larger forms in both hats and bonnets, both in the crowns and brims. The shirred satin lining to the brims, whether they are flaring or projecting, is a marked feature. As the season advances, the inclination for fancy marabout feathers and ostrich tips is developed, and feathers, flowers, lace, ribbon, and silk are all frequently seen on the same bonnet, with ornaments of steel, silver, gold, and crystal in new and beautiful forms. Dragon flies, bees, and beetles in silver, set with Rhine crystals, is a favorite bonnet ornament, and they look especially well when used to fasten cascades and scarfs or strings of either black or white Breton lace. From a large number of trimmed hats and bonnets seen at late openings, the following descriptions will give an idea of the variety in both shapes and trimmings:

A white chip gypsy bonnet, lined with a shirring of black satin—a delicate rim of Breton lace coquilles, fastened to a bandeau of black satin, with silver and crystal bees, forming a hint of a face trimming. Three ostrich tips, white and gendarme blue, nod over the crown. A gendarme blue ribbon torsade encircles the crown, and Breton lace plaitings edge the strings, which are arranged to form part of the crown trimmings. A few large yellow roses and other flowers and foliage are placed on one side of the crown.

A pale straw-colored Canton crape bonnet, trimmed with sulphur-colored gauze, shot with gold. The poke brim is lined with a shirring of gendarme blue satin and a plaiting of Breton lace. There is a spray of yellow jasmine and a knot of houstonias on one side of the crown, a white and blue ostrich plume, half and half, with the midrib dividing the color on the other side, and an Alsace bow of gendarme blue ribbon in front. Strings of the same ribbon, edged with plaitings of Breton lace, that form in part the cape in the back.

A delicate-tinted Tuscan straw of capote form, but larger than the old style capotes. The front is turned up as a diadem, and so is the small curtain in the back; both are lined with gold-colored satin. The crown is completely covered with the starry blooms of white Marguerites with yellow centres. A scarf of ivory-tinted Breton lace winds around the crown and forms the strings; some yellow jonquils, a blush rose, three red rosebuds, and some white hyacinth sprigs form the flower trimming, and a white marabout feather on one side, fastened with a silver and crystal

OUR LIBRARY OF OLD FAVORITES.

Cleopatra's Dream.—A Revel of the Imagination.

[In satisfaction of the importunities of many subscribers, we reprint the following verses, which appeared in one of the first issues of the ARGONAUT. This remarkable poem, by Story, was originally published in Blackwood's Magazine, and for a long time its author was unknown. It is something that will bear reading over and over again as a pure psychological study. The words are those of a lunatic, the logic is that of love.]

Here, Charmian, take my bracelets;
They bar with a purple stain
My arms. Turn over my pillows—
They are hot where I have lain.
Open the lattice wider,
A gauze on my bosom throw,
And let me inhale the odors
That over the garden flow.

I dreamed I was with my Antony,
And in his arms I lay;
Ah, me! the vision has vanished—
Its music has died away.
The flame and the perfume hath perished—
As this spiced aromatic pastille
That wound the blue smoke of its odor
Is now but an ashy hill.

Scatter upon me rose leaves—
They cool me after my sleep;
And with sandal odors fan me
Till into my veins they creep.
Reach down the lute, and play me
A melancholy tune,
To rhyme with a tune that has vanished,
And the slumbering afternoon.

There, drowsing in golden sunlight,
Loiters the low, smooth Nile,
Through slender papaya, that cover
The sleeping crocodile;
The lotus loils on the water,
And opens its heart of gold,
And over its broad leaf pavement
Never a ripple is rolled.
The twilight breeze is too lazy
Those feathery palms to wave,
And yon little cloud is as motionless
As a stone above the grave.

Ah, me! this lifeless nature
Oppresses my heart and brain.
Oh, for a storm and thunder,
For lightning, and wild, fierce rain!
Fling down that lute—I hate it!
Take rather his buckler and sword,
And crash them and clash them together
Till this sleepiog world is stirred.

Hark to my Indian beauty!
My cockatoo, creamy and white,
With roses under his feathers,
That flash across the light.
Look, listen, as backward and forward
To his boop of gold he clings;
How he trembles, with crest uplifted,
And he shrieks as he madly swings.
O cockatoo, shriek for Antony!
Cry, "Come, my love, come home!"
Shriek, "Antony! Antony! Antony!"
Till he hears you even in Rome.

There, leave me, and take from my chamber
That wretched little gazelle,
With its bright black eyes so meaningless,
And its silly tinkling bell.
Take him—my nerves he vexes—
The thing without blood or brain,
Or, by the body of Isis,
I'll snap his thin neck in twain!

Leave me to gaze at the landscape,
Mistily stretching away,
When the afternoon's opaline tremors
O'er the mountains quivering play—
Till the fiercer splendor of sunset
Pours from the west its fire,
And, melted as in a crucible,
Their earthly forms expire—
And the bald, bleak skull of the desert
With glowing mountains is crowned,
That, burning like molten jewels,
Circle its temple round.

I will lie and dream of the past time,
Æons of thought away,
And through the jungles of memory
Loosen my fancy to play;
When, a smooth and velvety tiger,
Ribbed with yellow and black,
Supple and cushion-footed,

I wandered where never the track
Of a human creature had rustled
The silence of mighty woods,
And, fierce in a tyrannous freedom,
I knew but the law of my moods.
The elephant, trumpeting, started
When he heard my footsteps near,
And the spotted giraffe fled wildly
In a cloud of yellow fear.
I sucked in the noontide splendor
Quivering along the glade,
Or yawning, panting, and dreaming,
Basked in the tamarind shade,
Till I heard my mate roaring.

As the shadows of night came on
To brood in the trees' thick branches,
And the shadow of my sleep was gone.
Then I roused and roared in answer,
And unsheathed from my cushioned feet
My curving claws, and stretched me,
And wandered my mate to greet.
We toyed in the amber moonlight
Upon the warm, flat sand,
And struck at each other our massive arms—
How powerful he was and grand!
His yellow eyes flashed fiercely
As he crouched and gazed at me,
And his quivering tail, like a serpent,
Twisted, curving nervously.
Then like a storm he seized me,
With a wild, triumphant cry,
And we met, as two clouds in heaven
When the thunders before them fly.
We grappled and struggled together,
For his love, like his rage, was rude;
And his teeth in the swelling folds of my neck
At times, in our play, drew blood.

Often another suitor—
For I was flexible and fair—
Fought for me in the moonlight
While I lay crouching there,

Till his blood was drained by the desert,
And, baffled with triumph and power,
He licked and laid beside me
To breathe him a vast half hour.
Then down to the fountain we loitered,
Where the antelopes came to drink;
Like a bolt we sprang upon them,
Ere they had time to shrink;
We drank their blood and crushed them,
And tore them limb from limb,
And the hungriest lion doubted
Ere he disputed with him.

That was a life to live for!—
Not this weak human life,
With its frivolous, bloodless passions,
Its poor and petty strife!
Come to my arms, my hero!
The shadows of twilight grow,
And the tiger's ancient fierceness
In my veins begins to flow.
Come not cringing to sue me!
Take me with triumph and power,
As a warrior that storms a fortress—
I will not shrink or cower.
Come, as we came in the desert
Ere we were women and men,
When the tiger spell was on us,
And love as you loved me then.

Snowdrop.

When, full of warm and eager love,
I clasp you in my fond embrace,
You gently push me back and say:
"Take care, my dear, you'll spoil my lace."

You kiss me just as you would kiss
Some woman friend, you chance to see;
You call me "dearest." All love's forms
Are yours, not far its reality.

O Annie! cry, and storm, and rave!
Do anything with passion in it!
Hate me one hour, and then turn round
And love me truly, just one minute.

W. W. STOREY.

Dreams.

From older legends springing
Appears a snow white band,
With joyous strains, and singing,
From some far magic land.

Whose flowers in growing splendor
Pine in the evening sun,
And bridal glances tender
Cast sweetly every one;

Where all the trees, uniting
In chorus, shout below,
And babbling brooks, delighting
The ear, like music flow;
And love soogs fierce and burning
Unheard of bliss impart,
Till sweet and wondrous yearning
Befools the throbbing heart.

Ah, could I thither travel,
And ease my aching breast,
And all my grief unravel,
And then be free and blest!

That land, whence care and trouble
Are vanish'd, that in dreams
Oft see I, like a bubble
Dissolves, when morning beams.

HEINE.

Companions.

I know not of what we pondered
Or made pretty pretense to talk,
As, her hand within mine, we wandered
Toward the pool by the lime-tree walk,
While the dew fell in showers from the passion flowers,
And the blush-rose bent on her stalk.

I can not recall her figure.
Was it regal as Juno's own?
Or only a trifle bigger
Than the elves who surround the throne
Of the Fairy Queen, and are seen, I ween,
By mortals in dreams alone?

What her eyes were like I know not:
Perhaps they were blurred with tears;
And, perhaps, in your skies there glow not
(On the contrary) clearer spheres.
No! as to her eyes I am just as wise
As you or the cat, my dears.

Her teeth, I presume, were "pearly,"
But which was she, brunette or blonde?
Her hair, was it quaintly curly,
Or as straight as a beadle's wand?
That I failed to remark; it was rather dark
And shadowy round the pond.

Then the haud that reposed so snugly
In mine—was it plump or spare?
Was the countenance fair or ugly?
Nay, children, you have me there!
My eyes were p'haps blurred; and besides I'd heard
That it's horribly rude to stare.

And I—was I brusque and surly?
Or oppressively bland and fond?
Was I partial to rising early,
Or why did we twain abscond,
When nobody knew, from the public view
To prow! by a misty pond?

What passed, what was felt or spoken—
Whether anything passed at all—
And whether the heart was broken
That beat under that shelling shawl—
(If shawl she had on, which I doubt)—has gone,
Yes, gone from me past recall.

Was I haply the lady's suitor?
Or her uncle? I can't make out—
Ask your governess, dears, or tutor,
For myself, I'm in hopeless doubt
As to why we were there, who on earth we were,
And what this is all about.

C. S. CALVERLEY.

Wise Words.

Philosophy will clip an angel's wings,
Conquer all mysteries by rule and time,
Empty the haunted air and gnomed mine,
Unweave a rainbow.

KEATS.

THE "MODJESKA RECEPTION."

A year and a half has passed since Virginia City gave its grand and memorable "Modjeska Reception," yet to this day Virginia City society has remained in utter ignorance as to what caused the absence of Modjeska herself from that entertainment. It is my mission to explain that much and long discussed point:

When Harry Sargent, Modjeska's business manager, was in Virginia City, preparing for her appearance there, he was suddenly called to San Francisco. Before leaving he asked some friends to suggest a proper person to take charge of his affairs, as he would be unable to return. A person, who may be called Fred as well as anything else, was recommended, and before Sargent's departure duly vested with the numerous and mysterious rights and interests of a dramatic star's business manager. Fred was of the budding moustache age, and as decided and interesting a character as Virginia City (that town of characters) contained. He was the son of wealthy San Francisco parents, and had been sent to Virginia City by his father, to "reform" (?).

Fred worked in the mines, when he worked at all—which was only when the cash became uncomfortably low, or his creditors' pressure uncomfortably high. After leaving one mine, he would present to the superintendent of another a letter of recommendation signed by a dozen or more of San Francisco's most prominent mining magnates, which never failed to secure him work at his own convenience. His social career, which opened brilliantly, was cut short at an early date by his own most monstrous and uncalled for disregard for the fundamental rules of Comstock polite society.

